In Allegany county three republicans and one federalist were chosen by the people. The governor is elected by joint ballot of both houses; and, as the senate is wholly republican, a governor of that political character would have had a majority of three votes. But the people of one district of Allegany were deprived of their suffrages, and the four federal candidates declared elected. This exactly reversed the weight of parties, and would have given to the federal candidate for governor a majority of three, had all the members voted. But seventeen of them refused to vote.

Among her provisions in the election laws of Maryland, it is enacted, that the judges of the election, and their clerks, shall be qualified by an oath administered by a justice of the peace; or, the presiding judge, so qualified, may qualify his brother judges, and the clerks—or a clerk so qualified, may qualify the presiding judge, &c. The presiding judge of district no. 4, was a justice of the peace; he qualified the two other judges and the clerks, and was then himself qualified by a judge instead of a clerk. When one of the judges from each of the six districts of the county assembled to make a return, it was contended that the election in district no. 4, was illegal, for the cause of the qualification as above stated; and four of the assembled judges made out a return, they rejected all the votes thereto given, and so placed the four federal candidates highest on the list—the other two judges also made a return, giving credit to the whole number of votes received in the county, showing that three of the republican and one of the federal candidates were elected. The matter thus came before the house of delegates, a majority of which is federal. The committee of elections made a report in favor of those that had the minority of votes, and the house adopted it, on Saturday evening last. The Monday following was the constitutional day for electing the governor. It was thought the senate would not meet the house for the ballot—but, at a late hour, the principle that each house ought to be the judge of its own election, prevailed over what the senate unanimately believed a sacrifice of the rights of the people to a form, and gov. W. was re-elected as aforesaid.

The state of Maryland has a republican majority of votes greater than the federal majorities in New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Delaware united, and twice told: Yet, by the representation of the counties instead of the people, and by a mistake in addition thereto, the minority rules. See the table, page 111.

But Maryland is not alone. Vermont has also a governor chosen by a minority of the people.

Military Scrap.

A "gouren spirit." A scouting party was sent out last June from Fort George, in search of a famous British captain Ball, an active and cruel commander of Indians. When they arrived at Six Mile Creek, serjeant James Rouse, volunteered with two dragoons, and proceeding with his small party to the Short Hills, discovered the house where this Ball was supposed to be at about 9 o'clock in the evening. In order to reach this place, they were compelled to pass within half a mile of a British picket guard. Serjeant Rouse, having entered the house, was told that Ball was not there. He, however, fired a pistol through a door he could not break open, when Ball opened it, and surrendered himself with his guard, 5 in number, prisoners. They were all placed on horses and carried 18 miles through the enemy's country, to Fort George. Since this handsome partizan affair, serjeant Rouse was taken prisoner (with col. Beerster's detachment,) and complaining to general Vincent of the ill treatment he met with from the Indians, was by him threatened to be sent to Quebec and hanged. Being out in prison with many others, he escaped with two of them, through a shower of baits, and plunged into the wilderness without arms or food. On the shores of lake Erie, they took a British centinel by surprise and made him row them across to Black Rock in a canoe; but serjeant Rouse was so exhausted with hardship and fatigue as to be unfit for duty for a long time after. It is hoped that this gallant non-commissioned officer will be promoted as a reward for his enterprize and spirit.

The Embargo Law.

On Monday last, at about 2 o'clock, the injunction of secrecy was removed from the late confidential proceedings of the two houses of congress, and the following act made public.

An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That an embargo be, and hereby is laid on all ships and vessels in the ports and places within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States and the territories thereof cleared or not cleared; and that no clearance be furnished to any ship or vessel, except vessels in ballast, with their necessary sea-stores, under the immediate direction of the president of the United States; and that the president be authorised to give such instructions to the officers of the revenue, and of the navy, and of the private armed vessels and revenue cutters of the United States, as shall appear best adapted for carrying the same into full effect: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the departure of any foreign ship or vessel, in ballast, with her necessary sea-stores, and with the goods, wares and merchandize, other than provisions, military and naval stores on board of such foreign ship or vessel when notified of this act, whose officers and crews shall consist wholly of such foreigners as did belong to nations in amity with the United States at the time of the arrival of said ship or vessel in the U. States, and which shall not have nor take on board for the voyage any citizen of the United States, except such as may produce a passport therefor, to be furnished under the authority and direction of the president of the United States. And all public armed vessels possessing public commissions from any foreign power, are not to be considered as liable to the embargo laid by this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall put, place or load on board any ship, vessel, boat or water-craft, or into any cart, waggon, sled, or other carriage or vehicle, or in any other manner attempt to convey any specie, goods, wares, merchandize, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, or any kind of live stock, with intent to export, transport or convey the same without the United States or the territories thereof, to any foreign place, kingdom or country, or with intent to convey the same on board any foreign ship or vessel within or without the limits of the United States, or with the intent in any other manner to evade the provisions of this act, all such specie, goods, wares, merchandize, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, live stock, and also the ship, vessel, boat, water-craft, cart, waggon, sled, or other carriage or vehicle, on board, or on or in which the same may be so put, placed or loaded as aforesaid, and also all horses, mules and oxen, used or employed in conveying the same, shall be forfeited, and the person or persons so putting, placing or loading the same as aforesaid, and also the aiders and abettors therein, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and fined a sum, by the court before which the conviction is had, equal to four times the value of such specie, goods, wares, merchandize, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, or live stock: Provided however, That this section shall not be construed to extend to any person or persons not being the owner or owners of such specie, goods, wares, merchandize, produce, or provisions, naval or military stores, who shall first inform and make complaint to the collector of the district of any such offence committed within the same district; and any informer or informers, not being the owner or owners as aforesaid, upon conviction of the offenders, shall be entitled to one half of the fine aforesaid, when the same shall be received by the United States, and shall be entitled to a certificate for that purpose from the court before whom the conviction shall be had.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners, consignee or factor of any ship, vessel or boat, which may, at the time when notice of this act shall be received at the several custom houses respectively, be laden in whole or in part, shall, on notice given by the collector, either discharge such cargo or give bond with two or more sufficient sureties, in double the value of such vessel and cargo, not to proceed on the intended voyage or trip, until permitted to do so, agreeably to the provisions of this act; and if the cargo shall not be discharged within ten days, or the bond given as aforesaid, the ship, vessel, or boat and cargo shall be wholly forfeited. And the several collectors are authorised in the mean while, and until the cargoes shall have been discharged, or the bond given as aforesaid, to take possession of such vessels, and to take such other measures as may be necessary to prevent their departure.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the president of the United States may authorise the collectors of the customs (when in his opinion it can be done without danger of the embargo being violated, and under such limitations as he may deem expedient) to grant permission to vessels or boats whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers or lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, or the territories thereof, to take on board at any time such articles of domestic or foreign growth as may be designated in such permission, bond with one or more sufficient sureties being previously given to the United States by the owner, owners, consignees, or factors of such vessel or boat, and by the master thereof, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of the said vessel or boat, that such vessel or boat shall not during the time limited in the condition of the bond, depart from any district of the United States without having previously obtained a clearance, nor until the master or commander shall have delivered to the collector or surveyor of the port of departure, a manifest of the whole cargo on board, that the said vessel or boat shall not during the time above mentioned proceed to any other port or place, than that mentioned in her clearance, nor put any article on board of any other vessel or boat or be employed in any foreign trade; and that on every voyage or trip, the whole of the cargo shall be landed in a port or place of the United States, or the territories thereof within the bay, sound, rivers or lakes to which the navigation of such vessel or boat is confined, or in the port or place mentioned in her clearance, shall in case of any suit or prosecution instituted on such bond for a breach of the conditions thereof, lie upon the owner or owners, consignee, or factors of such vessel or boat, or the master thereof, as the case may be, Provided, such prosecution or suit be instituted within two years after such breach shall have been committed.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any vessel or boat, not having received a permission, and a bond not having been first given in the manner provided for in the next preceding section, shall take on board any article or articles prohibited by this act, such vessel or boat, together with her cargo, shall be wholly forfeited, and the owner or owners, agent, freighter, or factors, master or commander of such vessel or boat, shall moreover severally forfeit and pay a sum equal to the value of the vessel or boat, and of the cargo put on board the same.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons, whose names do or may appear as owner or owners of any ship or vessel either on the certificate of registry, enrolment, or license of any such ship or vessel, or if neither registered or licensed, on the last clearance or custom-house documents issued before the passing of this act for such ship or vessel, shall be reputed as the true owner or owners of such ship or vessel, and be liable to the payment of all penalties which may be incurred by the owners of such ship or vessel, by reason of any violation of any of the provisions of this act: Provided always, that nothing in this section contained shall be construed to release any person or persons from the payment of any penalty incurred by virtue of this act, and in case of any new register or license being granted during the continuance of this act, or in case of the sale of any ship or vessel neither registered or licensed, a bond with one or more sureties to the United States shall, previous to the granting any such new register or license, or to recognizing the sale of such vessel not registered or licensed, be required by the collector, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars of each ton of such ship or vessel, that such ship or vessel shall not, during the continuance of this act, contravene or infringe any of the provisions thereof. Provided, that nothing herein contained, shall be construed to extend to the owner or owners of any ship or vessel who shall have a bona-fide sale of such ship or vessel, in any port or harbor of the United States, before notice of this act at such port or harbor respectively, nor to the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, in any foreign port or place, who shall have made a bona-fide sale thereof before notice of this act: And provided also, that such bond shall not release the owners and master of such ship or vessel, or any other person from the obligation of giving every other bond required by this act.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of all vessels licensed for fisheries, or those bound on a whaling voyage, and having no other cargo than necessary sea stores, salt, and the usual fishing tackling and apparel, shall give a general bond in four times the value of the vessel and cargo, that they will not, during the continuance of this act, proceed to any foreign port or place, and will return with their fishing fare to some port or place within the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall during the continuance of this act, depart from any port of the United States, without a clearance or permit, or if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act proceed to a foreign port or place, or trade with or put on board of any other ship or vessel any article or articles prohibited by this act, such ship or vessel, goods, wares, merchandize, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, shall be wholly forfeited; and if the same shall not be seized, the owner or owners, agent, freighter or factors of any such ship or vessel shall, for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum equal to double the value of the ship or vessel and cargo, and shall never thereafter be allowed a credit for duties on any goods, wares and merchandize imported by him or them into any port of the United States; and the master or commander of such ship or vessel, as well as all other persons who shall knowingly be concerned in any such violation of this act, shall each respectively forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding twenty thousand dollars for every such offence, whether the vessel be seized and condemned or not; and shall be imprisoned for a term not less than six months, nor exceeding one year; and the oath or affirmation of any master or commander knowingly offending against the provisions of this section, shall ever thereafter be inadmissible before any collector of the customs of the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any foreign ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of this act, take on board any specie, or any goods, wares, merchandize, produce or provisions, other than the provisions and sea-stores necessary for the voyage, such ship or vessel, and the specie and cargo on board, shall be wholly forfeited, and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction: and every person concerned in such unlawful shipment shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding twenty thousand dollars for every such offence.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of all districts of the United States and the territories thereof shall, and they are hereby authorized to take into their custody any specie, goods, wares, merchandize, provisions, naval or military stores, or live stock, found on board of any ship or vessel, boat or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, waggons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, or place in the possession of the enemies of the United States; and not to permit such articles to be removed until bond with sufficient sureties shall have been given for the landing or delivery of the same, in some place of the United States, whence in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of such articles being exported or placed in the possession of the enemies of the United States.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the powers given to the collectors by this act, to refuse permission to put any cargo on board of any vessel, boat, or other water craft, to detain any vessel, or to take into their custody any articles for the purpose of preventing violations of the embargo, shall be exercised in conformity, with such instructions as the president may give, and such rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid; which instructions and rules, the collector shall be bound to obey. And if any action or suit be brought against any collector or other person, acting under the directions of, and in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue, and give his act and the instructions and regulations of the president in evidence for his justification and defence. And any person aggrieved by the acts of any collector, in either of the cases aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district wherein the collector resides, stating the facts of his case, and thereupon, after due notice given to the district attorney and the collector, the said court may summarily hear and adjudge thereupon, as law and justice may require; and the judgment of said court, and the reason and facts whereon it is grounded, shall be filed among the records of said court; and if restoration of the property detained or taken in custody, or permission to load as aforesaid, shall be decreed, it shall be upon the party's giving such bond with sureties as is or shall be required to be taken in similar cases by the collector, and not otherwise; but if the said court shall adjudge against such petition, the collector shall be entitled to treble costs, which shall be taxed for him, and execution awarded accordingly by the court.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces or militia of the United States, or of the territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this act, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody, any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie, goods, wares, merchandise, produce, provisions, naval or military stores, or live stock, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons, resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties or in any manner opposing the execution of this act, or otherwise violating and assisting and abetting violations of the same.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the public and private armed vessels of United States to capture and seize on the high seas or elsewhere, any ship or vessel which shall have violated any of the provisions of this act, and to send the same into any port of the United States for adjudication.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act, may be prosecuted, sued for, and recovered by action of debt or by indictment or information, as the case may require, and if recovered in consequence of any seizure made by the commander of any public armed vessel of the United States, shall be distributed according to the rules prescribed by the act, entitled "An act for the government of the navy of the United States," and if in consequence of any seizure made by any private armed vessel of the United States, shall be distributed according to the rules prescribed by the "act concerning letters of marque, prizes and prize goods" and the act in addition thereto: and if otherwise, shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and may be mitigated or remitted in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting forfeitures, penalties and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and made perpetual by an act passed the eleventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred; and any officer or other person, entitled to a part or share of any of the fines, penalties or forfeitures aforesaid, may if necessary, be a witness on the trial thereof, but in such case he shall not receive any part or share of the said fine, penalty or forfeiture, but the part or share to which he would otherwise be entitled shall belong to the United States.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the time during which the act shall continue in force, shall not be computed as making part of the term of twelve calendar months, during which goods, wares or merchandise imported into the United States, must be exported in order to be entitled to a drawback of the duties paid on the importation thereof.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained, shall prevent the sailing of any private armed vessel duly commissioned by any foreign power in amity with the United States, nor any vessel of the United States duly commissioned by virtue of an act, entitled "An act concerning letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods," passed the twenty-sixth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve: Provided always nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for, and the duty of all officers of the customs and revenue officers of the United States, and they are hereby enjoined, to examine, search and effectually ascertain, the amount and kind of articles all such vessels about sailing may have on board, so as to prevent their taking any cargo or other lading than the stores, provisions, armament, furniture and equipment, generally proper and necessary for such vessels.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall appear, on report made to any collector of the customs, by any officer of the customs, revenue officer or other person, that any private armed vessel has on board any article or articles, whatever, goods, wares, merchandise, or cargo of any description, intended for trade or traffic with the enemies of the United States, either directly, or intermediately through any neutral or other person or persons, or for exportation, it shall be the duty of the said collector, and he is hereby authorised, to seize all such articles, goods, wares, merchandise, and cargo of every description, and to have the same landed forthwith, to be proceeded against as forfeited to the United States.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That in all such cases it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States, for the district within which the said proceedings shall take place, to proceed in due form of law for the condemnation and forfeiture of the said articles to the use of the United States.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of condemnation as aforesaid, the captain or other commanding officer, and each and every of the owners of such private armed vessels, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars each.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from and after the passing thereof, until the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, unless a cessation of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain and Ireland and their dependencies shall take place before that day; in which event, or in any other event that shall, in the opinion of the president, render the termination of the embargo hereby imposed compatible with the public interest, the president of the United States is hereby authorised to declare by proclamation, that this act is to cease and have no effect,

Mr. Giles' Letters.

Observations on the address, No. 1, of the honorable William B. Giles—by a correspondent of the Virginia Argus.

There is a great deal of apparent frankness and sincerity in No. 1. of Mr. Giles' address to the people of Virginia, and a great deal of real artifice. He vindicates the purity of Mr. Madison's motives, but more than insinuates the feebleness of the president's conduct. He is willing to allow the executive of the United States a good heart, if he can only persuade the nation that the chief magistrate's head is weak.—This, to be sure, is to "laurel with faint praise," and too much to practise under the auspice of a considerable name, the very art of which Mr. Giles complains as prevailing under "anonymous disguises." Our distinguished senator has very clearly demonstrated that he does not think as Mr. Madison thinks, which, according to a celebrated writer, only proves that Mr. Madison does not think as Mr. Giles thinks. But whether the president or the honorable senator, is right, still remains for the people to determine.

Mr. Giles rests the agency of his votes, upon the nomination of Mr. Russell as minister to Sweden, on two points: first, because the grade of plenipotentiary, proposed by the president, did not correspond with the grade of resident, proposed by the king of Sweden. And second, because the president declined revealing to the senate the considerations which induced him at this time to nominate a minister to Sweden.

On the first point, Mr. Giles brings to his aid various reflections, calculated to show, that it has been hitherto held a sacred maxim, not to increase our diplomatic agents in Europe, especially among the minor powers. But here his argument runs into contradictions; for he admits, in the sequel, that the senate would cheerfully have voted for a minister resident, which gives up the objection concerning the extension of diplomatic agents, inasmuch as a minister resident is a diplomatic agent. Mr. Giles appears to have had a glimpse of this logical defect in his address No. 1, and to obviate it displays, what I am very much surpris'd at, a singular ignorance of the qualities of different grades of public ministers. Thus, he asserts that a minister resident is a mere minister of ceremony; whereas the very reverse is the fact. A minister resident is, indeed, of less dignity than an ambassador, or an envoy extraordinary, and perhaps less than a minister plenipotentiary; not however, in relation to real business, but only in relation to sovereign importance. A minister resident is always charg'd with the affairs of his own government near the government with whom he resides; and a minister plenipotentiary is charg'd with no more. As to mere ceremony, the higher diplomatic dignity the more ceremony. So that if it were Mr. Giles' intention to shew the king of Sweden a little courtesy, he ought, in conformity with custom, to have voted for the plenipotentiary in preference to the resident.* But there is one thing touching this extension of political agencies abroad which he has not considered. It is this: to have nominated a minister resident in Sweden, would have been to have departed from the usual practice of the American government in a more important particular than the addition of one more plenipotentiary to our list. It would have been to commence a new grade of ministers, which being of a character to correspond with the minor sovereign dignities of Europe, would have opened the door for Saxony, Westphalia, Bavaria, &c. &c. and have consequently led the way to that very increase of ministers which Mr. Giles so strenuously condemns. And then to strengthen his defective reasoning, he draws our attention to the supposed little importance of Sweden, to her small influence with the British, and to the unstable policy of the president in attempting to seek peace through her means. Sweden, it is admitted, is a small kingdom; yet, from her peculiar position on the Baltic, from the military reputation of her crown prince, and the singular situation of the European states, her friendship was, at the time when Mr. Russell was nominated, and is even now, of vast advantage to Great Britain. The best proof of this is the conduct of Great Britain herself. We have seen the British ministry paying a large subsidy in money to Sweden, ceding to her the island of Guadaloupe, and offering violence to Denmark in order to gratify the crown prince. Would Sweden then have no influence with Great Britain? I think she should have a great deal. And this influence, added to that of Russia, might have wick'd with our enemy to an effective purpose. It is not because Sweden is small, as to resources, that she is insignificant. The smallest things, in certain positions, are exceedingly consequential. A grain of gravel, which we tread with contempt under our feet, if located in a certain way, will compel us to confess, by excruciating pains, that every thing in this world is potent or imbecile according to circumstances, and the relation which it holds with regard to other things. But, then, again, the instability of Mr. Madison's policy! Seek peace through Sweden?—What wickedness! There is a straw for a drowning man to catch at! Inform me, Mr. Giles, what is the object of this war? Peace: is it not? Peace, with our rights secured. Did the president offer to surrender those rights? Did he relax in military preparation? At the very moment when Mr. Russell was nominated, was not the war driven with a vigor unprecedented at any previous period of its existence? Ship-building, on the lakes and on the seaboard, and recruiting, were they not pushed with ardor? Where was the adversary to suspect weakness in the government? How was that weakness to be concealed by a negative on Mr. Russell? Our elections, which are the sole strength of this government, are at all times open; the acts of the government are at all times notorious; there could be nothing unknown to the adversary. Besides, the administration had uniformly asserted its devotion to peace, its aversion to war. It had invariably proclaimed that the declaration of war was an act of necessity,

* In speaking on this subject, Vattel (b. 4, c. 6.) gives the pre-eminence to ambassadors, of which grade of public ministers the United States have none. Of ministers resident, he says, "the word resident formerly related only to the continuance of the ministers stay, and it is frequent in history for ambassadors in ordinary to be styled only residents. But since the establishment of different orders of ministers, the name of resident has been limited to ministers of a third order, to the character of which general practice has annexed a lesser degree of regard. The resident does not represent the prince's person in his dignity, but only in his affairs. His representation is, in reality, of the same nature as that of the envoy; and he is accordingly, together with the envoy, often termed a minister of the second order; and the public ministers are distinguished only into two classes, ambassadors who have the representative character, so termed by way of excellence, and all the ministers who are not invested with that eminent character. This is the most necessary distinction, and indeed the only essential."

and that the moment Great Britain could be induced to return to a sense of justice, the war should cease. These were the avowed sentiments of the executive. There was, therefore, no degradation in seeking peace, on our own terms, through the proffered mediation of Russia, nor any mark of instability in cultivating, with that view, the friendship of Sweden.

With these observations upon Mr. Giles' first point of justification, I proceed to the second. On this latter point there is it must be confessed, strange criticism of words. "Information," Mr. Giles asserts, relates exclusively to "facts;" and "considerations" to "opinions." He admits, that Mr. Madison tendered to the senate "suitable information" concerning the nomination of Mr. Russell. But this "suitable information," he thinks, would not develop the president's "consideration," which induced Mr. Russell's nomination. If this is not straining at a gnat, Heaven knows what is! Let us examine this explicit use of words. What do we understand by "information?" Does that sole word imply any fact at all? Must it not be connected with something else to give it precision? And if I state to you my opinions, do I inform you of them, and is that not to give you "information," in relation to opinions, as accurately and grammatically, as if I gave you information relating to facts? How can a grave senator descend to this trifling? Is it the "infirmary of nature?" Or, what is it?

Yes, yes, (quoth Mr. Giles,) but the "suitable information" which the president proposed to give, must be called for by resolution; and opinions are never asked for in that method. Why, then did not the honorable Messrs. Wells, Giles and King, the senatorial committee appointed to confer with the president, meet Mr. Monroe, the secretary of state, according to his intimation of the 23d of June? By the way Mr. Giles has omitted Mr. Monroe's note of that date, which, being a very material paper, he ought to have inserted in discussing Mr. Russell's nomination. If for his own convenience, he "inverts the order of time," he ought not to invert the order of facts. The omission looks suspicious. In that note Mr. Monroe says to the committee, "The president has authorised me to confer with you on that [Mr. Russell's] subject, and to communicate to you ANY INFORMATION WHICH YOU MAY BE DESIROUS OF OBTAINING FROM THE EXECUTIVE. I will have the honor to meet you, for this purpose, at such place and hour as you will have the goodness to appoint." Here we find that the secretary of state, by the president's instructions, proposes to give to Messrs. Wells, Giles and King, "any information" which they might desire.—The communication would, of course, have been verbal; opinions could then have been stated, and the senate would thus have come at the "considerations" so much desired by Mr. Giles. But what was the course pursued by this gentleman and his colleagues? They refused, by a written note to meet Mr. Monroe; they would only confer with the president in person. This brings me to the great constitutional question: The independence of the executive branch of the government. In making appointments the president and senate are co-ordinate: The president nominates, the senate advise and consent. The president, in the business of nominations, is equal to the whole body of the senate. If they appoint a committee to confer with him, he may appoint a committee to meet their committee. This would be preserving the equality between himself and the senate, as established by the constitution. Messrs. Wells, Giles, and King, were the senatorial committee; Mr. Monroe was the president's committee. Through his committee the president offered to give "any information," of fact or opinion, which the senate required.—The senatorial committee declined it. They would "commune" with the president alone: In other words, they would reduce the president from his constitutional equality with the senate, to a par with a mere committee of the senate. This was on the part of the senatorial body, an attempt at usurpation of the executive function; it was an effort to degrade the president, to lessen his dignity, to bring him, in fact, to the feet of the senate! In resisting this attempted usurpation, Mr. Madison nobly did his duty and will reap an honorable reward. It ought never to be forgotten, that American liberty is the effect of independence in all the branches of government; and that whatsoever branch endeavors to encroach upon another, must be watched; and checked by the voice of the people.

Legislature of North Carolina.

The following memorial of the senate and house of commons of North Carolina, addressed to the president of the United States, has been transmitted by the hands of gen. Calvin Jones.

To James Madison, Esq. President of the United States. The memorial of the senate and house of commons of the general assembly of North Carolina—respectfully represents,

That upon the declaration of war by the United States against Great Britain, your memorialists hoped and expected that measures would have been taken by the general government to defend the sea coast of this state. In this hope and in this expectation we have been disappointed. His excellency the governor of this state has laid before us his communications with the department of war of the United States, in which he has exposed the condition of our sea-board, represented the points most liable to attack, suggested means of defence, and enforced the claims of this state upon the general government for protection. We regret that the general government has not given that attention to those representations which their importance merited; and this regret is increased by the consideration that a comparatively small expenditure of money would have placed North Carolina in a state of safety from the predatory incursions of the enemy. A due regard, however, to the interest of the state, forbids us any longer to remain in this uncertainty and in this insecurity. The time has now arrived when your memorialists wish distinctly to understand, whether the general government will afford to them the necessary protection. The enemy are off our coast: We know not at what hour or at what place they may land and plunder our towns and country on the sea-board. We earnestly request you, sir, without delay to inform us whether measures will be immediately taken for our protection. We make this enquiry thus early after having assembled together, that we may be able during our session to give to North Carolina an attitude suited to her population and the extent of her resources; and to extend to our sea coast the requisite protection, should it be longer withheld by the general government. We invite your attention to the communications of his excellency the governor of this state with the department of war of the United States, and earnestly entreat you to give immediate effect to the mode of protection and defence therein pointed out.

Legislature of Georgia.

INAUGURATION OF THE GOVERNOR.

Milledgeville, Nov. 5

Twelve o'clock this day being set apart for inaugurating the governor elect; the president and members of the senate attended in the representative chamber for that purpose, when his excellency PETER EARLY, the governor elect, attended by his late excellency governor Mitchell, the judges of the circuits, state-house officers, and members of congress, entered the representatives chamber; when the governor elect, with his characteristic emphatic eloquence, delivered to both houses the following address; the oath of office was then administered by the honorable William Rabun, the great seal of the state handed him by governor Mitchell; and they withdrew.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and House of Representatives, Called by the voice of the legislature to perform the functions of the executive department of this government, I cannot forbear from expressing to you the deep sense I feel for this proof of the public confidence.

The duties of the station at all times important to the community are at the existing crisis peculiarly arduous, delicate and interesting. And I do most devoutly supplicate heaven that nothing may be done on my part contrary to the true interest of this people.

The hopes, the honor, and the happiness of our nation, are staked in the contest with a most formidable foe. In this conflict the people of Georgia have a feeling and interest inferior to that of no part of the union. I approach the duties of the executive department with a due sense of their increased difficulty and of the high responsibility attached to the trust and will with sincerity pursue that course which my best judgment shall direct. But that judgment may often err. Error, at all times the portion of human nature, will be rendered more probable with the increase of the public difficulties. The general feelings, too, always keep pace with the interesting condition of public affairs.

Permit me then to ask of you gentlemen and of the community the observance of a rule of justice, due to all men but peculiarly important to those in high trusts. It is not to condemn until the whole ground can be viewed.

There is one consideration that ought to be borne in constant recollection. That species of measures now the most interesting to the public mind must in most cases be undertaken and prosecuted under the dictation and control of the general government. 'Tis only in cases of actual invasion or such imminent danger thereof, as will not admit of delay, that the state authority is at liberty to act for itself.

In the arduous toils which lie before us, 'tis the duty of all to unite. Union amongst ourselves will render us formidable to our foe, and crown our labors by the establishment of our just rights. But dissention and feeble counsels will make us the sport of our antagonist and the reproach of the world.

I will now proceed to take the oath of office, prescribed by the constitution.

Pennsylvania—election-statistics.

The following very interesting tables to show the result of the late elections in Pennsylvania, were prepared by a gentleman at Harrisburg to oblige the editor. We venture to say, they are as entirely correct as things of the kind can be; and will afford much satisfaction in reference and remark.

The gentleman observes—"I have only stated the votes given to the representatives, because they have all been recently cleared; and therefore more fully express the sentiments of the people."

The late elections in Pennsylvania do not appear to have been warmly contested, and the whole amount of votes given is but short of the number that would be polled, if an active opposition existed. The real republican majority in this state exceeds thirty-five thousand votes.

Female Heroism.

On reading the following, we could not refrain from exclaiming—Would that such had been the fate of the British monarchs at Hampton!

From the Richmond Enquirer.—The following singular achievement occurred in this neighborhood a few nights since. We record it as an example of that happy presence of mind and resolution in the weaker sex, which are worthy of imitation.

The heroine of this story is the wife of a militia man, who is now serving his tour of duty at Norfolk. They are poor but respectable persons, who live in the county of Hanover, about 10 or 12 miles from this city. Their house is near the farm of a Mr. Bootwright: it is small, and has but a single room to it.—The woman is a mother, with an infant about 4 months old. A few nights since she had retired to bed, lonely and unprotected, with no one but her sleeping infant beside her. The night was dark and rainy—the feeble light of the fire alone glimmered in the room. Amidst such a scene, so cheerless and full of gloom, so well calculated to excite the fears of women, she was disturbed by a sudden rapping at the door. She asked, who was there? A gruff and authoritative voice demanded an entrance. She again enquired the name of the intruder. The person without replied, that if she did not open the door immediately, he would break it open. She begged him to wait for a moment and she would let him in. Having briddled on a few clothes and thrown some light wood upon the fire, she opened the door and was surprised to find a negro, a man, a slave of her neighbor Mr. Bootwright's! She demanded of him what he wanted. He informed her with an authoritative air, that he had come to sleep with her. Being acquainted with the fellow, she replied with more confidence than she could otherwise have assumed, that he must be drunk and out of his senses. "None of your airs [replied the ruffian] my mind is made up. I will sleep in that bed to-night, or take your life."—

Terrified by his manner, made desperate by her situation, yet determined to yield her life rather than submit to his wishes, she yet had courage enough to devise a scheme for her escape which she carried into instant execution. Looking down at his feet, she discovered that they were muddy—"Why [said she] you cannot think to sleep in my bed with such feet as these—you must wash them." The fellow thinking himself on the eve of accomplishing his wishes, very readily assented to the terms—and she pouring some water in a noggin, seated him in a chair on the hearth, with his back towards the rest of the room. Stepping back, she seized an axe which lay on a table near the door, and ere the splashing of the water over his feet permitted him to suspect her intentions, she whirled the axe with such tremendous effect upon his skull, that he fell dead from his seat. She caught up her child, rushed out of the house, and made the best of her way through the rain and gloom of the night to her neighbor Mr. Bootwright. To him she disclosed the terrific events which had just transpired: when he replied in a manner that does him credit, "that he was sorry to lose such a fellow; but, that so far from blaming her, he commended the spirit which she had exhibited in the defence of her virtue." Persons were immediately sent to the scene of these transactions, when the evidences of her heroism were placed before them. So effectual was the blow he had received, so powerfully had her arm, nerved by desperation and terror, fallen upon his skull, that in the act of tumbling into the hearth from his stooping posture, his brains had fallen from their cavity into the noggin between his feet.

We learn (says the Enquirer) that name of the female, whose courage saved her from the grasp of the ravisher, is Mrs. Bowles—and that the executive council taking into consideration the following letter from the mayor of this city, have unanimously taken such measures as they have deemed most proper for procuring, if possible, the discharge of her husband from service at Norfolk:

Copy of a letter to the honorable the chief magistrate and executive of the state.

City of Richmond, Mayor's office, 15th Dec. 1813.

Most respectable sirs—Never was the omnipotent hand of the Most High, I am convinced, more signally extended, than it has recently been in the rescue of a forlorn, helpless female, from the fell designs of a fiend! a monster in human shape!! Her mind in a moment endued with power; and her arm nerved with supernatural strength; she has performed an act of prowess, the remembrance of which will be deeply engraven on the hearts of all her contemporaries, and by the historians handed down to the latest posterity. The Enquirer of this morning gives the recital! None can read it without emotions, that I shall not attempt to describe!—Suffice it to say, that the heroine is poor, forlorn and destitute—that her husband is far from her, fighting the battles of his country. That she at this awful crisis, needs more than ever, conjugal solace. Can it be afforded her? I presume not to dictate. But if the circumstance, with the weight, that your honorable body could give to it, was communicated to the commander under whose banners he is enrolled, is it not presumable, that his discharge might be obtained? If a substitute was required, I unhesitatingly say, one might be instantly procured. As an individual, who under the mild influence of our government enjoys the privilege of free communication with his superiors; conjoined with the office I hold by the will of my fellow citizens, I am emboldened thus to address you, and with the highest respect, subscribe myself your most obedient.

W. GREENIOW, Mayor.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A letter from Halslar announces a fact that we are very sorry for; it says that all the vessels of war that were driven ashore by the gale, had been got off; but many of them much damaged.

The French vessels, when they come in contact with the British, are desperate, since our tars taught them that Britons may be beaten. The French privateer Reynard, of 13 guns and 69 men, lately encountered a British sloop of war of 22 guns, and after a dreadful battle sunk her. The fight was in the English channel. The vessels lay "muzzle to muzzle" for several broad-sides. The French had 6 killed and 40 wounded, only 14 escaping unhurt; but the English vessel went down so quickly that not one of her crew was saved!

COTTON was sold in Baltimore last week for 49 cents per pound by the quantity. It has been sold at that price in Philadelphia. The home demand is monstrous; but this price is too great. Within four or five days after it fell 10 to 15 cents per pound.

FOREIGN COMMODITIES.—The great speculations that have lately been made in sugar, coffee, tea, and many other articles of foreign produce, has induced one of the Philadelphia editors to propose non-consumption associations. It is probable that more goods have been bought and sold in our cities within the last two weeks than for the whole period of the present year! The gambling is high; and immense sums will be won or lost. It appears to extend from one end of the union to the other. The price of these goods is amazingly enhanced. Many bankruptcies may be expected from this wild business.

FLORIDA.—Two British sloops of war, having under convoy a very valuable ship laden with dry goods, &c. passed Havana, November 1, from New-Providence bound to Pensacola.

HONOR TO THE BRAVE.—The legislature of Pennsylvania have voted the thanks of that commonwealth to captain Oliver Hazard Perry, of the state of Rhode-Island, with a gold medal—to "master-commandant Jesse D. Elliot, of the state of Pennsylvania, with a like medal;"—"and to those citizens of Pennsylvania who gallantly volunteered on board the American squadron on lake Erie," a "silver medal of the weight of two dollars, with each persons name thereon, and emblematically furnished in such manner as the governor shall direct," for the victory obtained on that lake "that has no parallel in the history of naval engagements." These resolutions passed unanimously.

The legislature of Georgia have also unanimously voted the thanks of that state to commodore Perry, his officers and their crews, for the victory on Erie.

If in titles and surnames, things unknown to the republic, we cannot rival a monarchy in rewarding our defenders, there is a glow of honest patriotic gratitude, that must be more pleasant to the noble mind, than any favor that a knave or a fool can bestow.

INFAMOUS TRAITORS.—It is a matter of fact, that the British squadron off New London had information of the departure of commodore Rodgers, in less than twelve hours after he sailed. It is a matter of fact, that a few days ago, when it was believed in New-London, Decatur's squadron would put to sea during the night, that blue lights were raised on the heights round that town; evidently designed as signals to the British fleet!

THE SOUTHERN INDIANS.—The Tennessee papers contain a "talk" of Mussulatubla, one of the most considerable of the Choctaws, in which he urges a supply of ammunition and arms that he may march against the Creeks; who, he says, have violated the treaty of peace and ought to be chastised. His request was partly complied with. The Chickisaws had been charged with the murder of certain white persons; through their interpreter, they most earnestly disavow the accusation, saying it was done by the Creeks. They are willing to give any proof that may be required of them, of their attachment to the United States; and have marched against the hostile Indians. A Nashville paper of the 30th ult. says—A flag arrived at head-quarters on the 17th, from the Hillooby town, suing for peace—offering to lay down their arms, and never again to go to war with the United States; nor commit any depredations on either the persons or property of our citizens, and to accept of any conditions gen. Jackson might demand. The general answered, we learn, "that if they would give up all the prisoners they had taken of the friendly party of Indians, and their property; all those, of their town who were at fort Mims, and those who have been concerned in committing depredations on our frontiers, and would join him when he got to their town (if he required it) in chastising those who remain hostile, he would take them under his protection."

This is one of the towns whose warriors were in the battle of Tallegada. Every man of them was either killed or wounded, who was in the battle and six of the wounded have since died.

THE KEY STONE.—The legislature of Pennsylvania has passed an act for the immediate payment of that state's quota of the United States' direct tax. Against it, in the house of representatives, two votes; in the senate, one vote!

FORGERY.—The Albany Register informs us that some persons near the frontiers have extensively forged the British army bills, and passed them to a considerable amount to the Canadian merchants.—This is "returning the compliment;" for most of the floods of counterfeited bank notes that have occasionally inundated the eastern states issued from the British possessions. It is the speculation of individuals; and though individuals, or even the government may embark in this commerce without violating British "morality," or "religion," or "magnanimity," we hope that every effort will be made to stop the dishonorable proceeding. There is nothing more notorious than that the British counterfeited our "continental money" during the revolution; and "his majesty's" ships carried an immense quantity of forged paper with them in the infamous Quiberon expedition, in 1795, purporting to be assignats of France, with a view to destroy the credit of the circulating currency. Latterly, all sorts of American official papers were counterfeited and publicly sold in London, under the immediate protection of the government;—yet, we trust that forgery and conflagration; negro stealing, and all sorts of Cockburn-plundering; the murder of prisoners, and assassination of women and children, by white or red savages; parishment, and the robbery of churches, will never be returned, "like for like" by the American people or government. Let these things characterise the nation that has been ridiculously called the "Bulwark of the religion we possess."

SURETIES.—We learn, with pleasure, that some very valuable seizures have lately been made at New York, by the officers of the customs.

MILITARY.

Wilkinson's army, we are told in the Albany Argus, are in comfortable quarters at Salmon River (French Mills) with an abundance of every thing. The 18 months men have re-enlisted, almost without an exception. It was thought the British might attack the post; but no apprehension was entertained of the result. A citizen of New-York was apprehend ed, suspected of having put up at the camp the following placard, addressed, "To the American army at Salmon River."

"NOTICE.—All American soldiers who are willing to quit the unnatural war in which they are at present engaged, will receive, at the British outposts, the arrears due to them by the American government, to the extent of five months' pay. No man shall be required to serve against his own country."

BOUNTY ON MARITIME PRISONERS OF WAR.

Circular from the commissary general of prisoners to the collectors of the United States.

Office of Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, November 30th, 1813.

SIR—By an act of congress, passed on the 2d day of August last, it has been provided, that a bounty of twenty-five dollars to be paid to the owners, officers and crews of private armed vessels of the United States, commissioned as letters of marque, for every prisoner of war by them captured, brought in, and delivered at a port in the United States, to an agent authorised to receive them.

In order to carry the law into effect, with the proper security to the public interest, and as much convenience to the citizens concerned as can be afforded, commanders of private armed vessels, and masters of vessels, sent in with prisoners by them, are in all cases required on their arrival in a port of the United States, to make a report to the collector, of the prisoners they may have brought in, before landing them, in the form enclosed. To render the compliance with this necessary formality more certain, you will furnish a copy of these instructions to each commander of the private armed vessels which may be commissioned at, or sail from your port; and you will give notice to the master of each vessel bringing in prisoners so captured, immediately on their arrival in your port, of what is required of them, and will furnish him with the form.

So soon as the report is made, you will give notice to the marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, if there be one resident at, or immediately near the port in which such vessel may come, of the arrival of the prisoners. He will be instructed to act in concert with you, and to take charge of them.—You will direct the prisoners then to be landed, and will verify the report of the master or commander, with the marshal or deputy marshal, and when found right, direct the prisoners, forthwith, to be delivered to him. You will so certify the report on four copies, and the marshal will add to each his receipt for the prisoners. One of these reports is to be filed in your custom-house, two to be transmitted to this office, by the first mail, and one to be left with the commander or master of the vessel delivering the prisoners, for the use of the owners or agent of the vessel, by which the prisoners were captured, in making the claim for the bounty at the treasury.

If there be no marshal or deputy marshal immediately near your port, you are in such cases, requested to proceed of yourself, to verify, certify and dispose of the report, in the manner herein before directed, adding to each your own receipt for the prisoners, and to take charge of them for the time being, giving immediate information to the nearest marshal or deputy marshal of their number and general description, and calling on him to send for, and receive them, with as little delay as possible.

During the time that such prisoners may be in your charge, you are requested to furnish them with subsistence as provided for by the cartel of the 12th of May last, in the most economical manner in your power, and to have all, who are not commissioned officers, midshipmen, masters, or masters mates, in the navy or army of the enemy, or masters, or first lieutenants, or mates of private armed vessels or merchantmen, or non-combatants, according to the second articles of the cartel, closely confined or guarded, so as effectually to prevent escapes. Those of the description enumerated not to be confined, you will parole in the form prescribed by the fourth article of the cartel, to remain at, or in the immediate vicinity of your port, until placed in charge of the marshal.

In the expenditure of money, which it may be necessary for you to make under these instructions, it is expected, that you will use all practicable economy, and you will transmit your accounts, supported by the proper vouchers, for payment to this office.

I enclose, sir, for your information, a copy of the instructions to the marshals, touching the subject of this letter, and _____ copies of the form of the report.

You will please to observe, sir, that it is intended to pay the bounty on all prisoners so taken and brought in, who are in the public service of the enemy or found on board their private armed or merchant vessels, except those of the description designated as non-combatants by the second article of the cartel of the 12th of May, heretofore furnished you. You will therefore be careful to have described in the report, against the name of each person, in the column headed—Rank or Quality—their particular character, on board the captured or re-captured vessel, on which they were found.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant.

J. MASON.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Cathcart, the United States' consul at Madeira, dated Madeira, August 17th, 1813.

"Inclosed is the affidavit of John Green, who escaped as it were miraculously from British tyranny; his two companions were drowned. It would be an act of humanity to inform their friends of their cruel fate through the medium of the public prints."

Consulate of the United States of America at Madeira.

I, JAMES LEANDER CATHCART, Esquire, consul and navy agent of the United States of America for the island of Madeira and its dependencies, do hereby certify and attest, that on the day of the date hereof, personally appeared before me, John Green, a native of East-Port, Massachusetts, who being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, solemnly deposed, that in the month of January, A. D. 1813, he shipped in Portland, Massachusetts, on board the brig Margaret, James Scofield, master, of said place, bound as he supposed to St. Bartholomews, with a cargo of boards and hoop-poles; but that the captain carried the vessel into Point Petre, Guadeloupe, where the cargo was sold and molasses taken on board, when they were given to understand that the vessel was seized, and that they must either go to prison or ship on board the British merchant ship Caroline, Goadley, master, bound to London, who wanted hands; they preferred the latter, and on their voyage put into Plymouth, England, with contrary winds, and all, though they had all regular protections, were pressed on board his Britannic majesty's ship the Superb, of 74 guns, the hon. James Pagett, commander, in the month of June, 1813, and being on a cruise, they anchored in Funchal roads on the 27th day of July, A. D. 1813, and on the night of the same day, he, the said John Green, in company with James Moses, a citizen of the United States, who formerly belonged to the said brig Margaret, and likewise with James Ingleson, belonging formerly to the brig Experiment, of Portland, James Rodgers, master, both vessels being owned by the same merchant in Portland, and both taken under the same circumstances at Guadaloupe, did attempt to swim on shore from the said British ship of war Superb, leaving on board said ship, Daniel Bonnell, of East-Port, Massachusetts, who could not swim; that being discovered the sentinels fired at them several times, and that two boats were sent after them, but that they escaped their search, but being long in the water, James Moses and James Ingleson, being both exhausted, sunk before they reached the shore and were both drowned; and that he, John Green, reached the shore with great difficulty, after having been about six hours in the water; that he lay upon the rocks until humanely assisted next morning by an Italian who belonged to the theatre, who had him carried in a palanquin to the American consul's house in Funchal, who immediately sent him to the hospital, where he remained until he recovered, and was then lodged in comfortable quarters, with other distressed seamen, until an opportunity offers to send him home to the United States.

In testimony of the truth thereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal of office at the city of Funchal, island of Madeira, this tenth day of August, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and of the independence and sovereignty of the United States of America the thirty-fifth.

JAMES LEANDER CATHCART.

FROM THE NEW YORK GAZETTE.

Messrs. Lang and Turner—I have noticed, with no little regret, repeated misrepresentations in the American newspapers, of the treatment American prisoners receive in his majesty's dominions. In some instances, I have had an opportunity of knowing they were inconsistent with truth, and I have reason to believe they are generally incorrect.

Can it be supposed that American prisoners do not receive the allowance of provisions agreed on the part of Great Britain to be delivered, and that this government remain uninformed of it; or that it would remain an unconcerned spectator of the deprivation in the allowance and abuse in the quality of the provisions stipulated to be delivered to their citizens when prisoners? I feel assured that general Mason, the American commissary general for prisoners, would, did he know, or even suspect injustice was done to American prisoners, without delay, represent it to me for correction. The American agents in London, Quebec, Halifax, &c. have certainly the best opportunities of knowing in what manner the prisoners under their care have been treated; I still have not been informed, that any of them have made complaints.

In your Gazette of Saturday, you published a statement under oath, made by Mr. Abraham Walter, in which he deposes—"That all that was allowed to American prisoners, on board the prison ship, was daily one pound of old wormy bread, which the inhabitants declared had been twice to the West Indies, and condemned for spoiled bread, and one half pound of exceeding bad meat, which in almost any other situation, would be absolutely not eatable; no liquors, no soap, no candles, and none of the other comforts of life; and that it was the opinion of all the prisoners, that many of them had actually starved to death, not being able to eat the provisions."

It can be proved that the American prisoners in Quebec, and in the other British colonies, invariably receive the same quality of provisions, issued to his majesty's army or navy. This it is supposed ought to satisfy any reasonable person. If the quality of the bread and meat, and the quantity of the latter were such as Mr. Walter represents, col. Gardner, the American agent at Quebec, ought to have remonstrated, and if not remedied, to have reported the facts to his government. By the 7th article of the cartel of the 12th of May, 1813, between Great Britain and the United States, it is agreed, "that the prisoners are to be furnished by the government in whose possession they may be, with a subsistence of sound and wholesome provisions, consisting of one pound of beef, or twelve ounces of pork, one pound of wheat bread, a quarter of a pint of peas, or six ounces of rice, or a pound of potatoes per day to each man." Under this article the British government are bound to supply sound and wholesome food, and a pound of beef, or twelve ounces of pork per day to each prisoner. If this is not done, blame, in some degree, attaches to the British officer who has the care of the prisoners; but the greater proportion of it must rest on col. Gardner, whose duty it is to see that justice is done to the prisoners. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with this gentleman; he has however, been represented to me as a most respectable character and peculiarly qualified for the duties of his office. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose he could be capable of such gross neglect.

With respect to the information Mr. Walter deposes he received from the inhabitants, the bread delivered the prisoners had been twice to the West Indies, and condemned for spoiled bread, every person acquainted with the regulations of the British navy must know that such circumstance is impossible. When provisions are unfit for use, a survey is held on them. They are condemned—the casks or bags which contain them are broken or cut to pieces, and the provision cast into the sea or river. The senior officer in port and commissioner, or if at sea, the commander and master of the ship of war, are obliged to certify the fact, that such provisions were destroyed in their presence. Dr. James Wood, of whom mention is made in the deposition of Mr. Walter, was, on the 13th November, on parole at Beauport, in Canada, and no intention expressed of committing him to prison.

THIRD VICTORY OVER THE CREEKS.

Copy of a letter from major-general Cocke, to the secretary of war, dated Head Quarters, Fort Armstrong, Nov. 28th, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to enclose you a copy of brigadier-general James White's detailed report of his excursion to the Hillabee Towns.

I am, with sentiments of esteem, your most obedient servant,

JOHN COCKE, Major-general.

Fort Armstrong, Nov. 24th, 1813.

Dear General—In mine of the 19th instant by major Outlaw, I promised you a detailed report, respecting the detachment ordered by you to the Hillabee Towns, in the Creek nation. In compliance with that promise, I have now the honor to state—That under your order of the 11th inst. I immediately marched with the mounted infantry, under the immediate command of colonel Burch. The cavalry under the command of major Porter, and a few of the Cherokee Indians under the command of colonel Morgan, with very short rations for four days only. We continued our march to Little Oakfuskie, when we fell in with and captured five hostile Creek warriors, supposed to be spies. Finding no other Indians at that place, we burned the town, which consisted of 30 houses. We then proceeded to a town, called Genalga, and burned the same, consisting of 92 houses; thence we proceeded to Nitty Chaptan.

consisting of about 25 houses, which I considered it most prudent not to destroy, as it might possibly be of use at some future period. From thence we marched to the Hillebee town, consisting of about 20 houses, adjoining which was Grayson's farm.— Previous to our arrival at that place, I was advised that a part of the hostile Creeks was assembled there. Having marched within six or seven miles of it on the 17th, I dismounted a part of the force under my command, and sent them under the command of colonel Burch, with the Cherokees under the command of colonel Morgan, in advance, to surround the town in the night, and make the attack at daylight on the 18th. Owing to the darkness of the night, the town was not reached until after daylight—but so complete was the surprise, that we succeeded in surrounding the town, and killing and capturing almost (if not entirely) the whole of the hostile Creeks assembled there, consisting of about 316, of which number about 60 warriors were killed on the spot, and the remainder made prisoners. Before the close of the engagement, my whole force was up and ready for action, had it become necessary; but owing to the want of knowledge on the part of the Indians of our approach, they were entirely killed and taken before they could prepare for any effectual defence. We lost not one drop of blood in accomplishing this enterprize. We destroyed this village; and, in obedience to your orders, commenced our march for this post, which we were unable to reach until yesterday. I estimate the distance from this to Grayson's farm, at about 100 miles. The ground over which we travelled, is so rough and hilly as to render a passage very difficult. Many defiles it was impossible to pass in safety, without the greatest precaution. For a part of the time, the weather was so very wet, being encumbered with prisoners, and the troops, and their horses having to subsist in a very great degree upon such supplies as we could procure in the nation, rendered our march more tardy than it otherwise would have been.

The troops under my command have visited the heart of that section of the Creek nation where the Red Sticks were first distributed.

In justice to this gallant band, I am proud to state, that the whole of the officers and men under the command of colonel Burch performed their duty cheerfully and without complaint—that from the cool, orderly and prompt manner in which major Porter and the cavalry under his command, formed and conducted themselves in every case of alarm, I had the highest confidence in them. Colonel Morgan and the Cherokees under his command, gave undeniable evidence that they merit the employ of their government. In short, sir, the whole detachment under my command, conducted in such a manner as to enable me to assure you that they are capable of performing any thing to which the same number of men are equal.

It gives me pleasure to add, that Mr. McCorry, who acted as my aid in this expedition, rendered services that to me were indispensable, to his country very useful, and to himself highly honorable.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES WHITE, Brig. Gen.

Major-general John Cocke.

Copy of a letter from colonel R. J. Meigs to the secretary of war, dated Highwasse Garrison, 25th Nov. 1813.

Sir—I received a letter last evening from major general Cocke, commanding one of the divisions of the Tennessee volunteers acting against the hostile Creeks, a copy of which I do myself the honor to transmit to you. The repeated defeats of these barbarous allies of Britain has opened their eyes;— though late, they are already convinced that friendship with the British is the direct road to ruin, and their resentment will probably recoil on their seducers.

RETURN J. MEIGS.

The honorable the Secretary of War.

Head-Quarters, Fort Armstrong,

November 22d, 1813.

Sir—On the 11th instant I detached general White with the mounted men and such of the cavalry as had horses fit for duty, accompanied by a few Cherokees, headed by colonel Gideon Morgan, to the Hillebee towns, with a hope that he would fall in with and punish the hostile Creeks in that quarter. On his march he killed three warriors and took six prisoners, supposed to be spies. On the 18th, the general reached Graysons, one of the Hillebee towns, one hundred miles from this place, where he found a party of hostile Creeks. They were attacked and defeated. He killed at that place sixty-one warriors and took two hundred and fifty prisoners, a part of whom are warriors, the residue women and children, without any loss on our part, either killed or wounded. My aid, major Outlaw, who was with the general, arrived yesterday morning, with a report from him. The general speaks in the highest terms of the officers and men under his command, and adds, that the Cherokees behaved in the best manner. I expect the arrival of the detachment tomorrow. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN COCKE.

Colonel MEIGS.

FOURTH VICTORY OVER THE CREEKS.

Milledgeville, (Geo.) December 8.

The massacre at Tensaw is avenged!—and hundreds of savages atone for the murder of our citizens in Morgan county. Captain Barton arrived here express from our army with despatches for general Pinckney, giving the official details of a brilliant victory over the Indians.

[OFFICIAL.]

Head-Quarters, sixth and seventh districts,

Milledgeville, 7th December, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor of enclosing to you a copy of the official account which I have just received from brigadier-general Floyd, of an attack made by him on the hostile Indians, and sincerely congratulate your excellency on the good conduct and bravery displayed on this occasion by the officers and troops of the state in which you preside.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant,

THOMAS PINCKNEY.

Camp, west of Catahouche, Dec. 4. 1813.

MAJOR-GENERAL PINCKNEY,

Sir—I have the honor to communicate to your excellency, an account of an action fought the 29th ult. on the Talapoosie river, between part of the force under my command and a large body of the Creek Indians.

Having received information that numbers of the hostile Indians were assembled at Autossee, a town on the southern bank of the Talapoosie, about eighteen miles from the Hickory ground, and twenty above the junction of that river with the Coosa, I proceeded to it with 950 of the Georgia militia, accompanied by between 3 and 400 friendly Indians. Having encamped within nine or ten miles of the point of destination the preceding evening, we resumed the march a few minutes before 1 on the morning of the 29th, and at half past 6, were formed for action in front of the town.

Booth's battalion composed the right column, and marched from its centre. Watson's battalion com-

It was my intention to have completely surrounded the enemy, by applying the right wing of my force on Canlehee creek, at the mouth of which I was informed the town stood; and resting the left on the river bank below the town; but to our surprise, as day dawned we perceived a second town, about five hundred yards below that which we had first viewed, and were preparing to attack. The plan was immediately changed—three companies of infantry on the left were wheeled to the left into echelon, and were advanced to the low town, accompanied by Merriwether's rifle company, and two troops of light dragoons under the command of captains Irwin and Steele.

The residue of the force approached the upper town, and the battle soon became general. The Indians presented themselves at every point, and fought with the desperate bravery of real fanatics.—The well directed fire, however, of the artillery, added to the charge of the bayonet, soon forced them to take refuge in the out houses, thickets and coves in the rear of the town; many it is believed concealed themselves in caves, previously formed for the purpose of secure retreat, in the high bluff of the river, which was thickly covered with reed and brush-wood. The Indians of the friendly party who accompanied us on the expedition, were divided into four companies and placed under the command of leaders of their own selection. They were by engagement entered into the day previous, to have crossed the river above the town and been posted on the opposite shore during the action, for the purpose of firing upon such of the enemy as might attempt to escape, or keep in check any reinforcements which might probably be thrown in from the neighboring towns, but owing to the difficulty of the ford, and coldness of the weather, and the lateness of the hour, this arrangement failed, and their leaders were directed to cross Canlehee creek and occupy that flank, to prevent escapes from the Tallsee town. Some time after the action commenced our red friends thronged in disorder in the rear of our lines. The Cowetaws, under McIntosh, and the Tookabatchians under Mad Dog's Son, fell in our flanks, and fought with an intrepidity worthy of any troops.

At 9 o'clock the enemy was completely driven from the plain, and the houses of both towns wrapped in flames. As we were then 60 miles from any depot of provisions, and our five days rations pretty much reduced, in the heart of the enemy's country, which in a few moments could have poured from its numerous towns hosts of the fiercest warriors. As soon as the dead and wounded were disposed of, I ordered the place to be abandoned, and the troops to commence their march to Chatahouche.

It is difficult to determine the strength of the enemy, but from the information of some of the chiefs, which it is said can be relied on, there were assembled at Autosse, warriors from eight towns for its defence, it being their beloved ground, on which they proclaimed no white man could approach without inevitable destruction. It is difficult to give a precise account of the loss of the enemy; but from the number which were lying scattered over the field together with those destroyed in the towns, and the many slain on the banks of the river, which respectable officers affirm they saw lying in heaps at the water's edge where they had been precipitated by their surviving friends, their loss in killed independent of their wounded, must have been at least, 200, (among whom are the Autosse and Tallsee kings) and from the circumstance of their making no efforts to molest our return, probably greater.—The number of buildings burnt, some of a superior order for the dwelling of savages, and filled with valuable articles, is supposed to be 400.

Adjutant-general Newman rendered important services during the action, by his cool and deliberate courage. My aid, major Crawford, discharged with promptitude the duties of a brave and meritorious officer. Major Pace, who acted as field-aid also distinguished himself; both these gentlemen had their horses shot under them, and the latter lost his. Dr. Williamson, hospital surgeon, and Dr. Clopton were prompt and attentive in discharge of their duty towards the wounded during the action.

Major Freeman at the head of Irwin's troop of cavalry and part of Steele's made a furious and successful charge upon a body of Indians, sabred several and completely defeated them—captain Thomas and his company, captain Adams, and lieutenant Hendon's rifle companies killed a great many Indians, and deserve particular praise. Captain Barton's company were in the hottest of the battle, and fought like soldiers. Captain Myrick, captain Little, captain King, captain Broadnax, captain Cleveland, captain Joseph T. Cunningham and captain Lee with their companies distinguished themselves.—Brigade major Sharkleford was of great service in bringing the troops into action, and adjutant Broadnax and major Montgomery, who acted as assistant adjutant, shewed great activity and courage.—Major Booth used his best endeavors in bringing his battalion to action, and major Watson's battalion acted with considerable spirit.—Irwin's, Patterson's and Steel's troops of cavalry, whenever an opportunity presented, charged with success. Lieutenant Strong had his horse shot and narrowly escaped, and quarter-master Tennal displayed the greatest heroism, and miraculously escaped, though badly wounded, after having his horse shot from under him. The topographical engineer was vigilant in his endeavors to render service.

The troops deserve the highest praise for their fortitude in enduring hunger, cold and fatigue without a murmur, having marched a hundred and twenty miles in seven days.

The friendly Indians lost several killed and wounded, the number not exactly known. Captain Barton, an active and intelligent officer (the bearer of these despatches) can more particularly explain to your excellency the conduct, movements and operations of the army.

I have the honor to be with high regard, your most obedient servant,
JOHN FLOYD, B. G.

CHAUCER and YEO.—The following very interesting letter attributed to captain Sinclair, of the General Pike, will be read with pleasure—

Extract of a letter to a gentleman in Richmond from an officer in the navy, dated,

"SACRETT'S HARBOR, Nov. 27.

"Your interesting and friendly letter which you have been promising, has at last arrived, and the pleasure I derived from it prompted an answer long since; but absence from port has prevented my doing so, and now I have arrived, my ideas are so congenial with the ice, snow storms, &c. which we have experienced, that I know not whether I can thure them sufficiently to aid me in a letter, with the uninteresting matter out of which I have to compose it.—The movements of the military and naval forces on the frontier, will compose the substance of my letter, and as you are a true friend to the cause in which we are engaged, such a topic may not be uninteresting.”

[Here the writer gives an account of some transactions relative to the plan of the campaign; and after stating that commodore Chauncey with his squadron escorted general Wilkinson with his army some distance down the St. Lawrence, in doing which the two large ships, the General Pike and the Madison, accidentally went on shore in the face of the enemy, but were got off without injury, the letter proceeds:—]

“You know enough of the geography of this country, to be informed that the confluence of the St. Lawrence with this lake is formed into two channels, by an island 20 miles long, in its centre—the northern leading by Kingston and bearing its name. The lower end of this island, where their channel came into ours, was the point to be guarded, and here we anchored—Sir James was soon in sight, on his way down, but was compelled to abandon his enterprise by meeting us—He lay so near round the point of the island, that the bells of the ships could be heard, and our guard boats in the passage were firing on each other during the night—our pilots could not venture to take the General Pike through, as there was only six inches more than she drew, and the passage a difficult one. However the wind came fair to attempt it, and we had all our boats sounding ahead, when his knightship thought it best to be off and made a precipitate retreat to Kingston—We lay here a week, in order to ensure time to our army to get beyond his reach, although we confidently believed that he would come into our channel and garrison one of the strongest and regular built forts in our country, which stands on Carlton island, the Gibraltar of this passage, and by mooring his fleet under this battery, we could not have passed out this way, and must either have wintered here or run the gauntlet by Kingston batteries. This he had not the enterprise to attempt; and we returned in perfect safety to this place about the 12th inst. with an intention of laying up for the winter, which had then set in very severely—Here the commodore found a letter from the secretary at war, pointing out the exposed situation of our fleet at this place, from Kingston being left unconquered, and wishing us to transport Harrison's army from the head of the lake.

“We fortunately had a fair wind, sailed immediately, and embarked the troops the third day after; but a most tremendous snow storm from the eastward came on, lasted three days, separated our fleet, and had it lasted 24 hours longer, most of our vessels must have perished with their crews—or had the enemy come out immediately afterwards, he must have taken us in detail—Some lost masts—some sails, and one her rudder—Many had men washed overboard, and some rode out the gale and anchored upon an enemy's lee shore, their fate hanging upon a rope yarn. I met no accident whatever, but suffered much from wet, cold and fatigue. I very unexpectedly found general Harrison from my neighborhood, and a plain, honest Virginian he is—He knew all my friends, and those of my wife—I made him and his aids very comfortable, as much so as the weather would admit—I gave him my bed, which he never quitted during the gale—they were all horribly sea-sick. I arrived here first in the general Pike, and they are all now in, except one, and she we hear is on shore in Niagara river, where she anchored for shelter and parted her cables, and went on shore—only two lives lost on board her.—Every day will demonstrate more clearly to the nation, the evils arising from our army's leaving Kingston in its rear—they have there the hulls of two ships newly finished—one larger than the President, to mount two tier of guns, 64 in number—long 32's and 13's—the other the size of the General Pike, and the frame of a third one, the size of the latter, all ready to lay down. All these, and their force on float, would have been destroyed. Their arsenal and grand depot, amounting to millions, would have been destroyed; an army captured which are now in Wilkinson's rear, and holding this place in check—and the vast and useless expence of building here a naval force, would have been saved—The army would have been in comfortable winter quarters, by which their healths would have been ensured for active enterprise in the spring.

“The Lady of the Lake, (a flag sent to Kingston) has just returned. The enemy have laid their ships up long since—they have never been out since the whaling we gave them on the 28th Sept. which we find to have been much more serious than we then expected. Sir James was dangerously wounded by a splinter carrying off the flesh from one side of his thigh, and cannot yet walk, except a little on his crutches. He acknowledges to have been beaten by us in each encounter, and thinks himself lucky that we could not follow the last victory up. He says the fighting was done; and that he had given orders to his men to escape from their vessels as soon as they ground, and that their trains were all ready laid, for blowing them up. His ships were literally torn to pieces, and a number of officers and men killed and wounded. He acknowledges that the General Pike did the work.”

Another account of the battle of the 28th—says, the fighting was over, and it was only necessary for commodore Chauncey to take possession, to have completed his victory; but in this he was disappointed by a sudden gale of wind, which drove the enemy's fleet to the head of the lake, under the protection of their batteries. Commodore Chauncey might still have destroyed their fleet; but our fleet must, in turn have inevitably been lost also, and the grand object of the government, the command of the lake, frustrated.

Chauncey might have covered himself with the same imperishable glory, that did Perry; but then, he would have unfortunately abandoned the all important object for which he was contending, and which, by his masterly conduct on that day, was completely and effectually secured to us.

[FROM THE MONTREAL COURANT.]

British official notice of the defeat of their fleet on lake Erie and of gen. Proctor.

GENERAL ORDERS—Head-quarters, Montreal, Nov. 24.

His excellency the commander of the forces has received an official report from major-general Proctor of the affair which took place on the 5th October near the Moravian village, and he has in vain sought in it, for grounds to palliate the report made to his excellency by staff adjutant Reiffenstein, upon which the general order of the 13th October was founded—on the contrary, that statement remains unconfirmed in all the principal events which marked that disgraceful day; the precipitancy with which the staff adjutant retreated from the field of action, prevented his ascertaining the loss sustained by the division on that occasion; it also led him most grossly to exaggerate the enemy's force, and to misrepresent the conduct of the Indian warriors, who instead of retreating towards Machedash, as he had stated, gallantly maintained the conflict, under their brave chief, Tecumseh, and in their turn harassed the American army on its retreat to Detroit.

The subjoined return states the loss the right division has sustained in the action of the fleet on lake Erie on the 10th of September, and in the affair of the 5th October near the Moravian village, in the latter but very few appeared to have been rescued by an honorable death from the ignominy of passing under the American yoke, nor are there many, whose wounds plead in mitigation of this reproach. The right division appears to have been incumbered with an unmanageable load of unnecessary, and forbidden private baggage—while the requisite arrangements for the expeditions and certain conveyance of the ammunition and provisions, the sole objects worthy of consideration, appear to have been totally neglected, as well as all those ordinary measures, resorted to by officers of intelligence, to retard, and impede the advance of a pursuing enemy. The result affords but too fatal a proof of this unjustifiable neglect. The right division had quitted Sandwich on its retreat on the 26th of September, having had ample time for every previous arrangement; on the 2d October following, the enemy pursued by the same route, and on the 4th succeeded in capturing all the stores of the division, and on the following day attacked and defeated it almost without a struggle.

With heartfelt pride and satisfaction the commander of the forces had lavished on the right division of the army, that tribute of praise which was so justly due to its former gallantry, and steady discipline. It is with poignant grief and mortification that he now beholds its well earned laurels tarnished, and its conduct calling loudly for reproach and censure.

The commander of the forces appeals to the genuine feelings of the British soldier from whom he neither conceals the extent of the loss the army has suffered, nor the far more to be lamented injury it has sustained in its wounded honor, confident that but one sentiment will animate every breast, and that zealous to wash out the stain, which by a most extraordinary and unaccountable infatuation, has fallen on a formerly deserving portion of the army, all will vie to emulate the glorious achievements recently performed, by a small but highly spirited, and well disciplined division, led by officers possessed of enterprize, intelligence and gallantry, nobly evincing what British soldiers can perform, when susceptible of no fear, but that of failing in the discharge of their duty.

His excellency considers it an act of justice to exonerate most honorably from this censure the brave soldiers of the right division who were serving as marines on board the squadron on lake Erie. The commander of the forces having received the official report of captain Barclay, of the action which took place on lake Erie, on the 10th September, when that gallant officer, from circumstances of imperious necessity, was compelled to seek the superior force of the enemy, and to maintain an arduous and long contested action, under circumstances of accumulating ill fortune.

Captain Barclay represents that the wind, which was favorable early in the day, suddenly changed, giving the enemy the weather guage, and that this important advantage was shortly after the commencement of the engagement, heightened by the fall of captain Finnis, the commander of the Queen Charlotte—in the death of that intrepid and intelligent officer, captain Barclay laments the loss of his main support. The fall of captain Finnis was soon followed by that of lieutenant Stokoe, whose country was deprived of his services at this very critical period, leaving the command of the Queen Charlotte to provincial lieutenant Irvine, who conducted himself with great courage, but was too limited in experience, to supply the place of such an officer as captain Finnis;—and in consequence this vessel proved of far less assistance than might be expected.

The action commenced about a quarter before 12 o'clock, and continued with great fury until half past two, when the American commodore quitted his ship, which struck shortly after, to that commanded by captain Barclay, (the Detroit)—hitherto the determined valour displayed by the British squadron, had surmounted every disadvantage, and the day was in our favor; but the contest had arrived at that period when valor alone was unavailing—the Detroit and Queen Charlotte were perfect wrecks, and required the utmost skill of seamanship, while the commanders and second officers, of every vessel were either killed or wounded, not more than fifty British seamen were dispersed in the crews of the squadron, and of these a great proportion had fallen in the conflict.

The American commodore made a gallant but too successful effort to regain the day. His second largest vessel, the Niagara, had suffered little, and his numerous gun boats, which had proved the greatest annoyance during the action, were all uninjured.

Lieutenant Garland, first lieutenant of the Detroit, being mortally wounded previous to the wounds of captain Barclay obliging him to quit the deck, it fell to the lot of lieutenant Inglis, to whose intrepidity and conduct the highest praise is given, to surrender his majesty's ship, when all further resistance had become unavailing.

The enemy, by having the weather-guage, were enabled to choose their distance, and thereby availed themselves of the great advantage they derived in superiority of heavy long guns; but captain Barclay attributes the fatal result of the day, to the unprecedented fall of every commander and second in command, and the very small number of able seamen left in the squadron, at a moment when the judgment of the officer, and skillful exertions of the sailor, were most eminently called for.

To the British seamen, captain Barclay bestows the highest praise—that they behaved like British seamen. From the officers and soldiers of the regular forces serving as marines, captain Barclay experienced every support within their power, and states, that their conduct has excited his warmest thanks and admiration.

Deprived of the palm of victory, when almost within his grasp, by an overwhelming force which the enemy possessed in reserve, aided by an accumulation of unfortunate circumstances, captain Barclay and his brave crew have by their gallant daring and self-devotion to their country's cause, rescued its honor and their own, even in defeat.

Killed—Lieut. Gordon, Royal Newfoundland regiment.

General McClure, who left Fort George on the 26th ultimo, to attack the enemy on Burlington Heights, has returned. He marched about twenty miles; when finding all the bridges destroyed he could not proceed, and so abandoned the expedition.

The "Richmond Volunteers" are expected to return home. As their time will expire before the period arrives when operations against Canada may be expected to recommence, it is said they will be discharged, themselves consenting. They are now at Malone, N. Y.

NAVAL.

The Congress frigate, captain Smith, has arrived at Portsmouth, N. H. from a cruise which commenced on the 30th April last, all which time, a few days for watering excepted, she was at sea—yet strange to say, captured only five or six British vessels, which were all that captain Smith saw after he parted with the President! The main is not "bridged" by British frigates, nor is the "sea covered" with their vessels of war. We are sorry that the exertions of this gallant officer to "earn a name" have not met that opportunity he so assiduously sought—for he deserves it. His official letter, as published, shall be inserted. The Congress cruised off Halifax several days, and made one capture near that port. The vessel and crew are in fine condition.

Copy of a letter from commodore Macdonough, commanding our naval force on lake Champlain, to the secretary of the navy, dated

United States sloop President,
Near Champlain, Dec. 3, 1813.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you the enemy made his appearance on this lake yesterday with six heavy galleys, manned apparently with upwards of 400 men, following close after our look-out boat which was bringing the intelligence. He set fire to a small shed which had been in public use, the smoke of which gave the first intimation of his approach. It being calm we instantly weighed and swept in pursuit of him; our galleys four in number, under lieut. Cassin, were directed to bring him if possible to action, and thereby enable the sloops to get up. The chase continued three hours; I was much surprised to see him refuse battle; his superior number of sweeps prevented it. It is presumed the enemy expected we had gone into winter quarters, and that Plattsburg was the object of his visit.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your most obed^t serv^t. T. MACDONOUGH.

Honorable WILLIAM JONES,
Secretary of the navy, Washington.

Proceedings of Congress.

The business before congress, except so far as it related to the important act inserted in the preceding pages, has not yet assumed much importance. The usual brief notice of proceedings, for the last week shall be noticed in our next number.

The following are the secret proceedings of the house of representatives on the act laying an embargo.

SECRET PROCEEDINGS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday Dec. 9.—The following message was received from the president of the United States, which was read and referred to the committee of foreign relations.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

The tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in their present state, to favor the enemy and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience.

Supplies of the most essential kind, find their way, not only to British ports and British armies at a distance; but the armies in our neighborhood, with which our own are contending, derive from our ports and outlets a subsistence attainable with difficulty, if at all, from other sources. Even the fleets and troops infesting our coasts and waters, are by like supplies accommodated and encouraged in their predatory and incursive warfare.

Abuses having a like tendency take place in our import trade. British fabrics and products find their way into our ports under the name and from the ports of other countries; and often in British vessels disguised as neutrals by false colors and papers.

To these abuses it may be added that illegal importations are openly made with advantage to the violators of the law, produced by under valuations or other circumstances involved in the course of the judicial proceedings against them.

It is found also that the practice of ransoming, is a cover for collusive captures and a channel for intelligence advantageous to the enemy.

To remedy as much as possible these evils I recommend:

That an effectual embargo on exports be immediately enacted.

That all articles known to be derived either not at all, or in an immaterial degree only, from the productions of any other country than Great Britain, and particularly the extensive articles made of wool and cotton materials, and ardent spirits made from the cane, be expressly and absolutely prohibited, from whatever port or place or in whatever vessels the same may be brought into the United States; and that all violations of the non-importation act be subjected to adequate penalties.

That among the proofs of the neutral and national character of foreign vessels, it be required that the masters and supercargoes and three fourths at least of the crews, be citizens or subjects of the country under whose flag the vessels sail.

That all persons concerned in collusive captures by the enemy; or in ransoming vessels or their cargoes from the enemy, be subjected to adequate penalties.

To shorten as much as possible the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it; and the restraints having that tendency, will be borne with the greater cheerfulness by all good citizens; as the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interest of their country in pursuit of their own.

JAMES MADISON.

December, 9, 1813.

Friday, Dec. 10.—Mr. Grundy from the committee on foreign relations, reported a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports or harbors of the United States, which was read and committed to a committee of the whole house to-day.

Mr. Post moved that it be printed—negated by yeas and nays—yeas 52—nays 82.

The house then went into a committee of the whole on the said bill—Mr. Nelson in the chair—and after some time spent therein, the committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

Saturday, Dec. 11.—The order of the day on the bill to lay an embargo being called for,

Mr. Oakley moved that it be postponed until Monday next. Negated by yeas and nays.—Yeas 45—nays 70.

The house then again went into committee of the whole house, Mr. Nelson in the chair, on the said bill, and after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported amendments which were read and concurred in by the house.

Mr. Gaston moved to strike out the fourth section and to insert the following as section 4.

That the collectors of the customs be and they are hereby authorised and required to grant a general permission to vessels or boats whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers or lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, to take on board at any time any articles of domestic or foreign growth, bound with one or more sureties being previously given to the United States by the owner or owners, consignees or factors of such vessels or boats, in an amount equal to one hundred dollars for each ton of said vessel, that such vessel shall not during the continuance of this act depart from any district of the United States without having previously obtained a clearance, nor until the master or commander shall have delivered to the collector or surveyor of the port of departure a manifest of the whole cargo on board, and that such vessel shall not during the continuance of this act be in any manner engaged in a violation of this act."

Mr. Stockton moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which was negated by—Yeas 52—Nays 83.

Mr. Grosvenor moved to amend the bill by striking out the words contained in the thirteenth section, "such instructions as the president may give, and such rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid, which instructions and rules the collectors shall be bound to obey," and in lieu thereof to insert "the laws of the United States."

Negated—Yeas 56—Nays 80.

Mr. Pitkin moved to amend the bill by striking out the words contained in the twelfth section, "or when in vessels, carts, waggons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place where such articles are intended to be exported."

Negated—Yeas 50—Nays 83.

Mr. Stockton moved to amend the bill by adding to the end of the 12th section the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States or of the territories thereof, shall be employed by any person to enforce any of the provisions of this act, unless a previous certificate shall be given by two magistrates of the state where such provision is to be enforced, that the civil authorities were incompetent to enforce the same, and that it is necessary to employ the military or naval force."

Negated, yeas 51—nays 77.

Mr. Hanson moved to add to the 13th section the following proviso:

"Provided always, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to impart powers to the president infringing or impairing in their execution the constitutional rights and liberties of the citizen."

Negated, yeas 43—nays 82.

Several other motions were made to amend the provisions of the bill, all which being rejected,

It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

Mr. Oakley moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the house, the evidence in the possession of the executive, that supplies of the most essential kinds find their way from the ports of the United States to the fleets and armies of the enemy.

Resolved, That the president be also requested to cause to be laid before this house, the evidence in the possession of the executive, that the practice of ransoming is made a cover for collusive captures by the enemy.

The question was taken to consider these resolutions, and negated by yeas 54, nays 74.

The bill laying an embargo, &c. being produced in an engrossed form, was read the third time and passed, by yeas and nays, as follow:

NO. II.

The resolution of the senate, requesting a respectful conference with the president upon the nomination of Mr. Russell and his refusal:

In the course of the deliberations on the nomination of Mr. Russell, on the 14th of June last, the senate came to the following resolution:

“Monday, June 14.—The senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Jonathan Russell, together with the motion submitted thereon by Mr. Wells, on the 11th inst. and the motion was amended and agreed to as follows:

“Resolved, That the nomination of Jonathan Russell, and the motion of Mr. Goldsborough on the subject, together, with the message of the president of the United States of the 7th inst. with the communications therein mentioned, be referred to a committee with instruction respectfully to confer with the president of the United States upon the subject of the said nomination and report thereon.

“Ordered, That Mr. Wells, Mr. Giles, and Mr. King be the committee.”

I shall purposely overlook all the incidents, which took place directly between the president, and the committee thus appointed, from this date, till the 6th of July following, when the message of the president declining the proposed conference, was laid before the senate, because, although those incidents might give rise to some commentaries, which might be captivating to some minds, yet they probably would be of an unpleasant nature, and if even real advantages in the argument might be derived from them, I should cheerfully dispense with, rather than risk the hazard of intentionally wounding the president's feelings. It is my sole object, to place this subject upon its own intrinsic merits; detached from all incidental considerations.

Whether it should ultimately be conceived by the public, that this resolution of the senate was founded on correct principles, or not, I presume every impartial mind must admit, that if such a proceeding could be justified on any occasion, it was on the one, which induced the senate to resort to it.—The extraordinary dilemma, which that body was placed in, being called upon to act upon a general intimation of unexplained considerations, inducing a measure in its opinions, deeply affecting the honor and the interests of the nation, the solicitude naturally felt by it, to act understandingly on the subject, and the sense of the high responsibility attached to every senator in case of acting erroneously thereon, furnished the strongest motives to the senate to request of the president a frank disclosure of his real objects on the occasion, and respectfully to confer with him thereupon. Without entering into an affirmative exposition of the principles, upon which I presume, the senate deemed itself justified in adopting the resolution; I shall proceed respectfully to examine the grounds upon which the president felt himself bound to decline the proposed conference altogether; and the replies to them, will sufficiently elucidate the views, I entertain of the subject.

Here I cannot help expressing a painful regret, that after the most deliberate attention to the reasoning of the president in favor of the position he had taken, I am not able to acknowledge its conviction. It is contained in his message of the 6th of July, commencing in the following words:

“Tuesday, July 6.—The following written message was received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Graham.

“To the senate of the United States.

“I have received from the committee appointed by the resolution of the senate of the 14th day of June, a copy of that resolution which authorises the committee to confer with the president on the subject of the nomination made by him of a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden.

“Conceiving it to be my duty to decline the proposed conference with the committee, and it being uncertain when it may be convenient to explain to the committee, and through them to the senate, the grounds of my so doing, I think it proper to address the explanation directly to the senate. Without entering into a general review of the relations in which the constitution has placed the several departments of the government to each other, it will suffice to remark, that the executive and senate, in the cases of appointments to office and of treaties, are to be considered independent and co-ordinate with each other. If they agree, the appointments or treaties are made. If the senate disagree they fall. If the senate wish information previous to their final decision, the practice, keeping in view the constitutional relation of the senate and executive, has been either to request the executive to furnish it, or refer the subject to a committee of their body to communicate, either formally or informally, with the head of the proper department. The appointment of a committee of the senate to confer immediately with the executive himself, appears to lose sight of the co-ordinate relation between the executive and the senate, which the constitution has established, and which ought therefore to be maintained.”

It is here to be remarked, that the president does not even intimate that there is any express constitutional inhibition; of a respectful conference, between the senate itself, or between a committee acting on the part of the senate, and the executive upon subjects of their concurrent jurisdiction; but infers its impropriety from the consideration, that “the executive, and senate in cases of appointments to office, and treaties, are to be considered independent, and co-ordinate with each other,” and after pointing out correctly the usual course of proceeding of the senate on ordinary occasions concludes:

“The appointment of a committee of the senate to confer immediately with the executive himself, appears to lose sight of the co-ordinate relation between the executive and the senate, which the constitution has established, and which ought therefore to be maintained.”

It seems to me a sufficient reply to the reasoning of the president, which conducts him to this result, to observe, that the recital of the usual course of proceedings by the senate on ordinary occasions, affords no reason why some other course should not be resorted to, on extraordinary occasions. The truth is, that the course of proceeding in the senate, upon nominations, is variable, suited to the varying circumstances of the case, and always intended to attain the means necessary and proper, to enable it to act understandingly on each. But the principle, upon which the president's inference finally places his obligation to decline the proposal conference is, that the executive and senate are in certain respects, co-ordinate, and hence substantially draws the inference, that to confer with a committee of the senate would be derogatory to the executive character. It is, as far as I am able to judge, this quality of co-ordination between the two departments, which alone can justify the principle of their freely conferring together. If this quality would not justify such a proceeding, it is admitted nothing can. If, instead of being co-ordinate with, the senate were subordinate to the executive, then there would not only be an obvious impropriety, but perhaps some scrupulous minds, might fancy that there would be some degree of impertinence in asking a conference. A conference, or as it is sometimes called, a free conference, takes place only amongst equals; a difference of course of proceeding, and phraseology, is applied to subordinates. In the one case, a respectful conference is requested; this is the language of one equal to another, both being equally independent of each other. In the other, a communication is directed. This is the language of a superior, to a subordinate.

If the executive and senate be co-ordinate, then the request of a respectful conference on the part of the senate, cannot, as it appears to me, offend against the dignity of the executive; nor do I see how it could, to the remotest degree, impair any other of its constitutional prerogatives. The president seems not sufficiently to have appreciated the distinction, between a conference, and a call for information, although the distinction seems obvious. The first requires a comparison, and interchange of opinions. The other, a statement of facts. Facts are, or in other words, information is not only often called for, but directed by either house of congress, from the heads of departments. But a conference, or in other words, an interchange of opinions, from the heads of departments is never requested by either house of congress. If opinions from the heads of departments should be called for, they are deliberated upon by the house calling for them; but no opinions of the house are interchanged for them. The president certainly upon his own principle, must have overlooked this distinction, when he permitted his secretary of state to propose in his stead, to confer with a committee of the senate. It certainly did not occur to him, that in the contemplation of the constitution, his secretary was not co-ordinate, co-ordinate, together in order, with the senate—but subordinate, sub-ordinatus, under in order, or he never could have authorised him to confer with a committee of the senate, which was clothed as I shall presently attempt to shew, quo ad hoc, with all the attributes of the senate itself. Nor do I conceive, that the president has been more fortunate in aiding his conclusions, by his illustrations, upon the principle of analogy, with the proceedings of the two houses of congress in relation to their conferences upon disagreeing votes between them. The illustrations are contained in the following extract from his message:

"The relation between the senate and house of representatives, in whom legislative power is concurrently vested, is sufficiently analogous to illustrate that between the executive and senate in making appointments and treaties. The two houses are in like manner independent of and co-ordinate with each other; and the invariable practice of each in appointing committees of conference and consultation, is to commission them to confer not with the co-or-ordinate body itself, but with a committee of that body. And although both branches of the legislature may be too numerous to hold conveniently a conference with committees, were they to be appointed by either to confer with the entire body of the other, it may be fairly presumed that if the whole number of either branch were not too large for the purpose, the objection to such a conference, being against the principle as derogatory from the co-ordinate relations of the two houses, would retain all its force."

The reasoning of the president drawn from this alleged analogy, is somewhat remarkable. It commences with an effort, to establish a distinction between a conference conducted on the part of each house through the medium of committees, as he without his usual attention to critical correctness, calls them, and a conference, conducted directly between the two houses in their entire character, and founds this distinction upon the suggestion, that "the invariable practice of each in appointing committees of conference and consultation, is, to commission them to confer not with the co-ordinate body itself, but a committee of that body." I do not know that either branch of congress gives to its conferees, commissions specifying the precise tribunal with which each is to confer; but in fact from a principle of convenience, and reciprocal equality the conferees do confer with each other, but expressly and practically on the part of their respective houses. These conferees are not properly and strictly speaking committees at all, nor are they so called in the journals of either house, but managers on the part of the houses respectively. The want of a critical attention to this distinction may have been the cause of an error on the part of the president on this point, if indeed, it should be conceived, he has unintentionally fallen into one. The object of this arrangement, is, that the managers on the part of each house, may make or receive propositions for compromising, or in any way adjusting the disagreeing vote of the two houses, subject in every case to the final control of the entire bodies of the two houses themselves; and the managers at the conference, are for these purposes invested with the attributes of the entire houses, and completely so far, identified with them—and so scrupulously attentive, are the two houses composing the general assembly of Virginia to the identification of each, with its managers at a conference, that during the sitting of the conferees, to the best of my recollection, all business is suspended by both houses. The due understanding of this point is so important, to the due estimation of the distinction upon which the president founds his refusal of the proposed conference on the part of the senate, that I beg to introduce a full journal of the two houses of congress in a particular case of a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two houses at the last session. It is as follows:

"July 27, 1813.—The senate proceeded to consider the amendments disagreed to by the house of representatives to the bill, entitled 'an act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize.'

"On motion,

"Resolved, That they insist on their amendments and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses.

"Ordered, That Mr. King, Mr. Worthington and Mr. Giles, be the managers at the said conference on the part of the senate.

"Ordered, That the secretary notify the house of representatives accordingly.

July 28, 1813.—The house proceeded to consider the message from the senate insisting on certain of their amendments disagreed to by this house, to the bill "laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize?" whereupon,

"Resolved, That this house doth insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the senate upon the subject matter thereof, and that Mr. Bibb, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Roberts be appointed managers at the same on the part of this house.

"They also insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the senate to the bill, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize." They agree to the conference proposed on the subject, and have appointed managers on their part.

"July 29, 1813.—Mr. King, from the managers on the part of the senate at the conference on the bill, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize," reported certain modifications of the amendments disagreed to.

"Whereupon,

"Resolved, That the senate concur in the report of the conferences, and that the bill be amended accordingly.

"July 30, 1813.—A message from the house of representatives, by Mr. Magruder, their clerk:

"Mr. President—The house of representatives agree to the modification of the amendments of the senate, to the bill, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize;" as reported by the managers at the conference on the said bill."

From an attentive perusal of these journals it must appear, that a conference upon a disagreeing vote, is considered to be essentially carried on between the two houses themselves, but conducted through the medium of managers on the part of each, merely for the sake of convenience. If then, the senate can transfer all its powers for particular objects to managers or committees, the distinction between a conference with the senate itself and its committee acting in its place and stead upon the ground of delegation from executive dignity, appears to me, to be rather fanciful, than solid. It will not escape attention, that whilst the president no where expressly admits, the right of the senate to ask a conference with the executive in a body; yet it is clearly inferable from the principle of analogy between the two houses of congress, which he relies upon as the standard and rule of his conduct; and if that be admitted, it certainly exempts the senate from the uncharitable imputation, thrown against it by certain sapient observers, of a design by this mode of proceeding to trench upon the executive authority. For if that were the object, the whole body of the senate would surely possess a more overawing influence over the president than a committee of the same body. But after the president conceives that he has established the distinction between the senate and its committee, pursuing the analogy of the proceedings between the two houses of congress, he arrives at this conclusion:

"And although both branches of the legislature may be too numerous to hold conveniently a conference with committees, were they to be appointed by either to confer with the entire body of the other, it may be fairly presumed that if the whole number of either branch were not too large for the purpose, the objection to such a conference, being against the principle, as derogatory from the co-ordinate relations of the two houses, would retain all its force."

It must strike every observer, that to enable the president to get at this conclusion, he puts a suppositious case, which could scarcely ever happen in practice: he then makes a presumption from this supposed imaginary case, and then draws his conclusion from some supposed analogy, to that presumption. Even the blind partiality of the president's most devoted friends must admit, that this is rather a theoretical and ingenious mode of reasoning, than a practical and conclusive one. If the senate can transfer all its attributes to a part of its own body for certain inchoate purposes, as I believe it can, and often does, then would that part, for those purposes possessing all the attributes of the whole body, be co-ordinate with the senate itself; and of course, so far co-ordinate with the executive. This appears to have been the opinion of the president himself, when on another occasion he observed in reply to the chairman of another committee, appointed to confer with him, that he did not consider the authority given to the committee by the resolution, such as would authorise them to call on him in their official character; but if they were specially instructed by the senate, he would freely receive them, and appoint a time for that purpose; special instructions in that case were accordingly given by the senate to the committee. Why this distinction between the mere appointment of a committee, and special instructions under that appointment, unless it was upon the principle, that the senate possessed the faculty of transpiring its powers, to its committees for certain purposes. But whether this presumption be fairly drawn in theory or not, the true reply to this course of reasoning, I conceive to be that the practice of conducting business between the two houses of congress by managers or conferences upon disagreeing votes between them, is founded altogether upon principles of utility and convenience. Its object is, to facilitate the public business, by harmonizing their proceedings; and if the suppositious case could really exist, and mutual convenience could be produced by it, I presume, whatever presumption might be drawn from it in theory, that in practice, the want of co-ordination on the part of a committee then invested with powers, would not long be deemed a sufficient consideration, to defeat arrangements founded altogether in mutual convenience, and practical utility.

The presumption therefore, drawn from the imaginary theoretical case, seems to be more than questionable. But there is another defect, and a very material one as it appears to me, in the president's final conclusion.

It consists in the essential difference in the organization of the tribunals supposed to be analogous. Each house of congress consists of numbers. The executive, of a single individual. It would be manifestly inconvenient from that circumstance for a committee to confer with either house collectively; but it would be entirely convenient for it to confer with the executive, consisting of a single individual. This difference is fully illustrated, in the extent to which the president carried this principle of analogy, in authorising his secretary of state, to personify the executive in conferring with a committee of the senate appointed to confer with the executive authority itself. Whereas, according to the constitution, the secretary does not possess one atom of executive authority; nor does the president possess the power to invest him with one, the office wanting the co-ordination with the chief executive authority of the nation, essential to such a purpose; but a committee of the senate does participate in the character, and powers of the senate, and for certain inchoate purposes may be invested with its whole powers, and of course would not be wanting in respect to co-ordination with the executive. Nor do I see, how the executive from its indivisibility, can make a committee of itself, analogous to the proceedings of either house of congress; and it is evident that, from this dissimilarity in its organization, from its physical incapacity, it cannot in this respect conform to the proceedings of either. The secretary of state personifying the executive, for the purpose of conferring, would be analogous to the secretary of the senate personifying that body for the same purpose; each being in the contemplation of the constitution, subordinate, the mere scribe to the tribunal, to which he belongs, and incapable of participating in its powers, or attributes. This exposition shows, the uncertainty of theoretical results, when drawn from practical dissimilarities. This also leads me to consider the character of the transaction in relation to its suggested encroachment on the executive authority.

It should be recollected, that the executive, in relation to the senate, upon the subjects of treaties, and appointments to office, is the active originating power. The senate, the passive, preventive power. The executive therefore presents to the consideration of the senate all original objects. The senate may give, or deny them actively. But in the case of denial, the power of the senate, is at an end.—It has no objects. It can originate or substitute.—The obvious effect of a conference between them, therefore, would be, to give the executive the advantage, of superadding to the views of the senate, his own considerations, in favor of his own policy or objects, which if left to the deliberations of the senate unaided, might be overlooked or not comprehended. It would certainly give him the advantage of his own reasoning, in favor of his own objects, without any disadvantage, which presents itself to my mind;—whereas the senate, could have no reciprocal advantage, possessing no reciprocal originating power. It certainly subjects the senate to an additional executive influence, without any counterbalancing influence on its part. The idle imputation of an intended encroachment, thus appears to be utterly unfounded; unless indeed, the ethics of certain fashionable moralists, should be received, as orthodox; always to impute a bad motive, to a good action, in disrespect to the evangelical rules of the old school, to regard the infirmities of our natures, with so much charity and tenderness, as always to presume a good motive, for even a questionable action.

Hitherto this subject has been examined upon the principle of analogy drawn from the proceedings of the two houses of congress. These without any constitutional provisions on the subject, are founded solely upon voluntary arrangements between them for mutual convenience, and have been found extremely beneficial in practice. It appears to me, that some similar course of proceedings, between the executive and senate upon all points of concurrent jurisdiction, but none others, if not enjoined, is at least recommended from the intimate connection established between them by the constitution. In the 2nd section of the 2nd article of that instrument, the following power amongst others is given to the executive. "He, (to wit, the president) may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of the respective offices." Upon this authority it is said the executive has formed a cabinet of consultation and advice of the heads of departments, upon all points of general policy; and without confining each to his opinion in writing upon any subject relating to the duties of his particular office. This has been done by every president, I believe, without any scruples upon the principle of a want of co-ordination. I do not mean to question the propriety of this proceeding; my object is to compare the connection, established by this clause of the constitution, between the executive and principal officers of departments, and that, by another clause, between the executive and the senate.

By the same section and article, this power is given to the executive—"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur, and he shall nominate, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." In these respects the most emphatical terms are used to establish the concurrent jurisdiction between the executive and senate. The president shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint, &c. &c.

The term "advice," is as emphatical an one, as could be used to make the senate the constitutional tribunal of advice to the executive, upon all subjects to which it relates. But the senate is not only to advise the executive in these respects, its consent is to be given to certain executive acts. Consent implies the exercise of will; and the exercise of will, involves the consequences of responsibility. The plain language of the constitution to each senator, is thus, you are not only to advise the president, but you are to give your own consent to his acts; and are therefore to be as responsible for them to the nation, as himself. The relations thus established, are, or ought to be, of the most intimate, and confidential nature, and in my judgment, it would conduce very much the due exercise of these powers, to agree upon some mode by which an interchange of opinion between the executive and senate, might be had at some intermediate stage of its deliberations upon executive propositions and before its final decision. The senate devised the mode on its part, of investing a committee of its own body with all its powers,

* To relieve the apprehensions of many well disposed people, for the safety of the executive authority, in consequence of an attempt on the part of the senate, to advise or interchange opinions with the president, through the medium of a committee, upon subjects of concurrent jurisdiction only at some intermediate stage of the deliberations, and before the final act, of the senate, they are respectfully informed, that when the federal government first went into operation, the concurrent jurisdiction established by the constitution between the executive and senate upon the subject of nominations to office, was deemed by general Washington to be of so intimate a character, that he always attended the senate in person, when deliberating upon that subject, to hear its opinions and receive its advice at all stages of its deliberations. An unlucky incident induced him to decline his personal attendance in the senate thereafter, and by letter addressed to the senate he stated the reasons of his determination in that respect, I do not at this time recollect the contents of those reasons, but I presume they had relation to the incident which induced the conduct. They, I believe, had no relation either to the want of co-ordination, or apprehensions of encroachments upon the executive authority. Nor does the present president condescend to place his refusal upon any apprehensions of that kind;—that idea is certainly a mere after-thought of officious friends; which I am sure he would disclaim. Many inconveniences attended the first practice of being always present at the examination of every nomination, from which, the last mode pointed out, would be entirely exempt.

and after requesting a respectful conference with the executive, authorising it, to act on its part, at that conference. The president has deemed it his duty to decline this overture, and thus to deny all intermediate interchange of opinion with the senate upon executive propositions; and to receive its advice, only by its final act. It is scarcely possible to avoid attaching to this act, an air of defiance, unfriendly in its tendency to that reciprocal confidence, and co-operation between the two tribunals, which the public interests seem imperiously to require. The president, as an independent department of the government, had an unquestionable right to decline the overture, and having, as I verily believe, with the purest motives, laid down the rule of his own conduct, it will doubtless, be cheerfully and I hope, with unabated confidence, and good will acquiesced in by the senate during the remaining part of his administration. Perhaps too, it will become the permanent rule of proceeding between the two tribunals in all future times. But I have yet to learn the correctness of the principle upon which the refusal was founded, and I have also yet to learn, that the executive authority of the nation will be improved by it.

Wigwam, October 23, 1813.

Legislature of Ohio.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the senate and house of representatives,

Convened at a period interesting to your constituents, and delegated to the discharge of the most important duties; you may find in the general health and fruitfulness of the last season, ample cause for congratulation and motives of gratitude to the Great Dispenser of every good gift.

The United States have not been so fortunate as to be exempted from the calamities of war, which for a long time has convulsed and continues to agitate the nations of the old world.

War, though ever to be deprecated, is not the greatest of evils; and when compared to national abasement, and the degradation of independence, appears less obnoxious, and when founded on justice, to conduct, to support and invigorate it, becomes a duty.

Compelled to this justifiable resort for the maintenance of our rights, essential to the sovereignty of the nation, and which cannot be abandoned without their sacrifice, peace must be redeemed by the sword. In the progress of the American arms, benevolence has added honor to victory; wanton severities, cruel depredations, and remorseless ferocities have stained the banners of the enemy with a crimsoned inhumanity. Regretful indeed as are these considerations to a peace-loving nation, there are nevertheless consolations to be found in the justice of our cause, in the prosecution of the war, as well as the inevitable urgency of the occasion.

Since the last session of the general assembly, urgent requisitions have been made on me by the commanding general of the 8th United States military district, for the aid of the militia of Ohio. Upon every call to arms the militia have marched with a prompt and cheerful alacrity, conducted with a commendable subordination, and acquired no inconsiderable degree of improvement in good order and discipline; and although unable to reach a retiring enemy, the troops were of essential service to the north west army, by furnishing large transportations and escorts of its provisions, artillery, and mili-tions of war. Two thousand of the Ohio militia are now on duty in the service of the United States, and are stationed at Forts St. Mary's, Amand, Jennings, Winchester, McArthur, Fandlay, Meigs, Upper Sandusky, Lower Sandusky and Portage, within the bounds of the state, and at Detroit, in Michigan.

The splendid and auspicious victory on Lake Erie—the capture of a British force in a contiguous section of Upper Canada—the dispersion of many savages, and the conclusion of an armistice with others as precursory to peace, afford a brighter prospect in the western horizon, heretofore beclouded with disappointment and disaster.

These successes promise greater exemption from the cruelties of the infuriate savage and his inhuman instigator;—yielding a degree of relief from those apprehensions which have been truly afflictive to our frontier inhabitants. An extinguishment of a considerable portion of Indian title to lands lying within the bounds of the state may soon be effected; and under the act of congress “to authorize the president of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries” it is hoped that the western and northern boundaries of the state may, at an early season, be demarked and established; and that a retarded emigration will redouble its pace to our healthy climate and faithful soil.

The fifty-third section of the militia law, providing for the assessment of fines for neglecting or refusing to march on tours of duty, has received various and contradictory constructions by the militia boards of enquiry; the merits or demerits of the delinquent in regard to neglect or refusal, seem in many instances not to have been considered—but the highest possible penalties have been adjudged. It will be perceived, that such decisions must press heavily on those whose circumstances are unprosperous or unfortunate—and that a more uniform rule ought to be prescribed, while shuddering from too much rigor, should guard against a too great relaxation of the principle of duty.

The major-general of the third division of militia, having accepted a military appointment in the army of the United States, resigned his commission from the state. The major-general of the second division has also accepted a similar appointment, but has not formally and in writing resigned his militia commission. I consider both offices as vacant—and for the purpose of a more complete organization, desire that those vacancies may be early supplied: together with that of quarter-master-general of the second division. The resolution of the general assembly respecting the mounting and equipping artillery, has been complied with. During the last and the present year, several articles of property were advanced by individuals and others impressed for military purposes; it will be proper to provide the means of compensation for those articles.

To facilitate the payment of Ohio militia in the service of the United States, I recommend the immediate creation of the office, and making the appointment of paymaster-general of the militia of Ohio, through whose hands all monies for militia pay, which shall be received from the paymaster-general of the armies of the U. States, shall pass to the regimental paymaster—conforming in his duties to the regulations of the United States as they may be prescribed. The great delays and difficulties which have occurred in the payment of the militia, have almost precluded a compensation for their services. Should such officer be appointed, I can instantly furnish him with the public regulations, laws, forms and instructions on the subject of his duty.

An account of the disbursement of monies drawn from the treasury, by authority of the Law “to pre-vide blankets for the Ohio militia then in the service of the United States," and of the acc'mentary thereto; and an account of sums drawn from the contingent fund, will soon be presented for your examination.

For the maintaining a regularity of accountship between the auditor's and treasurer's offices, no monies (it is considered) should be drawn from the treasury except through the auditor's office.—The drawing of monies from the treasury under the last mentioned acts, exemplifies the necessity of an adherence to that principle, and the departure from which in the above case will require the correction of a law. It will prove to the legislature the intimation given on a former occasion, that there ought upon principle to be an examining check on the treasury department.

Conformable to a resolution passed the last session, "relative to the jurisdictional right of the state of Ohio over the Ohio river;" I have transmitted copies thereof to the executive authorities of Virginia and Kentucky; to these communications no answer has been received, but have been informally informed that the legislatures of those states had entered on their consideration; but had not come to a decision.

It is a satisfaction to inform you, that the university of Ohio established at Athens, is in an improving condition, increasing in reputation and utility—but with regret I learn that the progress of the Miami University has been retarded beyond public and private expectation. Whether radical defects exist in the mode of the disposal of its lands, or an injudicious neglect in the management of its concerns, is meriting your investigation.

A list of vacancies which have occurred and executive appointments made, is presented. Some vacancies will require an early supply, as the times of holding some of the courts of common pleas are near.

The increasing number of counties and townships, may require an enlarged distribution of the laws.

In consequence of several former laws relating to taxes on lands, a variety of papers and documents have been deposited, and yet remain in offices of the clerks of the original counties—such papers and documents should, by a law to be passed, be transferred to the possession of the clerks of the county commissioners, of those counties in which the lands lie, and to which such papers and documents respectively relate.

Permit me, gentlemen, to turn your attention to a subject of superior importance:

The act of the United States, "to lay and collect a direct tax in the United States," passed the 2d day of August, 1813, apportions the quota of the state of Ohio at one hundred and four thousand, one hundred and fifty dollars and fourteen cents. The seventh section of the act provides, that where a state pays its quota into the treasury of the United States before the tenth day of February next, such state shall be entitled to a deduction of fifteen per centum; or if paid before the tenth day of May next, to a deduction of ten per centum.

Many reasons, both of state economy and general policy, might be presented in favor of the expediency of availing the state of the benefits derivable from the proposition. I will however but remark, that in addition to the value of the deduction proffered in the 7th section of the law, will be the amount of taxes imposed on lands purchased under any law of the United States, in a just and equal proportion of the state's quota of the direct tax;—which lands have heretofore been exempt from taxation, though now rendered liable by the eighth section of the aforesaid act, provided the state shall pay its quota by either of the days specified in the section next preceding. The ability of the state, to advance its quota, to me appears unquestionably competent.—You will by the auditor's report, perceive, that there is now in, and shortly will be accruing to the state treasury, a surplus of monies beyond the ordinary exigencies of the state. If the subject shall be considered, it will require an early attention.

By the act of the United States "laying duties on sales at auction of merchandize, and of ships and vessels," duties are payable to the United States. By a reference to that act it will appear necessary that you should provide, by law, for the appointment of licence of auctioneers. The laws of the United States which are quoted, will be furnished the general assembly.

The state penitentiary will (doubtless) be completed by the time of the next annual meeting of the legislature; and before its destined and appropriate use can be beneficial, our criminal code must undergo a prudent revision, adapted to the nature and extent of punishment by labor and confinement; and a system of police prison regulations established.

In making such revision, and forming such regulations, a resort will be had to experience and systems of other states, for the obtaining of information. It may be for you to decide if it might not be useful that suitable persons should be authorised to prepare such revision and police regulations during the recess and to present them to the next session of the legislature for examination.

The globe, at this period, exhibits the singular spectacle of but one nation (self-governed by the voice and will of free citizens) contending amid the storms of a tempestuous political world, for those rights which God and nature has bestowed.

In the belligerent condition of our country it behoves all invested with magistracy, command or legislation, to discharge with prudence, energy and fortitude, their various allotments of duty.

To you, gentlemen, is assigned the province of preserving morals, by providing for the correction of crimes, by making salutary reforms and useful improvements of the laws; of encouraging arts of general and domestic manufacture; of patronising that education, which, while it enlightens the understanding, corrects the heart; and of countenancing a religion replete with benignity and consolation.

I have thus suggested a few objects for your consideration; your equal information and knowledge will furnish you with many others of a beneficial nature.

Though dear to us are our institutions, there are duties (important and precious) to be performed in our federative relations. United by principle—instructed by historic example, and fortified by our own experience, a supreme attachment to the integrity of the union deserves to be cultivated with fervid devotion. Notwithstanding there may be a hostile few who with an unhallowed hand, would separate the columns and demolish the edifice of our liberties.

The unity of political sentiment which generally pervades the state, is a source of satisfaction; and to promote a concord, as happy for the citizen as salutary for the public, will be a pleasing duty to the representatives of free constituents, who discarding the distinctive appellations of party, should be proud of the name of AMERICAN.

With the heritage of freedom a constitution and laws as liberal as can comport with the happiness of man and his protection, before us,—we should be unworthy of their enjoyment, and ungrateful for the beneficent boon, were we not to add in the pro-servations of their purity to the extent of every rational and physical ability.

To the hope of an useful result to your legislative labors, to which I will at all times give, with cheerfulness, every official aid—I will add the supplication, that he who can check the raging of the heatheathen, and quiet the tumults of nations, would give wisdom to our counsellors, strength to our armies, and overshadow our beloved country with the wings of his protection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, December 20.—Mr. Ingersoll, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, made a report, which was read, and Mr. Ingersoll afterwards reported a bill to authorise the secretary of the treasury in behalf of the United States, to subscribe for seven hundred and fifty shares in the capital stock of the said company, which was twice read and committed to a committee of the whole house.

On motion of Mr. Burwell,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of authorising the president to provide an additional number of armed vessels for the public service, to carry not less than 16 guns nor more than 22; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. Seybert,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the present condition and distribution of the flags, standards and colors, which have been taken by the forces of the United States from their enemies; and whether it would be expedient to make any provision in relation to them; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of making adequate and permanent provision for the support of all officers, soldiers and marines, who have fallen or shall fall in the military or naval service of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The report of the committee of elections on the petition of Isaac Williams, jun. of New-York, contesting the election of John M. Bowers, the sitting member, which concluded with the resolve that the former was entitled to the seat held by the latter, was considered, and unanimously concurred in.

Mr. Cooper offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire and report what provisions ought to be made for the payment of the expenses of the militia called out under the authority of any of the state or territorial governments, for the defence of the country against the incursions of the enemy, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The preceding resolution was, after some desultory discussion, referred to this committee for revising the militia laws, instead of as proposed.

Mr. Pickens, after making a few prefatory remarks, submitted the following joint resolution, which was read, referred to a committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the legislatures of the several states, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of said states, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said constitution.

The electors of president and vice-president of the United States shall be chosen by districts; and for that purpose each state shall be divided by its legislature into a number of districts equal to the number of electors to which the state may be entitled. Each district shall contain as nearly as may be, equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding indians not taxed three-fifths of all other persons. In each district the persons qualified to vote for representatives in the congress of the United States shall choose one elector. The legislature of each state shall have power to regulate the manner of holding elections and making returns of the electors chosen by the people. In case all the electors should not meet at the time and place appointed for giving their votes, a majority of the electors met shall have power, and forthwith shall proceed, to supply the vacancy. The districts for choosing electors of president and vice-president of the United States, shall not be altered in any state until an enumeration and an apportionment of representatives shall be made subsequent to a division of the state into districts. The division of the state into districts shall take place as soon as conveniently may be, after this amendment shall become a part of the constitution of the United States and successively afterwards whenever a new enumeration and apportionment of representatives shall be made.

Tuesday, December 21—After several propositions had been laid before the house—Mr. Lovett submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house, if in his opinion it will not be inconsistent with the public welfare, all the evidence in his possession relative to the commencement, progress, and present state of the system of retaliation, upon prisoners of war, to which the governments of the United States and Great Britain have lately resorted. Also, that the president of the United States will cause to be laid before this house, the names of those prisoners of war who have been sent as criminals to England for trial. Also, evidence when and where those prisoners were captured; at what time they emigrated from the British dominions to the United States; when and in what manner they had incorporated themselves into our political society; also, whether any or all of the said prisoners have been naturalized agreeably to the laws of the United States; and when, and where, and all other evidence which may serve to shew and define the national character of the said prisoners of war.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house, if, in his opinion, it be not inconsistent with the public welfare, any documents, papers, evidence or information, tending to shew that naturalized subjects of Great Britain are, by her, employed in war, against their native country; and that they are, by her, protected from punishment, either by means of retaliation or otherwise, when taken by their native countrymen in arms against them, or in arms invading their territories.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house, if in his opinion it be not inconsistent with the public welfare, such evidence as he may have in his possession relative to the orders, regulations and proclamations, which, since the commencement of the present war, have been issued and promulgated in the provinces of Canada, by the governor-general of those provinces, or any other officer or agent of the British government relative to the state, condition, rights, and duties of the native citizens of the United States residing in those provinces; also the number of such native citizens of the United States, as have, during the present war, borne arms against the United States, within their limits, and what is the present situation of such citizens.

The resolutions were read, and on motion of Mr. Macon, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Wednesday, December 22 and Thursday the 23d.—Nothing important proposed or transacted.

Friday, December 24.—On motion of Mr. Ingersoll,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to enquire into the expediency of altering the judicial system of the United States.

Resolved also, That the same committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law for the more effectual punishment of crimes against the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

A proposition to adjourn until Monday, the 3d of January, on the ground that the several committees would not be able to report before that time, was discussed and negatived 99 to 46.

Monday, December 27.—Nothing important transacted.

Tuesday, December 28.—The speaker laid before the house the memorial of Alexander Smyth, late inspector-general of the army of the United States, stating the motives which had induced him to abandon his profession and enter the military service of his country; stating his surprize at being ousted from service without cause, by abolition of his office; offering to prove his conduct whilst in office to have been free from censure; and praying to be reinstated in the rank in the army which he recently held.

The memorial having been read—

Mr. Nelson of Va. moved its reference to the military committee; but on suggestion of Mr. Troup of Georgia, varied his motion so as to refer it to the secretary of war; which reference was agreed to.

Mr. Hanson, after some prefatory remarks, submitted the following resolutions—

Resolved, That the president be, and he is hereby requested to communicate to this house any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French government to accredit the minister plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that court, or of his reception, if accredited, and of the progress of his negotiation.

Resolved, That the president be, and he is hereby requested to cause to be laid before this house, any correspondence with or communication in writing from, the late minister of France, resident at Washington, on or about the 14th of June, 1809, or subsequently with his successor, Mr. Serrurier, prescribing or declaring the terms and conditions upon which their sovereign would consent to treat of amity and commerce with the United States, if any such correspondence or communication be in the possession of the executive, and if none such be in the possession of the executive, that the president be and he is hereby requested to inform this house, unless the public interest forbid such disclosure, whether there has not been such a correspondence or communication, which was withdrawn from the archives of the department of state, and if so, when and how the same was so withdrawn.

[The first resolution sufficiently explains itself; the record refers to "Tarreau's letter," see page 57. The house agreed, 125 to 21, to consider the resolutions, and they were ordered to lie on the table. Mr. Epes stated his willingness that the conduct of government should have the fullest examination; for "it possessed no secrets with the people." He said that Mr. Crawford had been received in France, and as far recognized as he could be, in the absence of the emperor; and declared that no such letter as described in the 2nd resolution now was, or ever had been, on the files of the secretary of state. Mr. Hanson pledged himself to prove that such a letter had been written, and that it was withdrawn on "solicitation," but not until Mr. Jackson had been dismissed, &c. As it is probable these resolutions will be adopted, we shall have to record the facts that transpire, and, may be, have room for some of the speeches of the members.]

Wednesday, December 29.—Many petitions were read and referred, but nothing important done. The house is yet chiefly occupied in preparing business. Among the petitions we notice the following:

Mr. King, of N. C. presented the petition of sundry persons in North-Carolina, praying the aid of the government in opening an inland navigation, to connect the waters of Chesapeake bay with the river St. Mary's in the state of Georgia. Referred to the committee on inland navigation.

Naval Law Case.

CIRCUIT COURT—OCTOBER TERM, 1813.

Stephen Decatur, vs. Thomas J. Chew.

This was an action for money had and received.—In the trial of this cause, so interesting to our gallant naval officers, a statement of facts was agreed upon by the counsel, which is substantially as follows:

In the autumn of 1812, commodore DECATUR commanded the United States' frigate United States, with unimpaired ordnance, and had attached to his service the frigate Chesapeake, captain EVANS, commander, and the brig Argus, captain SINGLIER, commander, by virtue of instructions from the navy department. Captain EVANS, with some latitude of discretion, sailed upon a cruise, in the Chesapeake, under the immediate and limited orders of commodore DECATUR, and during his cruise, captured a British merchant ship, called the Volunteer, and sent her, with a prize-master, into the district of New-Hampshire, where she was libelled, and condemned by the district court for that district; and one moiety of the proceeds ordered by the court to be paid into the treasury of the United States; and the other to be paid into court, for the use of the captors.—The officers and crew of the Chesapeake, appointed the defendant prize agent, who received the moiety of the proceeds condemned to the use of the captors. When captain EVANS returned to Boston, he reported his cruise to commodore DECATUR; but before the Chesapeake sailed on her cruise, commodore DECATUR had returned to New-London with his Britannic majesty's frigate Macedonian, as a prize, and owing to the superior force of the enemy lying off New-London, has not yet been able to proceed to sea.

Commodore DECATUR claims one twentieth of one moiety of the proceeds of the Volunteer. Capt. in EVANS, as a matter of right, refused to permit the defendant, who is a mere stake-holder, to pay it over on two grounds. The first was, that the Chesapeake was acting "independently" when she made the capture, in which case, by the prize-law of the United States, captain EVANS would have been entitled to three-twentieths of the prize-money, and the commodore to nothing. The second ground was, that commodore DECATUR had "left his station" prior to the capture of the Volunteer, in which case, by the prize law, the commodore was not entitled to any portion of the Chesapeake's prize-money.

The cause was argued early in the term by SINGLIER for the plaintiff, and by BLACK, district attorney, for the defendant. The court convened yesterday by adjournment, when his honor, judge SARGENT, pronounced a learned opinion, in which the district judge concurred, and gave judgment to the plaintiff.

Finances of South-Carolina.

COMPTROLLER-GENERAL'S REPORT.

To the honorable John Calhoun, speaker, and the other members of the honorable house of representatives.

The controller-general, in compliance with the resolution of your honorable house, of the 24th instant, requiring him to report a general view of the finances of the state during the last six years, specifying the annual amount of the receipts and expenditures, and of the debts paid during that period. Also, the debts now due by and the funds of every description belonging to the state, and the probable expenditures and receipts of the ensuing year, under existing laws.—Respectfully reports, That during the last six years, viz. from the last day of September, 1807, to the first day of October, 1813, there has been received at the two offices of the treasury, the sum of 1,878,160 dollars and 19 cents, and paid away during that period the sum of 1,924,826 dollars and 75 cents. That the balance in the two offices of the treasury, on the 1st October, 1807, was

Which added to the aggregate receipts, for the last six years, makes the sum of	2,029,628	88
from which after deducting the sum of	1,924,826	76

There will remain the balance

-------	---------	----

The sum in the two offices of the treasury, on the 1st October last.

That for the year 1812, there was received

And paid away	372,561	10

For 1809, received	318,303 42
And paid away	257,055 43
For 1810, received	302,194 62
And paid away	244,004 61
For 1811, received	305,955 70
And paid away	341,906 57
For 1812, received	279,000 61
And paid away	376,044 31
For 1813, received	314,500 80
And paid away	333,246

Exhibit (A) accompanying this report is a statement of the debts and credits for that period.

It is within the knowledge of your honorable house, that the revenue of the state, for the last six years, has arisen from general taxes, vendue duties, dividends of banks.

Interest and principal received on paper medium bonds, interest and principal on the stock of the United States held by this state, with a few other miscellaneous and contingent matters, such as licenses for hawkers and pedlars, theatres, fires and forfeitures, &c. That this revenue was considerably impaired in the year 1809, by a grant of all vendue duties to the city council of Charleston, in a sum equal at least to 13,600 dollars per annum—and was lessened in a much greater degree by the reduction of taxes, which took place in the year 1808.

That the average income from every source of revenue, for the last six years, does not exceed Dols. 313,025 70 And the average disbursements, for the same period, 526,803 49

In reply to that part of the resolution of your honorable house, which demands an account of the debts now due by, and the funds of every description belonging to the state, the comptroller-general respectfully refers to the estimate of public debt, accompanying his general report, No. , in which he has afforded all the information asked for.

Under the existing laws the receipts (including principal and interest, from the United States) will probably amount to 250,000

And the disbursements (supposing that there will be only 80.6 5 dollars and 50 cents of past appropriations unpaid called for) and that no part of the claim of the legionaries of Luxembourg, authorised by the act of 1807, to be paid when satisfactorily proved, should be called for 227,000

Within the last six years there has been paid off of the public debt, the sum of three hundred and eighty-eight thousand nine hundred and fifty-eight dollars, as will appear by exhibit. (B).

The comptroller-general begs leave to observe, that by the act of the legislature of 1794, the stock of the United States is pledged for the payment of the quarterly interest on, and final redemption of, the domestic debt, and that the whole of the stock of the United States, by the annual payment thereon, will be finally paid off in the year 1824. The estimate of probable receipts for the ensuing year, includes the interest and principal, which will be paid on that stock by the United States, and the estimate of disbursements, embraces no redemption of the state debt.

Respectfully submitted by THOMAS LEE, Comptroller-General.

Events of the War.

EDITORIAL REMARKS.—The present appears the most dreary sheet we have had yet to publish. The career of calamity scemed, for the moment, to overwhelm the soberness of reason, and place the mind in a state that has been aptly compared to the condition of "fishes frozen up in a pond." We have to record—

1. The evacuation of fort George with the burning of Newark. The former might be patiently borne; for courage and good conduct may restore the possession;—but to burn a town partakes so much of the character of the enemy, that we cannot cease to lament it for years, unless, indeed, general Clive shall advance some strong military reasons that may soften or excuse the act. It is a poor justification for us that the enemy, without reason, has destroyed several defenceless towns. We would not imitate him in his barbarisms. We have always held this testimony with one solitary exception; which was, that scalp-buying Malden should "be blotted from the map." But it may be right to learn more on the subject before we utterly condemn.—Let us hear what the officer has to say. He owes it to himself, and his country, to offer his reasons for the procedure. The account we have of it is "lame," and very unsatisfactory.

2. The exhibition of the "blue lights" on the heights of New-London, as detailed in commodore Decatur's letter—evidencing the blackest treason on the one hand, and a culpable desire to conceal the fact on the other, in too many persons.

3. The shipwreck of three very valuable vessels on the capes of Virginia, in a snow storm, during the night of the 20th ult. by which several persons were frozen to death.

4. The dreadful fire at Portsmouth, N. H. on the 22nd December—several hundred buildings being destroyed.

5. The invasion by the British from Fort George—the storming of Fort Magawa—the murder of many people—the burning of Lewisston, Manchester, Tuscarora—the desolation of the neighboring country—the loss of the public stores, of immense value, and of individual property to a great amount—with a “fearful looking for” like incidents at Buffalo and Black Rock, where several U. S. vessels lie.—But we will not despair of the republic.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DIRECT TAX.—A proposition to advance the state's quota of the direct tax of the United States, was agreed to in the house of representatives of South-Carolina, with only 2 or 3 dissentients.

RETALIATION.—The following resolution was presented to the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, by Mr. McCoy, on the 13th ult. and being called up and considered some days after, was agreed to almost unanimously:

“Considering that the honor and power of the nation are pledged for the protection of every citizen in the enjoyment of his natural and political rights—That the integrity and existence of all governments are inseparably connected and that a violation of the one must ever tend to a dissolution of the other. Aware that a prompt retaliation of injury is the only alternative by which the national character can be sustained in conjunctures when the vindictive passions of our enemies impel them to the sacrifice of the usages of war and the rights of humanity. And considering that some of the gallant defenders of our country, who have been captured in honorable combat with the enemy, have been seized as traitors and thrown into prison, perhaps to languish out a painful existence of privation and disease, or to receive judgment and sentence from a tribunal where Power shall take the place of Justice, and Vengeance usurp the seat of Reason. We the senate and house of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, do adopt the following resolution.

Resolved, That we view with high approbation the decisive spirit and firmness which the national authority have manifested in securing hostages for the safety of those defenders of the republic who are threatened with the penalties of treason against Great Britain. And while we are deeply anxious that a sanguinary result may be averted and that the calamities of the war may be unembittered by wanton bloodshed or cruelty, we are nevertheless, prepared under all circumstances, to support our government in every measure of just retaliation to which it may be driven by the violence of the enemy.”

THE MEDIATION.—The Philadelphia papers say that letters have been received from captain Lloyd Jones, of the U. S. ship Neptune, dated at St. Petersburg, September 15, which states that he intended to sail thence for Gottenburg in a few days; there to wait further orders from the American commissioners, in Russia. He did not think they had accomplished any thing.

It was reported at Gottenburg about the 23d of October, that lord Walpole had visited the emperor Alexander, and afterwards proceeded to St. Petersburg, to confer with the American envoys, who had remained in that city.

SHAMEFUL.—A copy of the embargo bill was received at Boston (a distance of 500 miles) before the injunction of secrecy was removed at Washington. The public safety demands that the person who communicated it should be discovered, and expelled.—He has violated his honor and his oath, and dare not be trusted; particularly in times like the present.

PENSACOLA.—A writer in a Tennessee paper says, Pensacola “is the hot-bed of corruption, the Hull for (for the British fleet) and the Malden (for the savages) of the southern part of our country.”

MILITARY SUPPLIES.—The commissary-general of the United States at Philadelphia, advertises that he will receive proposals for supplies of muskets

(and their appurtenances) rifles, sabres, swords, blue cloth, kersey, blankets, cotton drilling, stockings, flannels, muslin, shoes and boots, helmets and cap plates—“all which must be American manufacture.”

BATTLE OF THE BEAVER DAMS.—Colonel Bærstler requests the public to suspend their opinion as to his conduct on the above occasion. As he intends to demand a legal investigation as soon as he shall be exchanged, and shall be enabled to have the evidence of the officers under his command on the day of battle: it would be both indelicate and improper to say any thing further on the subject at present. Colonel B. begs that all such editors of newspapers in the United States, as have published any thing relative to the battle of the Beaver Dams, will give the above an insertion. Washington City, Dec 22.

Colonel M'Comb (says the Columbian) had been sent to Montreal for the purpose, as is understood, of conferring with the British commander-in-chief, on the subject of the officers placed in close confinement as subjects of retaliation.

BRITISH GOODS.—“At the auction of English hardware goods in this town (says a Portsmouth, N. H. paper) on Wednesday last, a cask containing AWL BLADES and TACKS was sold for 23 dollars 89 cents the pound sterling—the value of the cask was about 5000 dollars.”

QUEBEC, Dec. 7.—On Thursday evening were brought back to their old lodgings in the goal, the three American hostages, who, on the previous Saturday evening, made their escape from thence, viz. major C. Vandeventer, captain Isaac Roach, and lieutenant Sidney Smith. They were taken at the extreme part of Nouvelle-Beauce by a detachment of militia from that part of the country, commanded by captain Verrau, having under him lieutenant R. ne.

MILITARY.

FORT GEORGE AND NEWARK.—From the National Intelligencer of Dec. 29—“Accounts from Niagara have been received at the war office, stating that the enemy having approached fort George, brigadier general McClure had, on the tenth inst. removed the public stores, destroyed the fort, and retired to the south side of the Niagara river. It is also stated, that the village of Newark, adjoining fort George, had been burned. The general's motives for taking these steps, were to prevent the enemy from re-establishing themselves on the Niagara, and thus to give better protection to our own frontier and to the shipping on lake Erie, which he suspects to be the enemy's object, and which he states to be wintering at Buffalo.

The militia brigade forming the late garrison had refused to stay a day beyond their period of service, though the general had been authorized to offer them a bounty, and did actually offer it, for the service of an additional month. A previous call made in November for one thousand men had failed; a new one, directed by the governor, had not been executed; and the attempts made to embody volunteers, had not succeeded. The policy of burning Newark under the existing circumstances of the case, (taking for granted that it was done by design) is not perhaps to be defended. General McClure was not authorized to burn this village, unless it became necessary to do it in defending fort George. But, this fort destroyed and abandoned, the authority did not exist. Further explanations are, however, wanting before a correct opinion can be had.”

Fall of Fort Niagara, &c.—On Wednesday last, we received intelligence by way of Abam which stated—that a considerable force of British and Indians crossed the Niagara river on the 19th of Dec ember, carried fort Niagara by storm, and put the whole garrison to death, except three who made their escape; that they had burnt Lewiston, Manchester, Tuscarora, and every building in their vicinity and also murdered many of the inhabitants. That they were proceeding to Buffalo, which with Black Rock, and the U. S. vessels lying there, would probably share the same fate. We have waited with exceeding anxiety to be further informed of these matters, but have received nothing positive. The above are reports; but we believe they are substantially true. It appears certain that the enemy did cross the river, and that the utmost consternation prevailed in the adjacent country. We have no reason to hope that they did not do as they pleased, for there was no force to resist them. The garrison at Niagara, it is supposed, did not consist of more than 300 men, the chief of whom were invalids. The citizens, adjacent to these calamitous events, were rallying themselves for defence. We fear their efforts will be unavailing to meet them promptly, by reason that the arms and ammunition may have chiefly fallen into the enemy's hands. This is, indeed, a terrible business. The loss, public and private, is incalculable; and where it will end, we presume not to calculate.

See Post-script.

COL. BARCLAY.—Whole hosts of testimony are adduced in the papers to shew that col. Barclay's statements, inserted in the last number page 282, is a pure "British official"—about as true as that—a British force of 300 men defeated an American army of 8000; and then eat the whole of them, with their cannon, waggons and travelling forges!

"BRITISH OFFICIAL."—Sir George Prevost's strange statement (see page 285) is thus contradicted in a late National Intelligencer:—"We are authorized by capt. Todd of the 28th regiment, who was in gen. Harrison's staff at the time of the action on the Thames, to state that the second British bulletin relating to that action published in our last, is false in the following particulars: gen. Harrison's army took none of the British baggage on the 4th of the month, nor any until the day of action. The army was not harassed on its return, by the Indians; nor was an hostile Indian seen after the action, although the troops remained two days upon the ground. It is admitted that the warriors under the eye of Tecumseh fought bravely; but the others fled as soon as they discovered that they were turned by the mounted regiment. The former order, published under the sanction of the British government, contained a misrepresentation or falsehood in almost every line. Capt. Todd avers, that the number of troops brought by gen. Harrison into action was inferior to what the general's official account makes them. The error arose from the rapidity of the pursuit, (having marched 80 miles in three days and a half) and the impossibility of ascertaining the numbers that were left from fatigue and sickness at the farm-houses upon the road. From the documents taken from the enemy, it would appear that their force was at least equal to ours."

Washington City, Dec. 28.—The Secretary of War reached this city on Friday.

On Thursday major-general Harrison departed for the north western frontier.

Many officers have recently arrived in this city from the northern army; among whom we have heard of major-general Hampton, brig. gen. Parker, col. Swift, col. Coles, col. Scott, and col. Pickens.

NAVAL.

In the Ontario.—A New-York paper states that 150 ship carpenters had preceded from that city for Sackett's Harbor.

Expedition.—It is stated that one of the 74's now building, may be expected ready for sea by the 1st of June.

The Policy, a prize to the Essex, and two American ships from the South sea, with the privateer Rolla of Baltimore, have been captured by the enemy, to the eastward. But we have the pleasure to remark that several valuable vessels have lately got safe into port. The Loire frigate was supposed to be a South sea ship from the circumstance of her having the whale boats of the Policy hanging on her quarters, and the mistake was not discovered until she fired upon the Rolla, whose flag, however, did not come down until the frigate had discharged 140 shot and carried away one of the masts of the privateer.

CRUIZE OF THE CONGRESS.

The following (says the National Intelligencer) are the material circumstances which occurred during the vigilant and active cruize of the United States' ship Congress, captain Smith, which commenced on the 30th April and terminated on the 14th December.

His course was in a circuitous direction to the south east, crossing the equator, passing the north-east coast of Brazil, and thence homeward; in which a vast number of neutral vessels were brought to and examined, four valuable vessels of the enemy captured, but none of his cruisers seen from the 3d of May to the end of the cruize.

Extract of a letter from captain John Smith, to the secretary of the navy, dated on board U. S. frigate Congress, Portsmouth harbor, Dec. 14th, 1813

"I have the honor to communicate to you, the arrival, at this anchorage, of the United States' frigate Congress, under my command, whose daily situation during the cruize, I take the liberty of laying before you in the abstract from the ship's log, which accompanies this; in which there is accounted for, all vessels which were seen by us, from the period of our separation from the President, until our arrival at this place, with the exception of one brig, which twice escaped under the favor of dark nights, and whose great distance only enabled me to conjecture her to be an American privateer.

"The expiration of the term of service of the greater part of the crew of the Congress, I am concerned to advise you of; they have, nevertheless, for some months, been serving under those circumstances with the same zeal and activity I have always found them eminent for. Your sanction for their discharge, and order to replace their number, I shall be thankful for."

May 3. Lat. 40, 18, long. 44, 19, in chase of the British brig Curlew; saw at the same time to leeward a line of battle ship and a frigate. Lost sight of the chase during the night.

May 8. Lat. 37, 48, long. 57, 54, boarded the American ship Amiable Matilda, from New-York for Lisbon, in chase of which separated from the U. S. frigate President.

May 22, lat. 23, 53, long. 39, 59, captured the British brig Diana, of 10 guns and 14 men, George Thompson, master and owner, from Buenos Ayres, bound to London, 29 days out, cargo 6,050 hides, 239 bales of tallow and 7 bales of horse hair; three

May 24, lat. 20, 45, long. 58, 32, put all the prisoners on board the Diana on parole, and furnished her for a passage to Barbadoes.

October 25, lat. 19, 19, long. 40, 4, captured the British ship Rose, Philip Vibert, master, from Guernsey, bound to Guadaloupe, laden with medoc wine and potatoes, took out 5700 gallons of wine, which we put in our water casks, and 35 hogheads which we stowed in the hold, and 10 tons of potatoes, being all we could stow on board, and then destroyed her,—burthen 182 tons.

November, 9, lat. 25, 46, long. 43, 46, boarded the Spanish brig Amiable Maria, from Havana bound to Teneriffe; put on board of her, on their parole, the master, mate and supercargo of the late British ship Rose.

BLOCKADE OF NEW LONDON.

Com. Hardy, with the Ramillies, has taken the place of capt. Oliver and the Valiant. The latter has gone to port for repairs.

The British barges, off New-London, sometimes meet with the rubbers. In an attack upon an armed smack, some days ago, they were beaten off, with the reported loss of 8 men killed.

Mr. Penny, of Long Island, who, it will be recollected, was taken out of his bed by order of commodore Hardy, it is said, is to be immediately restored, by that officer. Of course the person who is held as a hostage for Mr. Penny will then be released.

A certain Mr. Lenter, "formerly a British officer, but more recently attached to the 23d U. S. regt." was apprehended on the 18th Dec. in attempting to escape to the British ship Valiant. He was detained on board one of the vessels of our squadron, but it is thought nothing can be proved against him sufficient to punish him.

Extract of a letter to the editor of the Connecticut Herald, from an officer in the state corps, dated Killingsworth, Dec. 14.

"Our engagements with the enemy have become so frequent, that it would be in vain to attempt to furnish a particular statement of each. That Killingsworth is to be the seat of war in the Sound, can no longer be doubted.

Yesterday, a sloop bound from N. York to Mystic River, having a valuable cargo on board, estimated at 5000 dollars, was chased on to the reef near the east point of the harbor by the British higger Intrepid; but before the boats of the enemy had succeeded in getting possession of the vessel, we gave them a plain statement of facts, which convinced them they had got the wrong side of the Atlantic.—They left the vessel for the original owners to repossess at their pleasure. The vessel and cargo received no damage."

The blue lights.—The active treason and shameless effrontery exhibited in the following letter from com. Decatur, calls forth feelings that we shall not attempt to commit to paper.

Extract of a letter from com. Stephen Decatur to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

New-London, Dec. 20, 1813.

Some few nights since, the weather promised an opportunity for this squadron to get to sea, and it was said on shore that we intended to make the attempt. In the course of the evening two blue lights were burnt on both the points at the harbor's mouth as signals to the enemy, and there is not a doubt, but that they have, by signals and otherwise, instantaneous information of our movements. Great but unsuccessful exertions have been made to detect those who communicate with the enemy by signal. The editor of the New London Gazette, to alarm them and in the hope to prevent the repetition of these signals, stated in that newspaper, that they had been observed, and ventured to denounce those who had made them in animated and indignant terms. The consequence is that he has incurred the express censure of some of his neighbors. Notwithstanding these signals have been repeated, and have been seen by twenty persons at least in this squadron, there are men in New London who have the hardihood to affect to disbelieve it, and the effrontery to avow their disbelief.*

I am, sir, with the highest consideration and respect, your very obedient and humble servant,

(Signed) STEPHEN DECATUR.

Hon. Wm. Jones, Secretary of the Navy.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

Eight or ten vessels passed safely, to sea in the snow storm on the 20th ult. but the valuable schooners, Express and Reindeer, with the privateer Tartar (proceeding to an eastern port to fill up her crew) by the mismanagement of their pilots or the violence of the storm, went ashore on cape Henry, after clearing the British fleet in Lynnhaven Bay. These disasters happened about 8 o'clock in the evening—the night was dreadful—twelve persons perished with the cold and were lost from the vessels, for the sea broke over them in a terrible man-

* We insert the following notice of the transaction as alluded to by commodore Decatur, that the world may see the offence of the editor of the New-London Gazette, who is a decided "federalist."

From the New London Gazette.

NEW-LONDON, Dec. 15.

"It will astonish every American who has one spark left to kindle into a flame the love of his country, when we state as a fact for which we vouch—that on Sunday evening last when the report was current our squadron would put to sea before the next morning—in the course of the night blue lights were raised on the heights, both at Groton and on this side of the entrance of our harbor; evidently designed as signals to the British fleet; this has excited the highest indignation, and the most decisive measures have been taken to detect and bring to condign punishment the traitorous wretches who dare thus to give the enemy every advantage over those great and gallant men, who in the war with Tripoli, and in the present contest, have surrounded the American stars with a lustre which cannot be eclipsed."

To complete the history of the "blue lights," we add the following, first published in the "Rhode Island American," and copied with great avidity (as below) into many gazettes. The infamous incident has been lustily denied by many; for it is feared the honest part of the community may reflect on the circumstance, and in it discover that wicked "British influence" that prevails in the United States. It is a mere sample of the paragraphs that have appeared in "refutation" of the charge—

"In our paper of Friday last we republished from the N. London Gazette, an account respecting the exhibition of blue lights, on the heights near that place, designed as signals to the enemy's fleet. We were unwilling to believe that any of our citizens could be guilty of so gross an outrage on the laws of their country; and are happy now to have it our power to state on the authority of a respectable paper published at Norwich, that the statement was TOTALLY INCORRECT. It appears that on the night of Sunday the 12th inst. blue lights from the enemy's ships were discernible from our guard-boats: but none were seen proceeding from the land."

ner. At the dawn of the day they received every possible assistance from a detachment of militia stationed on the shore. The British, at the same time, opened a cannonade upon them, by which a militia man was killed and one seaman wounded. The greater part of the cargoes of the vessels, and the equipments, was landed, amidst a heavy fire from the enemy, who finally succeeded in burning two of them, as it is supposed with the loss of several men, for they were gallantly resisted. The other is a wreck.

Copy of a letter from captain Tarbell, commanding the gun-boat flotilla on the Norfolk station, to the secretary of the navy, dated Navy Yard, Gosport, Dec. 14, 1813.

Sir—Last Tuesday evening I got under way with nine gun-boats and two tenders, taking in tow the Centipede and launch. We proceeded up the bay as far as East river; at the entrance of which, it was reported, lay at anchor two gun-brigs, a schooner, cutter and tenders. Previous to our arrival they had moved up to Piankatank. The fog clearing, unfortunately our force was discovered by a frigate, who proceeded up, and exchanged signals with the brigs; after which, all came to anchor off Newpoint Light-house. On Sunday, sunset, we weighed, with a fair wind, and stood down the bay; at 1 A. M. between Back river and Oldpoint Light, sailing-master Joseph Middleton in the Dispatch, on the look out ahead was attacked by 3 barges; he beat them off; before we could get up the barges rowed in under the land where we lost sight of them; several shot-holes through the Dispatch's sails. We arrived off Crany island on Monday morning—all well.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THE CHRONICLE.

Portsmouth, N. H. became a heap of ruins, by fire, in the night of 22d ult. The fire commenced in a barn (supposed to have been communicated by an incendiary,) and aided by a strong wind, spread destruction with unexampled rapidity. It began at half past 7 o'clock in the evening, and by 3 in the morning, from three to four hundred houses were consumed! No lives were lost. The value of the property destroyed is incalculable. Whole ranges of stores, with their rich contents, fell a prey to the flames. How great must be the distress! Let subscriptions be opened in all places, and the people give a little of what they can spare to relieve the pressure of this dreadful calamity. Many robberies were committed.

In 1802, Dec. 24, 118 buildings were destroyed by fire at Portsmouth; and on Dec. 24, 1806, 24 houses were burnt.

The brig New Hazard has arrived at Boston from Canton, with a full cargo of teas, nankeens and china ware. She will produce to her owners many hundred thousand dollars.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The British schooner Bramble, bearing a flag, arrived at Annapolis at 12 o'clock yesterday, in 42 days from Plymouth, Eng. which she left about the 29th of November, with dispatches for government. The Bramble was brought to on Sunday in Lynhaven bay by the Dragon, 74; and captain Wallace of the schr. Caroline of Philadelphia, was put on board as pilot, together with Mr. Sandels, a passenger in the Caroline, and Messrs. Rich of the Atalanta and Brethoff of the George of this port. Captain Wallace, to whom the public is indebted for this information, came up to this city last night; he was captured on his passage from Charleston to Philadelphia, off Cape Henry, about 34 days since, and was detained on board the Dragon until Monday last.

Captain Wallace, who came up in the flag to Annapolis, copied the following summary from the Plymouth Telegraph, of Nov. 6, 1813, which he politely handed to us.

"Two letters from sir C. Stewart to the English government, dated 16th and 18th of October, the latter from Leipsic, contain details of two great battles fought on the 16th and 18th of Oct. in the former of which the French, under Ney, Marmont and Bertrand, were defeated with the loss of 12,000 men. The loss of the allies is stated at from 6 to 7,000. On the 13th a severe battle was fought near Leipsic, where the French were attacked throughout their whole line by the combined allied armies, and totally defeated, with the loss of upwards of 40,000 men in killed, wounded and prisoners, 65 pieces of cannon, besides the desertion of 17 battalions of German infantry, with all their staff and generals, who went over to the allies en masse. During the action the French lost generals Regnier, Vallery, Brune, Bertrand and Lauriston. On the 19th the town of Leipsic was taken by assault, with all its artillery, magazines, stores, with the king of Saxony and all his court, the garrison and rear-guard of the French army; upwards of 30,000 wounded Bonaparte had only escaped from Leipsic at nine o'clock in the morning; the allies entered at eleven.

On the field of battle on the 19th, an officer arrived from general Tottenburn with information that Bremen had surrendered to the corps under his orders, the keys of which he brought, and they were presented by the prince royal to the emperor of Russia. Bavaria has declared war against France. This fact is announced in the prince regent's speech to parliament on the 4th November.

Two French frigates had been sent into Plymouth about the 1st of November. Their names were the Weser and La Trave of 44 guns each.

In conversation with the bearer of the despatches in the Bramble, captain Wallace drew from him that they were of a pacific nature; but he said that nothing had been heard from St. Petersburg.

The Dragon 74 and a brig were the only vessels in Lynnhaven Bay on the 27th. Two frigates, with several tenders, left it the day before, supposed to have come up the bay.

London papers to the 14th Nov. were brought by the Bramble, but they were mostly taken on board the Dragon.

Extract of a letter from governor Tompkins to the secretary of war.

Albany, December 24, 1813.

"Upon my arrival in this place to-day, I was met by an express bringing despatches, of which I send you a copy.

"The express further informs, that on his arrival at Batavia he learned from major Allen (the contractor's agent at Niagara) and from lieutenant Loomis, who, with two or three others had made their escape, that fort Niagara had been taken by the British. The garrison was surprised. Capt. Leonard (1st regiment of artillery) had the command; but it is rumored that he was not in the fort at the time, but with his family some miles off. What became of the rest of the garrison, those who escaped do not know.

"In consequence of this information, major-general Hall has been ordered to repair to that frontier with as many of his division as may be necessary to expel or destroy the invaders. The British have with them a number of indians, and continue to sanction their massacres."

Head-Quarters, Buffalo, Dec-26th, 1813.

SIR—I would respectfully represent to your excellency, that on the morning of yesterday, the enemy crossed over a little below Lewistown—they have burnt Lewistown, and every house from that place to within two and a half miles of Schlosser, and the Tascarora village is also burnt.

The last express stated, that the enemy were fortifying on the mountain below Schlosser. The force of the enemy is differently represented—it is stated to be from four to eight hundred regulars, and six hundred indians—it is further stated that the enemy are still crossing. The force the enemy can bring is not precisely known, it is probably from 1500 to 3000, including regulars, militia and Indians. Our force is about 200 regulars at fort Niagara, & about 150 near this place. I have ordered out my brigade to repel the invasion. I am in hopes of success with the assistance of the militia of Genessee.

I am respectfully, &c.

The committee of foreign relations in the house of representatives, have at length reported two bills, in consonance to the message of the president recommending such measures; the one for prohibiting the delivery of cargoes of libelled vessels on bonds, pending their trial, to those who claim a right to them; and the other, a bill to prohibit the practice of ransoming vessels from the enemy. These bills are made the order of the day for Monday next.

Duties on Importation & Tonnage.

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

I transmit to the senate a report of the acting secretary of the treasury, complying with their resolution of the 13th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

December 2th, 1813.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 16th, 1813.

SIR—In compliance with the resolution of the senate of the 13th inst. I have the honor to state:

That the amount of duties accruing on goods, wares and merchandize imported into the United States, from the 1st day of July, 1812, to the 31st day of December, of the same year, for which period the accounts of the collectors of the customs are settled, was $9,869,199 31

And the amount of tonnage, including light money, accruing during the same period, was 92,297 70

The accounts of the collectors from the 1st day of January, 1813, to the 30th day of September, of the same year, have been but partially settled; and some for the quarter ending 30th of September have not yet been received at the treasury. For this period, therefore, an estimate only can be given, taken from the accounts of the collectors, as rendered to the treasury, and in some cases from their less formal returns. This estimate is as follows:

Duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, as imported:

For the 1st quarter of the year
1813,		$2,280,000 00
	2d do.	2,356,000 00
	3d do.	1,380,000 00
		$6,016,000 00

Tonnage duties, including light money:

For the 1st quarter of the year 1813,		$89,000 00
	2d do.	84,000 00

$240,000 00

The sums above stated, for duties on merchandise imported, are without the deduction for drawbacks paid on merchandize re-exported. These drawbacks paid from the 1st of July to the 31st of December, 1812, amounted, by the accounts as settled, to $639,555 44.

And they are estimated to have amounted during the three first quarters of the year, 1813, to the following sums, viz.

During the 1st quarter of the year
1813, to		$536,000 00
	2d do.	229,000 00
	3d do.	148,000 00

$913,000 00

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 19 of VOL. V.]

BALTIMORE, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1814.

[WHOLE NO. 125.]

Hec olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

Printed and published by H. NILES, South-st. next door to the Merchants' Coffee House, at $ 5 per annum.

Attention invited.

The idea of increasing the matter of the REGISTER, as proposed in page 240, is reluctantly abandoned for the present. The editor believes he cannot pursue the project, without hazarding too much of his interest in this favored establishment.

But to accommodate his many friends who desire an increase of matter, he submits the following:

During the six or eight months last past, the quantity of matter laid off for insertion, has constantly accumulated. Much attention has been bestowed, in reading every thing, to present first such as the chain of events or circumstances of the times rendered necessary; and it is believed the arrangement has afforded considerable satisfaction. But many things of high interest to the studious reader or careful observer, have been omitted. They should not be lost. To describe these papers is impossible; and faith must be given to the editor's judgment by those who desire to have them, as proposed below. Every subscriber may obtain them if he pleases; but those who do not preserve the REGISTER or are not curious "in matters in general," will not require them. Assured from various causes, that sufficient encouragement will be afforded to justify the attempt, it is proposed to publish a SUPPLEMENT TO THE PRESENT VOLUME, to contain at least twelve sheets, the charge for which will be one dollar; that is, two sheets more than the same money purchases of the regular work. This supplement to be put to press by the middle of March next, and published in about four weeks thereafter. No more will be printed than are ordered, except for the files the editor preserves for future disposal. The regular annual payment is due the last of next month, and those who wish the supplement, will, at the same time, advance the additional dollar; blank receipts for which will be forwarded to all the agents, as well to accommodate the subscribers who have paid the current year, as those who have not. When the supplement is put to press the subscription for it must be closed. The plan is respectfully offered to all, and none will complain if their own neglect should deprive them of a copy.

AS many of the subscribers live at too great a distance to be heard from in the space of time between the full period of payment, and that when the supplement must go to press, the bills will be forwarded to the agents early next month, and the settlement of them eight or ten days before their maturity, cannot be of importance to any. Gentlemen residing in places where there is no agent will please to forward their money and make known their wishes, by mail.

Legislature of Kentucky.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR TO THE LEGISLATURE.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives.

The constitutional period having again arrived, which makes it the duty of the governor to lay before the legislature information of the state of the commonwealth, and recommend for their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient.

In conformity with this part of my duty, and a recollection that the last general assembly felt a deep interest in the war in which the U. S. are now engaged having confided to the governor extensive powers and discretions as to the future military operations from this state; it may now perhaps be deemed my duty to state to your honorable body the steps that have been taken in succession, on the different requisitions that have been made upon this state for reinforcements to the north western army by the general government.

Under the act of the last session "authorising the governor of this state to raise and organize a detachment of militia" the most speedy and effectual measures were taken to comply with the views of the legislature, and the whole force contemplated by that act was organized and ready to take the field by the middle of March last. Previous to which a requisition for 1500 men had been made by major general Harrison upon this state to reinforce the north western army; and such arrangements for pay and subsistence having been made with the proper officers before their march, as to render any advance from the treasury of this state, as contemplated by the said act unnecessary; that force was ordered on under the command of brig. gen. Green Clay, to the head quarters of the north western army. Great part of this detachment was unfortunate, but the other part was of immense importance in assisting to repel the enemy from the siege which they had commenced upon fort Meigs, and by maintaining that post during the season against the numerous hordes of savages and British that had determined upon its reduction.

Not long after the aforesaid detachment had marched, a further requisition was received from the commander in chief of the north western army for 1500 men to reinforce the posts on the frontiers. In consequence of this request, I gave orders for the two remaining regiments of the organized militia under the act of the third of February last, to rendezvous at Georgetown on the second day of May following. But previous to their arrival at the point of rendezvous, I received a letter from major general Harrison, "requesting me to suspend any measures that might have been commenced to furnish further reinforcements to his army, unless I had received instructions to that effect from the secretary of war." No such instructions having reached me, the troops then on their march to the place of general rendezvous were at once discharged, from the consideration that they had been long held in a state of suspense; that they had at a great expence to equip themselves for a tour of six months' service, and the season of the year had arrived which rendered it proper for them to engage in some useful employment, I thought it would be unreasonable to hold them longer in that state of uncertainty, more especially, as by that time I had reason to believe that it was not intended to use any more militia in that quarter. I directed the disbanding of those two regiments, under the powers vested in me by the aforesaid act. The lengthy communications in the office of state, relative to those two requisitions of the militia from Kentucky, can be referred to for any further information which the general assembly may deem necessary. No further calls were made upon Kentucky until the latter end of July, at which time I received a letter from gen. Harrison, requesting me to send a reinforcement of militia to his aid, of not less than 400 nor more than 2000 men. In addition to this, major Trimble, his aid-de-camp who was the bearer thereof, was instructed to make certain verbal communications to me. One of which was, that gen. Harrison would accept the further force of 1500 volunteers, if they could be marched to his aid speedily. Taking the whole requisitions into view, it was at once evident to my mind, that it only could be complied with to answer the purpose, by an appeal to the patriotism of my fellow-citizens to volunteer their services as mounted men for that period; and under the impression that this course was most suitable to the genius of my countrymen, I was induced to issue a proclamation of the 31st July last: and in pursuance thereof, a force about equal to both gen. Harrison's requisitions assembled at Newport on the 31st Aug. following.—And although I had given the earliest intimation to the secretary of war of the steps that I was about to take to comply with gen. Harrison's requisition, and was anxious to know the pleasure of the president, with respect to the course I adopted before the volunteers passed the limits of the state, no information was received on that head until after my return from the campaign. But as this seemed to be the only occasion by which I could meet the wishes of the legislature as expressed in their resolution of the 31 Feb. last, "requesting the governor to take command of the militia when called into the service of the United States," I determined to proceed to the head-quarters of the north western army, relying upon the requisition of the commanding general as being sufficient to warrant the march of the volunteers.

The campaign, under the guidance of a gracious and everruling Providence terminated favorably to our arms. To say nothing of the destruction of public property, and of the immense stores of arms and munitions of war taken by our army from the enemy, it has added to the United States an extent of territory of great value; which, if not surrendered to the enemy upon a general peace, will forever put to silence our savage foes, that have so long infested the western country; they being now completely severed from British influence.

On my return to Kentucky, I received a letter from the war office, informing me "that the president had been pleased to approve of my arrangements in substituting volunteers for the militia required by gen. Harrison." The documents herewith transmitted, marked 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, will afford the legislature all the information necessary on the subject.

At an early period in the spring, information was received, that great apprehensions were entertained by the inhabitants of Livingston and Caldwell counties, of an attack from the hostile Indians that hovered round their frontiers: In consequence of which, orders were issued for a small guard for a short period, for their protection. It will be proper for the legislature to make such appropriations for the payment of this service, as their wisdom may direct. The documents marked 7, 8, 9 and 10, herewith forwarded, will afford the information necessary to judge of the propriety of the steps I had taken.

During the last session of congress, that body proceeded to pass sundry laws for the purpose of raising a revenue suited to a state of war: In the act laying a direct tax, the privilege is reserved to each state, of making the payment of its quota thereof, with a deduction of fifteen per centum, if paid before the 10th day of February next; or of ten per centum if paid before the 1st of May following.

This subject will no doubt receive the early attention of the general assembly; and such measures will be adopted in relation thereto, as they shall deem most consistent with the interest of the people.

You may be assured, gentlemen, of my hearty co-operation in all your labors that may have a tendency to promote the public good.

ISAAC SHELBY.

Frankfort, December 7, 1813.

Another message was received from the governor enclosing a letter from the secretary of state, which follows. The message itself recommends that rooms should be allotted the British prisoners in the penitentiary for their close confinement, according to the president's directions. The governor in his letter makes this remark: "Whilst the generous mind will deeply regret the occasion for such a measure, it will be recollected, that it has been forced upon us by the conduct of the enemy who during this war, have disregarded the usages of civilized hostility."

Extract of a letter from the secretary of the department of state, to the governor of Kentucky.

Department of State, Nov. 27, 1813.

"Sir—The British government seems to have given to this war, every degree of savage barbarity and cruelty which it may be able to inflict. In the close of the late campaign the British commanders at Quebec, seized and sent to England twenty-three of our soldiers who had been made prisoners, to be tried for treason, on the pretence that they were British subjects. For so unjust, and outrageous an act, the president was bound to confine a like number of British prisoners in the United States, which he did in the expectation, that the British government seeing the inevitable consequence of the first measure, would relax from it, or at least leave the affair in the state in which it had thus been placed, for accommodation by treaty. More recently, however, a measure of still greater injustice has been adopted. The prince regent has ordered into close confinement forty-six officers of the United States, upon the principle, as he says, of retaliation, expecting by the violence of the proceeding to intimidate this government into a submission to the extravagant and unfounded claims of the British government. The president has met this measure with equal decision, by ordering into like confinement forty-six British officers, as a pledge for the safety of those on whom the British government seems disposed to wreak its vengeance.

"These officers are ordered to be conveyed to Frankfort in Kentucky to be confined there in the penitentiary of that state, which is represented to be a building affording the twofold advantage of good and safe accommodation.

"This step is taken in the full confidence that every facility will be afforded to its complete execution by your excellency, that may be expected from a character so strongly attached to the union, and decided in the support of all the necessary measures to secure success to the just war in which we are engaged."

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On Monday, the 20th December, Mr. Ingersoll, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, made the following report:

The committee, to whom was referred the consideration of the memorial and petition of the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, beg leave to report:

That so long ago as in the year 1705, surveys and other preparations were made for undertaking this important national improvement of which the practicability is so obvious from the proximity of the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware and the nature of the intermediate ground, that even at that early day, certain individuals were prompted to make the attempt.

That in the year 1799 the legislature of the state of Maryland enacted a law, which was followed up, in the year 1801, by corresponding laws enacted by the legislatures of Delaware and Pennsylvania, providing for the incorporation of a company with a capital stock of $400,000, for the purpose of cutting and making a canal between the river Delaware and the Chesapeake bay: in pursuance of which acts of incorporation subscriptions were received for nearly the whole amount of the two thousand shares, at $200 each, surveys were made, engineers and workmen employed, a route and position located for the canal on the isthmus which separates the bays of Chesapeake and Delaware, and some material progress effected in the execution of the work. But after expending upwards of $100,000 in the purchase of water-rights, the construction of a feeder and reservoir, and digging some portion of the canal, the work was suspended in the year 1803, in consequence of the non-payment of subscriptions, the evidence daily accumulating, that $400,000, the whole amount subscribed, even if collected, was a sum inadequate to the completion of the canal, and of that depression of the funds and spirit of the company which were superinduced by the absence of public support and encouragement from the individual enterprize which had so far carried on the undertaking. Since that time the subject has been under consideration in congress, bills in various shapes have been acted on in the senate for extending national aid to this great national work, and on the 3d day of March, 1811, the last day of the last session of the eleventh congress, a bill, which came from the senate, appropriating two hundred thousand acres of public lands for this object was indefinitely postponed in the house of representatives, rather, as this committee have been taught to believe, from the lateness of the period at which the subject was brought before the house of representatives, than from any indisposition on their part to accede to the liberal provision proposed by the senate.

That conceiving the present to be a moment when the importance of such a canal will probably be appreciated as it ought to be, your committee beg leave to enumerate briefly some of the most prominent advantages to be derived from it:

By connecting the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware, the contemplated canal will throw open an internal navigation from the north-western parts of the state of New-York to the southern extremities of the state of Virginia.

Besides the contributions which such a course of internal navigation would afford to the sustenance of the community, and to an export trade, in the products of the earth, which it would transport from all the various regions it must connect together, it would moreover supply the coal from the banks of the James river and the Susquehanna, to the cities and settlements along the Atlantic coast, thus substituting a cheap and inexhaustible species of fuel for the wood of which the country is deprived, and of which the price already constitutes so large a drain upon the resources of the poor and manufacturing classes.

The extensive beds of plaster of Paris and other useful substances, which are said to exist on the shores of the Susquehanna, and of which the want is now so severely felt in other places, might be carried into active usefulness throughout some of the most agricultural districts of the union.

The transportation of merchandize, of all kinds of articles of food, clothing and necessity, of almost every thing which the north, middle and south interchange, would be facilitated in point of price, time and safety, to a great amount. Your committee are informed that at this time government is compelled to convey by land in the winter season, over the portage from the Chesapeake to the Delaware (a road rendered almost impassable by land carriage) the most bulky pieces of timber for the ship of the line building at Philadelphia, and that the expence of the conveyance over this small distance is enormous.

In the reduction of the time, labor and cost of all military transportation, whether of men or things, the importance of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal is inestimable; and desirable as such an improvement may be in time of war, its uses would be no less extensively beneficial in time of peace.

That essential as such a canal is at this juncture, and advantageous as it would be at all times, the motives to its undertaking are increased by the facility and shortness of time with which it may be undoubtedly accomplished.

The canal begins at Welch Point on the Elk river an arm of the Chesapeake, and is to terminate at a distance of twenty-two miles, on Christiana river, a branch of the Delaware. At low water the depth of water in Christiana is nine feet and in Elk twelve feet, within one hundred feet from the shore. The tide rises four feet in both rivers. The highest intermediate ground, over which the canal is to be carried on a level of thirteen miles in length, is seventy-four feet above tide water, the descent is to be effected by nine locks on each side. The digging is generally easy. No expensive aqueducts nor bridges nor any other obstacles occur but those which have been already overcome in digging the feeder through a rocky soil. The supply of water drawn from Elk river, by a feeder six miles in length, which is completed, and which is itself a boat canal three and a half feet deep, united by a lock of ten feet high to the main canal is calculated to fill daily one hundred and forty-four locks; a quantity sufficient on an average for the daily passage of twenty-four vessels. The canal is twenty-six feet wide at the bottom, and fifty at the top on the water line, being dug at the depth of eight feet. It is intended for vessels of from forty to seventy tons, drawing seven and a half feet water. The banks twenty feet wide for towing paths, one of which may be converted into a turn-pike road, being raised three feet above the level of the water, will, by increasing the height of the lock gates one foot, admit a depth of nine feet water, in the canal. The digging one mile through rocky ground cost $15,000; another mile perfectly level and without any impediments, cost $2,300, which gives an average of $7,650 a mile. The whole distance to be cut is twenty-two miles; the whole computed cost at $850,000. Of this sum $100,000 has been laid out. The sum solicited by public contribution is $287,000. Of this sum the state of Pennsylvania contributes $75,000, to be reimbursed by three hundred and seventy-five shares of the stock; the state of Maryland contributes $50,000, to be reimbursed by two hundred and fifty shares of the stock; and the state of Delaware 12,000 dolls. to be reimbursed by sixty shares of the stock. The sum solicited of congress is 150,000 dolls. to be reimbursed by seven hundred and fifty shares of the stock. With public assistance to such an amount the president and directors of this canal calculate on individual contributions and private loans, sufficient to complete the work in a short time.

The states of Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania, which are most immediately interested in this public improvement, having given their consent and co-operation to the work; your committee, in behalf of the national legislature, beg leave to report the following bill for bestowing the aid required of the United States.

[Mr. Ingersoll then laid on the table a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to subscribe, on behalf of the United States 750 shares in the capital stock of said company; which bill was twice read and committed to a committee of the whole house.]

General Smyth's Petition.

The following is a copy of the memorial of Alexander Smyth, laid before the house of representatives on Tuesday, the 29th of December, and by that body referred to the secretary of war.

To the honorable the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled:

The petition of Alexander Smyth, a citizen of Virginia, respectfully represents—That having in 1807 written to an honorable member of the house of representatives, that in case of war with Great Britain he was desirous to enter into the regular service, he received in 1808 an appointment as colonel of a regiment of riflemen. That although war had not commenced, yet the event being probable, he abandoned his profession, which was then lucrative, left his family, vacated his seat in the senate of Virginia as the representative of thirteen counties, and joined the army of the United States. That your petitioner had the good fortune to give the utmost satisfaction to his superiors, general Wilkinson, general Hampton, general Dearborn, and the late secretary of war, while acting under their immediate orders; was promoted to the rank of brigadier and inspector general in July 1812; given the command of a brigade in September; and of one of the armies of the United States in October in the same year. That at the expiration of five weeks, during which period he made every exertion in his power to serve the nation, he found it necessary to put his troops into winter quarters. Having determined on that measure, as your petitioner had been absent from his home the last eight winters, much the greater part of the last five years, and the whole of the last fourteen months, and had been refused leave to visit his family in the month of July preceding, and calculating that it was probable the campaign of 1813 might terminate his existence, he, without resigning his command, asked for leave of absence, which was granted until the 1st of March, 1813, at which time your petitioner was ordered to report himself to the secretary of war. That your petitioner left his troops in cantonments, under the command of an officer of thirty-six years experience, and in February, 1813, reported himself by letter to the secretary of war, and solicited orders; and as the failure of your petitioner to take fort George, York and Kingston, and to winter in Canada as he was instructed, had created some clamor, your petitioner proposed that an enquiry into his conduct should take place, which the honorable secretary, through the medium of the adjutant-general, was pleased to promise; since which time your petitioner has not had the honor to hear from the war-office.

Your petitioner would further represent, that he has heard that some members of your honorable body are of opinion, that by an act of the last session, regulating the staff of the army of the United States, your petitioner has become a private citizen; and with this opinion, his own might, perhaps accord, were it not impossible to believe that the congress of the United States, at their last session, could have intentionally committed an act of injustice.

Your petitioner affirms that he has not done or omitted any thing to the injury of the nation; that his chief, if not his only error, has consisted in expressing too freely his indignation against those who had done injuries, or omitted to perform duties, to the nation. The motives which led astray, he conceives might procure for this error forgiveness. That this affirmation is true, he believes he can satisfy a committee or committees of your honorable body, on short notice.

Your petitioner has essayed to engage again in the pursuits of civil life; but he finds that, while the din of war continues, it is impossible for him to give the necessary attention to any peaceful pursuit. He desires to serve, to die, if Heaven wills it, in the defence of his country; a country that has protected his infancy, given him a family, and at times distinguished him with considerable honors; from whose government no act of wrong, personal to himself, will force his esteem, while it maintains, with steady perseverance, that country's rights.

Your petitioner confidently trusts, that in deciding on his prayer you will be mindful of the rule of justice.—To others do, the law is not severe, what to thyself thou wishest to be done; and of the rule of policy, 'The social body is oppressed, when one of its members is oppressed.'

The prayer of your petitioner is, that you will revise the act organizing the staff of the army of the United States, and by a declaratory act preserve the rank of your petitioner, as a brigadier-general in the line, abolishing only his authority as inspector-general, &c. And your petitioner, &c.

ALEXANDER SMYTH.

The Prince Regent's Speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

It is with the deepest regret that I am again obliged to announce to you the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

The great and splendid successes with which it has pleased Divine Providence to bless his majesty's arms and those of his allies, in the course of the present campaign, has been productive of the most important consequences to Europe.

In Spain, the glorious and decisive victory, obtained near Vittoria, has been followed by the advance of the allied forces to the Pyrenees, by the repulse of the enemy in every attempt to regain the ground he had been compelled to abandon, by the reduction of the fortress of St. Sebastian, and finally, by the establishment of the allied army on the frontier of France.

In this series of brilliant operations you will have observed, with the highest satisfaction, the consummate skill and ability of the great commander field-marshal Wellington and the steadiness and unconquerable spirit which have been equally displayed by the troops of the three nations united under his command.

The termination of the armistice in the north of Europe, and the declaration of war by the emperor of Austria against France, have been most happily accompanied by a system of cordial union and concert amongst the allied powers.

The effects of this union have even surpassed those expectations, wherewith it was calculated to excite.

By the signal victories obtained over the French armies in Silesia, at Culm and Denzvit, the efforts of the enemy to penetrate into the heart of the Austrian and Prussian territories were completely frustrated.

These successes have been followed by a course of operations, combined with so much judgment, and executed with such consummate prudence, vigor and ability, as to have led in their result, not only to the discomfiture of all those projects which the ruler of France had so presumptuously announced on the renewal of the contest, but to the capture and destruction of the greater part of the army under his immediate command.

The annals of Europe afford no example of victories more splendid and decisive than those which have been recently achieved in Saxony.

Whilst the perseverance and gallantry displayed by the allied forces of every description engaged in this conflict, have exalted to the highest pitch of glory their military character, you will, I am persuaded, agree with me in rendering the full tribute of applause to those sovereigns and princes, who, in this sacred cause of national independence, have so eminently distinguished themselves as the leaders of the armies of their respective nations.

With such a prospect before you, I am satisfied I may rely with the greatest confidence on your dispositions to enable me to afford the necessary assistance and support of a system of alliance, which originating chiefly in the magnanimous and disinterested views of the emperor of Russia, and followed up as it has been with corresponding energy by the other allied powers, has produced a change the most momentous in the affairs of the continent.

I shall direct copies of the several conventions which I have concluded with the northern powers, to be laid before you, as soon as the ratifications of them shall have been duly exchanged.

I have further to acquaint you, that I have concluded a treaty of alliance and concert with the emperor of Austria, and that the powerful league already formed, has received an important addition of force by the declaration of Bavaria against France.

I am confident you will view with particular satisfaction, the renewal of the ancient connection with the Austrian government; and that, justly appreciating all the value of the accession of that great power to the common cause, you will be prepared, as far as circumstances will permit, to enable me to support his imperial majesty in the vigorous prosecution of the contest.

The war between this country and the United States of America still continues; but I have the satisfaction to inform you, that the measures adopted by the government of the United States for the conquest of Canada have been frustrated by the valor of his majesty's troops, and by the zeal and loyalty of his American subjects.

Whilst Great Britain, in conjunction with her allies, is exerting her utmost strength against the common enemy of independent nations, it must be a matter of deep regret to find an additional enemy in the government of a country, whose real interest in the issue of this great contest must be the same as our own.

It is known to the world that this country was not the aggressor in this war.

I have not hitherto seen any disposition on the part of the government of the United States to close it, of which I could avail myself consistently with a due attention to the interests of his majesty's subjects.

I am at all times ready to enter into discussions with that government for a conciliatory adjustment of the differences between the two countries, upon principles of perfect reciprocity not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and with the maritime rights of the British empire.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have directed the estimates for the services of the ensuing year to be laid before you.

I regret the necessity of so large an expenditure, which, I am confident, however, you will judge to be unavoidable, when the extent and nature of our military exertions are considered.

I entertain no doubt of your readiness to furnish such supplies as the public service may require.

I congratulate you on the improved and flourishing state of our commerce; and I trust that the abundant harvest which we have received from the bountiful hand of Providence during the present year will afford material relief to his majesty's people, and produce a considerable augmentation in many branches of the revenue.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I congratulate you on the decided conviction which now happily prevails throughout so large a portion of Europe that the war in which the allied powers are engaged against the ruler of France is a war of necessity; and that his views of universal dominion can only be defeated by combined and determined resistance.

The public spirit and national enthusiasm which have successively accomplished the deliverance of the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, and of the Russian empire, now equally animate the German people; and we may justly entertain the fullest confidence that the same perseverance on their part will ultimately lead to the same glorious result.

I cannot but deplore most deeply the continuance of this extended warfare and of all those miseries which the insatiable ambition of the ruler of France has so long inflicted upon Europe.

No disposition to require from France sacrifices of any description inconsistent with her honor or just pretensions as a nation will ever be on my part, or on that of his majesty's allies, an obstacle to peace.

The restoration of that great blessing upon principles of justice and equality has never ceased to be my anxious wish; but I am fully convinced that it can only be obtained by a continuance of those efforts which have already delivered so large a part of Europe from the power of the enemy.

To the firmness and perseverance of this country, these advantages may in a great degree be ascribed. Let this consideration animate us to new exertions, and we shall thus, I trust be enabled to bring this long and arduous contest to a conclusion which will be consistent with the independence of all the nations engaged in it, and with the general security of Europe.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MONOPOLY.—There are many reasons to apprehend that the late great speculations in coffee, sugar, tea, &c. originated in a political intrigue of the enemy or his adherents; and in a country where so much depends on the feelings of the people as in the United States, a powerful diversion might have been expected—for it really appears hard, at once to forego the many luxuries we riot in, or pay the present unconscionable prices for them. But to the great credit of the citizens of the union, instead of venting their indignation against the government, as was expected, they have run foul of the speculators, and wish them every thing else—than their benefit. Thousands have adopted substitutes for them. Tens of thousands curtail the use of them to one half of the quantity hitherto consumed; and a vast number discard them altogether. Those who believed that the spirit of the American people would fail for the want of sugar, tea and coffee, were shallow politicians. Yet they succeeded in raising the market, and have drawn into the vortex many innocent and worthy men. Rain will follow; and the calamities incident thereunto will, more or less, aid the enemy. For it is impossible to suppose that coffee will stand at 38 cents per lb. ten at 5 or 48 and sugar at $40 per cent.* For the first and second we have many substitutes equally palatable when familiarized by a little habit, and the use of the latter may be re-nounced three-fourths without injuring the health of one person. But of coffee we have an immense supply. In one Boston paper no less than twenty-five hundred and fifty tons (5,712,000 lbs.) is offered for sale, and every city is equally full of it. It would not be above the mark if we were to say that Boston, New-York, Philadelphia and Baltimore now have from forty to fifty millions of pounds of coffee on hand†—the lesser ports have proportionate parcels; of teas, also, there is a large stock—the supply of sugar is less, but there is great deal of that; and Louisiana, by internal navigation, will send us vast quantities in the spring.

RUMORS OF PEACE.—What is, in extenso, the amount of the despatch lately received from the British ministry, we can only gather from the statement and rumors below. They have had powerful effects among the speculator class—few large sales have been since made of foreign goods, and flour has advanced several dollars a barrel. Some, who pretend to know a great deal, apprehend an immediate settlement of our differences with Great Britain—others think the whole a mere ruse de guerre to paralyze the measures of government. We learn that the Bramble is to wait for an answer until the Neptune arrives.

*Since writing the above we have the following: New-York, January 4.—The news per the Bramble has had an inconceivable effect upon our market. An immense deal of property was yesterday literally thrown under the hammer, and knocked down at the following prices: coffee at 23 cents; sugar at $22 50 per cwt. hyson tea at $1 94 per lb. souchong at $1 50, salt 87 1-2 cents per bushel and other articles in proportion! To what madness has the rage of speculation driven thousands, who now, with equal folly are making unnecessary sacrifices. The public know not the cause. All is conjecture and report.

† This is not mere assertion. I have many reasons to believe the amount is less than the truth. The consumption of coffee in the United States, when it was cheapest and most generally used, has not exceeded thirteen millions of pounds per annum, if it were so much. With the present habits of the people, ten millions a year is an ample supply, and that may be, and will be, if the price should stand as it is, reduced more than one half. Wheat, rye, barley, chestnuts, potatoes, &c. &c. all make a liquor resembling coffee, a useful and quite as wholesome. The estimate of the consumption is founded on official documents. But the peace rumors, with the folly of the thing itself, has knocked it down, as well as sugar and tea. † has fallen more than 50 per cent in some places.

From the National Intelligencer of Jan. 1.

FROM BRITAIN.—Various rumors were in circulation during the whole of yesterday respecting propositions which are said to have been made to our government by the government of Great Britain, relating to an accommodation of differences between the two countries. We have made inquiry into the foundation of these reports, in the hope of being able to present to the public a correct account of them. We regret that it is not yet fully in our power. The following facts we believe may be relied on; that a flag of truce has arrived from England, at Annapolis, with a despatch from the British minister to the secretary of state, bearing date early in November, which although it contains no distinct proposition, may be considered as rather of a pacific character. It is said that the British minister speaks in this despatch of a communication to the Russian government, and, through it, with our envoys at St. Petersburg, relating to a negotiation to be entered into between the United States and Great Britain for peace; but that no document, either from the Russian government or our envoys, in reply thereto, has been forwarded. Under such circumstances, it would seem to be impossible for our government justly to appreciate the real object or intentions of the British government. Their letter relating to despatches from our envoys might have been written on the presumption that those despatches had already reached our government. We must therefore await further arrivals before we can form any correct idea of their import. If, as we have reason to believe, the Neptune, which took our ministers to St. Petersburg, was to leave the Baltic in the latter end of October with despatches for the United States, all doubt or uncertainty on this important subject will soon be removed.

From the Federal Republican of Jan. 3.

Nothing decisive will be done by our government towards an accommodation with Great Britain, until Mr. Madison is satisfied that the power of France is at end. Whenever he is so satisfied, we have not a doubt a treaty of amity and commerce will be negotiated with Great Britain. France forced us into this war; and while she is able to apply the force to keep us in it, there is no hope of our getting out of it. If the news brought by the flag of truce to Annapolis is to be relied on, or is shortly confirmed, we believe a minister will be sent to London or a negotiation will be opened here for a peace, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made.

“We subjoin the remarks of the court paper upon the despatch from Lord Castlereagh.* They are official and very nearly in the same words that Mr. Madison has been heard to express himself in conversation on the same subject. What can be more generous, more noble, more magnanimous than a proposition for peace from England at such a time, and under the new and glorious circumstances of her affairs in the old world. She seems disposed to treat us as a parent endeavoring to reclaim his prodigal son. If England entertained the views and feeling towards this nation, which a majority of the people have been made to believe by their deceivers, is it possible at the very moment when all power is about to center itself in her hands, and when the difficulties and embarrassments of our government, and their disgraceful failures are every where known and visible, is it possible she would let us escape without grinding us to dust for our co-operation with France, in the attempts to destroy her? Magnanimous nation! far different are her feelings towards us, notwithstanding the antipathies which Jefferson and his disciples have produced in the minds of the ignorant or interested against her. We are perfectly convinced Great Britain will give us the same terms, and as good terms when successful and beyond the reach of danger, that she would, when pressed with difficulties and surrounded with danger—nay better terms. Such is the nature of true courage, which is always generous."

* Meaning, we presume, the National Intelligencer; and the remarks preceding.

An extract of a letter says—"Our commissioners have been met in Russia—differed on two points, which are referred to the respective governments, and lord Castlereagh has communicated those two points to our government."

From the Baltimore Whig of January 5.

"From a highly respectable and authentic source at Washington, we last evening learned that the communication from lord CASTLEREAGH to Mr. Secretary MONROE, by the Bramble, amounts, in truth, to nothing, if not worse than nothing. It is strongly believed, that the enemy calculated the despatch would reach here the first week after the meeting of congress, and would have the effect to paralyze the proceedings of that body. The British cabinet supposed that the flag with the despatch would present to this nation the appearance of an anxious desire on their part for peace, and would prevent the adoption by congress of any restrictive measure on commercial operations. In short, the flag was intended to throw a spirit of relaxation into our political system, to damp the recruiting service, to divide and distract the friends of the war and the government."

From the Baltimore Federal Gazette.

"We congratulate our readers on the prospect of such arrangements being contemplated as will probably lead to a speedy peace. This measure, so desirable, and now so anxiously looked for by all classes, we think we have just reasons for stating, is contemplated by our government, as likely to be soon effected.

Our correspondent at Washington assures us, that it is confidently expected, the president will in a few days nominate to the senate, 2 person to be appointed minister plenipotentiary on the part of the United States to treat with Great Britain; that it is understood the British government have evinced a desire to make such arrangements with respect to the existing differences as our government may, without prejudice to the question of right, or injury to our national honor, accept; and that our government, in the liberal spirit of accommodation and a desire (as the friends of administration say) to put an end to the evils resulting from a state of war, are inclined to meet the proposal, and waving minor difficulties, to submit all matters in dispute to an immediate negotiation.

The source from which our correspondent obtains his information, he assures me may be relied on; and, although we confess our wishes may influence our opinion on the subject, we do not hesitate to recommend it to the belief of our readers."

[Such is the substance of the many rumors. One report says that Mr. King, of the senate, is nominated as our minister on the occasion. See postscript.

STEAM VESSEL OF WAR.—A number of influential and patriotic gentlemen of the city of New-York assembled a few days ago at the house of ROBERT FULTON, Esq. to investigate the principles and utility of a steam vessel of war invented by that gentleman. After examining the plan and hearing the reasons submitted, they immediately adopted measures to raise $120,000 for the purpose of giving a trial to the experiment, proposing to build one to carry 24 long 24 pounds to aid in the defence of that city.

THE ENEMY.—A Philadelphia paper says that Mr. McCauley's extensive manufactory of floor cloths, was clandestinely entered some time ago, and several of the largest pieces of cloth maliciously cut and destroyed. The like happens in other places. A very ingenious artist in Baltimore, after great labor in preparing his loom, is now weaving shawls called "Cashmere" for which he expects to receive $10 each. The editor was invited to see him at work a few days since, and, while he admired the curious apparatus and elegant workmanship, he indignantly learnt that the first shawl completed had been wantonly destroyed, by some person unknown. These things should put our manufacturers on their guard. They are the petit war of the enemy.

COMMERCE.—From the 1st to the 24th Dec. 1813, 44 sail of vessels cleared and sailed from Boston for foreign ports. Only 5 of this number were Americans.

"THE FRIENDS OF PEACE"—From the New-York Evening Post.—"What would be the value of a peace, if not attended with a change of those rulers who are driving the country headlong to ruin? A peace, if such be its effects, would be the heaviest of curses: there is no event that could happen, no possible condition of things that can be imagined, which ought not to be deplored, dreaded and avoided, as the greatest of calamities, if its tendency is to perpetuate power in the profligate hands that for sixteen years have governed this unhappy country."

This is an honest confession and the editor deserves credit for it. What Mr. Coleman says, may be regarded as the sentiment of a considerable party, and must not be esteemed as a mere flying paragraph. It means, that an honorable peace would be the "heaviest of curses" if it did not bring a certain character of persons into power! O shame!—But the principle, for which the war was proclaimed, daily becomes more popular. In the house of representatives of the United States, the "war party" as it is called, has a relative gain of six members since March last; two of which came from the city of New-York, where the Evening Post is printed.

COM. CHANCEY has arrived in New York.

A HIGH PRIZE.—A very valuable ship, under Russian colors, direct from Liverpool, and fully laden with British goods, bound for Amelia Island, was taken by gun boat No. 153 off St. Mary's bar, and carried into that port. She is said to have documents that prove the property is in the enemy.

CORCENEILL.—In page 262, we noticed the "arts of the enemy" to prevent the passage of an embargo law, by blockading the sound, and shewing that all sorts of provisions were "dog-cheap" in Lisbon, Cádiz, &c. We have now to present another remarkable case. The president, in his message to congress, recommends the passage of a law to prevent the ransoming of vessels—and out comes the following in a Philadelphia paper, edited by an ex-member of congress—"Understood?"—"We are informed that captain Pim, of the Niemen frigate (one of the British squadron which lately made such numerous captures off Chincoteague) is last from England, via Halifax, and has on board an order from the admiralty prohibiting the ransom by the officers of his majesty's navy, of any captured American vessels. He is also authorised to capture and detain all neutral vessels bound to American ports."

BURE LIGHTS. It is astonishing to observe the efforts made to invalidate the truth of the report respecting the "blue lights" exhibited on the shores of New-London. With impudence unparalleled, the facts are denied in toto, and the thing is twisted and turned a thousand ways to weaken its force: for the people are alarmed and shocked at the vile treason, and begin to see the lengths to which the attachment of so many to the enemy, will carry them.—But these folks have sown for themselves a full harvest of mortification, and we hope they may reap the crop in repentance: they had not yet seen Declarator's letter to the secretary of the navy. Hardened as they are, they will not say that is false.

MORE RETALIATION. A cartel has arrived at Boston from Halifax, with 140 prisoners, among whom are several officers late of privateers, and some of the midshipmen that belonged to the Chesapeake. Another cartel with 4 or 500 prisoners was to sail in a few days. The passengers report that there remained at Halifax about 1400 prisoners; of whom 140 officers and seamen, were held as hostages. They also say that 16 of the Chesapeake's late crew, had been detained for as many of the Bower's crew, who, it is said, had deserted ashore! Is this possible? "His majesty wants men and must have them!" and the barbarians are capable of any thing.

It is stated that several of the crew of the late U. States brig Argus, have been put into irons at Plymouth (E.) on suspicion of their being British subjects. The officers are on parole at Reading. Is it not singular that we have not yet had an American account of the fight of that vessel with the Pelican? Can it be that our officers are not permitted to write home?

Sir George Prevost, by general orders issued at Montreal, Dec. 12, notices the receipt of a communication from general Wilkinson, stating the confinement of the 45 British officers, held as hostages by the government of the United States—and after a good deal of intemperate language, he directs that all the officers of the United States, prisoners of war, in his power, shall be confined.

A "Butcher." Admiral Warren, the spoiler in the Chesapeake—the commander of an expedition in which several defenceless towns were wantonly burnt—in which one church was battered with stones and another plundered—in which sick persons were murdered, and women violated, is elected one of the vice-presidents of a Bible society at Halifax. I dare say, if such institutions exist in India, the creature who receives the revenue from the prostitutes and murders in honor of Juggernaut, may be a member of one of them. Is this "the religion we profess."—See WEEKLY REGISTER, vol. III, p. 547.

DIRECT TAX.—A proposition to assume the state's quota of the United States direct tax has failed in North Carolina from a difference of opinion in the legislature to equalize the levy, which it was proposed to make under the authority of the state.

The legislature of Ohio have, without a dissenting voice, agreed to pay that state's quota of the U. S. tax. True as the needle to the pole, this young and gallant and prosperous state, ever points to patriotism.

THE ADMIRABLE PORTER.—This gallant naval officer (says the Providence Phoenix) is much better entitled to the superlative we have applied to him, than the Frenchman who once bore it—the admirable Critchton. We are lost in wonder and astonishment when we contemplate the peerless services which captain Porter has rendered with a single frigate—the Lord is on his side; and his doings are marvellous in our eyes.

Four at Jamaica, Nov. 25, thirty-two dollars per barrel.

DOUBLE TREACHERY. A vessel from Newport for New-York, (says the Providence Patriot) with a valuable cargo, supposed to have a rickety, as she was insured in this town at 4 per centum, while other vessels pay from 10 to 20, was recently captured in the Sound, by which some of our insurers have lost from 10 to 1500 dollars each. It is hinted that some people have been bit in the same way before.

We recommend to the particular consideration of the reader the triumphant letter of general Harrison to general Vincent, inserted below. How glorious is his conduct compared with Proctor's infamy, and the generally barbarous proceedings of the enemy?

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE.

Copies of the following letters have been politely communicated to us for publication, by an officer of general Harrison's staff, who has the originals in his possession. [National Intelligencer.]

FROM GENERAL PROCTOR TO GENERAL HARRISON.
October 8th, 1813.

SIR,—The fortune of war having placed the private property of the officers and several families of the right division of the British army in Upper Canada, in your power; as also letters, papers and vouchers of the greatest consequence to individuals, without being of any to the cause of the captors, I do myself the honor of applying to you in their behalf, hoping that agreeably to the custom of war, you will avail yourself of this favorable opportunity to alleviate private feelings, by causing the said property and documents to be restored. I must also intreat that every consideration in your power be shown for private families, not of the army. I trust that with the same view you will permit the bearer hereof to ascertain the fate of individuals, and that you will facilitate the retreat of any families that may unfortunately have been interrupted in the attempt. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) HENRY PROCTOR,
Major-General in H. B. M.'s service.

Major-General Harrison, or officer commanding the army in the service of the U. S. at Moravian Towns.

FROM GENERAL HARRISON TO GENERAL VINCENT.
Head-Quarters, Fort George, 3d Nov. 1813.

SIR—Lieutenant Le Breton, an officer in your service, arrived at Detroit on the 15th ultimo, bearing a flag and a letter to me from general Proctor, requesting humane treatment for the prisoners in my possession and the restoration of private property and papers. This letter was directed to me at the Moravian Towns; and as the subject was not of the importance to authorise the lieutenant's pursuing me to Detroit, I was somewhat surprised as his doing so. It did not appear to me proper to permit him to return in that way, and as I was upon the point of setting out for this frontier by water, I conceived that mode of conveyance would be full as agreeable to him, and would enable him to meet general Proctor as expeditiously as by the land route. I regret that the badness of the weather and other causes which he will explain have detained him until this time.

Understanding that you are the senior officer, I have determined to address my answer to you.—With respect to the subject of general Proctor's letter, those which I have the honor to enclose you from the British officers, who were taken on the 5th ultimo, to their friends, and the report of Mr. Le Breton, will satisfy you that no indulgence which humanity could claim in their favor, or the usages of war sanction, has been withheld. The disposition of the property taken on the field of action or near it, was left to the commanding officer at Detroit. The instructions given to that gentleman, and the well known generosity of his character, will ensure to the claimants the utmost justice and liberality in his decisions. In making this statement, I wish it however to be distinctly understood, that my conduct with regard to the prisoners and property taken, has been dictated solely by motives of humanity, and not by a belief that it could be claimed upon the score of reciprocity of treatment towards the American prisoners who have fallen into the hands of general Proctor. The unhappy description of persons who have escaped from the tomahawk of the savages in the employment of the British government, who fought under the immediate orders of that officer, have suffered all the indignities and deprivations which human nature is capable of supporting. There is no single instance that I have heard of, in which the property of the officers has been respected. But I am far from believing that the conduct of general Proctor has been thought an example worthy of imitation by the greater part of the British officers; and in the character of general Vincent, I have a pledge that he will unite his exertions with mine to soften as much as possible the fate of those whom the fortune of war may reciprocally place in our power.

But, sir, there is another subject upon which I wish an explicit declaration: Will the Indians who still adhere to the cause of his Britannic majesty, be suffered to continue that horrible species of warfare which they have as heretofore practised against our troops, and those still more horrible deprivations upon the peaceable inhabitants of our frontiers? I have sufficient evidence to show that even the latter has not always been perpetrated by small parties of vagrant Indians acting at a distance from the British army. Some of the most atrocious instances have occurred under the eyes of the British commander and the head of the Indian department. I shall pass by the tragedy of the river Raisin, and that equally well known which was acted on the Miami after the defeat of colonel Dudley—and select three other instances of savage barbarity committed under the auspices of general Proctor:—In the beginning of June a small party of Indians conducted by an Ottawa chief, who I believe is now with the British army under your command, left Malden in bark canoes, in which they coasted lake Erie to the mouth of Portage river; the canoes were taken across the portage to the Sandusky bay, over which the party proceeded to the Cold creek, and from thence by land to the settlements upon that river, where they captured three families, consisting of one man and twelve women and children. After taking the prisoners some distance, one of the women was discovered to be unable to keep up with them, in consequence of her advanced state of pregnancy. She was immediately tomahawked, stripped naked, her womb ripped open, and the child taken out. Three or four of the children were successively butchered as they discovered their inability to keep up with the party. Upon the arrival of the Indians at Malden, two or three of the prisoners were ransomed by colonel Elliott and the others by the citizens of Detroit, where they remained until they were taken off by their friends upon the recovery of that place by our army. I understand that the savage chief received from colonel Elliott a reprimand for his cruelty.

On the 29th and 30th of the same month, a large party of Indians were sent from Malden on a war expedition to Lower Sandusky. At a farm-house near that place they murdered a whole family, consisting of a man, his wife, son and daughter.

During the last attack upon fort Meigs by general Proctor, a party headed by a Seneca, and intimate friend of Tecumseh's, was sent to endeavor to detach from our interest the Shawansee of Wapockanata. In their way hither they murdered several men and one woman, who was working in a corn field.

I have selected, sir, the above from a long list of similar instances of barbarity which the history of the last fifteen months could furnish; because they were perpetrated, if not in the view of the British commander, by parties who came immediately from his camp and returned to it—who even received their daily support from the king's stores, and who in fact, (as the documents in my possession will show) form a part of his army.

To retaliate then upon the subjects of the king would have been justifiable by the laws of war and the usages of the most civilized nations. To do so has most amply been in my power. The tide of fortune has changed in our favor, and an extensive and flourishing province opened to our arms. Nor have the instruments of vengeance been wanting. The savages who sued to us for mercy would gladly have shewn their claims to it, by re-acting upon the Thames the Bloody scenes of Sandusky and Cold creek. A single sign of approbation would have been sufficient to pour upon the subjects of the king their whole fury. The future conduct of the British officers will determine the correctness of mine in withholding it. If the savages should be again let loose upon our settlements, I shall with justice be accused of having sacrificed the interests and honor of my country, and the lives of our fellow-citizens to feelings of false and mistaken humanity. You are a soldier, sir, and as I sincerely believe, possess all the honorable sentiments which ought always to be found in men who follow the profession of arms. Use then, I pray you, your authority and influence to stop that dreadful effusion of innocent blood which proceeds from the employment of those savage monsters whose aid (as must now be discovered) is so little to be depended on when most wanted, and which can have so trifling an effect upon the issue of the war. The effect of their barbarities will not be confined to the present generation. Ages yet to come will feel the deep rooted hatred and enmity which they must produce between the two nations.

I deprecate most sincerely the dreadful alternative which will be offered to me should they be continued, but I solemnly declare, that if the Indians that remain under the influence of the British government are suffered to commit any deprivations upon the citizens within the district that is committed to my protection, I will remove the restrictions which have hitherto been imposed upon those who have offered their services to the United States and direct them to carry on the war in their own way. I have never heard a single excuse for the employment of the savages by your government unless we can credit the story of some British officer having dared to assert that "as we employed the Kentuckians, you had a right to make use of the Indians."

If such injurious sentiments have really prevailed, to the prejudice of a brave, well informed and virtuous people, it will be removed by the representations of your officers who were lately taken upon the river Thames. They will inform you, sir, that so far from offering any violence to the persons of their prisoners, these savages would not permit a word to escape them which was calculated to wound or insult their feelings; and this too with the sufferings of their friends and relatives at the river Raisin and Miami fresh up on their recollection.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) WM. HENRY HARRISON.

P. S. I pledge myself for the truth of the above statement in relation to the murders committed by the Indians.

W. H. H.

FROM GENERAL VINCENT TO GENERAL HARRISON.

Headquarters, Burlington Heights,

10th November, 1813.

SIR—Lieut. Le Preter, having delivered your let ter of the 5d inst. I have directed capt. Merritt of the provincial dragoons to proceed with a flag to fort George, as the bearer of this acknowledgment of your obliging communication.

The account given of the British officers, whom the fortune of war has lately placed at the disposal of the United States, is such, as cannot fail affording very consoling reflections to this army and their anxious friends.

Though you must be sensible there are several points in your letter, respecting which it is wholly beyond my power to afford you the satisfaction of an "explicit declaration," yet be assured, sir, I shall never feel the smallest degree of hesitation in joining you in any pledge, that it will ever be my anxious wish and endeavor to alleviate as much as possible the fate of those who may fall into my power by the chances of war.

Believe me, sir, I deprecate as strongly as yourself the perpetration of acts of cruelty committed under any pretext; and shall lament equally with yourself that any state of things will produce them. No efforts of mine will be ever wanting to diminish the evils of a state of warfare, as far as may be consistent with the duties which are due to my king and country.

The Indians, when acting in conjunction with the troops under my command, have been invariably exhorted to mercy, and have never been deaf to my anxious entreaties on this interesting subject.

I shall not fail to transmit the original of your letter to the lower province, for the consideration of his excellency the commander of the forces.

I feel particularly anxious to be made acquainted with your instructions relative to the disposal of the gallant and truly unfortunate capt. Barclay, whose wounds I lament to hear are such as to preclude all hopes of his being ever again able to resume the duties of his station. Under these circumstances I am induced to rely on your liberality and generous interference to obtain a release or parole, that he may be allowed the indulgence of immediately proceeding to the lower province.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) JOHN VINCENT, Maj. Gen.

His excellency maj. gen. Harrison.

FROM THE BOSTON PATRIOT.

To Thomas Barclay, Esq. British agent for prisoners at New-York.

SIR—Actuated by the same motives which doubtless influenced you to make the publication contained in the New-York Gazette, and re-published in the Boston Centinel, I have been induced to communicate the following information, and accompanying depositions which go far to invalidate your statement and support the deposition of Mr. Walter, the American naval pilot on lake Champlain. The disposition you discover to vindicate the reputation of your country, I certainly respect—it partakes, sir, of that patriotism, the destitution of which among a portion of those called Americans, you must have known, to believe your statement would be accepted, supported only by inferences and conjecture, in opposition to the deposition of one who makes oath of his own knowledge of the existence of facts. But, sir, in this your knowledge is correct, and when you see in the Centinel of this town the publication of the solemn deposition of a respectable pilot of our navy, and your own informal, unofficial and uncertified statement (which is merely a speculation on the probability of facts) offered and headed "refutation" immediately after—Your anticipation with mine of a devotion to your cause and service will unquestionably be exceeded. Here allow me to digress for a moment while I with pleasure inform you that the attachment of country, honorable regard for its interest and zeal in its service, which I have witnessed, inspired me with respect for numbers in his majesty's service and country—At the same time they exhibit a liberality of sentiment and opinion highly becoming, although it evinces less loyalty or rather they do not contend for so much in behalf of his majesty as the devoted portion of a party in this country—Those gentlemen are enemies by war alone, and should I meet them in any place but the field my hand would be extended with feelings of respect and esteem. If this is a delineation of honorable character you must despise the conduct of those in this country who form so great a contrast, although their efforts may be serviceable to you. But to return to our subject. You contend that because the laws and regulations of the British service do not direct the issue of decayed or unsound provisions and limit the quantity beneath that required for the sustenance of man—unfortunate prisoners cannot so receive them, and by similar inferences only, you disprove the cruel severity of their treatment. It is not contended that your government actually establish such disgraceful and inhuman usage by law—yet all governments are implicated in degree as it permits its agents to abuse the justice they intend to dispense. It is true, sir, that the character of your nation for humanity, justice and honor has been seriously impeached by the conduct of those who have been its representatives since the war.

The depositions which follow, show what has been the treatment of American prisoners at Quebec, and if you wish, any number of affidavits can be added. The unprecedented hardness of heart in capt. Clark in extorting from the soldiers a sum so disproportionate to the value of a fish, might have been punished by your government had a disposition existed to notice such behavior. While the Royalist lay in Boston harbor the circumstance was stated in some of our papers, which caused major Murray then British agent for prisoners, to call on some of the officers who had been conveyed in that ship to contradict it, when he was answered that it would be done with pleasure if it were not so, but they had witnessed the transaction while on board with much regret.—Major Murray was mortified at the result of his enquiries, and said, with some feeling, that "captain Clark should be reported to his majesty." It was not only the article of fish, but liquor was sold the prisoners also at one dollar for each common junk bottle, and other articles proportionately high, thus taking advantage of those unfortunate men knowing they believed. "REFUTATION," in glaring capitals—the opinion of a British agent in opposition to the oath of an American citizen. Good God!—of what stuff is this nation composed. But there is nothing new in this—it is the "religion" of some to believe that the British are angels. It ought not to have excited the surprize of the writer of this spirited article (who, we think, is col. Miller)—it has always been so. When capt. Jessop solemnly swore that he had been flogged by order of the British, many years ago, and shewed his back for the scars, a person now in congress, then in authority, declared him perjured (in fact) because a British officer said, "On his honor he did not BELIEVE it was so." What kind of proof shall we afford these men? If a spirit were to come from Abraham's bosom, and say, that Britain was any thing else than "magnanimous, religious and humane," they would deny it. See Harrison's letter to Vincent.

*The same heading of col. Barclay's mere "notice" of things, has been extensively circulated, and had received money from their government which about to sail, and which they could not spend for necessities on shore.

I will now, sir, assure you that so far from misrepresentations being often made, the one fourth part has never been told.

It is a fact that lieut. George Gooding was made prisoner of war, three days before the declaration of war was received and still held as such contrary to the usage of nations.

It is a fact that the same lieut. George Gooding was sent from Malden to fort Erie in the schr. Lady Prevost and was excluded the cabin and forced down the fore-castle with the sailors, where he was obliged to exist during the passage.

It is a fact that the capitulation of Detroit was violated in half an hour after the articles were completed.

It is a fact that a room in major Muir's quarters (who was commanding officer at Malden before the war) was decorated with scalps which were strung and hung in festoons over the fire place.

It is a fact that American soldiers of the 4th regiment infantry were frequently invited and every effort made to induce them to enter the English service, a crime for which your own laws condemn the guilty to death.

At your suggestion I will exhibit depositions of all these facts and more. The scattered situation of those capable of deposing thereto alone prevents them from present publication. If, then, you would serve your country, prove to the people of America, that the British government have no participation in the foul conduct represented—may furnish one instance of restitution, for injury, or displeasure and punishment of one of her subjects for these outrages upon humanity, justice and christianity, and you will do much for the British nation.

I beg you to believe that in making this communication I retain for you the highest personal respect. You have appealed to the public and thereby challenged facts which you can be enabled to investigate.

AN OFFICER OF THE ARMY.

Boston, December 30, 1813.

I hereby certify, that I was surrendered and made prisoner of war to the enemy at Detroit, with the detachment of the 4th U. S. regiment infantry, on duty at that place, and continued with said detachment during their confinement, (except a few days while sick at Kingston.) That being quarter-master-serjeant of the above named regiment, and the officers being separated and confined to a small village, five miles from Quebec, I received at that place the rations allowed and furnished for the prisoners, which consisted as follows:—For one day each week, of ten ounces of fresh meat, and ten ounces bread per man; for one day, ten ounces salt beef, ten ounces bread per man, and four pounds flour for each mess of six men; and for one day more the same quantity of salt pork and bread, with one quart of peas for each mess of six men. For the remaining four days, we had one quart of peas, one quart of oat meal, one pound of sugar, and one pound of rice, for each mess of six men, with the ten ounces of bread per man, and daily rations of liquor, though short of the quantity allowed in the British service. The rations of meat thus amounted to thirty ounces per man per week, which is less than four and an half ounces per day, and from this scanty allowance, fifty six pounds per week was stopped from the gross, for which they agreed or promised to give us vegetables to thicken our soup, but when received, consisted of little more than a few cabbage leaves. I further declare, that the bread we received was mouldy, wormy, and in such small pieces as had the appearance of old and condemned bread;—the meal so sour and stale that this part of the ration could seldom, if ever be ate;—the peas were so old and wormy, that few of them could be ate, after boiling the whole twenty-four hours, for which they were drawn. That our men were much crowded, and suffered for want of room and air—and that for attempting to send a letter to one of our officers, with information of our suffering situation, I was threatened with being confined in irons. And I further declare, that twenty-three men died on board the cartel, during our passage from Quebec to Boston, most of whom I believe expired in consequence of their close and crowded confinement, and want of air at Quebec, and the small quantity and miserable quality of the provisions and other articles issued them.

WILLIAM KELLEY,

Qr. Mr. Sergt. 4th Regt. U. S. Infantry.

SUFFOLK, ss.—Boston, 22d Dec. 1813.—The above named William Kelley personally appeared, and made oath, that the above declaration and certificate by him signed, is true—before me.

W. P. WHITING, Just. Pacis.

I hereby certify that the quantity and quality of the rations we received while prisoners of war, at Quebec, was such as described by quarter-master-serjeant Kelley, and that the description given of our situation and sufferings in the foregoing statement is equally true. SOL. JOHNSON, Corporal.

Boston, December 20, 1813.

SUFFOLK, ss.—Boston, 22d Dec. 1813.—The above named Solomon Johnson personally appeared and made oath that the above certificate by him signed, is true—before me, W. P. WHITING, Just. Pacis.

I do hereby certify, that being a prisoner of war to the enemy, with a detachment of the 4th U. S. regiment of infantry, surrendered at Detroit, and confined at Quebec during the fall of 1812, and transported from that place to Boston in the ship Royalist, commanded by captain Clark; do depose and say—That, while at Quebec, our rations were very scanty in allowance, and unfit in quality for the subsistence of a savage. The oat-meal was so sour and stale, we could not possibly eat it, and upon offering it two hogs on the fore-castle, they actually refused to eat it also. The bread was so musty, rotten and old, we could only use it by boiling it with the wretched allowance of meat, and then made a practice of skimming from the surface the numberless quantity of worms, many of which were over three-fourths of an inch in length.

The peas also were bad, as described by quarter-master-serjeant Kelley, and after the boiling were mostly thrown away.

And I further declare, that while on board the above named ship, a quantity of fish being caught, and many of them by John Brewer, a soldier in the regiment—the same were offered for sale at one dollar each, by the carpenter of the ship, who told captain Clark the prisoners did not like to give so much for them; when the reply of captain Clark was, "God damn them, if they do not choose to give that, they may go without; I can corn them for the use of the ship!" Finding I could not obtain any, without paying the price required, and my health being impaired by want of provisions, and the infamous quality of the little portion received—the cravings of hunger and debility prevailed, and I purchased two of captain Clark's cod-fish of a middling size and paid THO DOLLARS for them. And further, that I saw several others sold at the same extorted price. RICHARD FILEBROWN,

Sgt. 4th Regt. U. S. Infantry

Boston, December 21, 1813

SUFFOLK, ss.—Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Boston, December 24, 1813.—Then the above named Richard Fillebrown personally appeared, and made oath that the affidavit, by him subscribed, was true, before me, WILLIAM SIMMONS,
Justice of the Peace.

I hereby certify that, being a soldier of the 4th U. S. regiment of infantry, and a prisoner of war to the enemy, while on a passage in the cartel ship Royalist, captain Clark, from Quebec to Boston, during a calm, the captain directed some lines and bait to be furnished, with which a number of fish were caught from a boat astern of the ship, and a great part of them by John Brewer, a soldier and fellow prisoner. The fish were immediately taken in charge by the carpenter of the ship, and offered for sale, at one dollar each. Half furnished and exhausted by our scanty and wretched fare at Quebec, I solicited one of the fish at a less price, when the carpenter replied, it was the captain's orders and he could not sell them lower. I could not resist the cravings of nature, and therefore paid one silver dollar for one common cod-fish.

JOHN WHITELEY.

Boston, December 20, 1813.

SUFFOLK, ss.—Boston, 22d December, 1813.—The above named John Whiteley personally appeared and made oath that the above certificate by him signed, is true—before me,

W. P. WHITING, Just. Pacis.

MILITARY.

Under the expectation of a contemplated attack upon Norfolk, a number of the Virginia militia are ordered to march for its defence. Brig. gen. Robert B. Taylor, who with so great distinction has had the command at that place, in a letter to the adjutant-general of Virginia, has requested leave to retire.

PROCTOR'S PAPERS.—Some of the papers captured among general Proctor's baggage on the Thames, have been published. They give evidence of many interesting facts, and shall be registered.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.—It is rather remarkable that we have not yet received any regular account of the proceedings of the enemy on the Niagara frontier; but it appears that all we said and all we apprehended in our last, is substantially true. An Albany paper says that governor Tompkins received advices by an express that Buffalo and Black Rock were destroyed on the 30th ult.—The United States vessels lying at the latter place, happily only four small schooners, used as gun-boats, were taken and destroyed. It was supposed the enemy would cross into Canada the next day. Though the neighboring militia rallied with great spirit, they were generally destitute of arms and ammunition, and could offer no effectual resistance. As from the many reports that prevail it is impossible to make out a narration of facts, as we have attempted to do, we shall only observe, that the whole of the Niagara frontier, from fort Niagara east to Buffalo, west, both inclusive, and several miles of the interior, has been conflagrated and laid waste. All the United States' stores have fallen into the enemy's hands. Many numbers have been committed; though perhaps not to the extent reported, and a scene of distress is exhibited unparalleled in this war, except in some parts of the Mississippi territory. We may have the particulars for next week. Report pointedly says that the commander of fort Niagara was absent. Gen. B. Clark has published a vindication of his conduct in abandoning fort Genesee and burning Newark. The former, from the deficiency of troops to maintain it, was evidently correct, and he justifies the latter, as he says, by the orders of the secretary of war—he gave the inhabitants twelve hours notice to remove their effects. We shall attempt to collect and arrange all the papers and facts of this dreadful business for record in our next paper.

By letters received at this office from Pittsburg, we learn that major-general Harrison left that place, on the 1st inst. for Cincinnati, on his way to Detroit—where, our correspondent adds, "his presence is much wanted, as the Indians once more begin to assume a hostile attitude." We shall rejoice to hear that the winter has passed away without giving the government cause to regret the lenity of its conduct towards those treacherous savages, since their recent subjugation.

Nat. Int.

Copy of a letter from general Floyd to his excellency, governor Early, dated camp Mitchell, 12th December, 1813.

Sir—I herewith forward to you the pipe of the old Talliscot or Tano King taken at the battle of Autossee. The friendly Indians observe, that it was the pipe of the greatest man in their nation and who was for many years their king, but he had grown old and foolish—had forsaken them—that he was now dead and as none of his successors had acquired sufficient dignity to be entitled to it, requested that I should send it to my king, meaning your excellency.

It is valuable for its antiquity! This once respected and venerable chief used this pipe at the treaty of Shoulderbone and how long before it is unknown.

I have the honor to be, with much respect and esteem, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN FLOYD.

NAVAL.

Supplies to the enemy's vessels have been so frequently furnished as to cease to surprise us. The squadron off Provincetown, (Ms.) was lately furnished with a quantity of cattle by some persons disguised as Quakers. The embargo law may remedy this grievance.

The Albion 74, anchored in Tarpaubin Cove, (Martha's Vineyard) a few days ago, and is said to have lost 3 mariners and 9 seamen by desertion. The captain threatened to destroy all the houses on the island if the men were not given up—but they had been helped to the main.

Our naval officers are not more valuable for their gallantry in combatting the enemy, than in their humanity to their own crews. Who ever heard of such a cruise as the "admirable Porter's 2" With a complement of from 550 to 400 men, he was eight months at sea, and lost only nine of them—three by accidents, one of old age, and the rest by diseases that all persons, at sea or on shore, are liable to! The Congress also returned from a cruise of more than 200 days, with every man hearty!

We notice the sailing of many stout privateers from various ports of the United States. The embargo will greatly increase this species of the national force. And have also the pleasure to observe there are many valuable arrivals.

The famed frigate Constitution, captain Stewart, went to sea from Boston on the 30th ult.—to take the third frigate—we hope.

An English privateer brig, Campbell, commander, sailed from Otaheite, (South Pacific Ocean) in August, bound on a cruise.

The French privateer brig Venus, returned to Bordeaux, after a cruise of three weeks in which she captured sixteen English vessels—part of which were destroyed. Two French frigates were lately off Madeira.

Killed in the battle of Autossee.

The treaty of Shoulderbone was held in '86

Resolved, that the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house any information in his possession that may be to be communicated, which may tend to illustrate the causes of the failure of the arms of the United States on the northern frontier.

Mr. Troup thought the enquiry inexpedient at this time; but the resolution was adopted by ayes and nays, as follows:

Mr. Pickens proposed amendments to the constitution of the United States (see page 297) were disagreed to in committee of the whole—for the resolve, 57, against 470.

Wednesday, Jan. 5.—Mr. Kilbourn submitted resolution having for its object the protection of the N. W. frontier, by donations of lands to actual settlers—referred to the military committee.

A bill making partial appropriations for the military service of 1814, was passed—

The house took up the report of the committee of the whole, on Mr. Pickens' resolution, and agreed to postpone the consideration of them till to-morrow.

Mr. Taylor submitted a resolution to require the attendance of the attorney-general of the United States, at the seat of government during the sittings of congress.

The bill to amend the 7th section of the act to lay and collect a direct tax [allowing a little further time to the states to assume the payment] was after some remarks thereon, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. [This amendment was proposed because the legislatures of some of the states had not had opportunity to act upon it.]

POSTSCRIPT.

The important matter inserted below, received when this sheet was nearly prepared for the press, has driven out several articles.

WASHINGTON, January 7.

FROM BRITAIN.—The following highly important messages and documents were on yesterday transmitted by the president of the United States to both houses of congress.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled.

I transmit for the information of congress copies of a letter from the British secretary of state for foreign affairs to the secretary of state, with the answer of the latter.

In appreciating the accepted proposal of the government of Great Britain for instituting negotiations for peace, congress will not fail to keep in mind that vigorous preparations for carrying on the war can in no respect impede the progress to a favorable result, whilst a relaxation of such preparations, should the wishes of the United States for a speedy restoration of the blessings of peace be disappointed, would necessarily have the most injurious consequences.

JAMES MADISON,

Lord Castlereagh to the secretary of state.

Foreign office, November 4, 1812.

SIR,—I have the honor to enclose to you for the information of the president of the United States, a copy of a note which his Britannic majesty's ambassador at the court of St. Petersburg was directed to present to the Russian government, as soon as his royal highness, the prince regent, was informed that plenipotentiaries had been nominated on the part of the American government for the purpose of negotiating for peace with Great-Britain under the mediation of his imperial majesty.

His lordship having by the last courier from the imperial head-quarters, acquainted me that the American commissioners now at St. Petersburg have intimated, in reply to this overture, that they had no objection to a negotiation at London, and were equally desirous, as the British government had declared itself to be, that this business should not be mixed with the affairs of the continent of Europe, but that their powers were limited to negotiate under the mediation of Russia.

Under these circumstances, and in order to avoid an unnecessary continuance of the calamities of war, the prince regent commands me to transmit, by a flag of truce, to the American port nearest to the seat of government, the official note above mentioned, in order that the president, if he should feel disposed to enter upon a direct negotiation for the restoration of peace between the two states, may give his directions accordingly.

In making this communication, I can assure you that the British government is willing to enter into discussion with the government of America for the conciliatory adjustment of the differences subsisting between the two states, with an earnest desire on their part to bring them to a favorable issue, upon principles of a perfect reciprocity not inconsistent with the established maxims of public law, and with the maritime rights of the British empire.

The admiral commanding the British squadron on the American station will be directed to give the necessary protection to any persons proceeding to Europe, on the part of the government of the United States, in furtherance of this overture; or should the American government have occasion to forward orders to their commissioners at St. Petersburg, to give the requisite facilities, by cartel or otherwise, to the transmission of the same.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

CASTLEREAGH.

[ENCLOSURE ALLUDED TO ABOVE.]

Translation of a note from lord Cathcart, to the count de Nesselrode, dated Topfiz, 1st September, 1813.

The undersigned ambassador of his Britannic majesty to the emperor of all the Russias, desiring to avail himself of the first occasion to renew the subject respecting America, which was brought into discussion in a conference at the moment of departure from Reichenbach, has the honor to address this note to his excellency the count de Nesselrode.

Although the prince regent, for reasons which have already been made known, has not found himself in a situation to accept the mediation of his imperial majesty, for terminating the discussions with the United States of America, his royal highness desires, nevertheless, to give effect to the beneficent wishes which his imperial majesty has expressed of seeing the war between Great Britain and America soon terminated, to the mutual satisfaction of the two governments.

With this view, his royal highness having learned that the envoys plenipotentiary of the United States for negotiating a peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of his imperial majesty, have arrived in Russia, notwithstanding that he finds himself under the necessity of not accepting the mediation of any friendly power in the question which forms the principal object in dispute between the two states, he is nevertheless ready to nominate plenipotentiaries to treat directly with the American plenipotentiaries.

His royal highness sincerely wishes that the conferences of these plenipotentiaries may result in re-establishing, between the two nations, the blessings and the reciprocal advantages of peace.

If, through the good offices of his imperial majesty, this proposition should be accepted, the prince regent would prefer that the conferences should be held at London, on account of the facilities which it would give to the discussions.

But if this choice should meet with insuperable obstacles, his royal highness would consent to substitute Gottenburg as the place nearest to England.

The undersigned, Sir

CATHCART

THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO LORD CASTLEREAGH.

Department of State, January 1814.

MY LORD—I have had the honor to receive by a flag of truce your lordship's letter of the 4th of November last, and a copy of a note which his Britannic majesty's ambassador at the court of St. Petersburg presented to the Russian government on the first of September preceding.

By this communication it appears that his royal highness the prince regent rejected the mediation offered by his imperial majesty to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain, but proposed to treat directly with the United States at Gottenburg or London, and that he had requested the interposition of the good offices of the emperor in favor of such an arrangement.

Having laid your lordship's communication before the president, I am instructed to state, for the information of his royal highness the prince regent, that the president has seen with regret this new obstacle to the commencement of a negotiation for the accommodation of differences between the United States and Great Britain. As the emperor of Russia was distinguished for his rectitude and impartiality, and was moreover engaged in a war, as an ally of England, whereby it was in his interest to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain, the president could not doubt that his royal highness the prince regent would accept the mediation, which his imperial majesty had offered to them. It was the confidence with which the high character of the emperor inspired the president, that induced him, disregarding considerations, which a more cautious policy might have suggested, to accept the overture with promptitude, and to send ministers to St. Petersburg, to take advantage of it. It would have been very satisfactory to the president, if his royal highness the prince regent had found it compatible with the views of Great Britain, to adopt a similar measure, as much delay might have been avoided, in accomplishing an object, which, it is admitted, is of high importance to both nations.

The course proposed as a substitute for negotiation at St. Petersburg, under the auspices of the emperor of Russia, could not, I must remark to your lordship, have been required for the purpose of keeping the United States unconnected against Great Britain, with any affairs of the continent. There was nothing in the proposed mediation tending to such a result.—The terms of the overture indicated the contrary. In offering to bring the parties together, not as an umpire, but as a common friend, to discuss and settle their differences and respective claims, in a manner satisfactory to themselves. His imperial majesty shewed the interest which he took in the welfare of both parties.

Wherever the United States may treat, they will treat with the sincere desire they have repeatedly manifested, of terminating the present contest with Great Britain on conditions of reciprocity consistent with the rights of both parties, as sovereign and independent nations, and calculated not only to establish present harmony, but to provide, as far as possible, against future collisions which might interrupt it.

Before giving an answer to the proposition communicated by your lordship, to treat with the United States independently of the Russian mediation, it would have been agreeable to the president to have heard from the plenipotentiaries of the United States, sent to St. Petersburg. The offer of a mediation by one power, and the acceptance of it by another, forms a relation between them, the delicacy of which cannot but be felt. From the known character however of the emperor, and the benevolent views with which his mediation was offered, the president cannot doubt that he will see with satisfaction a concurrence of the United States, in an alternative, which, under existing circumstances, affords the best prospect of obtaining speedily what was the object of his interposition. I am accordingly instructed to make known to your lordship, for the information of his royal highness the prince regent, that the president accedes to his proposition, and will take the measures depending on him for carrying it into effect at Gottenburg, with as little delay as possible; it being presumed, that his majesty the king of Sweden, as the friend of both parties, will readily acquiesce in the choice of a place for their pacific negotiations, within his dominions.

The president is duly sensible of the attention of his royal highness the prince regent, in giving the orders to the admiral commanding the British squadron on this coast, which your lordship has communicated.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

CONGRESS—On Thursday, Mr. Jackson of Va. proposed certain amendments to the constitution of the United States, so that a duty may be laid on exports.

Mr. Munroe offered a resolution for the appointment of a lieutenant general—it lies over for consideration.

Mr. Sharp introduced some resolutions respecting the nature of the service of the militia, with a view to direct that a prosecution be instituted against the governor of Vermont. Loud on the table.

Mr. Pickens' motions were taken up; but postponed on the receipt of the president's message, inserted above.

☞ The Neptune is stated to have arrived at New-York with Mr. Gallatin on board.

It is said one of our vessels of war is ordered to be fitted out at New York to proceed as a flag with dispatches.

A letter received in Washington city from Washington, M. T. of date Dec. 14, says—"Information was received last evening, that a British force of 2000 troops had arrived at Pensacola, and that a British squadron had swept all the American property afloat on the coast between Orleans and Pensacola."

THE CHRONICLE.

An election has been held in the city of New-York, for a representative in congress, in the place of Egbert Benson, esq. (fed.) resigned. William Irving esq. (rep.) has been elected by a majority of 377 votes. His opponent was Peter A. Jay, esq.

The British "official" letters sustain the facts briefly given in our last of the defeat of the French, in Germany. The details are of great length. They make the whole French loss to be 82,000 men killed, wounded and prisoners. Another account says that the emperor with the remnant of his force, had retreated across the Rhine; his German allies appear generally to have deserted him. The Russians have entered Cassel, the capital of Westphalia; the king made his escape. From the whole it appears that Bonaparte has been fully defeated—We have yet, however, but one side of the story.

Richardson and Bailhache propose to publish a newspaper, in English and French, at the town of Detroit, under the title of "The Republic." To their prospectus is added a spirited address "to the people of Canada."

Public Lands.

Copy of a letter from the commissioner of the general land office to the house of representatives.

Treasury Department, General Land Office,
December 30th, 1813.

SIR—I have the honor herewith to enclose a report respecting the public lands of the U. States, and am, with great respect, your most obedient humble servant,

EDWARD TIFFIN.

The honorable the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the U. States.

Treasury Department, General Land Office,
December 30th, 1813.

SIR—Although the law establishing the general land office does not require the commissioner to make an annual report of the state of that part of the public concerns confided to his care, yet as there has been a considerable accession of new members to the national legislature, I have thought it would be acceptable to have a comprehensive view of the extent and situation of the public lands, that such legislative provisions as are required may be the more readily perceived.

A report made to the senate on the 19th of February, 1812, by the chairman of a committee charged with an inquiry into the state of the public lands, together with the accompanying documents from the honorable the secretary of the treasury, afforded the most ample information which the nature of such inquiry could at that time furnish, and has much abridged the labor that would otherwise have been necessary in preparing this memoir.

It appears from public documents in this department, that the United States, after deducting all that has been sold, and leaving a sufficiency to satisfy every lawful claim, will possess a national domain of at least four hundred million acres of land, embracing a variety of soil and climate capable of furnishing all that is necessary for supplying the wants, and affording most of the luxuries of life to man, and which, if properly managed, will secure auxiliary aids to the government for ages yet to come.

This four hundred million of acres are situated as follows:

In the state of Ohio.

Lands to which the Indian title
has been extinguished 6,725,000
Lands to which the Indian title
has not been extinguished 5,575,000

Total number of acres of land in Ohio. 12,300,000

In the territory of Michigan.

Lands to which the Indian title
has been extinguished 5,100,000
Lands to which the Indian title
has not been extinguished 11,400,000

Total number of acres of land in Michigan 16,500,000

In the Indiana and Illinois south of parallel of latitude passing by the southern extremity of lake Michigan.

Lands to which the Indian title
has been extinguished 33,000,000

Lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished 23,200,000

Total number of acres in Indiana and Illinois 56,200,000

In the territory of lake Michigan and north of said parallel of latitude.

Lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished 5,500,000

Lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished 54,500,000

Total number of acres west of Michigan 60,000,000
In the Mississippi territory.

Lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished 5,900,000

Lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished 49,100,000

Total number of acres in the Mississippi 55,000,000

In the cession made by the French government the 30th of April, 1803, and including the territory of Missouri, the state of Louisiana, and the lands east of the river Mississippi and island of New-Orleans as far as the river Perdido, at least

In the last described portion of territory, it has not yet been correctly ascertained what proportion of the Indian title has been extinguished, but, prior to the period when the United States became possessed of the country, a considerable quantity had been ceded by the Indians, and since that period cessions have been obtained of the Sacs, Foxes and Osages, which, with the lands in the occupancy of the inhabitants, are supposed to amount to from twenty-five to thirty million of acres.

This delightful region, embracing a surface of two hundred million of acres, has heretofore been least known; but our very intelligent principal surveyor south of Tennessee, who, under instructions from this department, has been running township lines to ascertain its character and value, gives the most flattering account of it, and from whose information we may safely infer that at no very distant period, the United States will not only be able to procure, within its own boundaries, a sufficiency of sugar, rum, (perhaps coffee) molasses, and most of the tropical fruits for their own consumption, but be able to spare some for exportation. Within a year last past, there has been discovered tracts of country equal to many of the West-India Islands, for quantity of soil not only fit for, but of the kind best adapted to produce those precious articles. Extracts from some of the communications of the surveyor, will best explain the situation of the lands here. In a letter dated the 21st of January, 1813

he writes, "I have the honor herewith to transmit to you two rough sketches of the north and south east district of Louisiana, that you may more distinctly perceive the character of the country. Contrary to our expectations or hope, we are informed that there is a large body of high primitive soil, extremely rich and valuable, situated south west of Orleans, about twenty miles distant, and from twenty to fifty miles in extent, on which a flock of some hundreds of buffalo range, and have remained for many years past living on the high cane lands during the season of inundations, and ranging through the salt marshes during the season of low water. This information is obtained by one of our deputies, and I presume may be relied on; if so, it will at once become the most valuable and saleable tract of land in this country, it being in the best position for the growth of sugar cane."

In another dated September 3, 1813, he writes, "My principal deputy for the south eastern district of Louisiana has been employed for some time past in extending township lines through and exploring the southern portion of his district. He represents, that there are a number of islands on the coast, some of them of considerable size, and good soil; he found a body of high rich land in the neighborhood of the coast, extending along the bayous running into the bays."

Our surveyors have made some progress in surveying tracts of the water courses, under the law for surveying lands on water courses in Louisiana: the lands on the bayou they have been surveying (bayou Cayou) for about 30 miles up; it extends back from that water course about half a mile of high apparently primitive soil, heavily timbered and of the richest quality, thence it descends four hundred and sixty-five perches; there are several other bayous similarly situated with valuable lands on their margins; these lands are as far south as the Bayou of Mouth of the Mississippi; they are exposed to the ocean, and of course better calculated for the growth of sugar cane than any lands in the Mississippi. This tract of country, and the approach to it by water, are very little or not at all known. It would doubtless add much to the value of those lands, and promote their ready sale, to have an accurate survey of the coast, bays and islands, in front, annexed to the survey of the interior country; so that purchasers or those disposed to purchase lands there, might see the advantage those lands possess, and their convenient approach and communication with the ocean.

It would swell this paper too much to detail minutely the several representations made of this immensely valuable country, immensely valuable, whether considered as it respects its surface and situation, the products it may be rendered capable of furnishing, or the treasure it is destined to pour into the national coffers.

In this region a land office is directed by law to be opened in the territory of Missouri, as soon as the private claims are all ascertained and the lands surveyed; and from which territory alone it is believed inexhaustible stores of lead may be obtained.

In the state of Louisiana, three land offices are provided for by law, one at New-Orleans for the eastern land district, one at Opelousas for the western land district, south of Red river, and the other at such place, north of Red river, as the president of the United States shall designate; the land offices in these districts are progressing to a close in ascertaining the character and extent of the private claims, and the surveyors have prepared a considerable part of the eastern district for market, and are progressing fast with the remainder.

In that portion of the country lying east of the river Mississippi and island of New-Orleans as far as the river Perdido, two commissioners have been erected by law, one west, the other east of Pearl river, to ascertain the nature and extent of private claims derived from either the French, British, or Spanish governments, and to obtain a list of all the actual settlers who have no claims to land derived from either of those governments, and who are satisfactorily progressing in the discharge of their official duties.

In the territory of Illinois two land offices are directed by law to be opened, one at Kaskaskia, the other at Shawneetown, so soon as the private claims and donations are all located, and the lands surveyed, which are in great forwardness. By an act of congress passed on the 30th of April, 1810, it was provided in section 6, "that a tract of land in the Illinois territory at and including Shawneetown on the Ohio river, shall under the direction of the surveyor general, be laid off into town lots, streets, and avenues, and into out lots, in such manner and of such dimensions as he may judge proper, &c. &c. I quote the words of the act, to show that it was mandatory on the surveyor general; for, it appears, a most unfortunate selection of a scite for this town has been made, and that notwithstanding the expense already incurred in laying out the town, it will be necessary to abandon it. To show the causes to such determination, I beg leave to give extracts from some of the representations made to this office by the present surveyor-general, one of the territorial judges, the principal deputy surveyor, and one of the late commissioners at Kaskaskia, who write, August 14th, 1813, as follows:

"When I recently recommended a small change in the plat of Shawneetown, it was then my decided conviction that the scite itself ought to be changed, but not knowing that others would feel an interest sufficient to induce them to unite in such a recommendation, I was unwilling to move alone in so important an object. I was an eye witness to one of the two inundations by which that place was visited last spring, and to the great distresses and losses which were experienced. I had before observed, in riding through the woods surrounding the town, the extraordinary height of the water marks upon the trees, which were so visible, for the space of about two miles on the road to the saline, that one might imagine himself riding under water to the depth of from 12 to 15 feet, but the last spring I saw the water itself even at a greater height than had been marked by the icy freshness of winter. I rode upon the flood for more than two weeks in a keel boat over the principal street of the town lashed to a merchant's store, and the boat was upon a level with its roof; an attack of ague and fever then compelled me to quit and seek health in the high lands of Kentucky. The flood continued to rise a few feet afterwards, and was nearly as long in falling as it was in rising; a second inundation quickly succeeded; when the waters rose as high as in the first. At the time I left the boat the waters were about midway on the roofs of the houses generally, and quite to the ridge poles of several. Being heavy log cabins, they usually did not float till immersed to the last mentioned depth, and I saw about from 15 to 20 float away; about 40 in the whole floated off. It was a merciful providence that the wind did not blow hard in either of the inundations, for if it had done so, every building of every description must unquestionably have been demolished and swept off. I need not describe the distresses and losses of the inhabitants—several were sickened—some died. Every beast perished which could not be taken into boats or was not seasonably driven to the high lands. All the fences with every description of improvements around and in the houses, which could float, were taken off. The time occupied by both freshes was about ten weeks; I mean the time that the water lay over the surface of Shawneetown."

It has been observed that Shawneetown was laid out under the authority and at the expense of the United States, to which is annexed a most valuable district of rich land, which with the lots of Shawneetown are directed to be offered for sale, whenever the president of the United States shall so direct, (for all the present settlers there are volunteers on public lands, and have made small temporary improvements, expecting when the sales commenced to become purchasers); but should congress determine to abandon the present plan, from this representation confirmed by others in this office equally strong and respectable, and authorise the surveyor-general to select a better spot to lay off a town upon the United States' own lands a few miles lower down on the Ohio river, the situation of which for a town, in every point of view, could not be excelled in the Illinois territory; and the monies the sale of the lots would produce, above what the sales in the present town would, will far more than cover the loss incurred by laying out the present town of Shawnee.

In this territory there is also a very valuable saline which is directed by law to be leased in such a way, that the occupants may, while the interests of the United States are secured, produce the greatest possible quantity of salt, and furnish the inhabitants of that country with this essential necessary of life at the lowest possible price.

In the Indiana territory two land offices are established, one at Vincennes, on the Wabash, and the other at Jeffersonville, on the Ohio embracing a vast extent of remarkable fertile lands. At the last mentioned office, the fractional sections lying around Clark's grant, which were not surveyed and ready for market when the sales first commenced, are now ready and will be offered so soon as the state of the country will justify the measure.

The existing laws require "that all lands forfeited for non payment, shall be offered for sale at the court house of the county in which the officers are situated," and the register and receiver at Jeffersonville represents, that the court house of their county is fifteen miles distant from their offices; that it occasions great inconvenience and derangement of their business to attend the sales at so great a distance, and urge the necessity of legislative interference for their relief.

In the state of Ohio there are six land offices established and in successful operation; one at Cincinnati, one at Chillicothe, one at Zanesville, one at Marietta, one at Steubenville, and the other at Canton. The western boundary line of Virginia military reservation, embracing the lands between the Scioto and the Little Miami rivers in this state, has never yet been satisfactorily established. An essay has lately been made by commissioners appointed by the United States and the state of Virginia without success; a report of the commissioners on the part of the United States with a plat of the country and explanations, were made to congress and are on their files, giving ample information on that controverted business.

In the territory of Michigan one land office has been established at Detroit. The private claims and donations to individuals had been patented soon after the organization of this office, but before they were presented to the persons by their agent, who had them in possession, he was taken prisoner by the enemy, and states the patents were wantonly destroyed: application was made here for exemplifications, but, owing to the situation of the territory at that time, and the very limited means allowed to perform the complicated duties assigned us, they have not been issued.

In the Mississippi territory there are three land offices established; one at Huntsville, in Madison county, one at Washington, west of Pearl river, and the other at Fort St. Stephen's, east of Pearl river.—In this latter district, the register of the land office states, that a number of persons obtained certificates of pre-emption to land, to the amount in the whole of 21,930 acres of land, and that the time had elapsed wherein they were bound to complete the whole of their payments, but that they have never paid one cent therefor. These lands are therefore reverted again to the United States, most of which would now sell, but it requires an act of the legislature to authorise their sale.

In this district the whole of the rich and valuable lands ceded by the Choctaws, and laying along the Tombigbee, are surveyed and ready for market. By the articles of agreement and cession made between the United States and the state of Georgia, on the 24th of April, 1802, the United States are bound to pay to the state of Georgia, out of the first net proceeds arising from the sales of the land ceded, after deducting the expenses incurred in surveying and incident to such sales, the sum of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; only forty-six thousand three hundred and thirty-two dollars and seventy cents of which have yet been paid in arms under the act of April, 1808.

From this view of the state of the public lands, it will appear, that, independent of the lands now offered for sale at the several land offices established by law, we have nearly ready to add thereto the balance of the Choctaw purchase, and the forfeited pre-emptions in the Mississippi territory, the eastern and western land districts in the state of Louisiana, the Kaskaskia and Shawneetown districts in the Illinois and the fractions around Clark's grant in the Indiana: and so soon as the laws can be carried fully into effect, and the lands surveyed, the district north of Red river, and the lands to which the indian title has been extinguished in the territories of Missouri and Michigan.

The commissioner of the general land office, considers it his duty farther to state, that upon the organization of this office, the public business assigned to it was greatly behind. Patient industry and incessant application has done much, but the examination of and auditing the quarterly accounts of the receivers of public monies, present such an immense load of labor, that he is compelled to solicit additional aid in the estimates for the year 1814, for clerk hire; for, by a decision of the comptroller, as the proper law officer of the treasury department, the commissioner of the general land office is compelled to examine and audit all the accounts of the receivers of public monies as far back as the year 1801, and the immense mass of business is pressing, for some of the late receivers are indebted to the United States in large amounts, and suits cannot be commenced by the comptroller until their accounts are examined and audited.

All which is respectfully submitted by your most obedient servant,

EDWARD TIFFIN,
Com. of Gen. Land Office.

The hon. Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The accounts for the fourth quarter of the year 1813, have not yet been made up at the treasury, but the receipts and expenditures during that quarter have been nearly as follows:

Receipts from the customs, sales of lands, and small branches of the revenue, about	3,300,000

Of the sums obtained on loan during the year 1813, and included in the receipts above stated, an account of the terms on which they were made has been laid before congress, excepting as to the treasury notes issued under the act of February 25, 1813, and the loan of seven and a half millions obtained under the authority contained in the act of the 2nd of August, 1813. The annexed statement marked F. will show the whole amount received for treasury notes during the year 1813, and at what places they were sold or disposed of. Three millions, eight hundred and sixty-five thousand, one hundred dollars, of the notes issued under the act of June 30th, 1812, became due in the course of the year 1813, or in the present month of January, and have been paid off, or the funds placed in the hands of the commissioners of loans for that purpose.

The papers under the letter G. will show the measures taken under the act of August 2nd, 1813, authorising a loan of seven millions, five hundred thousand dollars, and the manner in which that loan was obtained. The terms were 88 dollars and 25 cents in money, for 100 dollars in stock, bearing an interest of six per cent.; which is equivalent to a premium of 13 dollars 31 cents and four ninths of a cent on each hundred dollars, in money, loaned to the United States. Of this sum of 7,500,000 dollars about 3,850,000 dollars were paid into the treasury during the year 1813, and the remainder is payable in the months of January and February, 1814.

For the year 1814, the expenditures, as now authorised by law, are estimated as follows:

1. Civil diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	$ 1,700,000
2. Public debt, viz:
Interest on the debt existing previous to the war	2,100,000
Ditto on the debt contracted since the war including treasury notes and loan for the year 1814	2,950,000
	5,050,000

Reimbursement of principal, including the old six and deferred stocks, temporary loans and treasury notes 7,150,000

3. Military establishment, estimated by the secretary of war for a full complement (including rangers, sea-fensibles and troops of all descriptions) of 63,422 officers and men and including ordnance, fortifications, and the Indian department, and the permanent appropriations for Indian treaties, and arming and equipping the militia 24,550,000

4. Navy, estimated for 15,787 officers seamen and boys, and for 1,869 marines, and including the service of two 74 gun ships for four months, and three additional frigates for six months of the year 1814, and the expenses of the flotillas on the coast and on the lakes 6,900,000

Amounting altogether to $45,350,000

The ways and means already provided by law are as follows :

1. Customs and sales of public lands. The net revenue accruing from the customs during the year 1812, amounted, as will appear by the annexed statements A. and B. to 13,142,000 dollars. Of this sum, about 4,300,000 was produced by the additional duties imposed by the act of July 1, 1812. The duties which have accrued during the year 1813, are estimated at 7,000,000 dollars. The custom-house bonds outstanding on the 1st of January, 1814, after making a due allowance for insolvencies and bad debts, are estimated at 5,500,000 dollars; and it is believed that 6,000,000 dollars may be estimated for the receipt of the customs during the year 1814. The sales of public lands during the year ending September 30th, 1813, have amounted to 256,345 acres, and the payments by purchasers to 706,000 as will appear by the annexed statement C. It is estimated that 600,000 dollars will be received into the treasury from this source during the year 1814. The sum, therefore, estimated as receivable from customs and lands, is $6,600,000

2. Internal revenues and direct tax. From the credits allowed by law on some of the internal duties, and from the delays incident to the assessment and collection of the direct tax, it is not believed that more ought to be expected to come into the treasury during the year 1814, than the sum of 3,500,000

3. Balance of the loan of seven and a half millions, already contracted for 3,650,000

4. Balance of treasury notes already authorized, 1,070,000

5. Of the balance of cash in the treasury on the 31st December, 1813, amounting, as is above stated, to about 1,683,000

There will be required to satisfy appropriations made prior to that day, and then withdrawn, at least 3,500,000

And leaving applicable to the service of the year 1814, 1,183,000

so that there remains to be provided by loans, the sum of 29,550,000

Although the interest paid upon treasury notes is considerably less than that paid for the monies obtained by the United States on the funded stock, yet the certainty of their reimbursement at the end of one year, and the facilities they afford for remittances and other commercial operations, have obtained for them a currency which leaves little reason to doubt that they may be extended considerably beyond the sum of five millions of dollars, hitherto authorized to be annually issued. It will, perhaps, be eligible to leave to the executive, as was done last year, a discretion as to the amount to be borrowed upon stock or upon treasury notes, that one or the other may be resorted to, within prescribed limits, as shall be found most advantageous to the United States.

The amount estimated to have been reimbursed of the principal of the public debt during the year ending on the 30th September last, including treasury notes and temporary loans, will appear by the estimate marked D. to have been 3,201,368 dollars. As the payment on account of the loan of sixteen millions had not then been completed, and the stock had, consequently, not been issued therefor, it is not practicable to state, with precision, the amount added to the public debt during the year; but, after deducting the abovementioned reimbursement of 3,200,000 dollars, this addition will not fall short of 22,500,000.

The plan of finances proposed at the commencement of the war, was to make the revenue, during each year of its continuance, equal to the expenses of the peace establishment, and of the interest on the old debt then existing, and on the loans which the war might render necessary, and to defray the extraordinary expenses of the war out of the proceeds of loans to be obtained for that purpose.

The expenses of the peace establishment, as it existed previous to the armaments of 1812, made in contemplation of war, but including the eight regiments added to the military establishment in the year 1808, and the augmentation of the navy in actual service, authorised in 1809, amounted, after deducting some casual expenses of militia and other incidental items, to about $7,000,000

The interest on the public debt, payable during the year 1814, will be, on the old debt, or that existing prior to the present war, $2,100,000

On the debt contracted since the commencement of the war, including treasury notes and allowing $500,000 for interest on the loan, which must be made during the year 1814, a sum as small as can be estimated for that object, 2,950,000

Making $12,050,000

The actual receipts into the treasury from the revenues as now established; including the internal revenues and direct tax, are not estimated for the year 1814, at more than $10,100,000

Viz :
From customs and public lands, 6,600,000
Interval revenues and direct tax, 3,500,000

10,100,000

If to this sum be added that part of the balance in the treasury on the 31st Dec. 1813, which has been estimated above, to be applicable to the expenses of the year 1814, and which, upon the principles above stated, may be considered as a surplus of revenue beyond the expenses of the peace establishment, and of the interest on the public debt for the year 1813, and therefore applicable to the same expenses for the year 1814, which sum is estimated at

And making together	11,280,000
There will still remain to be provided new revenues capable of producing	770,000
	12,050,000

But as the internal revenues and direct tax, when in full operation, will produce, in the year 1815, probably 1,300,000 dollars more than is estimated to be received from them in the year 1814, it will rest with congress to decide whether it is necessary that new and additional revenues should now be established. To what extent the existing embargo may reduce the receipts into the treasury from the customs during the year 1814, it is difficult to estimate, as the operation of the war had reduced the receipts from the customs nearly one half from that which was received during the year preceding the war. The former embargo reduced the revenue from the customs nearly one half the amount of that which was received during the year preceding its full operation. In this case, however, the transition was from the full receipt of a peace revenue, to the entire suspension of exportation and of foreign commerce in American bottoms. It is not, therefore to be presumed that the existing embargo will cause a reduction of the war revenue in the proportion of the peace revenue. Moreover, the effect of the act prohibiting the importation of certain articles necessarily increases the demand and enhances the value of those which may be lawfully imported, and the high price they bear will produce extraordinary importations, and in part compensate for the prohibition to export any thing in return: to this may be added, the duty on salt, the operation of which is yet but partial.

To the amount of the defalcation of the revenue caused by the embargo, whatever it may be, must be added the difference between the amount of the interest payable in the year 1814, on the loan of that year, and the whole amount of the interest on the same loan payable in the year 1815,—as well as that part of the interest which may be payable in the year 1815 on the loan of that year. The sum of these items will be required for the year 1815, in addition to the revenues now established, except 430,000 dollars, being the difference between the estimated increase in the receipt of the internal revenues and direct taxes and the 770,000 dollars remaining to be provided for in the foregoing estimate.

With these considerations it is submitted, whether it may not be expedient and prudent to provide new revenues capable of producing the whole or such part of the 770,000 dollars unprovided for, as may appear necessary to fulfil the public engagements and secure to the financial operations of the government the confidence, stability and success which is due to its fidelity and to the ample resources of the country.

All which is respectfully submitted. W. JONES,
Acting secretary of the Treasury.

Foreign Coins.

The annual report of the director of the Mint, on the subject of assays of foreign coins, contains a statement of assays of the gold and silver coins of Great Britain, France, Spain and Portugal, from which it appears—

1. That the gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal are all uniformly of the same quality, and exactly equal to that of the gold coins of the United States; and therefore their intrinsic value is at the rate of 100 cents for 27 grains, or $88\frac{2}{3}$ cents per pennyweight.

2. That the gold coins of France, especially those issued since the year 1806 inclusive, are also of a uniform quality; their intrinsic value being at the rate of 100 cents for $27\frac{2}{3}$ grains, or $87\frac{5}{8}$ cents per cwt.

3. That the gold coins of Spain are somewhat variable in their quality; their average intrinsic value being at the rate of 100 cents for $28\frac{7}{32}$ grains, or $84\frac{3}{8}$ cents per dwt.

4. That the intrinsic value of the French crown, supposing its weight 18 dwts. 17 grs. is 110 cents and $\frac{7}{100}$ parts of a cent.

5. That the intrinsic value of the Spanish dollar, exclusive of those issued prior to the year 1806, supposing it of the full weight of 17 dwts. 7 grs. is 100 cents and $\frac{2}{100}$ parts of a cent.

Proctor's Papers.

The following letters, found among major-general Proctor's baggage captured on the Thames, unfold many curious facts—and also show that the enemy's force, white and red, was much greater in the Upper Province than has been generally supposed.

Fort George, January 10, 1813.

SIR,—A long letter which I addressed to you on our marine affairs for lake Erie, will I hope have reached you safely. As it becomes a matter of the greatest moment to gain as accurate information as possible, of the preparations of the enemy, as to building armed vessels and boats; I request you will be pleased to select some intelligent inhabitant in your vicinity who would undertake to proceed down the border of lake Erie, as far as in his power towards Buffalo, for the purpose of obtaining the information so essential to our plans; it would be his object to examine at all the rivers and creeks what is going forward. It would require the greatest caution and circumspection as well as secrecy on the person chosen for this service; he should be one whose habits or profession would justify his assuming the character of a person travelling on some matters of business; and to insure his attention to the objects on which he is sent, it will be advisable to agree with him for a sum to be paid him commensurate with the distance he may travel, and the information he may obtain. You will be pleased to communicate to me, for the information of major-general Sheaffe, the result of the measures proposed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

OFFICIAL.

Fort George, April 29, 1813—2 o'clock, A. M.
My dear general—This morning at one o'clock accounts were received here by brigadier-general Vincent, with the unpleasant intelligence that that town had been carried by a body of the enemy's troops; about 1500 troops brought up the lake in thirteen vessels, viz. two square-rigged, and the others smaller; amongst the latter were gun-boats. Detailed particulars (from sir Roger Sheaffe who was there) has not yet reached us, but we have ascertained, in addition to York having fallen, that the powder magazines there have been blown up; whether this has been accidental, or been effected by our troops in their retreat, we know not.

The grenadiers and another company of the king's were engaged. Five companies of that regiment have reached this post; two companies of the 41st on their march towards you; the first beyond Ancaster, the other at Henry's have been recalled; they are extremely much wanted here, and had they pursued their route, they would not have reached in time to act against Harrison.

The enemy on the frontier opposite to us, have received a reinforcement within these few days of nearly 30,000 men; they are well furnished with boats.

You will thus perceive the critical situation in which we are placed on this line. We look with confident hope for the report of your success—and brigadier-general Vincent (who is here, and by whose directions I am writing to you) has desired me to impress upon you, what essential aid could be rendered to us, by the timely arrival here of five hundred indians; should you have secured Harrison's army; it is the brigadier-general's desire, and in which I most earnestly join, that you forward to us in the king's vessels to Point Abino, that number with as great expedition as possible. In the event of your having captured Harrison's army, you will see the impossibility under existing circumstances of our taking charge of them here, and therefore brigadier-general Vincent requests you will make the best arrangements in your power to dispose of them either by securing them at one or the other of your own posts, or passing them on parole into the United States by way of Cleveland or other route, as you may find expedient; the latter line of conduct is perhaps the most preferable on account of the state of your supplies of provisions.

Sincerely wishing every success, and hoping to send you, and receive from you, good accounts, I have the honor to be, &c.

CHRISTO. MYERS, Col. Act. Q. M. G.

Brigadier-general Proctor.

Norton had gone towards you as far as the head of the lake, but is called back. C. M.

Dep. Asst. Com. General's Office,

Amherstburg, 14 Aug. 1813.

SIR—The near prospect of a scarcity of provisions in this district is to me an object of the greatest concern and uneasiness. The whole of the flour now in store will not be more than sufficient for fourteen days, according to the quantities now issued daily, and very little can at present be expected in this district. One particular cause for this is that the two principal mills (McGregor's and Arnold's) are not now going for want of water. The dam of the former has been broken, and that of the latter much injured from the back water, occasioned by the great rains, &c. this year. The wind-mills at this season are of but little comparative service. The greatest part of the flour required for Detroit and Sandwich will now have to be supplied from the six hundred and seventy barrels lately brought from Long Point, by the schr. Mary (transport) and as this is all that I have to depend on, we shall very soon be in absolute want, without some very great abatement takes place in the quantities issued to indians, or some extraordinary exertions made to supply our wants from the neighborhood of Long Point. The possibility of the former is an object worth every attention, as the practicability of the latter, until our fleet are enabled to go down to Long Point is rather doubtful; by land carriage I fear little can be expected from that distance in the present state of the roads from thence.

Dep. commissary general Conche has been informed of this, in as strong language as I am master of. He has in consequence made purchases of flour at Long Point and sent an officer of his department to that neighborhood to purchase cattle for this place. For the last ten days I have stationed acting dep. asst. com. gen. Reynolds at Detroit, with a clerk of the commissarial dep. for purchasing supplies in the Michigan territory and about Sandwich. Two boats have been sent to the river Thames for flour and corn. Agents have been appointed by me here, at Sandwich, river Thames and Delaware for purchasing cattle, but with all my possible exertions, I despair of being able for any length of time, of supplying provisions to his majesty's forces in addition to the immense quantities now issued to indians; the latter I estimate at fourteen thousand rations per day at this post, Detroit and Sandwich.

It gives me additional pain to be thus obliged to trouble you. I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT GLMOR,
Dep. Asst. Com. General.

Amherstburg, 13th March, 1813.

SIR—Eight Muncseys left this on the 7th instant to reconnoitre at the Miami Rapids, and yesterday returned with a scalp. They reported that the Americans are numerous, and have completed a stockade much larger than the fort here.

One hundred and twenty Indians which I had sent over the river yesterday left Brown's Town for the Rapids with six interpreters along, and by them I expect some prisoners, or some more information than we have yet had. The snow being yet deep out there, will however be no detriment to them.

Your humble servant,

M. ELLIOTT.

Amherstburg, 8th Sept. 1813.

SIR—A few days ago, I sent out to Sandusky some of the Hurons of Brown's Town to see what those of Sandusky were about; they found the Americans had taken them into the state of Ohio, on Mad River, where they are guarded by a number of Americans. The Crane told the messengers that there were 9000 men raising within twelve miles of that place, and that their intention was to advance to the foot of the Rapids and fortify themselves there, building block-houses on their way to that place, at the distance of every five miles, and to cross in winter on the ice, and attack and take this place, and afterwards sweep the English from this along into the sea. In consequence he sent a message to the Hurons and other nations (which was yesterday delivered in my presence) to withdraw themselves from this and join him on Mad River, where they and their property would be safe. That if all did not attend to his advice, he hoped some who had any regard for their lives would go and join him.

A Shawanoe informs me that he saw 300 troops advancing towards fort Wayne—report however said 200. The said Indian came from the Ottawa towns.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

M. ELLIOTT

Gen. Proctor, commanding.

Head of Lake Ontario, 4th June, 1813.

MY DEAR GENERAL—A series of misfortunes have suddenly befallen us. Perhaps before you receive this you will have learnt that the army under general Dearborn crossed the Niagara line on the 27th ult. and after being most gallantly opposed by part of the King's Newfoundland and Glengary regiments, got possession of fort George, and compelled the whole of our troops to retire upon this position.—Here general Vincent means to make a stand, but in the event of his being beat, and forced altogether to retire to Kingston, he is directed by the orders which I yesterday brought him, to detach to your assistance the remainder of the 41st regiment, two companies of the Newfoundland, and the remainder of the three companies of the Glengary regiment.—The companies of the two latter corps are much weakened by the action of the 27th.

I learn with infinite regret, your distressed situation for want of provisions, and it is certainly unfortunate that a considerable quantity of pork, intended for your use, was destroyed at Point Abino, for fear of falling into the enemy's hands. I hear you have flour enough, and I hope you will have plenty of fresh beef. It is said that the enemy have detached troops against you. Your situation, it must be owned, is sufficiently embarrassing; but Sir George, on my leaving him, knowing but imperfectly the events here, and still more so, those of your neighborhood, relies with confidence on your zeal and ability—certain that the most indefatigable exertions will be made on your part in defence of your post, and of the squadron, which (whatever may happen) must not fall into the hands of the enemy.

Our fleet under sir James Yeo, is now on the lake, determined to fight: and at present fully able to beat the enemy's. All are anxious for the meeting, for a naval victory on our part would soon restore matters to their usual flourishing state. Colonel Baynes, with a force of only 800 men, attacked Sackett's Harbor on the 29th ult. It was supposed the garrison was small, in consequence of their having detached so many men to Niagara—we found, however, upwards of 3000. Our gallant little band drove them at the point of the bayonet, into their works, (though with a good deal of loss) which were found much too strong to carry with our small force, without artillery, and unassisted by our large ships, a calm having prevented their co-operation: Thus separated we re-embarked without any opposition, having taken from them three field pieces and one hundred and fifty men.

When I left Kingston, 2000 men were on the march for that place, including 2d battalion 41st, De Watteville's and Mucrone. The 13th and 98th were hourly expected to arrive at Quebec. We may look for other reinforcements from Spain, which will I hope, enable us to recover our lost ground.

I beg my best respects to Mrs. and Miss Proctor, and to Henry, and believe me, dear general,

Yours most truly,
Rr. M'DOUGALL.

Head-quarters, Forty-mile creek, June 14th, 1813.

MY DEAR GENERAL—We every day look for a reinforcement of about 400 men from Kingston. On their arrival, and should the fleet continue with us, it is intended to advance the army to 20 mile creek and throw forward our whole body of Indians, and the light troops (considerably augmented) to feel the pulse of the enemy. We have various accounts as to his force, and none to be depended upon, but his fears are said to be as strong as ever and a ruse of the nature above mentioned, might operate so powerfully upon him, as might induce him to think, that his own side of the river is the only place of safety.

of childhood that fears a painted devil." But it is so far lucky, that our opponents are mere infants in the sublime science of war. Now, as you are perhaps encumbered with too many mouths, considering your scanty means of filling them, you perhaps might be able to prevail on two or three hundred more of your scarthy warriors to join us here. They would be invaluable under our present circumstances, and you might fairly tell them, that a great effort is to be made to drive their enemy and ours across the St. Lawrence; and once effected, I do most positively believe they will never renew the attempt. Remember me to cols. Warburton, Dickson and Monckler, and believe me always, yours,

Rr. M'DOUGALL.

Amherstburg, 27th Oct. 1812.

SIR—I have seen a letter from you to colonel St. George, mentioning that three Frenchmen had been killed near Sandusky. That it is the case, is true; but the Indians having seen them in an enemy's country, and those people being actually resident for a long time past there, occasioned them being taken for enemies. They had been on board the vessel, and had gone ashore to get something more of their property on board, and the Indians having no knowledge of the circumstance, and not knowing them to be Canadians, consequently shot them.

I shall drop down to-day to the mouth of the river, and to-morrow morning will set up the Miami bay

I have the honor to be, &c.

M. ELLIOTT.

P. S. Col. Clure writes me, that they expect another attack soon, and says they will require assistance from this place. If you have any commands on the subject, I should be glad to know, and your opinion.

Col. PROCTOR, &c. &c. &c. Detroit.

Copy of a letter from the commissary of the upper district of Upper Canada, to his superior below.

Deputy assistant commissary-general's office,
Amherstburg, 6th August, 1813.

Edward Conche, esq.

SIR—Your letter of the 26th ultimo, with two thousand pounds currency in army bills, were delivered to me by Mr. Charles Askin on the 29th.

I am extremely happy to find that I may expect liberal supplies of flour from Long Point, the more so as the two principle mills (McGregor's and Arnold's*) are not now going—the dams are broke and I am informed that it is more than probable, will not be prepared and filled with water till late in the fall, thus the wheat on hand and that now cutting in this district, will be of little immediate service to me for want of mills to grind it. The wind-mills at this season of the year do very little service.

I have been abundantly supplied with cattle for this some time past, though my issues have averaged about 17 head per diem—but should the Indians remain with us, and in addition to the quantities of meat, &c. issued by me, continue their wanton and extensive depredations on cattle of all descriptions, a short period will put an end to our supplies of this article. I have now in my possession, to be submitted to brig-gen. Proctor, accounts to near two thousand pounds for working oxen, milch cows, sheep, hogs, &c. killed by Indians, and I presume accounts to at least as much more, will be given in addition thereto. Some of those cattle have been killed without any meat having been taken from them; in other instances the horn and tail seem to have been the cause of shooting down the animal—these being cut off, the carcase is left to the dogs. In addition to about 14,000 rations per day, can a new country like this supply sufficient provisions for our consumption? The commissary general cannot expect from me any particular accounts of the resources of the country under such circumstances. I can only say, that for 2000 men, I could easily supply provisions for six months in conformity to general orders, mentioned in your letter of the 18th ult. Since then I have been feeding about 15,000 troops, Indians, &c. from what I presume the commander of the forces has as little idea of the provisions required for this post, as others seem to have of the difficulties to be surmounted by me, and the immense labor to be performed, otherwise I can scarcely suppose that I should have been so long without more assistance. I have now given up the idea of making up my accounts till assistance as required by me, are sent. I find such difficulties in procuring flour, corn, &c. sufficient to feed such hordes of savages, in paying therefor, and money to do so, finding materials for all departments of the army here, that the business of the day is more than sufficient to employ the whole of the time of myself and my small establishment. Hence my reason for applying for an officer of the department to be put over me. I find more expected of me than all my abilities and zeal can perform—my accounts getting in arrears, and the miserable prospect before me, of getting embarrassed beyond the possibility of extraction—of perhaps involving myself and family in ruin from getting so involved. I was in hopes that as a number of officers of the commissariat, superior to me in rank, and likely in abilities and practice, had arrived from England—others promoted in this country—that one of them might have been sent here to take charge of a district which I consider inferior to none in Canada in point of responsibility and commissariat duties.—At the same time, I should be far from wishing more than can be asked with propriety or granted without ruining my prospects in the department, after 15 years faithful services.

I am very happy that you are sending me a supply of oats, in addition to the 30 barrels mentioned by you—I will require about 60, provided you can spare so much. I beg to be informed what quantity of that article is issued to the troops in your district.—Brigadier-general Proctor requires some for their horses, though I cannot get him to give out a general order on that subject. I have to acknowledge your letter of the 24th ult. and beg leave to state, that on the receipt thereof I could not pay the accounts to the 41st regiment on account of the paymaster, as well as the commanding officer, being at the fort of the Rapids. Since their return I have been prevented from making payments for want of money, a supply of which I hope soon to receive on a larger scale than hitherto. The escort of dragoons with the 4000 dollars in specie has not yet arrived.

P. S. I sincerely hope that the transport Mary will soon arrive with more flour—I am really out. I have sent Mr. Reynolds and one of my clerks to Detroit to purchase the whole of the flour and corn that they can get in the Michigan territory and in the neighborhood of Sandwich. I pay $10 per bbl. of 196 lbs. for flour, and 7s. 6d. per bushel for corn. I understand that the schooner Ellen is to be sent for provisions to Long Point in a few days.

real character of the proffered mediation of Russia, to effect a peace between the United States and Great Britain. It may be useful to call to mind the things that were said, in the most wicked manner, as to the proposal, acceptance and object of that interference; not with a hope to reclaim a wayward party, struggling to wade through falsehood to power, or with the least expectation that its cheek will be tinged with shame at an exposition of its conduct—but to put our fellow-citizens on their guard hereafter, and assist them to appreciate those that would consider an honorable peace with Great Britain as the "HEAVIEST OF CURSES" [see page 311] if "it should be made without a change of our rulers." Miserable sinners!—they call themselves of the "peace party."

1. It was absolutely denied that Russia had offered her mediation at all. The whole was declared to be a cheat of our government, to amuse and gull the people of the United States. The honor of several busy personages was pledged to prove this; and the impudence of their assertions deceived many of our citizens.

2. It was said, a million of times over, and believed by thousands, from the mere force of the oft repeated falsehood, that our commissioners had orders leading to a secret connection with Bonaparte—nay, it was insinuated that they had really gone out to meet the congress at Prague; though the events, out of which that proposed conference grew, had hardly happened in Europe before the appointment was made in America: all this was said and solemnly declared to, though Mr. Eschard, one of the most distinguished gentlemen in opposition to Mr. Madison, had been by him appointed one of the commissioners.

3. We were told, over and over, and over again, until, perhaps, they who made the story almost believed it, that our commissioners had never been recognized by the Russian government—and many carried the fraud so far as to depose that they had been dismissed, ordered off; and treated as the agents of the "tyrant Napoleon."

Having thus pointed out some of the things that have happened, without laying claim to the "fillet" we venture to predict the course that will be pursued:

Great Britain has offered to negotiate, and our government [without taking time to consult Bonaparte] has accepted the proposition. The business of these men will be to render the negotiation vain, if it be possible, by deteriorating from and belittling [the word suits the idea] the resources of their own country, that the enemy may assume a ground we cannot meet him upon;—that the "HEAVIEST OF CURSES"—an immediate peace—may be avoided.

We hope the effort may fail. They have deceived the British ministry so often, that I do not think any thing else than open rebellion will induce the Guelphic cabinet to believe they are in earnest. Being myself a real friend of peace, I care not where, when, how, or by whom it is made; provided only, it be an honorable peace—a peace that shall secure the great principles for which the sword was reluctantly drawn.—And have only to add, that government, always misrepresented as the enemy of the merchant, is entitled to, and ought to receive, the sincere and hearty thanks of every [honest] dealing man in the union, for the promptitude with which it laid before the public the state of our foreign relations, in matters of so great interest, that every one might judge and act for himself.

HIGH TREASON.—Two persons were committed to Boston jail on the 2d inst. charged with supplying the enemy with cattle.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

RUSSIAN MEDIATION.—The people now have the facts before them by which they may judge the SPIES CAUGHT.—A New-Haven paper of January 5, says—Two persons had been detected in fort Trumbull, New-London, as spies, (one of them dressed in a woman's apparel) by a private in the fort. They had been on board the American squadron and in fort Griswold. They were sent on board the frigate United States. The one in woman's clothes proves to be the second-lieutenant of the Ramilies. [We have no confirmation of this.]

THE EMBARGO.—In ridicule of that provision in the embargo law designed to prevent a traffic with the enemy, and compel that honesty which patriotism could not inspire, the following is published in a Boston newspaper: we preserve it as a curiosity—Boston, January 5.—The following is a copy of a coaster's manifest, hence to Welfleet, under the present liberal arrangement of our penny wise government:—170 lbs beef, 1 barrel flour, 1 hog, 6 bushels corn, 1 bbl. apples, 1 bushel dried apples, 25 lbs. cheese, 20 lbs. butter, 1-2 bushel beans, 1 lb. tea, 1-2 lb. pepper, 1-2 lb. ginger, 2 lbs. coffee, 2 lbs. chocolate shells, 1 doz. cabbages, 14 lbs. candles, 12 bushels cranberries (a penny biscuit and a 2 copper candle.)

RETALIATION.—Ten of the warranted officers of the Chesapeake frigate, having been released from close confinement in Halifax, the ten British officers who were closely confined in Ipswich jail, in retaliation, have been likewise released.

COLONIAL PRODUCE.—Very large quantities of sugar and coffee have lately been received in the Eastern ports, through "neutrals" and some American vessels, from Havana, St. Bartholomew, &c.

BRITISH TRAFFIC.—We have several times noticed the active trade of the enemy in the Chesapeake in the article of slaves, kidnapped or enticed from their masters, and sent to the West Indies for sale. The law of Great Britain is pointedly against such introduction, but the officers of the navy "want money and must have it." The governor of Virginia has officially communicated to the legislature this war of the enemy, stating the fact that they were so taken possession of, transported and sold. He recommends the passing of a law authorising the county courts to take depositions for the purpose of authenticating these losses—as "upon the termination of the war, a rational hope may be indulged, either that the enemy will be made to compensate for those injuries so repugnant to the principles of civilized warfare, or, if the government should deem it wisest with a view to the interest of the whole to forbear to press the point, it will itself indemnify them."

SIR GEORGE PREVOST.—The general order of this officer, inserted below, has excited great indignation, and met with the reprehension it deserves. It is infamously false. France is not "the ally of the United States." It is notorious, that even that good understanding that should exist between all nations at peace with each other, does not belong to the two countries. On the contrary, we have such serious matters in dispute with her, that, though she is invulnerable by us, we should have declared war against her long ago for the maintenance of principles violated, if the more extensive trespasses on the rights of persons, as well as of property, by her enemy, Britain, had not compelled us first to try to "square the yards" with the latter. This is perfectly known to sir George—and also, that at this time, instead of our being in an alliance with France we are nearer to a state of war against her: and so have been for years. But this is the old clamor of prejudice—another British general, Benedict Arnold, had the honor first to cry out "French influence," and we think, if the baronet knew how stale and unprofitable that stuff has become amongst us, he would not have vexed his conscience with the sin of uttering it, seeing he can make so little by it. As to the clamor here, it is "meat, drink, washing and lodging" to many that, without it, could not make a speech or write a paragraph—but sir George's brains we had hoped were better stocked with ideas.

A DESERTER.—Among the late deserters from the Albion is an Irishman, who said "he had often heard much of America, and guessed he would take a peep at some parts of it before he returned back again."

MANAGEMENT. If we could believe all that we see in the papers, it would appear, that Mr. Madison had induced lord Castlereagh to send out the Bramble with despatches, just that he [the president] might effect another loan! Certainly his lordship is a very obliging gentleman!

DIRECT TAX. The state of Kentucky has assumed the payment of its quota of the direct tax. Virginia has done so like-wise.

BRITISH COURTESY! A Boston paper says—"We understand that on Christmas night, captain Hayes, of the Majestic, sent a very polite card ashore to the ladies at Provincetown, informing them that he should give a genteel ball that evening, on board his ship, and hoped to have the pleasure of their company." But the ladies declined the invitation.

SOUTH WESTERN FRONTIER. The accounts from Mobile are contradictory. While some say that a large British [land] force has arrived at Pensacola, and united itself to the savages; others report, the enemy have no troops at all, and that their vessels are badly manned. The latter is by far the most probable. The whole coast is closely blockaded.

AMERICAN BANKRUPTCY. The United States stocks are selling in LONDON at ten per cent. above par, and vast quantities are ordered, or about to be sent there. How much above par would the British stocks bring in our money market? We care not how much of our stocks go to Europe, but hope the marshals and their deputies will keep a sharp look out for the precious metals, which the avarice of many may tempt them to export, contrary to law—they are at 30 or 40 per cent. advance, in Great Britain.

BALTIMORE VESSELS. A very large portion of the honest foreign trade of the United States, for some time past, has been carried on in Baltimore vessels, under the "striped bunting." During the last week or ten days, there was entered on the coffee house books, notices of the safe arrival of from three to six vessels a day, for several days, with valuable cargoes. These wonderfully constructed schooners cannot easily be taken, if not over-loaded, if they have sea-room and are uncrippled, and properly managed. Since the war we have lost but four of our privateers—one of them was land-locked and taken in the Chesapeake bay—one was captured after a severe gale in which which she had suffered much—one was given up by cowardice, and the other was taken for want of a good look-out. They go where they please; they chase and come up with every thing they see, and run away at pleasure. What would be the effect of thirty or forty of these vessels (commanded by persons accustomed to sail them) let loose on the enemy's commerce, to destroy, under direction of the navy department?

OUR RESOURCES.—Those who doubt the ability of the United States to extinguish the war debts, are invited to look at the report of the commissioner of the land-office for the amazingly valuable capital we possess, in addition to all the other means of raising a revenue, common to nations. On some of the lands of which that respectable gentleman speaks, sugar, of a superb quality, has been raised by the Indians, and exhibited at New-Orleans. All this sort of land, and there appears a very large quantity of it, if properly taken care of, will bring from 1 to 300$ per acre, in a very little time. Our country is full of money—the legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania are asked to charter about a half a hundred of banks, with good solid capitals. The whole amount of money, at this time petitioned (to congress and the several state legislatures) to be invested in stocks, is about 60 millions.

GEN. HULL.—The court for the trial of gen. Hull met at Albany, and was organized, as appointed by the secretary of war. The general did not object to any of the members. The trial will be very tedious. Many of the witnesses did not appear.

THE PEACE REMOVS.—Several correspondents have asked the editor his opinion of the prospect of peace. That opinion would be worth little, if he could give one, which he confesses himself unable to do. He hopes that a looking for that blessing, may not relax the exertions to win it.

BRITISH NATURALIZATION.—London, Oct. 18. On Tuesday, 52 Dutchmen, volunteers for the 7th battalion of the 60th regiment, marched into Edinburgh castle. This battalion which is to serve in Canada is to be augmented to 1509 men; and we understand, have given orders to enlist Dutchmen as well as Germans, for it at all the depot in the kingdom.

*Adjutant-general's office, head quarters,
Montreal 12th December, 1813.*

GENERAL ORDER.—His excellency the governor in chief and commander of the forces has to announce to the troops under his command, that he has received a communication from major-general Wilkinson, commanding a division of the army of the United States of America, by order of his government, of which the following is an extract.

“The government of the United States adhering unalterably to the principle and purpose declared in the communication of general Dearborn to you, on the subject of the twenty-three American soldiers, prisoners of war, sent to England to be tried as criminals; and the confinement of a like number of British soldiers, prisoners of war, selected to abide the fate of the former, has, in consequence of the step taken by the British government, as now communicated, ordered forty-six British officers into close confinement, and they will not be discharged from their confinement until it shall be known that the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers in question are no longer confined.”

It would be superfluous to use any argument to refute an assumption so extravagant, unjust, and unprecedented, as to deny the right of a free nation to bring to legal trial, in a due course of law, her own natural born subjects taken in the actual commission of the most heinous offence that man can commit against his king, his country, and his God that of raising his parricidal arm against his allegiance to his countrymen, by leaguings with their enemies, a crime held in such abhorrence by every civilized nation in Europe, that summary death by the law martial is its avowed reward, and is inflicted with unrelenting severity by France the ally of the United States. This pretension must appear to every unprejudiced and upright mind, as iniquitous and unjust, as is the retaliation which the government of the United States has adopted, by placing in close confinement three and twenty British soldiers, as hostages for an equal number of infamous wretches, the unworthy offsprings of Great Britain; who, when drawn from the ranks of the enemy, solicited to be suffered to expiate their treason by turning their arms against their recent employers. These rebels have, with the contempt they merit, been consigned to the infamy and punishment that await them from the just laws of their offended country: while the government of the United States does not blush to claim these out-cast traitors as their own, and outrage the customs of civilized war, in the persons of honorable men, by placing them on a par with rebels and deserters.

No alternative remains to the commander of the forces, in the discharge of his duty to his king, his country and his fellow soldiers, but to order all the American officers, prisoners of war, without exception of rank, to be immediately placed in close confinement as hostages for the forty-six British officers so confined, by the express commands of the supreme authority in that country, until the number of forty-six be completed, over and above those in confinement.

His excellency directs that this general order, together with that issued on the 27th Oct. be read to the troops, that the British soldiers may be sensible of the terms on which America has determined to wage this war; confident, that he will meet them with proper spirit and indignation; for should he become the prisoner of a foe so regardless of those laws which for ages have governed civilized nations in war, he would be doomed to a rigorous confinement, and that perhaps only preparatory to a more savage scene.

Adjutant general B. N. A.
MILITARY.

The Creeks. We have no late important particulars of the war with the Creeks. We apprehend that the pursuit of them has been retarded from the expiration of the term of service of a considerable part of the Tennessee militia. It appears, however, that some volunteers had marched to join Jackson, and that active operations might soon recommence. General Floyd, recovering of his wounds, was expected to resume the command of the Georgians. One account says, that 3000 warriors of the friendly Creeks had rendezvoused at Cowetars, to act as directed.

It is stated that brigadier-general Parker, of the U. S. army, is to have the command at Norfolk.

Certain British vessels lying off Pensacola have undertaken to interdict all intercourse with that port and every place to the westward of it. They capture every thing—Spanish vessels, as well as others. It is stated they have proposed to send two regiments of black troops to help in the defence of that place. It is also said that the Big Warrior has defeated the rebels [Indians] in a general engagement, many of whom have fled to Pensacola for refuge. The Big Warrior is a friendly Creek.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.

We confined ourselves for two weeks to a brief notice of the facts and reports that had reached us from the Niagara frontier, as well of the difficulty to ascertain what was truth, as from the desire of at once presenting a regular detail of events. The following brief summary, with the documents annexed, will preserve the history of this disgraceful and calamitous descent of the enemy.

The evacuation of fort George and burning of Newark has already been stated, and is further accounted for below. On the eighteenth of Dec. gen. McClure, at Buffalo, addressed a proclamation to the inhabitants of Niagara, Genessee and Chetauque counties calling upon them to take up arms, as an attack upon Niagara would be made [see the note below.*]

*To the inhabitants of Niagara, Genessee and Chetauque.

The present crisis is truly alarming. The enemy are preparing to invade our frontier, and let their savages loose upon your families and property. It is now in your power to avoid that evil, by repairing to

On the nineteenth, about 3 o'clock in the morning, the British after several days notorious preparation, crossed the Niagara river with a force variously stated, but perhaps, amounting to about 1200 regulars, 200 militia and 200 indians. They landed at Five Mile Meadows, without opposition, being unseen. A detachment under col. Murray immediately marched to fort Niagara—a discharge of small arms was heard for a little space, but soon the royal salute of 21 guns proclaimed the complete surprize or vile treachery of the officers of that garrison.—The commandant, capt. Leonard, was absent—he left his post late at night—the main gate, [it is said and we believe it] was left open. Who opened it?—This gate had always (as well in the day as the night) been kept closed, except for the moment when a heavy carriage was entering, at which time a responsible officer attended. The gate must have been opened late at night; it could not have been so when the garrison went to sleep. We shall not make the remarks on this matter that the thing appears to deserve.

Very soon after the salute was fired, a party of the enemy appeared at Lewiston, at which place was stationed 30 or 40 militia, with a field piece. It does not appear that they done much for the defence of the place; to which, indeed, their force was incompetent. A general flight ensued—the indians entered, and began to plunder, to burn and to MURDER. A letter to the editor says “they killed at and near Lewiston, eight or ten of the inhabitants, who when found, were all scalped, with the exception of Lewiston, Schlosser and Buffalo. Every man who is able to bear arms is not only invited but required to repair to the above rallying points, for a few days, until a detachment of militia arrives. The enemy are now laying waste their own country, every man who does not take up arms or who is disposed to remain neutral, is inhumanly butchered, his property plundered and his buildings destroyed. Information has just been received, that six or eight of their most respectable inhabitants between fort George and Queenston, have fallen victims to their barbarity. Every man in the province is required to take up arms, and he that refuses is wantonly butchered. What then fellow-citizens, have you to expect from such an enemy, should they invade your frontier? Think of the consequences; be not lulled into a belief, that because you reside a few miles from the river, that you are secure: No, fellow-citizens, the place to meet them is on the beach. Then you will have it in your power to chastise them, but should they be suffered to penetrate into the interior with their savages, the scene will be horrid!

If, then, you love your country and are determined to defend its rights—if you love your families and are determined to protect them—if you value your property, and are determined to preserve it—you will fly to your arms and hasten to meet the enemy, should they dare to set foot on our shores.

Since the above was prepared, I have received intelligence from a credible inhabitant from Canada, (who has just escaped from thence,) that the enemy are concentrating all their forces and boats at fort George, and have fixed upon to-morrow night for attacking fort Niagara—and should they succeed, they will lay waste our whole frontier. In that case, our supply of arms, which are deposited at fort Niagara, will be cut off: Therefore all who have arms, accoutrements or ammunition, will do well to bring them, and all who have horses will come mounted.

GEO. MCCLURE, brig. gen.

Commanding Niagara frontier.

Head-quarters, Buffalo, Dec. 13, 1813.

one whose head was cut off; their bodies were in a mangled state; one with his entrails taken out, and heart missing; the bodies were stripped and a part of them buried; among the bodies found was that of a boy ten or twelve years old, stripped and scalped.”

As they approached the Tuscarora [Indian] village, the indians turned out for defence of their homes, and killed one of the enemy indians—this made a little pause, but the enemy soon fired the houses, and destroyed the whole. They also butchered some of the flying inhabitants here. They then went on to Manchester, which they burnt, with the valuable mills and other buildings belonging to A. Porter, Esq. also Youngstown and all the farm houses adjacent, always excepting the houses of their particular friends. They wantonly destroyed every thing they could—shooting down horses, cattle, sheep and swine, and suffering them to lie where they fell. The whole number of houses destroyed amounted to about 100. One account says that the United States stores in the arsenal on the Ridge Road were saved—another informs us that they were destroyed by our people.

After those scenes in the neighborhood of fort Niagara, the enemy marched up to Buffalo, which they also burnt. See gen. Hall's letters. They committed many murders there, but saved the house of the famous Pomeroy. They destroyed three small schooners at Black Rock, and in fact swept the country for some miles in the interior, from Niagara to Buffalo, the extreme points of the river. Report adds that a detachment had marched for Erie, for the purpose of burning that part of the lake fleet that lies there; and we fear they will have effected it. The most valuable part of the squadron, we believe, is at the head of the lake; and safe for the present.

The events call up many reflections on the management on our part and the barbarity of the enemy. We may advert to them hereafter. We cannot, however, fail to express our detestation of those who justify these cruelties by the conflagration of Newark—for they have thought it right to burn Marye-de-Grace, Frenchtown, Georgetown and Fredericktown; and, as I live, I believe lamented that Baltimore, the third city of the union, had not shared the same fate. But we will not be discouraged—the allied savages shall yet be beaten.

There are accounts from Erie of the 4th inst. Early information had been received there of the events on the Niagara; preparations were made to meet the enemy, and the alarm had subsided as the means of meeting the foe were rendered efficient. It is a long and dreary march from Buffalo to Erie; and from what we hear we wish the enemy may have went forward. Our vessels were so moored in the harbor as to present a battery of 20 guns each way; and the ice had been broken around them. Volunteers had prepared to march from Ohio, some went from Pittsburg. A force will be stationed there for the present. The neighboring Pennsylvanians turned out with great spirit, at the requisition of major-general Mead.

The following British account of these events may serve to cap the whole—

From the Plattsburgh Republican—Jan. 1.

We stop the press to copy the following from a handbill printed at Montreal on Tuesday morning, December 28.

“Extract of a letter from an officer of high rank in the army to his friend in this city, dated Queenston, December 19, 1813.

“I have the happiness to acquaint you that fort Niagara was taken by assault an hour before daylight this morning. Col. Murray commanded the storm.

ing party, which consisted of the 100th regiment, (the prince regent's own Irish heroes) the grenadiers, the 9th royal and flank companies of the 41st. Our loss has been but trifling—lieutenant Newland of the 100th grenadiers, killed; colonel Murray wounded through the wrist, and perhaps half a dozen other casualties: the quantity of ordnance, stores, ammunition, provisions &c. found in the place is very great: 3000 stand of arms 50,000 worth of clothing are among the articles: the remainder of the troops, with the whole of the western Indians, who had been passed over to support the attack, immediately after ascertaining the success of colonel Murray's column, moved towards Lewiston to attack the heights on which the enemy had planted some heavy guns, avowedly for the purpose of laying Queenston in ashes: both heights and Lewiston were, however precipitately abandoned on the advance of general Rial's column: a war-whoop from 500 of the MOST SAVAGE INDIANS (which they gave just at day light, on hearing of the success of the attack at Fort Niagara) made the enemy take to their heels and our troops are in pursuit—we shall not stop until we have cleared the whole frontier. The Indians are retaliating the conflagration of Newark—not a house within my sight but is in flames—this is a melancholy but just retaliation.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The late descent of the enemy on this frontier, and the horrid outrages committed on our defenceless inhabitants by British allies, being laid to my misconduct as commanding officer of the American forces on this frontier, and altho' my conduct has been approved by the Sec. at War, the commander in chief of this state, and by major Gen. Harrison, before his departure, still I deem it a duty which I owe to my own reputation, in order to put a stop to the evil reports which are propagated against me, without knowing my orders, or the means which I had in my power to execute them, to give a brief statement of my most prominent acts since I have had the honor of so important a command.

On my arrival at Fort George, and previous to the departure of general Wilkinson with his army from that post, I suggested to the general the necessity of marching out against the enemy at Cross Roads and Four Mile Creek; that his army, with the addition of my militia were sufficient to take or destroy all the British forces in that neighborhood, which would have done nothing more for the militia than to protect and keep in order the inhabitants of that part of the Province, as otherwise our frontier would be liable to be invaded. This proposition, however, was not agreed to, as the general's instructions were of a different nature. The general left with me col. Scott and 800 regulars, who were to remain until I considered my force sufficient to hold the Fort without them, when they were to march to Sacket's harbor.

About the 12th of October, the British army commenced their retreat towards the head of the Lake. I issued orders for my militia to pursue, which was promptly obeyed. We advanced as far as the Twelve Mile Creek, and within a short distance of the enemy's rear guard, when Col. Scott sent and express requesting me to return, and said that he would abandon the Fort the next day, and march with his troops to Sacket's Harbor, and at the same time detained my provisions and ammunition waggon, which compelled me to abandon the further pursuit of the enemy, and induced them to make a stand on the heights of Burlington. I was then left with about 1000 effective militia in Fort George, and 250 Indians, a force not more than sufficient to garrison that post. On the arrival of general Harrison's army, I was elated with the prospect of uniting our forces, of driving the enemy from Burlington, taking possession of that post, and giving peace to the Upper Province and our frontier. We were prepared to march in 24 hours, when the arrival of Commodore Chauncey, with orders for that excellent officer, gen. Harrison, to repair immediately with his army to Sacket's Harbor, I remonstrated against his going off, as will be seen in a correspondence between the general and myself; but in vain. By which movement all my expectations were blasted, and I fore saw the consequences, unless a reinforcement was immediately sent on to supply the place of the drafted militia whose term of service would shortly expire. I considered my force which had become ungovernable, as then insufficient to go against the enemy. The object of the last expedition to the Twenty Mile Creek is fully explained in the general order which I issued on my return.

For six weeks before the militia were discharged I wrote, and continued writing, to the secretary at war the necessity of sending on a detachment of militia or regular troops; that I found it impossible to retain the militia in service one day beyond their term; I also stated, from the best information, the enemy's losses. I offered a bounty of two dollars per month, for one or two months, but without effect. Some few of col. Bloom's regiment took the bounty, and immediately disappeared, and I was compelled to grant a discharge to the militia and volunteers, which left me with about sixty effective regulars of the 24th U. S. infantry under captain Rodgers, to garrison Fort George. I summoned a council of the officers, and put the question—Is this fort tenable with its present number of men? They unanimously gave it as their opinion that it would be un-ness in the extreme to pretend to hold it and recommended its evacuation immediately, as the enemy's advance was then within eight miles. I accordingly gave orders for all the arms, ammunition and public stores of every description to be sent across the river, which was principally effected, though the enemy advanced so rapidly that ten of my men were made prisoners, and ordered the town of Newark to be burnt. This act, however distressing to the inhabitants and to my feelings, was by an order of the secretary at war, and I believe at the same time proper. The inhabitants had twelve hours notice to remove their effects and such as chose to come across the river, were provided with all the necessaries of life.

I left captain Leonard in the command of Fort Niagara with about 160 effective regulars, and pointed out verbally and particularly in a general order how he should prepare for an attack, which would certainly take place. I stationed Col. Griest's artillery, consisting of about 80 men with two pieces of artillery, at Lewiston, under the command of major Bennet and made them a present of four hundred dollars for volunteering their services for three weeks; but before that place was attacked they nearly all deserted, except the officers, who bravely defended themselves and cut their way through the savages. The Canadian volunteers, about 40 in number, under major Mallory, an officer of great merit, I stationed at Schloer, and went myself to Buffalo, to provide for the safety of that place and Mack Rock, which I trust is out of danger, having called out the militia of Niagara à mare.

The public are now in possession of some of the leading facts which have governed my conduct in the discharge of the trust assigned me, and I appeal to the candor of every dispassionate man to determine with what justice my feelings as a citizen, and pride as a soldier, have been wounded, and my character aspersed. If submission to the orders of superiors are justifiable, then possibly I may have failed in my defence. If to have suppressed the risings of mutiny is reprehensible, then also am I not justified. If to have enforced the disciplinary laws of a camp is a proceeding unwarranted, then have I been in error. But fellow citizens, I do not think so meanly of you, as to credit the monstrous supposition, that you will deliberately advocate such strange hypotheses. Your prejudices against me have been the result of feelings misled by the acts of my enemies, and not the result of your sober judgment, operating upon facts and principles. Those facts are now before you. On those facts, judge me in your candor and I will abide the decision.

GEO. M'CLURE.

The following is the correspondence which passed between Gen. M'Clure and Gen. Harrison, alluded to in the defence of General M'Clure.

From General M'Clure to General Harrison.

Fort George, Nov. 15, 1813.

DEAR SIR,

The subject of our conversation this morning has occupied my most serious reflections. The deadly blow heretofore given to the patriotism of our citizens on this frontier, has prepared them for murmurs and complaints; those who are now on their march, have left their homes and their business, under great sacrifices, with the moral certainty of being brought into action. The last address which I issued under your direction, and which I am happy to find has met your approbation, gives them reasons for indulging the expectation of service, and they are anxious to drive the enemy from their borders forever. The high character of General Harrison, combined with these circumstances, has excited strong interest in the public mind relative to our operations.

In this peculiar situation of affairs, I feel it to be due to the gallant volunteers and militia, who are assembled and collecting, and to my own reputation, most respectfully to solicit, that if it is not incompatible with your instructions and your better judgment, you will not abandon our projected expedition against Burlington Heights. Such is the anxious wish of the militia, and I have no doubt the soldiers under your command are equally if not more desirous of the employment.

My anxiety on the subject, I trust, will excuse the appearance of any disrespect in making this communication which certainly is far from my feelings. My confidence in the valor, ability and prudence of General Harrison, will dispose me most cheerfully to submit to any arrangement he may be bound to make, however great may be my disappointment in their result.

I have the honor to be, with the utmost respect your obt. servt.

GEO. M'CLURE.

Maj. Gen. Harrison.

Head-Quarters, Newark, Nov. 15, 1813.

DEAR SIR,

Your letter to me of this morning, has been received. I feel most severely the weight of the reasons which you urge for the prosecution of the intended expedition to Burlington. The disappointment, however, to the brave and patriotic men, who are turned out under the expectation of serving their country effectually in the field at this inclement season, is the most painful circumstance attending it; as I am well convinced of from the information received this morning, and last evening that the enemy are removing as fast as possible from the head of the lake to Kingston, which has been left with a very small part of the force that was lately there, and it is more than probable that should we advance in force, the enemy having him now—If they meet at Burlington, would destroy the stores which they have remaining there, and retreat too rapidly to be overtaken; there are considerations however, which I would make it extremely desirable to make an exhibition of force in that quarter, but the orders I have received from the secretary at war, leave me no alternative. Com. Chauncey is extremely pressing that the troops should immediately embark, declaring that the navigation at this season is so small vessels is very dangerous.—The force at Sacket's Harbor is—The troops at York are all hastening down to Kingston.—Sacket's Harbor may be endangered by even a delay of a few days, and should the troops that are here, not get down before the lake is frozen, our fleet may be destroyed for the want of their aid. I cannot therefore take upon myself the responsibility of delaying their going down even a day. Will you be so good at a proper time, as to explain the above circumstances to the patriots who left their homes with the intention of assisting me to drive the enemy far from our borders, and assure them that I shall ever recollect with the warmest gratitude, the partiality they have been pleased to express for me and their preference of serving under my command.

I will direct payment to be made to the volunteers for rations and forage in coming out.

Accept my best wishes for your health and happiness, and believe me sincerely your friend,

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

Gen. McClure.

Head-Quarters, Newark, Nov. 15, 1813.

DR. SIR—Being ordered to return to the westward, you will be pleased to resume the command, which you received previously to my arrival at this place. The orders which you heretofore have received will govern you. It will be necessary that you keep a vigilant eye over the disaffected part of the inhabitants, and I recommend that you make use of the zeal, activity and local knowledge which Col. Willcocks certainly possesses, to counteract the machinations of our enemy and ensure the confidence of our friends amongst the inhabitants. It will, however, I am persuaded, be your wish, as it is your duty, to guard the latter as much as possible from oppression.

The volunteers which were lately called out, will be retained as long as you consider their services necessary: the drafted militia, until further orders are received from the Secretary of War.

There can be little doubt of its being the intention of the enemy to send the greater part of the troops which they have at Burlington and York to Kingston, and to make York the right of their line. They may, however, have a small command at Burlington, and those may be so securely posted as to render them safe from any desultory expedition you may set on foot; but it is desirable to have any supplies which they may have collected at _____, in the neighborhood destroyed; and should the success below be not such as to promise possession of the whole of the Upper Province, _____ may be destroyed.

Capt. Leonard and Reed, or either of them, are appointed to muster your troops when and where you think proper.

In closing this communication, I should not do justice to my feelings, if I were not to acknowledge the zeal and talents with which you have managed your command. Your conduct appears to me to have been extremely judicious and proper throughout, and your troops exhibit a state of improvement and subordination which is at once honorable to your officers and themselves.

I am very sincerely, your friend and obedient servant,

WM. HENRY HARRISON.

Dr. Gen. Geo. McClure.

Fort George, Nov. 16, 1813.

MY DR. SIR—I cannot suffer you to depart from this post, without expressing to you the great satisfaction I have received from our intercourse, and my extreme regret that its continuance has been so short. You carry with you, sir, the highest esteem and the warmest admiration of every officer and soldier under my command who has had an opportunity of forming and acquaintance with you.

Your recommendation will meet with every attention and respect in my power, and I shall only regret, that you are not here yourself to execute them.

For the terms of appreciation you have been pleased to use in speaking of my conduct, I can tender you only my thanks.

With the warmest wishes for your health and prosperity, and that of your officers, with whom I have had the pleasure of an acquaintance, I remain, with the utmost respect, your friend and servant,

(Signed)

GEO. MCCLURE.

Major Gen. Wm. H. Harrison.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Head-Quarters, Newark, Nov. 30, 1813.

The general commanding feels it a duty due to himself and to his patriotic troops to develop to them his views and feelings, as regards their late excursion, and what may yet be expected from them. Those who have rendered willing obedience to orders, by turning out at this inclement season, and pursuing the march till it was deemed necessary to return, are entitled to the General's thanks, and what is a richer reward, the thanks of their country. The General cannot, however, withhold his censure from those, who, without cause, refused to join in the expedition, nor from those still more inexcusable who made a pretence of patriotism by going with him a part of the way and then deserting their ranks.

At this season of the year, it would have been rashness in the extreme to have attempted with ----- to dislodge twice our numbers from a strongly fortified position, which nature has rendered still more impregnable. Such was not the expectation of the General, nor of his principal officers. He never intended to expose the brave troops who went with him, to certain disaster, to have forfeited the security of our frontier inhabitants, and most probably lost the possession of Fort George, by attempting that which was under all circumstances physically impossible.—There were other objects in view, worthy the expedition, which the General trusts have been in part accomplished, one in particular not improper to mention.—The citizens of Canada, who look to us for protection, have seen once more that you are not afraid to march into the interior of their country; upwards of 400 lbs. flour have been secured at the Twenty Mile Creek and on this side; and it is nearly certain that the enemy have drawn up all their force from York to receive us, and consequently left Kingston the more liable to capture, should it be attempted by our northern army. It may not also at this time be improper to state, that Gen. P. B. Porter has been authorized to command an expedition against -----: it was, therefore, important that the attention of the British should be drawn off also from that quarter.

The General has no doubt the troops might have advanced farther with perfect safety, and it would have been his pride to have gone with them, had there been any advantage to gain by it, but there was none. 'Tis certain the roads were cut up in such a manner, and obstructed by fall in timber, that the cannon could not have been taken along. The enemy's force was increasing whilst ours was growing less. The opinions and advice of every colonel, and all the principal officers of the different regiments and corps, were reasons which imperatively bound the general to acquiesce in the necessity of returning.

The militia will soon be discharged. In the mean time they may yet have an opportunity of meeting the enemy on equal grounds. Be always prepared and ready to meet them; you will by that means strengthen your claims upon the gratitude of your country, by ably volunteering to defend a garrison which our regular army were at the point of evacuating and giving up to the British army without a struggle.

The general cannot conclude this order without addressing some words to the independent and enterprising volunteers who form a respectable part of his command; their promptitude in answering the call of their country, the willingness to be engaged in enterprises of the most dangerous description, the sacrifices they have made at the altar of patriotism, define the character of freemen and Americans, who will never shrink in the hour of danger, from doubling the standard which has been consecrated by the deeds of their forefathers. Although there are some, doubtless, whose business requires their immediate return to their homes, the general yet flatters himself there are many who will consent to remain on this frontier for a further term of service; the situation of this garrison will be truly precluded, if left to be defended by a small force. The general therefore invites the further cooperation for a short time, of all those whose domestic concerns are not too urgent a nature, in a cause which involves the security of their persons, the protection of their rights, and the honor of their country.

GEORGE MCCLURE,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Head-Quarters, Fort Niagara, Nov. 12, 1813.

Captain Leonard will, as soon as possible, have a proportion of handgrenades in different Block-houses, and give directions to the officers of the infantry where they should be posted with their men in case of an attack—and should they not be able to maintain the out-works, to repair to the Block and Mess-houses; and have every thing arranged in such a manner as though he expected an immediate attack.

Much is expected of Captain Leonard from his long experience and knowledge of duty; and the General feels confident he will be well supported by Captain Loomis of the Artillery, as well as the officers of the Infantry.

By order of Brig. Gen. GEORGE MCCLURE,

DONALD FRASER.

Lt. 15th U. S. Inf. and Vol. A. de Camp.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Head-Quarters, Fort Niagara, December 13, 1813.

The contractor will deposit in Fort Niagara, immediately, one month's provision for three hundred men, and keep good that Deposit. He will provide and issue at the following places:

At Leveiston, say for 200 men,

At Schlosser, - - - 200 men,

At Buffalo, - - - 1000 men, for one month.

The Commanding Officers at the different stations will sign returns.

By order of General MCCLURE,

JOHN A. ROGERS,

Capt. 24th Inf. act. Aid-de-Camp.

SIR,

To the Editor of the Buffalo Gazette.

Having heard from several sources illiberal and erroneous statements of the loss at Fort George when that post was abandoned and that great quantities of arms and ammunition were destroyed we consider it a duty we owe the commandant, General McClure, to undeceive the people and convince them of the measures that were pursued. The period for which the militia had been drafted having expired, the general held out every inducement in his power for them to remain but for a short time, he offered a bounty, but neither the love of country nor the shame of abandoning him when the enemy were advancing, could prevail on them to remain; in consequence of which he was left with about sixty effective men to maintain Fort George. The British knowing the period when the militia turn of service would expire, availed themselves of that moment to endeavor to retake the frontier, and advance from Burlington Heights.—The general called a council of the remainder of his officers, when it was unanimously agreed that the fort was not tenable with the small remaining force. All the public property of every description that was of any value, except three twelve pounders, which he had not sufficient physical force to carry away (and those were spiked, their carriages burnt, and buried in the ruins of the fort) was taken across the river to Fort Niagara—nor was there a musket left or a cartridge of powder more than was necessary to blow up the works. A considerable quantity of property, belonging to individuals friendly to us, was also taken across; and so near was the enemy, that eight or ten prisoners were taken in assisting them to get their property.

As it relates to the burning of the village of Newark, however disagreeable to the General, the act was not unauthorised, but at the same time he conceived it necessary for the protection of our front-ers, that the enemy might not have it in their power to quarter with their Indian allies in the village and maraud and murder our citizens.

Twelve hours notice was given to the few inhabitants that remained, to secure their household property, and every measure that could be taken to alleviate their situation was done; three or four houses were left for those that chose to remain, others who might wish to go across the river, the general ordered rations and quarters to be provided for. For their immediate protection, the general has ordered out, en masse, the militia of Niagara county.

JOHN A. RODGERS,
Capt. 24th U. S. Infantry.
JOHN WILSON,
Brig. Major of Militia.
DONALD FRAZER,
Lt. 13th Inf. V. A. D. C.

Buffalo, Dec. 18, 1813.

Copy of a letter from General McClure, of the New-York state troops, to the Secretary of War.

Head-Quarters, Buffalo, December 22d, 1813.

SIR—I regret to be under the necessity of announcing to you the mortifying intelligence of the loss of Fort Niagara. On the morning of the 19th inst. about 4 o'clock, the enemy crossed the river at the Five-mile Meadows in great force, consisting of regulars and Indians, who made their way undiscovered to the garrison which from the most correct information I can collect, was completely surpris'd. Our men were nearly all asleep in their tents; the enemy rushed in and commenced a most horrid slaughter. Such a success escaped the fury of the first onset, retired to the old mill-house, where they kept up a destructive fire on the enemy, until a want of ammunition compelled them to surrender. Although our force was very inferior and so comparatively small indeed, I am induced to think that the disaster is not attributable to any want of troops, but to gross neglect in the commanding officer of the fort, Capt. Leonard, in not preparing, being ready, and looking out for the expected attack.

I have not been able to ascertain correctly the number of killed and wounded. About twenty regulars have escap'd out of the fort—some badly wounded. Lt. Peck, 24th regt., is killed, and it is said three others.

You will perceive, sir, by the enclosed General Orders, that I apprehended an attack, and made the necessary arrangements to meet it, but have reason to believe, from information received by those who have made their escape, that the commandant did not in any respect comply with those orders.

On the same morning a detachment of militia, under Major Bennett, stationed at Lewistown Heights, was attacked by a party of savages, but the Major and his little corps, by making a desperate charge, effected their retreat after being surrounded by several hundred, with the loss of six or eight, who doubtless were killed; among whom were two sons of captain Jones, Indian interpreter. The villages of Youngstown, Lewistown, Manchester, and the Indian Tuscarora village, were reduced to ashes, and the inoffensive inhabitants who could not escape, were, without regard to age or sex, inhumanly butchered by savages headed by British officers painted. A British officer who is taken prisoner avows, that many small children were murdered by their Indians. Major Mallory, who was stationed at Schlosser, with about forty Canadian volunteers, advanced to Lewistown Heights, and engaged the advanced guard of the enemy to fall back to the foot of the mountain. The Major is a meritorious officer—he fought the enemy two days, and contended every inch of ground to the Tontarowny Creek. In these actions Lt. Lowe, 22d regt. U. S. army, and eight of the Canadian volunteers were killed. I and myself, three days previous to the attack on the Niagara, left it with the view of providing for the defence of this place, Black Rock, and the other villages on the frontier. I came here without troops, and have called out the militia of Genesee, Niagara and Chautauque counties en masse.

This place was then thought to be in most imminent danger, as well as the shipping, but I have no doubt is now perfectly secure. Volunteers are coming in in great numbers; they are, however, a species of troops that cannot be expected to continue in service for a long time. In a few days, one thousand detached militia, lately drafted, will be on.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE M. MCCLURE,
Brig. Gen. Commanding.

Hon. John Armstrong, Sec. of War.

[Here follows the general orders inserted above, dated at Fort Niagara, Dec. 12 and 13, directing captain Leonard to prepare himself for defence; and ordering the contractor to furnish supplies of provisions.]

Extract of a letter from Gen. McClure to the Secretary at War.

Batavia, Dec. 25, 1813.

"It is a notorious fact that the night on which Fort Niagara was captured, Captain Leonard left the Fort about 11 o'clock, P. M. I am assured that he has since given himself up to the enemy, and that he and his family are now on the Canadian side of the Strait."

Extract of a letter from Maj. Gen. Hall, commanding on the Niagara frontier, to his Ex. Gov. Livingston, dated Buffalo, Dec. 25, 1813.

"On my receiving information of the enemy's crossing the Niagara river, and taking the Fort, I immediately set off for that frontier. On my arrival at Batavia, I found a number of volunteers assembled. I carried there the day to forward them on to the frontier and made arrangements for those who should follow.

I this day arrived at Buffalo and assumed the command of the troops, being all volunteers, now on this station. The whole number here, at Lewistown, &c., may amount to 2000 of all descriptions. The enemy have made their appearance off Black Rock, and an invasion is to be expected. The troops now out can be kept out but a few days. Those called out on your Excellency's last requisition cannot arrive at this place till the middle or last of this week. The order did not reach me till the evening of the 19th inst.

"Our loss in the capture of Niagara has been immense. What number of brave men have been sacrificed, we have not been able to learn—it must have been great.

"Several inhabitants have been killed at Lewistown, &c., among whom it is not ascertained there are any women or children.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"AMOS HALL."

From the same to the same, dated "Head-Quarters, Niagara Frontiers, Dec. 30, 1813, 7 o'clock P. M. [Received by Express.]

SIR—I have only time to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th inst. and to add that this frontier is wholly desolate. The British crossed over, supported by a strong party of Indians, at a little before day this morning, near Black Rock—they were met by the militia under my command with spirit; but, overpowered by numbers and discipline of the enemy, the militia gave way and fled on every side; every attempt to rally them was ineffectual. The enemy's purpose was obtained, and the flourishing village of BUFFALO IS LAID IN RUINS. The Niagara frontier now lies open and naked to our enemies. Your judgment will direct you what is most proper in this emergency. I am exhausted with fatigue, and must defer particulars till to-morrow. Many valuable lives are lost.

"I have the honor, &c.

"A. HALL, Major General."

Extract of a letter from major-general James Wilkinson to the secretary of war dated French Mills, Nov. 20, 1813.

"I consider it an act of justice to inform you, that col. Walbach was most conspicuously and actively engaged in the affair of the 11th inst. from the beginning to the end of the action: his duty being general and performed on horseback, he was from right to left exposed to great danger, but fortunately escaped without a scratch; and at a critical turn of the action, contributed most essentially, I am assured, to save five pieces of artillery, by leading the dragoons to a partial charge."

A letter from the post-master at Warren, to J. Johnson, Esq. post-master at Pittsburg, dated Warren, Jan. 3, 1814, says,

"I am informed by the post-master at Lower Sandusky, a party of forty men commanded by lieuts. Larwell, Fish and Davis, who were sent by general Cass to reconnoitre on the river De Trench, were attacked by the British, three killed, two made their escape, and the rest taken prisoners."

NAVAL.

A New-York paper mentions that one hundred waggons had been put in requisition at Albany to convey naval stores to Sackett's Harbor. It is reported, the enemy has launched his large frigate at Kingston.

The schooner Rapid, being chased off the Mississippi, by the Herald sloop of war, unfortunately upset. The crew were picked up by the boats of the enemy's vessel, and treated—as they ought to be—as we would treat the enemy in the same circumstances. The case is noted with pleasure.

The Champlain flotilla is laid up in Otter creek, near Vergennes, Vermont, for the winter.

It appears that commodore Rodgers after leaving Newport, in the President frigate, must have passed within a very short distance of two 74's and five frigates, all which were looking for him. On this one of our editors wittily observes—

"How to cook a lamprey—first catch a lamprey."

Old Cook Book.

His Britannic majesty's schooner Pictou lately captured the schooner Jane of Cape Look Out, and "his majesty's officers" robbed the captain of every little article of private property, such as his watch, and the small sum in cash that he had with him. This is what the folks call "magnanimity."

The Essex.—We have some scraps of late news from the Essex, via Barbadoes. It appears she had made several recent captures.—The "British papers accuse captain Porter of seducing their sailors from allegiance; and say he carries a white flag at the mast head, on which is written in large letters, "FREEDOM AND SAILORS RIGHTS," by which means he gets his men." And seem to apprehend that he may raise a formidable fleet! The frigates La Ring and La Peque arrived at Barbadoes, December 1, after a fruitless cruize of six months for our little frigate. It does not appear that they captured one vessel.

Two Baltimore privateers are doing an active business in the neighborhood of Barbadoes. One of them has taken a hint from the enemy, and is ransoming many vessels.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

The enemy's business, since the last report, appears to have chiefly consisted in some petty plundering. Some days ago they landed on New Point Comfort (an island) and hoisted their flag on the top of the light house. They burnt the vault, where the oil was deposited, and after committing some other like heroic deeds, departed.

This vessel, on her voyage from the West Indies home, was captured by one of our privateers, re-captured by the enemy and sent into Halifax, where she paid salvage—sailing thence with her original cargo, she was taken by the Congress, happily afforded some important information to captain Smith, and has at length safely arrived, after being blown off the coast several times.

738. Schooner ———, from Martinique, laden with 120 hhds. molasses, sent into Charleston, by the Caroline of Baltimore. The prize has British and Swedish papers.

739. Brig Silena, captured by the revenge of Baltimore, and burnt.

Proceedings of Congress.

On Thursday the military committee reported a bill to fill the ranks of the army, by increasing the bounty on enlistments so as to amount to in the whole $100—25 on enlistment, 25 on mustering and joining some military corps, and 50 on being discharged, with a bounty of 520 acres of land. The term of service is 5 years. A determination exists to fill the ranks of the army—a bounty is provided specially for re-enlistments. After some amendments, the bill was reported to the house, and passed to a third reading. This looks like doing business.

Mr. Calhoun, as the Russian mediation was at end, offered a resolution requesting the president to lay before the house the papers connected therewith. We have neither time nor room for particulars.

Our usual history of the proceedings of congress is laid over for the present week to make room for articles of more interest; but the sketches for the last week shall be inserted in our next, that the chain may be preserved. Very little business has been done; and great part of the time was thrown away about Mr. Harrison's motion respecting Timrod's letter. On Monday, the first resolution (see page 298) was agreed to without a division, when Mr. H. offered a substitute for the second which went to raise a committee to enquire into the matter. This was opposed as being improper and indecorous, and cast out, 100 to 60. Mr. Roberts, on Wednesday, renewed Mr. H's original motion, which he and all the minority violently opposed—it however was carried by a large majority.

THE CHRONICLE.

Fire.—Several houses were destroyed at Brooklyn, (Long-Island, opposite the city of New-York) on Monday night, the 2d. inst. On the morning of the 5th, the elegant church called St. George's Chappel in New-York, with its superb organ, cloek and steeple, was consumed. The sight of the latter wrapt in flames was awfully grand: it fortunately fell in the body of the church. The fire commenced in a cabinet-maker's shop—and several other work-shops and dwellings were consumed. At Harrisburg, on the 24th December, ten or twelve buildings were consumed and others much injured. Another fire happened in New-York on the evening of the 8th, by which 8 or 10 houses were destroyed.

Mexico.—We have again cheering intelligence from Mexico. In the heart of that country there has for several years existed a sturdy band of armed patriots, maintaining the cause of freedom with various success. They have lately assumed a very imposing character—they have taken Acapulco, the first and most important port in the south sea—one of the armies is reported to consist of 70,000 men.

In South America, also, the work of liberty makes some progress. Caraacas, Caro and Santa Fe have republican governments; and *Carthagen*a has several active privateers at sea, capturing many valuable Spanish vessels.

Cundinamarca.—That portion of territory in South America, formerly known by the name of "New-Granada," has also changed its form of government, and is now known as the republic of Cundinamarca. The people have published a manifesto to the world, assuming self sovereignty. Great inducements are held out to emigrants.

Five thousand troops, from Spain, have arrived at Monte Video, to crush the patriots of Buenos Ayres.

We observe with pleasure that liberal subscriptions are raising in many of the eastern towns for the relief of the sufferers at Portsmouth, N. H.—The officers and crew of the Congress frigate contributed $700. Captain Hull has daily distributed 100lb. of beef, with a proportion of vegetables.—William Gray, esq. of Boston, has given $1000.

The inquisition in Spain and Portugal has dwindled down to a mere shadow. The religious orders from which the members of this once horrible tribunal were taken, are dissolved—they cannot any more congregate, but have to return to society on a per diem.

The ship Florentine, from London to Havanna, with a cargo valued at £150,000 sterling, was taken by a Carthagenian schooner privateer, and ordered for *Carthagen*a.

SPRINGFIELD, (Mass.) Dec. 23.

Wolves.—A few days since a large male wolf, killed within the limits of this town, was exhibited to the view of the people, and tendered to the town clerk for the legal bounty. The bitch wolf, his companion, has been seen several times, and it is said to be ascertained, than within a year the pair have destroyed in Ludlow, Granby and other towns in the vicinity, 150 sheep.—No man in town can recollect that within a half a century, this voracious and destructive animal has been seen within its bounds until now.

Paul Cuffe.

The following singular and rather interesting memorial, which was on Friday presented to congress, is published at the request of several subscribers, who probably feel an interest in the success of Mr. Cuffe's expedition. It is impossible to say what fate awaits it.

Nat. Int.

* This source of revenue will last many years, for some will prefer paying the interest rather than extinguish the principal—but if they should, the monies will be applied to other productive sources.

To the president, senate, and house of representatives of the United States of America.

The memorial and petition of Paul Cuffe, of Westport, in the state of Massachusetts, respectfully sheweth, that your memorialist actuated by motives which he conceives are dictated by that philanthropy which is the offspring of Christian benevolence, is induced to ask the patronage of the government of the United States, in affording aid in execution of a plan, which he cherishes a hope may ultimately prove beneficial to his brethren of the African race within their native climate.

In order to give a complete view of the object in contemplation, it may not be considered trespassing too much on your time to premise some of the leading circumstances which have led to the present application. Your memorialist, being a descendant of Africa, and early instructed in habits of sobriety and industry has gratefully to acknowledge the many favors of a bountiful Providence, both in preserving him from many of the evils which the people of his colour too often have fallen into, and also, by blessing his industry with such a portion of the comforts of life as to enable him in some degree not only to commiserate, but to relieve the sufferings of his fellow creatures, and having early found implanted in his heart the principles of equity and justice, he could but view the practice of his brethren of the African race in selling their fellow creatures into a state of slavery for life as very inconsistent with that Divine principle; and in his mature age, having been greatly interested in the abundant labor of many pious individuals, both in this country and in England to produce a termination of the wrongs of Africa, by prohibiting the slave trade, and also to improve the condition of the degraded inhabitants of the land of his ancestors, he conceived it a duty incumbent upon him, as a faithful steward of the mercies he had received, to give up a portion of his time and his property in visiting that country, and affording such means as might be in his power to promote the improvement and civilization of the Africans.

Under these impressions he left his family, and with a sacrifice of both time and money visited Sierra Leona, and there gained such information of the country and its inhabitants as enabled him to form an opinion of many improvements that appeared to him essential to the well being of that people. These he had an opportunity of communicating to several distinguished members of the royal African institution in London, and he had the satisfaction at that time to find that his recommendations were approved by the celebrated philanthropists the duke of Gloucester, William Wilberforce, Thomas Clarkson, William Allen and others, and has since learned that the institution have so far acceded to his plans, as to make some special provision to carry them into effect. One of these objects was to keep up an intercourse with the free people of color in the United States, in the expectation that some persons of reputation would feel sufficiently interested to visit Africa, and endeavor to promote habits of industry, sobriety and frugality, among the natives of that country.

These views having been communicated by your petitioner to the free people of color in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston, they, with a zeal becoming so important a concern have manifested a disposition to promote so laudable an undertaking, and several families whose characters promise usefulness, have come to a conclusion if proper ways could be opened to go to Africa, in order to give their aid in promoting the objects already adverted to. Your petitioner, still animated with a sincere désire of making the knowledge he has acquired, and the sacrifices he has already made, more permanently useful in promoting the civilization of Africa, solicits your aid so far as to grant permission that a vessel may be employed (if liberty can also be obtained from the British government) between this country and Sierra Leona, to transport such persons and families as may be inclined to go, as also, some articles of provision, together with implements of husbandry, and machinery for some mechanic arts and to bring back such of the native productions of that country as may be wanted.

For although pecuniary profit does not enter into calculation in the object in contemplation, nor does it afford any very promising prospects, yet without a little aid from the trifling commerce of that country, the expense would fall too heavy on your petitioner, and those of his friends who feel disposed to patronize the undertaking. Your petitioner therefore craves the attention of congress to a concern which appears to him very important to a portion of his fellow creatures who have been long excluded from the common advantages of civilized life, and prays that they will afford him and his friends such aid as they in their wisdom may think best.

With much respect, I am, your assured friend,
PAUL CUFFE.

Westport, 6th month, 1813.

Internal Navigation.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met—

The memorial of the subscribers, citizens of that part of the state which is watered by the Alleghany river, French Creek, Lake Erie, and their tributary waters,

Respectfully sheweth,

That among the various objects which originally invited your memorialists to settle and reside in this new and remote part of the state, one which they have always deemed of primary importance, is the advantage of an extensive communication by water in various directions, the only means by which the remote parts of an interior country can be rendered either important to the interests of those parts situate nearer the sea coast or comfortable and convenient to themselves, in the dependent condition of man upon his fellow men, in the social and civilized state.

The great importance of such water communication, and the flattering prospect of finding it capable of being improved to a high degree of perfection, in this section of the state, seems to have been in the early contemplation of those intrusted with the immediate care and charge of its interests. The triangular tract which includes the valuable harbor of Presqu'isle, was purchased with a view chiefly, if not exclusively to obtain this harbor, and to connect by an easy communication, the commerce of the lakes with that of this state by French creek and the Alleghany river.

Your memorialists on becoming acquainted with these waters discerned at once the provident wisdom of their early legislators, and a field for the exercise of the present and future enterprize of the state.—By their admirable situation and connection, as well as the excellence of their channels, present convenience and advantage are experienced, the hand of improvement invited, and the reward of such exertions brought clearly to view.

An improvement in French creek, sufficient to render its navigation as certain as that of the Alleghany river, is alone wanting to afford an uninterrupted communication between New Orleans and Quebec—between the two immense waters, the Mississippi and its tributary streams and the St. Lawrence, and great lakes; a communication of many thousand miles in extent, embracing every climate with all the various productions of the American continent.

To draw such a commerce through a part of Pennsylvania, is evidently an object worthy the high character of this state; but the events of the present period point out to your memorialists with peculiar force, the expediency of our early exertion for the purpose of embracing the first and whole of the advantages to be derived to this state, from such a mean of intercourse.

It is reasonably to be expected that as a consequence of the existing war with Great Britain, our national government will shortly gain possession of all the territory bordering upon the opposite shores of the St. Lawrence and the lakes. Upon this expectation being realized, and even pending the military operations by which it is to be effected, the objects of a commercial intercourse, through the proposed channel, will be extensive, various and increasing. Besides the supplies of military and naval stores, and provisions required by the United States, a great portion of which are produced in this state, and would alone form an object of great and mutual usefulness between the citizens of this state and of the United States; the extensive and lucrative fur trade of the north-west must immediately change its direction, coming wholly into the United States, and all supplies of merchandize lately carried into the extensive region in question, through channels exclusively occupied by Great Britain, must now be supplied by the United States. These, with the supplies of salt for a great part of the western section of Pennsylvania, where an excessive dearth of that essential article is now experienced in consequence of the late interruption of supply by the northern waters, form in the aggregate an immense amount in tonnage and commercial intercourse, which would immediately flow through this part of Pennsylvania by French creek, if improved to a state sufficient to insure a boat navigation at all times during the summer season. The objects of a less immediate but more extensive commerce through the same channel, are the mineral productions, especially copper, of Lake Superior, and the agricultural productions, which no doubt must rapidly and progressively increase to an incalculable extent with the increase of population and demand for articles produced in older settlements. Such rapid increase of population, productions and demand, is fairly and reasonably to be calculated upon in the great extent of territory bordering upon the three great lakes Erie, Huron and Michigan, within favorable climates, a soil invariably good, and the extent of coast more than two thousand miles.

These views are drawn from self evident principles and facts of notoriety and it is believed are alone sufficient to demonstrate the signal importance of a safe and uninterrupted transportation on French creek. But the subject still derives additional interest and importance when considered in connection with other projects of improvement for the benefit of interior intercourse in this and other states. The great turnpike road already authorised by law from Northumberland to lake Erie, would derive its chief importance from the articles of return transport which must be carried by French creek to its intersection with this road, the same would be the effect in transporting iron and other heavy articles from east to west; many articles might bear a light transportation as far west as the Alleghany river, and from thence to lake Erie by water, which would not bear the land transportation the whole distance.

The future improvement, also of which the west branch of the Susquehanna is undoubtedly capable, must be contemplated as important in establishing the mean of rendering permanent an advantageous competition on the part of this state, with any other route of communication that may be opened by any of our sister states.

Such are the advantages within the reach of this state, but to secure them, your memorialists deem an early activity highly necessary. Other routes, both to the westward, the eastward and southward, will be improved with alacrity. Already is the state of Ohio alive to this subject; her citizens will not fail to exert a great degree of enterprize to effect improvements upon the Cayahuga and Muskingum; Sandusky, Scioto and Miami, with a view to an easy transport to the Ohio, and by that river and Monongahela, to meet the great Cumberland turnpike at Brownsville.

Already has the state of New York a turnpike road extending from the tide water of the north river to Genessee; with a lock navigation in the Mohawk river and Wood creek, with projects of improvements in Oswego river, &c. Already are both the states of Maryland and Virginia, bent upon the improvement of the Potomac to Fort Cumberland, notwithstanding the formidable appearance of the task, in a water having a fall more than 750 feet.

These states are also actively engaged in carrying turnpike roads in the same direction, determined by land or water, or both, to meet the United States turnpike road at Cumberland, and consequently the whole commerce of the lakes, in case the neglect of Pennsylvania should permit the states of Ohio and New York, a preference in this transportation.

Your memorialists will only add a few observations as to the practicability of the proposed improvement; they believe the aggregate descent of all the ripples in French creek requiring improvement, would not exceed 50 feet, which are divided into six or seven ripples or rather shoals of not more than 4 or 5 each, chiefly over a bottom of pebble or loose stones; and floods in this creek are never so high as in the Potomac, the Susquehanna, Monongahela or many other streams, and at these rapids never exceeding eight feet.

The navigation of French creek in its present state is generally used during most of the spring and fall months; and your memorialists doubt not would be found on a survey by an experienced engineer, to be susceptible of improvement for a sum of $20,000, which would render its navigation certain at all times from the first of April to the last of November; and for a less sum might be greatly improved, though in a degree less perfect and permanent.

The sum of $20,000, in the estimation of your memorialists, is small when compared with the magnitude and importance of the object—an object which they are convinced many of the states would not lose, if to be secured for one nation. The improvement contemplated in the Potomac is estimated to cost nearly or quite that sum: that in the Mohawk has already cost $160,000, and still that river is inferior to French creek in its present state.

Without the proposed improvement, however, the advantage of a communication by French creek must be lost, being liable to frequent interruption by high and low water in the best season, and generally interrupted during the three summer months.

Your memorialists have to observe further, that improvements on certain parts of the roads communicating with French creek, are much wanted, to which the resources of the local inhabitants are altogether inadequate, and at the same time highly important, particularly a part of the road from the town of Mercer to Meadville, and a part of that between the latter and the town of Waterford.

By a proper application of the sum of $20,000, your memorialists have no doubt, all these valuable improvements may be so far completed as to ensure to this state the great advantages which have been adverted to.

Recommending these subjects to the early care and attention of the legislature, your memorialists will pray, &c.

Mr. Giles' Letters.

Observations by a correspondent of the Virginia Argus.

In No. II, of Mr. Giles' Address, he has shewn how a man of ability may plausibly pervert the plainest question, and lead the public mind to a wrong conception of political principles. He has furnished, also, additional proof that a writer with a name, is not in the least inferior to a writer without one, in framing ingenious disguises for false doctrines. This sort of ingenuity, however, may be tolerated, because, being expressed, and perceptible to reflecting men, it is susceptible of counteraction. But what I think altogether unjustifiable on the part of this elevated Senator, is his most unaccountable resort to insinuation. Of all the modes of conducting a controversy, that of insinuation is the most disingenuous; for as, in such a case, nothing is stated, the judgment is evaded, and the imagination, that great field of human errors, is left to infer, at random, whatsoever of evil may suggest itself. Of this character is the introductory passage of Mr. Giles' No. II, where he says "I shall purposely overlook all the precedents, which took place directly between the President, and the committee thus appointed, from this date, till the 6th of July following, when the message of the President, denouncing the proposed conference, was laid before the Senate, because, although those incidents might give rise to some commentaries, which might be captivating to some minds, yet they probably would be of an unpleasant nature, and if even good advantages might be derived from them, I should cheerfully dispense with them, rather than risk the hazard of unintentionally wounding the President's feelings. It is my sole object, to place this subject upon its own intrinsic merits; detached from all incidental considerations." By this passage the reader is led to conclude, that Mr. Giles knows something which passed between the President and the senatorial committee, that might assist his argument; but that, out of delicacy to the Executive, and to prevent the malice of Mr. Madison's enemies, he will not reveal it. The reader, of course, is left to his conjectures. And it is manifest that the exalted Senator has thereby afforded more scope to malicious politicians, than if he had actually proclaimed what he pretends to be acquainted with. If real delicacy in relation to the President's feelings was his governing motive, why did he advert to confidential circumstances at all? why does he sharpen curiosity by anonymous hints, calculated to foment ill nature? Had Mr. Giles frankly disclosed whatever it is that he alludes to, he might have been met, and in all probability rebuffed. As it is, he has made an insinuation, without asserting a fact; a mode of discussion which does not in the least correspond with the professions in his No. I, where he represents it to be his intention to remove anonymous disguises, and to develop the truth for posterity! I leave it to the consideration of my fellow citizens, whether a writer, who deals in this manner with Mr. Madison, can be his friend; and whether the appearance of reserve in the quoted passage, does not partake more of craftiness than of sincerity; seeing that whilst it afflicts to south asperity, it instils a subtle poison, which must act corrosively against its object? It may, for ought I know, be improper for anonymous writers to intermeddle with political concerns, or with the characters of our public agents. But I am confident it is more favorable to truth, to suppress the names of those who comment upon public events, than it is to substitute insinuation for fact, even with a name, the most distinguished.*

Having thus occupied the most distinguished, Mr. Giles proceeds to reduce the better faculties of the understanding. In this attempt at intellectual seduction, he insists that there is no constitutional inhibition of a conference between the President and the Senate; that the course of conduct adopted by the Senate upon nominations is variable, and that the quality of co-ordination between the President and Senate is the very reason why a free conference is proper, they being in that respect, perfectly equal; all which ab-

* One might be induced to suppose, from the style of Mr. Giles' address, that he had been lately amusing himself with the "School for Secedists." The following brief extract from that dramatic piece will show, that he has in fact fixed upon the character of Mrs. Candor.

"Lady Trache. What's the matter, Mrs. Candor?"

Mrs. Candor. Why they are censorious, they won't allow our friend, Miss Vermillion, to be handsome.

Lady Trache. Oh, surely she's a pretty woman.

Croby. I'm glad you think so.

Mrs. Candor. She has a charming fresh color.

L. Trach. Yes, when it's fresh put on.

Mrs. Candor. Well, I'll swear 'tis natural, for I've seen it come and go.

L. Trach. Yes, it comes at night and goes in the morning."

It will be observed, that Mrs. Candor does not exactly say ill-natured things herself; she only gives occasion to others to say them.

legations may be quietly admitted, without the slightest objection, if they do not at all affect the point in dispute, which is the mode of conference, and not the conference itself. This will be seen by reference to the President's message to the Senate of the 6th of July. In that message he says, "If the Senate wish information previous to their final decision, the practice, keeping in view the constitutional relation of the Senate and Executive, has been, either to require the Executive to furnish it, or to refer the subject to a committee of their body to communicate, either formally or informally, with the head of the proper department." I have already shewn that "information" relates to opinions as well as to facts; and that the President proposed, through a committee on his part, to meet the committee of the Senate, for the purpose of conferring together, and of furnishing those considerations respecting the nomination of Mr. Russell, which it was the object of the Senate to ascertain. In refusing to meet the Executive committee, the committee of the Senate voluntarily abandoned the pursuit of that knowledge which Mr. Giles contends was so essential to determine the senatorial votes, and thereby asserted an equality between three members of the Senate and the President of the United States, in relation to appointments to office. To prove this equality, the critical senator labors with infinite minuteness, and endeavors to persuade us, that there is a difference between the managers of a conference and a committee to manage a conference! For myself, I am totally at a loss to comprehend where this difference lies. A committee, as I understand the word, is one or more men to whom any business is committed, which business is, by such committee, to be managed, or effected: And managers are, in like manner, persons who are appointed to do any business assigned to them. By whatever name they are called, their function is the same. There is therefore, no inaccuracy whatever in the President's using the word committee, as it is completely descriptive of those to whom it is applied. But Mr. Giles is, unquestionably, a man of exceedingly great powers of discrimination; for we find him still adhering to his own explanation of the term "information," accusing the Executive of dullness, in overlooking obvious differences. The President seems (says M. G.) not sufficiently to have appreciated the distinction, between a conference, and a call for information, although the "distinction seems obvious." Surely a man of common sense might here pause, widely open his eyes, and wonder, without the imputation of idocy. If all the conferences, have the same end in view, to wit: "information," what distinction is there between them, except in the method of obtaining it, and thus the President expressly indicates, in his message of July 6, may be, "either to request the Executive to furnish it," which would be a call by resolution; or "to refer the subject to a committee of the Senate to communicate, either formally or informally, with the head of the proper department," which might be done by letter, or by personal interview or conference. Indeed, in whatever way Mr. Giles pursues his argument, he invariably falls at the principal point of issue, namely, whether a committee of the Senate is competent, or agent, to refer, in a conference, in the case of appointments to office? Any, like myself, who works up hill, with a huge absurdity, which, as he gains the summit, being unable to fix, escapes his grasp, and compels him to renew the task. I readily confess that I am assuaged of this verbal criticism; but the honorable Senator compels me to it.

To these frivolities, however, Mr. Giles adds some thing of a bolder cast. In the technical phraseology of the Law, he pretends that the Senate can, quo ad hoc, or for certain inchoate purposes, clothe a committee of that body with all the attributes of the Senate itself. To prove this, he quotes certain parts of the journal of the Senate of the United States, and all-goes a custom in the legislature of Virginia, of adjourning, whenever a conference is carried on between committees of its two branches. But I will ask Mr. Giles this: Does not each house of Congress, and each house of the General Assembly of Virginia, always exercise over their committees, or managers, the power of accepting or rejecting the report which they make concerning such conference? This is evident, in the case of the Senate, from whose journal of proceedings he has published extracts, by which it appears, that on the report of the managers, it was resolved, that the Senate enter in the report of the conferences; or otherwise. The same course is uniformly followed by each house of the General Assembly of Virginia. If, then, the Senate exercises, as it will not be denied that it does, a controlling authority over the proceedings of such committees, or managers, how can it be said they are for inchoate purposes, or quo ad hoc, clothed with the entire attributes of the Senate? If they are equal to the Senate in any thing, then in that thing the Senate cannot check them; because, if it could, it would be the Senate, quo ad hoc, checking the Senate; which would be ridiculous, and past all reason. We read in Swift's tale of a Tub, of my lord Peter wishing to persuade his brethren that all kinds of good meats were contained in simple bread; but never before now, I apprehend, did any one undertake to shew a Senatorial committee could be inspired with the whole authority of the Senate itself, for any object in which a co-ordinate branch of the government was concerned. There could, in fact, be no mode of infusing such great power into a committee, unless it were by a previous resolution of the whole body of the Senate, specifying that the Senate would be bound by what the committee might or might not do. This I believe is never done; and certainly was not done in the case before me.

Now, then, we come to the merits of the question. A committee of the Senate is appointed to confer with the President in person. Suppose the President assents to the conference, what is the consequence? The President, speaking as the entire executive branch, is bound by what he says, unless he retracts and runs into inconsistencies; and the Senatorial committee do not bind the Senate at all; for after their report of the conference, the Senate decides just which way it pleases. And, after getting out of the Executive his sentiments, if it decides against him, the effect of such vote is a simple pass upon the President's understanding (thus degrading him below the Senate, with which he is, by the constitution, made co-ordinate; in other words, equal. Take the course, however, which the Executive proposed, and the difficulty and degradation vanish. Mr. Monroe, the Secretary of State, being appointed the President's committee, would have met the committee of the Senate upon proper terms: one committee would not, in that event, have been more bound than the other; each would have reported to the principal, respectively; the Senate would have procured the information it wanted; and the co-ordination of the two branches of the government would have been preserved. I flatter myself, if that this exposition of constitutional doctrine is a little more solid, and somewhat more rational, than that of the honorable Senator.

But here Mr. Giles sets up another objection. He argues that the Secretary of State is not a constituent part of the Executive department of government, as the committee met of the Senate, are a constituent part of that body; and he even traces this portion of his argument so far, as to place the head of the department of State on a par with the Secretary of the Senate! I fancy he is the only one that thinks so. He will not find the same class of men occupying both stations. Such a comparison has no significance. Do you find Jeffersons; Madisons, or Monroes, acting as Secretaries of the Senate? I in an no disrespect to that body; I wish not to wound the feelings of any individual.—It is Mr. Giles who forces these allusions from me. The situation of Secretary of the Senate is truly respectable. But the individual that once occupies that post, is not very likely to gain the first chair in the foreign office. I propose to shew, with seriousness, that the celebrated Senator of Virginia is mistaken on this subject.

By the first paragraph, of the second section of the second art. of the constitution of the U. S. the President "may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of the respective offices." The Department of State is one; and the chief of that Department, the Secretary of State is, of course, a principal executive officer, recognized by the words of the constitution, who is opinion upon the affairs of his department. The President may require, in writing, for what purpose? Certainly to enlighten his understanding. What are the Secretary of State's duties? To superintend all business of a foreign or domestic diplomatic or other nature confided to him by the laws and by the President. In relation to any of this business, his opinions—not mere facts—are held in view by the constitution as essential to the President. In this particular, then, the constitution indicates the Secretary of State as a participator in Executive deliberations; and, if the President may require his opinions in writings, he may, by stronger reason, require them verbally. From this grows up what is called the cabinet. Its utility is obvious. Each secretary brings into Council his own reflections; an interchange of sentiments and opinions take place, and the nation is thus benefited by a wider range of intelligence. Hence it is manifest, that the Secretary of State is an eminent constitutional organ; and although not co-ordinate with the President, is undoubtedly a participator in the duties of the Senate. For what is a committee of the Senate? It is a body in which, recognized by the power vested in the Senate to determine the rules of its proceedings, a committee of the Senate is, in truth, only the creature of the Senate, without assigned or independent authority of any kind, and deriving its importance as well as its very existence from the Senate itself. The Secretary of State, on the contrary, has duties assigned him as Secretary of State, by law. So perfectly is he identified as a part of the Executive; that Congress, in legislating, frequently assigns him business, peculiar to his department, in express terms without committing the President. A committee of the Senate has no power to bind any thing, in Senate or out of it, by vote or resolution: But the Secretary of State, by a letter under his seal, is understood to bind the President. Thus quo ad his functions, he is a constituent part of the executive; much more so than a committee of the Senate; for he is authorized by the constitution, acknowledged by the laws, and known, in certain circumstances, in the government, as an independent co-ordinate of the presidential administration. Mr. Giles, as yet, he confesses, that as the executive is an individual, he is indivisible, and cannot clothe the Secretary of State, in form of a committee, with his executive attributes. Having distinctly shewn that the Senate cannot transpire their entire attributes into a committee of their own, and having likewise demonstrated that although the Secretary of State is not co-ordinate with the President, yet, that he is superior to a committee of the Senate, I might be allowed to pass by this objection, as frivolous with respect to the question before me. But I do not seek indolence; and I presume Mr. Giles does not ask to be spared. Physically speaking, assuredly the President is not divisible; that is, you cannot split him in two, or cut off a member, so that one part of his body shall act as President, and the other as his committee; And it is as certain, still physically speaking, that the Senate can be divided, one part acting as a committee to the other, on account of its consisting of many individuals. It is not, however, the physical, but the political composition that is in question. Physically speaking, the Senate is an individual as well as the President is. A majority of votes, expressive of the majority of opinions, is the will of the Senate; and the force of the opinions which the President derives from his Secretary of State, or verbally, together with his own determines the will of the Executive. It may be said, if you take away the Secretaries, a perfect President will bind Executive power still remains. So, I say, take away the committee of the senate, and the senate itself, with full power, still remains. This is well exemplified in practice; as, notwithstanding what Mr. Giles alleges takes place in the general assembly of Virginia when conferences between committees are going on, it is notorious that the conferences of committees of the two houses of congress do not at all interrupt the progress of business in either branch of that body.

As the Secretary of State is superior to a committee of the Senate, so is he superior to the Secretary of the Senate.—The Secretary of the Senate is the mere recorder of the votes and resolutions of that body; he originates nothing; he suggests no line of proceeding; he drafts no resolutions; he is simply a passive agent. The Secretary of State originates, and does not record; he suggests and sometimes acts, from a general knowledge of the President's sentiments, upon his own responsibility; the President does not order him; he can ultimatum. Further, the Secretary of the Senate is appointed by the Senate alone, and is not an officer of the government generally; the Secretary of State is appointed by the President and Senate, and is a Secretary in his province, for all branches. These are essential, and very distinguished differences.—There are others, which will readily occur to the reader. He parallels to be run with the Secretary of the Senate, may be found in the President's private Secretary; which, in every point of view, is equally respectable.

If it shall be thought that I have, in the preceding observations, refuted the reasoning of Mr. Giles; that is to say, it shall be thought that I have shown that the mode of conferring, by committees, between the two houses of Congress, which Mr. Giles confesses is the practice, is as the president alleges, a mode, which from analogy, applies to conferences between the Executive and Senate; and if I have also shown that the Secretary of State, as the committee of the President, was co-ordinate or superior to the committee of the Senate, for the purposes of such confer- nces as I think I have; then must the public decide at once against Mr. Giles and in favor of Mr. Madison. Because the President, before he drew the distinction between the Senate, and a committee of the Senate, in his message to that body of the 6th of July, wishing, as it were, not to excite unpleasant altercation, did,—not as Mr. Giles asserts, "permit his Secretary of State to propose, in his stead, to confer with a committee of the Senate;"—but positively authorized him to do so; as will appear by the following short note, which considering Mr. Giles's fondness for copious quotations of authentic documents, it is very surprising he wholly omitted to insert in any part of his address on the subject to which it relates:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
June 23d, 1813,

GENTLEMEN,

The indisposition of the President continuing, I am instructed by him, to express to you his great regret at the delay, to which it has already subjected the proceedings of the Senate on the nomination of a minister plenipotentiary from the United States to Sweden. To prevent any further delay, from that cause, he has authorized me to confer with you on that subject, and to communicate to you ANY INFORMATION which you may be desirous of obtaining from the Executive relating to it. I will have the honor to meet you for this purpose, at such place, and hour, as you will have the goodness to appoint.

(Signed)

JAS. MONROE.

The Honorable

Messrs. Wells, Giles and King.

It is to be observed, that the information proffered by the Secretary of State, in the name of the President, was not confined to facts; but included "any information," and not only such information as the Secretary of State could give, as Secretary of State, but "any information" which the committee were "desirous of obtaining from the executive." There was, consequently, no restriction on the part of the President. And it is the most extraordinary thing in the world that Mr. Giles, the luminous, the penetrating, the critical Mr. Giles, should undertake to aver, with this very note of Mr. Monroe's written in his reach (for it was published among the other executive proceedings of the Senate on Mr. Russel's nomination) that "the President has deemed it his duty to decline the overture of the Senate for a conference, and thus deny all intermediate interchange of opinion with the Senate upon executive propositions." So he from this being the fact, it was the committee of the Senate that declined this being the fact, it was the committee of the Senate that declined to confer, assuming a mistaken equality with the President himself, (as if a part of the Senate were equal to the whole) and pretending to a higher standing than the Secretary of State, to whom the committee is, in view of the constitution and laws, actually subordinate. In proof of this, I here introduce the answer of the committee to Monroe, which Mr. Giles has likewise omitted:

COMMITTEE ROOM, 24th June, 1813.

SIR,

The committee of the Senate, appointed to confer respectively with the President of the United States on the nomination made by him of a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden, have had the honor this morning to receive your letter of yesterday.

The committee, being with equal concern of the great indisposition of the President; but as they presume there are connected with this nomination no considerations of so urgent a nature as to require an immediate decision upon it, they will wait with pleasure for the conference they have been ordered by the Senate to request of the President, until the restoration of his health takes place.

WM. HILL WELLS,

Chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Mr. Russel's nomination.

The Hon. JAMES MONROE,

Secretary of State.

It may be here very pertinently asked, who exhibited the most temper-modulating spirit; who stood out upon formal etiquette? It must be answered, the Senate. It would rarely seem that the object of the Senate was not information, concerning facts or opinions; that, they might have received from the Secretary of State. It was the President himself the committee wanted to get at; and because he would not admit that these members of the Senate were equal to the entire body, and co-ordinate with himself, the Senate wilfully voted without the knowledge that was tendered to it. Suppose the Executive were to attempt to act in this manner with the Senate: Suppose he were to send a committee (which he has as much right to do as the Senate) to the Senatorial chamber, to demand a conference, in Senate. Would it be granted? Would the Senate not consider it as an attempt to encroach upon its dignity? Mr. Giles has taken care to secure the Senate from such an outrage by alleging the indivisibility to the Executive. The President always communicates with the Senate in writing; He never attempts to lessen its dignity by sending committees to confer with it in full session. The mode of inter-communication by writing appears all so, by what Mr. Giles says in a note to his No. 11, to have been determined on as the best by General Washington, after he had tried the method of personal conference by attending in the Senate. Such attendance could not but have been accompanied by a violation of the spirit of the constitution, which intended the President and Senate, in regard to nominations, to be checks on each other. If the President were to attend the Senate, or the Senate to attend the President, (which, in effect, would be the same thing,) the Senate could not speak with freedom on nominations without frequently insulting the President's feelings. And moreover, such attendance, would go to subvert the form of our government quo ad hoc: It would go to convert the Senate and President, from two separate and independent branches, as designed by the constitution, into a single divan, or assembly, for making appointments to office. Throughout the whole of Mr. Giles's No. 11 there is a strain of reasoning, which vindicates the intermeddling of the Senate in Executive affairs. He speaks of an "interchange of opinions" between the two, after the President has acted and before the Senate has voted on nominations. What would be the consequence of such interchange? The President, having taken his ground, would naturally insist on his man, and the Senate must either acquiesce, or enter into an altercation with the President: Or, if the President gave way, then the Senate would virtually partake of the power of nomination in addition to the exercise of the power of approval; a case not at all contemplated by the constitution. Besides, to what businessings, and restatements, and private promises might these accords, unmade, unmade, unmade lead? The President, on some occasion, corrupt the senators, or the senators, corrupt the President; and being, by such means, practically identified as one body would certainly be an overmatch for the House of Representatives, and thus establish an odious oligarchy, in the room of present happy system of checks and balances. On the whole, the stand which the President took, appears to mark, with appropriate distinction, the limit of executive and senatorial intimacy; and for taking that stand, and maintaining it, I as an American citizen, most heartily thank him.

Legislature of Massachusetts.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

Our meeting at this time will excite the mournful reflection that we have lost a most able and useful magistrate by the death of the late chief justice.—His pre-eminent talents as a lawyer, and his inflexible uprightness as a judge, were acknowledged by all that knew him. But to you, gentlemen, the commemoration of his attainments and services will be unnecessary—the regret of the public, and the unfeigned grief of his friends and acquaintances, accompanied him to the grave. May the members of that profession to which he was so illustrious an ornament, do honor to his example and memory, by imitating his virtues.

Since your former session, I have received fifteen hundred stands of arms, which were delivered by order of the secretary of war, conformably to the act of congress, making provision for arming the militia of the United States. The arms have been deposited in the public arsenal at Cambridge, and are ready for distribution, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the legislature. Pieces of ordnance and other suitable munitions of war, have been sent to those towns on the coast, which were thought most exposed; and a number of small arms have also been distributed, which had been purchased by virtue of the resolve of the 27th of February last. An account of the measures taken by the executive under the resolve of the sixteenth of June, and the annual return, by the adjutant-general, of the militia of this state, will be laid before you.

The court of common pleas for the middle cir cuit has made a representation to the governor and council, that the security, which the law requires of coroners, was, in some instances, given a long time since—that their sureties may be dead or have become insolvent: and that in actions of replevin against sheriffs for large quantities of goods, and in many other cases, the public are not secure: And that the courts of common pleas have no authority by law to require coroners to give new security when the former has become insufficient. As the legislature can provide the most convenient and effectual remedy in this case, the council advised me to transmit the above representation to the two houses.

The right of fully investigating political subjects, and of freely expressing our sentiments in relation to them, is secured to us by our constitutions, and is essential to the public safety and the preservation of a free government: Without the exercise of this right, the most oppressive laws would not be repealed, nor the most grievous abuses reformed; and whoever attempts to invalidate this privilege, whatever name he assumes, is not a friend to republican liberty.

When the government of a nation engages in a war that is unjust and unnecessary, the people are bound, notwithstanding, to submit to the laws which are enacted agreeable to the constitution, and are justified in defending themselves against hostile invasion. If they do nothing more, the government alone is answerable for all the sufferings endured or inflicted. But though, at the first view, almost every man is shocked with the idea of war, as a violation of the obvious principles of humanity; yet there is danger, that, from the continuance of it, or from selfish considerations, a sense of justice and the influence of moral principles will be lost among the people. In the tumult of arms the passions of men are easily inflamed by artful misrepresentations—they are apt to lose sight of the origin of a contest, and to forget, either in the triumph of victory, or the mortification of defeat, that the whole weight of guilt and wretchedness occasioned by war, is chargeable upon that government which unreasonably begins the conflict, and upon those of its subjects who voluntarily and without legal obligation, encourage and support it.

If the British orders in council were a principal cause of the present war, we had the utmost reason to expect, that when those orders were revoked, and an armistice was proposed with a view of opening the way to an accommodation, that proposal would have been readily agreed to. But the revocation of the orders seemed to produce no effect on the measures of our administration. And though the British government had often declared, that the orders should be revoked when the French decrees were repealed—though they were revoked as soon after the repeal was notified, as the then deranged state of the British ministry would permit—and though, in the act of revocation, the repeal of the French decrees was assigned as the cause of it—yet an attempt has been made to convince the people of this country, that the British orders were not revoked in consequence of the repeal of the French decrees, but from the pressure of our restrictive system. This attempt seems to exhibit a want of fairness and a disposition unfriendly to peace with Great Britain.

Nor can we readily believe that the war was declared or is carried on for the protection of our native seamen. The states which produce them, well know, that the number impressed by British ships has been grossly exaggerated—that the British government has uniformly disclaimed any right to impress them—that when impressed, they have been exchanged when their citizenship was ascertained, and that the number of British seamen employed by us, has, at all times, been far greater than those of a. nations who have been impressed from our vessels. No class of men has suffered more by the war than our gallant native seamen; they have been more injured in one year of hostility, than they ever were, or probably ever would have been by British impressment—they are eminently distinguished for bravery and naval skill, and whenever their services can be useful to their country, they will do all that men can do. But their number is diminishing, and during the war must continue to diminish, from the annihilation of their ordinary business, as well as from the immense superiority of force employed against them.

If we are contending for the support of a claim to exempt British seamen from their allegiance to their own country, is it not time to inquire whether our claim is just? And, if the justice of it was apparent, whether the cause we are pursuing has any tendency to establish it? The principles and laws of the states, which have been violated in the war is carried on for this purpose, or to protect neutral merchant ships from search by belligerents, it seems to be equally opposed to our own principles and practice, and the established rules and usages of other nations.

The late act of the national government interdicting the trade coastwise, between different parts of the same state, as well as between the states respectively and with all foreign nations, contains provisions of such a character as makes it worthy of an inquiry, whether any measures can be properly adopted by this government, which would be likely to induce congress to repeal them, or to amend them in such manner as to render their constitutionality less questionable?

The friends of peace are accused of being under British influence, but their accusers ought to reflect, whether partialities of an opposite kind have not produced the evils we suffer, and whether if our conduct towards both belligerents had been impartial, a war with either would have been thought necessary. We had assumed the character of a neutral nation; but had we not violated the duties imposed by that character? Had not every subject of complaint against one belligerent been amply displayed, and those against the other concealed or palliated? And had we not, in the former case, been remarkably sagacious in discovering insults, and equally solicitous in the latter to keep them out of sight? It is indeed been suggested that we have no connection with France in regard to the war; but when England and France were engaged in a most arduous struggle, and we interfered and assaulted one of them, will any man doubt our intention to assist the other? Some connection seems also to be implied in the proposal which was made by the French emperor, that the congress at Prague should be composed of plenipotentiaries from France, the United States, Denmark and the other allied princes, on the one hand, and the plenipotentiaries of England, Russia, Prussia and their allies, on the other.

Previously to the French revolution, there was seldom an instance in the history of civilized nations, in which a prince or government engaged in war without alledging reasons to justify the measure; and though, in some cases, the motives of the war were unjust, the reasons assigned were specious; and in pretence, at least were founded in necessity. But the French emperor has thought fit to dispense with these forms and to wage war without even a pretence of injury. The glory of the prince or the convenience of the great nation have been deemed sufficient grounds for subjugating one after another, the states of Europe; and so far as the influence of the government extends, a species of political morality has been introduced, which annuls the distinction between power and right, and authorises a government and its subjects, whenever they are able, to subdue or destroy the neighboring states. How extensively this system of morals has been adopted it is impossible to say: But we have seen the rapacious and desolating progress of the French government approved by Americans, and have been often told it would be convenient for us to expel the Indian tribes to a still greater distance; and to conquer the adjoining provinces of Great Britain and Spain, and annex them to the United States. There was some ground to hope that the events of the Russian campaign might incline the French rulers to call in question the policy, if not the justice, of this predatory system; and induce them to renounce those false and fatal principles, which have been injurious to their own nation and destructive to the peace and happiness of the world. Had such been the case, the disasters they met with might eventually have proved beneficial even to themselves: For no people are less to be envied, than they, who prosper in a cause of deceit and violence and whose retribution is deferred till repentance can afford no relief.

As we are unable to ascertain the motives under which the government is actuated in prosecuting the war, we can form no opinion concerning its probable duration. Peace, however, must be ardently desired by the people of this commonwealth, as the present state is unfavorable to their morals, and ruinous to their prosperity; and besides, a large national debt has been already incurred, and is continually increasing, which will probably have the same continuance as the union of the states, and must entail upon the present generation and their posterity the burdens of direct and oppressive taxes.

But though our fellow citizens have suffered greatly since the war by the loss of property on the ocean, and by an almost total interruption in their fisheries and other maritime pursuits, and the difficulties they have met with in conveying necessary supplies from one part of the coast to another, yet we have abundant cause of gratitude for the internal order and tranquility which have prevailed through the state, and plentiful harvests with which the Almighty has been pleased to favor us the past year. May we be solicitous not to abuse the gifts of his bounty by a petulant or prodigal use of them.

Proceedings of Congress.

Thursday, January 14.—The following resolution was yesterday had on the table by Mr. Jackson, of Virginia, and passed. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following articles be proposed as amendments to the several state constitutions in the constitution of the United States, each of which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said constitution:

1. Congress shall have power to lay a tax or duty not exceeding per centum ad valorem on articles exported from any state.
2. Congress shall have power to make banks in any state.
3. Congress shall have power to make banks in any state, with the consent of the state within which the same shall be made.
4. Congress shall have power to establish a national bank with branches there in any state.

Many private petitions were read and referred. Mr. Ingersoll, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Oliver Evans in behalf of his interest in the several terms in general, and of Mr. Evans's improvement in millinery, particularly made a report in part on the petitions of the four hundred owners against Oliver Evans's patent, concluding with a resolution that their petition ought not to be granted. This report was, on motion of Mr. Fish of N. Y. referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Ingersoll stated also, for public information, that in relation to the subject at large of the extension of patent terms generally, it was the committee's impression that it would be inexpedient generally to extend the terms of patent rights, though an extension might be due to Mr. Evans's improvement of the steam engine. A decision on this question, however, had been deferred by the committee, with a view to afford an opportunity to persons claiming like indulgence to bring their claims before congress.

Mr. Murrel, after some preliminary remarks, in which he adverted to the failure of our arms, proposed the appointment of a responsible officer (a lieutenant-general) to take charge of the military establishment. He said the necessity of having such a head to the army was seen and acted upon in 1798. He adverted to the absence of the secretary of war from the seat of government, assuming the office of commander in chief, in addition to the other important duties he was required to perform. Mr. Wright denied that our arms had failed; but was not opposed to the reference of the subject to the military committee. He complimented the secretary of war for his exertions, and said we had succeeded in every thing, but at the close of the campaign, when storm and climate defeated the expected issue. The motion laid over for consideration.

Mr. Sharp, having explained the laws relating to the militia which subject them when in regular service, to the rules and articles of war, adverted to the recent proclamation of governor Chittenden, and complimented the "Green Mountain Boys" for their refusal to obey it, offering the following—

Resolved, That the militia of any of these United States, or the territories thereof, when lawfully employed in the service of the United States, are subject to the same rules and articles as the troops of the United States.

Resolved, That every person not subject to the rules and articles of war, who shall procure or entice a soldier in the service of the United States to desert, is guilty of an infraction of the laws of the United States and subject to punishment.

Resolved, That his excellency Martin Chittenden, governor of the state of Vermont, by issuing his proclamation dated at Montpelier on the 10th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1813, did entice soldiers in the service of the United States to desert—Therefore,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be and he is hereby requested to instruct the attorney general of the United States to institute a prosecution against the said Martin Chittenden.

Mr. Fish, of Vt. expressed his regret that these resolutions had appeared; when he thought was the sense of the whole delegation from Vermont. He thought few people in that state, and certainly none of its representatives, approved of the proclamation—but if the governor had committed an offense, he was liable at the proper tribunal. He thought that house ought not to interfere in the matter, being calculated to bias the proceedings that might be had against him. This opinion so prevailed generally that the resolutions were laid over for further consideration.

Mr. Pickens's resolutions to amend the constitution of the United States were taken up in committee of the whole. Mr. Grosvenor opposed and Messrs. Pickens and Gaston supported them—they were laid aside on receiving the message of the president, inserted in our last number.

Friday, January 7.—Mr. Wheaton presented a petition of Paul Cuffie, a free colored man, who states that from motives of religion and humanity he hath been induced to attempt the civilization and amelioration of the inhabitants of the African continent, and praying permission for a vessel to depart from the United States to the Cape of Good Hope for the purpose of carrying a number of families of free colored people to effect the object of his undertaking. Referred to the committee of commerce and manufactures.

Mr. Ingersoll, after some remarks on the powers and patronage of the postmaster-general, comparing his authority in the appointment of his numerous officers, with the restricted powers of the other branches of the government, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of revising the laws regulating the general post-office establishment of the United States, and of recommending them as to render them more conformable than they are at present to the principles of the constitution, as regards the appointments to office under that establishment.

Which was passed and referred as proposed.

Mr. Grosvenor offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire into the acts, rules and regulations by which furloughs or leave of absence from the armies of the United States are obtained on the officers thereof, and whether said acts, rules or regulations ought to be revised, altered or amended, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Crook, chairman of the military committee, opposed the resolution, and he presented the disposition of the house to interfere in the management of the army. He read the following article from regulations of the war office respecting furloughs—

No furlough shall be given during a campaign; nor any, but by the general commanding the district or army, and for the cause of disability, which disability shall be certified by a regimental or hospital surgeon.

Furloughs shall, beside expressing the term of time granted to absentees, express also an order to join the regiment, post or garrison, in which they may be long.

No order shall be given to officers seeking a furlough for their own convenience, which shall have the effect of entitling them to a allowance for the transportation or baggage.

The motion lies on the table.

The bill making a partial appropriation for the military establishment, as returned from the senate, amended, was then taken up and after a delay of several days the yeas 52. Aye, until Monday.

Mandate, January 10.—Several petitions were read and referred. Mr. Troup reported a bill to raise three additional regiments of riflemen; and a bill authorizing the president to raise for five years or for the war, fourteen of the regiments authorized by the act of January 29, 1813, which bills were severally twice read and committed to a committee of the whole house.

On motion of Mr. Grosvenor, of New-York, the house proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him on Friday last, which was read and agreed to by the house.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs, be instructed to enquire into the acts, rules and regulations, by which furloughs or leave of absence, from the armies of the United States, are obtained for the officers thereof, and whether said acts, rules or regulations ought to be revised, altered or amended, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Wright, of Md. submitted the following resolution. Resolved, That a committee of the whole house be instructed to enquire into the expediency of extending the 2d section of the act, for the establishment of rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, relative to spies, to the citizens of the United States.

The question on this motion, was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 85—nays 77.

The house proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. Hanson, of Ml. on the 28th ultimo: when Mr. Hanson withdrew the said resolutions, [see page 298] and offered the following in lieu thereof:—

Resolved, That the president of the United States, and he is hereby requested to communicate to this house, any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French government, to accredit the minister plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that court, or of his reception, if acceded, of the time when so accredited, and of the progress of his negotiations.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire, whether Mr. Turquan, late minister of France, did or did not, on or about the 1st of June, 1807, write a letter to the secretary of state, setting forth the terms and conditions, upon which his government would treat of amity and commerce with the United States, and using certain complaints against this government, and requiring certain political sacrifices to be made, as an indispensable prerequisite to the formation of such a treaty, and whether the said letter was not withdrawn from the archives of the department of state, and how and when it was so withdrawn; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

On the question, whether the house will now proceed to consider the said resolution, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 90—nays 69.

And before deciding further on the same—the house adjourned.

Tuesday, January 11.—Mr. Ingersoll of Penn. from the committee appointed to enquire into that subject, reported a bill "providing for the appointment of post-masters." [That after the first day of May next, no person shall act as post-master in any office of the United States, who shall not have been nominated by the president, and receive the approbation of the senate.] The bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. Andrews, of S. C. from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill further to amend the act regulating pensions to persons on board private armed vessels; which was twice read and committed.

The consideration of Mr. Hanson's resolutions occurring—The first, after some remarks by Mr. Calhoun, who said it called for information in a proper manner, was agreed to without a division.

Of the second resolution, Mr. Calhoun said, it was of a character unprecedented in its call on the executive, and that to warrant its adoption a specific object—what was expected to grow out of it, and that the object was of a character to warrant the investigation, should be shewn. Mr. Hanson made a long speech on the subject in which he maintained the propriety of the resolution, and enforced its adoption—the letter had been, he said, in the department of state, and that the facts that belonged to it were proper subjects for enquiry. Mr. Calhoun again rose, and opposed the resolution—he said, "suppose it were proved that this letter was in fact written by general Turreau, and that all the other circumstances relating to it were true, when or how he did not credit, what did it prove? Merely that an impertinent letter had been written by a foreign minister. Did the executive sanction it? No. What view the executive ought to take of such a letter, or how to treat it, depended on a variety of circumstances, on which this house had not the means to form an opinion."

Mr. Gaston replied to Mr. Calhoun—he thought the opposition to the resolution proceeded from an over delicacy in respect to the executive. He thought the matter important as the very terms on which the French government would be in amity with us. Mr. Roberts followed and disclaimed any idea of infringing the rights of the house to a call for information or of shelling the executive. He stated that the ground of the resolution rested on newspaper evidence, and, generally, that the matter was not worth the time consumed with it. He viewed the motion as "unbearable," but it was a frivolous thing, when measures of red impotence burdened the table of the house. After a motion to amend the resolution, Mr. Fish of N. Y. conceiving that the house was trifling with the feelings of the nation, moved to postpone the subject until March next—laid it in the negative. Mr. Oakley also seconded the resolution generally. He said—the pretence of a search of a successful enquiry would be to prove the executive to have been guilty of a high crime or misdemeanor, and subject to impeachment.

Mr. Alston of M. C. followed in opposition to the resolution, pursuing the same grounds as occupied by others in opposition to it. If every fact alleged were proved, he said, it would prove nothing against the executive. This subject originated in jealousy and schism, he said, and prosecute an inquiry to the utmost, there it would end. Mr.

A. adverted to the sensibility gentlemen yesterday displayed on the proposition to prevent spies, toyism if you will, from stalking abroad; and expressed his astonishment at the inconsistency of their conduct to-day on a matter of much more doubtful propriety.

Mr. Grosvenor, of N. Y. adverted, somewhat harshly, to what had fallen from Mr. Alston on the subject of yesterday's debate, and proceeded to speak in support of the resolution, which he warmly advocated on the grounds before mentioned, declaring in substance, that if the facts were proved, the president merited impeachment for concealing them—and appeared to conceive the permission of the withdrawal of the letter to be no less an offence than he considered its concealment to have been; because the same rule extended would authorize the destruction or giving away of any public document at any time, or even of all the papers in the department of state.

Mr. Calhoun rose again, and ridiculed the idea of an enquiry by the house into the base accusation of French subservency—he said, The very document by which gentlemen wished to prove a French influence, cut up by the roots the faithful absurdity—being predicated on the supposed existence of an influence of a very different character.

Mr. Sharp spoke at considerable length against the resolution. He contended, that put what construction they might, the retraction of the letter was its apology. He said, the hon. member had told the house the other day that he had in his possession the only authentic copy of the letter, translated in the hand writing of one of the clerks in the department of state. How came it into the gentleman's possession? How does he know it to be authentic, or to have been translated in that manner. Mr. S. called upon gentlemen to let the house know what they knew, and let the house predicate any proceeding thereon if thought proper.

Similar enquiries how took place between Messrs. Grosvenor, Calhoun and Mason, of N. C. on the subject of the proceedings on the impeachment of Judge Chase, which has been drawn into consideration, on the 3d of January, &c.

Mr. Wright spoke warmly, and mentioned in his remark a toast drunk by a venerable member of the house, "Britain's fast anchored in us, the bark of our holy religion." He was checked by the speaker.

Mr. Gaston again spoke in support of the proposition, as affording information necessary for legislative acts likely to come before the house during the present session—and in reply to Mr. Calhoun's remarks on the variety of reasons offered by the advocates of the motion.

Mr. Wright rose to say, that the venerable gentleman to whom he had first alluded (Mr. Pickens) had very politely corrected his statement of his toast, and written it down for him as follows:—"The world's last hope—Britain's fast anchored in us"—which sentiment, the same gentleman had informed him, "he had no objection should be inscribed on his tabernacle."

Mr. Stockton spoke in favor of the resolution, and in reply to Mr. Sharp.

Mr. Mason assigned the reason why he should vote for the proposition—not that he believed the president to be pure and free from corruption—but because he had no objection to the whole truth being known; so which the president would have no objection, inasmuch as a pure man, like pure gold, need fear no scrutiny. He conceived the retraction of the letter to be a disavowal in fact, and in the nature of an apology for having sent it.

The question to amend the resolve so as to require the information therein stated from the executive instead of obtaining it through a committee, was decided in the negative by a large majority.

The main question on the adoption of the resolution was taken, at a late hour, and decided as follows:

So the resolution was rejected. Adjourned.

Wednesday, January 12.—Mr. Roberts, after stating his desire to gratify the gentleman in the minority, as well as satisfy his own curiosity, proposed the original resolution offered by Mr. Hanson [see page 298] as a substitute for that which was yesterday rejected.

Mr. Hanson warmly opposed this and was called to order for his personalities. He afterwards spoke of his being in possession of the document, which he pledged himself to be authentic. He thought the substitute an evasion of the enquiry. Mr. McLau supported the motion, but ridiculed the importance that had been tributed to the subject by the minority of the house. Mr. Post opposed the resolution on the ground of inefficiency.

Mr. Roberts replied to Mr. Post. His object was to obtain full and complete information on this subject, and to institute an enquiry how this withdrawal letter had come into the possession of those who now say they have it. That information, when demanded yesterday, had been refused by those in whose power it was to give it.

Mr. Grosvenor replied to Mr. Roberts and opposed the resolution; the paper in question was in the possession of a member of the house; and he wished the matter thoroughly investigated.

Mr. Barnett said the only real question before the house these two days was, whether the house should go in at the door or climb over the walls of the public offices to get at the necessary information. Mr. B. was for the first course; and if gentlemen on the other side, said he, are determined to go over the wall, let them receive that denunciation which it is said those shall have who go over the wall.

Mr. Webster avowing a wish that if the enquiry was made, it should be effectual, which he conceived it could not be under the present motion, moved to amend the motion by substituting therefor that which was yesterday rejected.

Many motions were now made; and vast debate was had upon them. After several members had spoken, Mr. Rolin's resolution was carried by a large majority—and thus were three days of the people's time consumed.

Thursday, January 12.—On motion of Mr. Troup the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on a bill making provision for filling the ranks of the regular army, &c. Sec. 1, provides a bounty of 160 dollars; payable 25 on enlisting, 25 on mustering and joining some military corps, and fifty at the expiration of his service, which is for five years, unless sooner discharged; when he shall become entitled to a bounty of 320 acres of land. Sec. 2, gives a premium of 8 dollars for the enlistment of said soldier. Sec. 3, increases the monthly pay of the privates to 10 dollars per month; that of the non-commissioned officers and musicians is proportionally advanced. Sec. 4 and 5 provide for the re-enlistment of the soldiers whose time of service will soon expire, granting them the advantages stated in the first section.

On this bill a variety of opinion existed, though there was little difference of principle, in the majority of the house.

After debate, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Friday, January 14.—Mr. Taylor, of N. Y. from the committee on the militia system, made a report on the resolution directing them to enquire into the expediency of altering the tour of militia duty to three months, concluding with the following resolution: Resolved, That it is inexpedient to limit the service of the militia called out under the authority of the United States to a term not exceeding three months.

This resolution, after some discussion in which Mr. Kerr warmly opposed its adoption, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. McKim, Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be required to lay before this house a digest of American manufactures heretofore ordered to be made out under his direction, if the same be prepared, and to report the progress made in this work if not ready for delivery.

On motion of Mr. Jackson, of Va. Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to enquire whether it be not required by the constitution of the United States to extend the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases not provided for by law; and also into the expediency of such extension.

Mr. Ball, of Ohio, offered a resolution intended to apply to the state of Ohio only, but which was, on the suggestion of several gentlemen, so varied and amended as to read as follows: viz.

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for adjusting and satisfying the claims of the United States, or territories thereof, arising from articles impressed and supplies furnished to detachments of militia ordered into public service by the authority of said states and territories from the commencement of the present war.

This amended, the resolution was agreed to, ayes 90.

Mr. King, (of Mass.) after an introductory speech of considerable length, offered the following resolutions— Resolved, That the constitutional powers of congress do not extend to the suspension or interdiction of the coasting trade of the United States of America from a district in one state to a district in the same state.

2. Resolved, That the constitutional powers of congress do not extend to a suspension or interdiction of the coasting trade of the United States of America from a district in one state to a district in the same state; or an adjoining state on the sea coast; or on a navigable river; Therefore,

3. Resolved, That the committee on foreign relations be and they are hereby instructed to lay in a bill to repeal so much of the act bearing on commercial ships and vessels in the ports and harbours of the United States, passed on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1813, as suspends or interdicts the coasting trade of the United States of America from a district in one state to a district in the same state; or an adjoining state on the sea coast; or on a navigable river.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, by a large majority. The progress of a bill for the encouragement of enlistments, &c. was read a third time.

Mr. Sheffey offered the following new section by way of rider to the bill.

And he it further enacted, That the troops to be enlisted shall be limited to the defence of the territories of the United States or the frontiers thereof, or such part thereof as the president of the United States shall direct and determine.

After some objection on the question of order as to the admission of a rider to a bill, being contrary to practice, and a discussion on the principle of the proposed rider, the question on its passage to a second reading, was decided as follows:

For Mr. Sheffey's motion 54

Against it 63

The bill was then put on its passage, and a warm debate ensued till 7 o'clock in the evening when the previous question was required (which precludes further debate) and decided thus:

For the previous question 76

Against it 68

The main question was then put—"shall the bill pass?" and decided as follows:

AYES—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bad, Barnett, Bowen, Beall, Bradley, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clark, CLOPTON, Conistock, Conrad, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Dawson, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Eppes, Evans, Findley, Fisk, (of Va.) Fisk, (of N. Y.) Forney, Forsythe, Franklin, Ghoshun, Glasgow, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jackson, (of Va.) Johnson, (of Va.) Kennedy, Kent, (of N. Y.) Kent, (of Md.) Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Law, Lefferts, Lowmies, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLan, Montgomery, Munroe, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Piper, Pleasant, Seale, (of Pa.) Shea, (of Tenn.) Wright, Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Baylies, (of Mass.) Bayly, (of Va.) Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Cooper, Cox, Culpepper, Davenport, Davis, (of Mass.) Dewey, Ely, Gaston, Griddle, Grosvenor, Hale, Holtz, Jackson, (of R. L.) Kent, (of N. Y.) King, (of Mass.) Miller, Muffit, Mosley, Markell, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Post, Potter, J. Reed, W. Reed, Ridgely, Ruggles, Schureman, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shipperd, Smith, (of N. Y.) Stanford, Stockton, Sturges, Taggart, Thomson, Vose, Ward, (of Mass.) Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson, (of Mass.) Winter— And the house adjourned.

Saturday, January 15.—Mr. McLan, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on so much of the president's message as relates to the militia law, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the families of the privates in the militia of the United States, who have been slain by the enemy or died in the service since the commencement of the war, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution having been amended, on motion of Mr. Nelson, of Virg. so as to include non-commissioned officers as well as privates and volunteers as well as militia, was adopted.

Mr. Eppes having stated that Virginia had expended 332,000 dollars, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be instructed to lay before this house, a report on the claims of the state of Virginia, for monies advanced in the service of the United States, to the detachments of militia, distinguishing such claims as under existing laws can be settled, and distinguishing also such claims as cannot be adjusted and settled without the intervention of legislative provision.

This resolution was so amended, on suggestion of Mr. Macon, as to include a general enquiry as to advances made by any state, although Mr. Eppes and Mr. Burwell objected to the amendment, on the ground that advances made by other states did not stand on the same footing as those of Virginia, which had considerably advanced in a train of settlement before they were rejected.

The resolution having been further amended, on the suggestion of Mr. H. M'phail, so as to include the territories as well as states, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Troup, of Geo. the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the report of Mr. King, of N. C. in the chair, on the bill sent to this house from the senate, "authorising the president of the United States to raise certain regiments therein mentioned to be enlisted for five years, or during the war."

After some time spent therein, the committee rose, reported progress and had leave to sit again.

[The debates yesterday and today were very animated. The editor of the National Intelligencer is expected to report them at length, and we shall insert some of them in the Register.]

Monday, January 17.—A letter was received from the acting secretary of the treasury communicating a digest of the returns of the marshals respecting manufacturers made in 1810.

Mr. Reed submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire whether any, and if any, what means of retrenchment and economy of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficiency in the naval establishment, may be practicable and expedient, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Seybert, in the absence of the chairman of the naval committee (Mr. Lowmies) stated his conviction that nothing effectual could be done by the proposed committee—he thought a navy board, only, could make necessary reforms. He stated as a fact that 6000 men were employed in our naval service but less per man than those employed in the navy of Great Britain.

Mr. R. said the enquiry was not promoted for any alleged mismanagement in the individuals of the navy department. His design was merely to collect the opinions of practical men on the subject. The resolution was laid on the table.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. King in the chair, on the bill authorizing the enlistment of certain regiments for five years or during the war.

After several members had spoken thereon, the committee rose and had leave to sit again. It appears that all three bills have resolved the question as to the policy of the war.

Thursday, January 18.—Mr. Roberts moved to amend the standing rules of the house so that stenographers should be sworn to report the debates or proceedings faithfully; and directing that the said reports should be signed by them when published, &c.

Mr. King, after some remarks that went to show the hardship of many persons employed in the coasting trade, who had been kept from returning to their homes with their vessels by the embargo, offered a resolution that had for its object an enquiry as to the expediency of relieving them. A good deal was said on the subject, and the resolution was finally agreed to—82 to 69.

Mr. Gaston offered the following resolution—
Resolved, That pending the negotiation with Great Britain, it is inexpedient to prosecute military operations against the Canadas for invasion or conquest.

Which the house refused to consider, 92 to 67.
Messages from the president were received respecting our relations with France and the Russian mediation, both which are inserted below.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Message from the president to the house of representatives of the United States.

I transmit to the house of representatives a report of the secretary of state complying with their resolution of the 14th inst. JAMES MADISON.

Jan. 18, 1814.

REPORT.

The secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 11th inst. requesting the president to communicate to the house any information in his possession, and which it may not be improper to divulge, in relation to the omission or refusal of the French government to accredit the minister plenipotentiary sent by the United States to that court, or of his reception if accredited, of the time when he was so accredited, and of the progress of his negotiation, has the honor to communicate to the president, for the information of the house, the following letters in relation to that subject, viz:

A letter from Mr. Crawford to the secretary of state of the 15th August, 1813, enclosing one to the duke of Bassano of the 27th of July, and his answer of 1st August; and an extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to the secretary of state of the 8th of September, 1812. Respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

Department of state, Jan. 18, 1814.

Mr. Crawford to Mr. Monroe.

PARIS, 15th Aug. 1813.

SIR—On the 27th ult. I wrote to the duke of Bassano, to inform him of my arrival in Paris, in quality of minister plenipotentiary of the United States. On the 8th inst. I received an answer, dated at Dresden, on the 1st. Copies of my note and of his answer are herewith enclosed.

With sentiments of high respect, &c.

(Signed) WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of state.

Mr. Crawford to the duke of Bassano.

PARIS, 27th July, 1813.

My Lord—I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have been appointed by the president of the United States of America, minister plenipotentiary to the court of his imperial and royal majesty, the emperor of the French and king of Italy. I wait the pleasure of your excellency as to the time and manner of presenting my official credentials, preparatory to my reception by the government of his imperial and royal majesty, as the accredited minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

I seize on the present occasion to assure your excellency of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be your most obedient and very humble servant.

(Signed) WM. H. CRAWFORD.

His excellency the duke of Bassano.

Translation of a letter from the duke of Bassano to

Mr. Crawford, dated Dresden, Aug. 1st, 1813.

SIR—I have had great pleasure in hearing of your safe arrival in France, and I have received the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 27th of July, on your nomination in the quality of minister plenipotentiary of the United States to his imperial majesty the emperor of the French and king of Italy. The choice which your government has made of a person so distinguished in his own country, and so worthy of this honorable mission, cannot but be agreeable to his imperial majesty; and though he is at this time absent from Dresden, I can give you this assurance in his name. I will have the honor to communicate to you his intentions respecting the presentation of your letters of credence and your reception. Without waiting even for this, I will receive all the communications which you may think proper to make to me as minister plenipotentiary of your government, and the delay of a formality will produce no delay in the exercise of the mission confided to you, or in the correspondence which it will procure for me the benefit of holding with you.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

(Signed)

DUKE OF BASSANO.

His excellency Wm. H. Crawford, &c. &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Crawford to Mr. Monroe, dated Paris, September 8th, 1813.

"I have just received an answer to the note which I addressed to the duke of Bassano, requesting Mrs. Barlow's passports. On the subject of recognition he says he is very solicitous I should present my letter of credence to the emperor in Paris. He does not repeat his invitation to communicate with him. The operations of the war will probably detain the emperor in the North (until) the winter. It is believed that the duke of Bassano will not return before him. If this opinion should be realized, the winter will be far advanced before I shall be able to draw the attention of the French government to the subjects of discussion between the two nations."

RUSSIAN MEDIATION.

Message from the president.—To the house of representatives of the United States.

I transmit to the house of representatives a report of the secretary of state complying with their resolution of the 13th inst. JAMES MADISON
January 18th, 1814.

REPORT.

The secretary of state to whom was referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 13th inst. requesting the president to lay before the house such documents relative to the Russian mediation, as in his opinion it may not be improper to communicate, has the honor to transmit to the president, for the information of the house the following letters in relation to that subject, viz:

A letter in French (with a translation) from Mr. Daschkoff, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of Russia, to the secretary of state, of the 8th March, 1813, with the answer of the secretary of state of the 11th March.

An extract of a letter from the secretary of state to Mr. Adams, minister of the United States at St. Petersburg, of the 1st July, 1812, and four letters and extracts from Mr. Adams to the secretary of state, bearing date respectively on the 30th September, 17th October, and 11th December, 1812, and on the 26th June, 1813.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE

Department of state, Jan. 1814.

Since the return of the emperor to Paris, Mr. Crawford has been received in ample form. 11. 1822

[Here follows in the regular series the original copy of M. Daschkoff's letter, a translation of which being inserted, we deem it unnecessary to insert the original.]

Mr. De Daschkoff, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his imperial majesty the emperor of all the Russias, to the secretary of state of the United States.

[TRANSLATION.]

The undersigned envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, has the honor to make known to the secretary of state of the United States of America, that he has just received orders from the emperor his master, to make the following overture to his excellency the president of the United States.

The peace of Russia with England seemed to present this immense advantage to the commerce of nearly all seafaring people, that it freed their relations from that constraint, from that continual vexation to which it had been subjected for many years without intermission. The emperor viewed with pleasure a result so conformable to all his wishes, and which appeared as not being at all doubtful. It became so, however, by the war between England and America.

The undersigned is directed to express to the president of the United States the regret with which his imperial majesty forces the great shackles which this new episode is about to oppose to the commercial prosperity of nations. The love of humanity and what he owes to his subjects, whose commerce has already sufficiently suffered, command him to do every thing in his power to remove the evils which this war is preparing even for those nations who will not take part in it.

His majesty, who takes pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the government of the United States of America, is convinced that it has done all that it could to prevent this rupture, but that treating of it directly would take away from the negotiation all semblance of impartiality. In a direct discussion every thing would tend to excite the prejudices and the asperity of the parties. To obviate this inconvenience, his majesty the emperor, gratified at being able to give a proof of his friendship alike for his majesty the king of Great Britain and for the United States of America, wished to offer to them his mediation, and charged the undersigned to propose it to the president of the United States.

The undersigned having the honor to communicate to the secretary of state the sentiments and wishes of his imperial majesty, begs him to make them known to the president of the United States. The emperor would feel great satisfaction if a like disposition on the part of the United States should have the effect of stopping the progress of this new war, and of extinguishing it in its origin. From the satisfactory assurances which the president of the United States has constantly given to the undersigned, of the sentiments of regard and friendship on the part of the United States, and of his excellency for Russia, and particularly for the august person of his majesty, he cannot but flatter himself that he will receive an answer which shall correspond with the generous wishes of the emperor his master.

The undersigned cannot refrain from expressing on this occasion, to the secretary of state, his individual wishes for whatever may have a tendency to re-establish active relations between Russia and the United States, and to advance the prosperity of the republic.

He seizes with eagerness this occasion to renew to the secretary of state, the assurances of his highest consideration and respect.

(Signed) ANDRE DE DASCHKOFF.
Washington, 24th Feb. (8th March) 1813.

The secretary of state to Mr. Daschkoff.

[Copy] DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 11, 1813.
SIR,—I have had the honor to receive your note of the 8th instant, making known to the president of the United States the disposition of his majesty the emperor of Russia, to promote peace, by his friendly mediation, between the United States and Great Britain.

I am intrusted by the president to assure you, that he sees in this overture, on the part of your sovereign, strong proofs of that humane and enlightened policy, which have characterized his reign.—It was impossible that a war between the United States and Great Britain should not materially affect the commerce of Russia, and it was worthy the high character of a prince, distinguished by his attachment to the interests of his people, to interpose his good offices for the restoration of peace. The president sees, at the same time in this overture, and in the circumstances attending it, a strong proof of the friendly interest which his imperial majesty takes in the welfare of the United States.

The United States, conscious that they were not the aggressors in this contest; that on the contrary, they had borne great wrongs for a series of years, before they appealed to arms in defence of their rights, are willing and ready to lay them down as soon as Great Britain ceases to violate those rights.

The president is aware that many of the inconveniences resulting from a direct communication between the parties themselves may be avoided, by the mediation of a third power, especially one entitled to, and possessing the entire confidence of both the belligerents. To the claim of Russia to that distinguished consideration, the president does not hesitate to express on the part of the United States his full acknowledgment. He recollects with much satisfaction that during a period of great and general contention, the relations of friendship have always subsisted between the United States and Russia; and he finds in the personal qualities, and high character of the emperor Alexander, a sacred pledge for the justice and impartiality which may be expected from his interposition.

Influenced by these sentiments, the president instructs me to inform you, that he willingly accepts the mediation of your sovereign to promote peace between the United States and Great Britain. I am instructed also to state, that such arrangements will be made, without delay, as will afford to his imperial majesty the opportunity he has invited, to interpose his good offices for the accomplishment of so important an event. Of these arrangements I shall have the honor to advise you in an early communication.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to John Quincy Adams, Esq. minister plenipotentiary of the United States at St. Petersburg.

Department of State, July 1, 1812.

SIR—On the 18th ultimo a declaration of war against Great Britain passed congress; of which, of the president's message, and report of the committee of foreign relations of the house of representatives leading to it, I have the honor to transmit to you copies.

You are too well acquainted with the causes which produced this result to require any explanation of them. As it appeared that Great Britain would not revoke her orders in council, on the just grounds on which it was claimed, but enlarged the conditions on which she proposed her willingness to revoke them, there remained no honorable course for the U. States to pursue short of war. On full consideration of all circumstances, this measure was adopted.

and the government is resolved to pursue it till its objects are accomplished, with the utmost decision and activity in its power.

"In resorting to war against Great Britain, as the United States have done, by inevitable necessity, it is their desire and hope that it may be confined to her only.

"It is seen with much regret that the emperor of Russia is likely to be reduced to the necessity of becoming a party to the war in Europe, if he has not already become so. Should that event take place, there is no reason why the war between the United States and Great Britain should affect, in the slightest degree, the very friendly relations which now exist between the United States and Russia. It is the sincere desire of this government to preserve, in their utmost extent, those relations with that power.

"With France, our affairs in many important circumstances are still unsettled; nor is there any certainty that a satisfactory settlement of them will be obtained. Should it however be the case, it is not probable that it will produce any closer connexion between the United States and that power. It is not anticipated, that any event whatever will have that effect."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State.

St. Petersburg, 30th September, 1813.

"On the 20th inst. I received a note from the chancellor requesting me to call upon him the next evening, which I accordingly did; he told me that he had asked to see me by the emperor's command; that having made peace and established the relations of amity and commerce with Great Britain, the emperor was much concerned and disappointed to find the whole benefit which he expected his subjects would derive commercially from that event, defeated and lost by the new war which had arisen between the United States and England; that he had thought he perceived various indications that there was on both sides a reluctance at engaging in and prosecuting this war, and it had occurred to the emperor that perhaps an amicable arrangement of the differences between the parties might be accommodated more easily and speedily by indirect than by a direct negotiation: that his majesty had directed him to see me, and to inquire if I was aware of any difficulty or obstacle on the part of the government of the U. States, if he should offer his mediation for the purpose of effecting a pacification. I answered that it was obviously impossible for me to speak on this subject any otherwise than from the general knowledge which I had of the sentiments of my government: that I was so far from knowing what their ideas were with regard to the continuance of the war, that I had not to that day received any official communication of its declaration, but that I well knew it was with reluctance they had engaged in the war; that I was very sure, whatever determination they might form upon the proposal of the emperor's mediation, they would receive and consider it as a new evidence of his majesty's regard and friendship for the United States, and that I was not aware of any obstacle or difficulty which could occasion them to decline accepting it.

"I knew the war would affect unfavorably the interest of Russia. I knew it must be highly injurious both to the United States and England. I could see no good result as like to arise from it to any one.—The count replied, that he had considered it altogether in the same light, and so had the emperor, who was sincerely concerned at it, and who had himself conceived this idea of authorising his mediation.—He thought an indirect negotiation conducted here, aided by the conciliatory wishes of a friend to both parties, might smooth down difficulties which in direct discussion between the principles might be found insuperable. To a mutual friend, each party might exhibit all its claims, and all its complaints, without danger of exciting irritations or raising impediments. The part of Russia would only be to hear both sides, and to use her best endeavors to conciliate them. I observed there was a third party to be consulted as to the proposal—the British government. The count answered, that it had already been suggested by him to the British ambassador lord Cathcart, who had the day before dispatched it by a messenger to his court. Some question occurred concerning the mode of enabling me to transmit this communication to the United States, upon which the count promised to see me again in the course of a few days. He said that he should write to Mr. Daschkoff, and instruct him to make the proposition to the government of the United States."

St. Petersburg, 17th October, 1812.

SIR—I received a few days since a letter from Mr. Russel, dated at London, the 9th of September, and informing me that his mission there had closed, that he had received his passport, and that in three days from that time he should leave the city to embark at Plymouth for the United States. He adds that the British government had rejected a proposition which he had been authorized to make for a suspension of hostilities.

"The evening before last I had another interview with the Chancellor Count Romanzoff, at his request. There had been rumors in circulation here of an armistice in Canada, and of the appointment of commissioners by the President for a new negotiation with Great Britain. The Count asked me if I had any authentic information of these circumstances. I said I had not, that my information was altogether of a different aspect; and I told him the substance of Mr. Russel's communication. He then observed that this incident would not discourage this government from making an office of its mediation, which he had suggested to me in a former conference. On the contrary, the failure of every new attempt at direct negotiation confirmed him in the belief and hope that a mediation, might be more successful, a mediation of a common friend, not only desirous from the sentiment of friendship to see the parties reconciled to each other, but having also a strong interest of his own in their reconciliation.

"The Count said he had his despatches for Mr. Daschkoff ready, instructing him to make the proposition in form to the American government: and he asked me whether I could indicate to him a mode of transmitting them directly to the U. S. In our former conversation (reported in my letter of the 30th ult.) I had offered to despatch one of the American vessels now at Cronstadt, if the British ambassador would furnish her a passport, or any document that would protect her from capture by British armed vessels. The count said he had made the proposal to the ambassador, who had expressed his readiness to give the document; provided the vessel and messenger should go by the way of England, a condition, which the Count said he had told the ambassador he could not ask me to agree to, and with which I did not think it, in fact, suitable to comply. There are, however, two American gentlemen here, on the point of departure for the United States, and by them I shall transmit this despatch and its duplicate, together with those of the chancellor to Mr. Daschkoff. I am, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS,

St. Petersburg, 11th Dec. 1813.

SIR—On the 4th inst. I received the duplicate of your favor of 1st July last, announcing the declaration by the congress of the U. States of war against G. Britain, and enclosing printed copies of the President's proclamation founded upon it, of his previous message recommending it, of the report of the committee of foreign relations proposing it, and of the National Intelligencer of the 20th June. The original of your letter with the documents not having yet come to hand, these gave me the first official communication of the war.

"I had on the 7th inst. an interview with the Chancellor Count Romanzoff, in which I communicated to him the substance of that part of your dispatch which related to Russia, and those which concern the state of our relations with France. In the present state of the war between this country and France, I was convinced that the view of the American government's intentions with regard to that power, so explicitly and so strongly manifested in your letter, would not only be gratifying to the chancellor but that it would be satisfactory to the Emperor, and would powerfully counteract any impressions unfavorable to the U. States, which the English interest here is endeavoring to excite. I therefore told the count that although I had not been instructed to make to him any official communication of the declaration of war, the dispositions of the American government towards other powers and particularly towards Russia, on this occasion, had been distinctly suggested to me, in a manner which I felt it my duty to make known to him. That the United States, compelled by unavoidable necessity to vindicate their violated rights against Great Britain by war, were desirous that it might be confined exclusively to them and their enemy, and that no other power might be involved in it. That it was particularly and earnestly their wish to preserve and maintain in their fullest extent their commercial and friendly relations with Russia. That the war in which the Emperor is now engaged against France, although it could not be known by the Presdent to have been actually commenced at the time when your despatch was written, was how we contemplated as more than probable and the necessity which obliged the Emperor to take a part in it was mentioned to me as a cause of respect to the American government. But it was hoped it would not in the slightest degree affect the friendly dispositions between Russia and the United States. That I was informed by you that the principal subjects of discussion which had long been subsisting between us and France, remained unsettled. That there was no immediate prospect that there would be a satisfactory settlement of them; but that whatever the event in this respect might be, it was not the intention of the government of the United States to enter into any more intimate connections with France. This disposition I added was expressed in terms as strong and clear as I thought language could afford. It was even observed that the government of the United States did not anticipate any event whatever that could produce that effect, and I was the more happy to find myself authorised by my government to avow that intention, as different representations of their views had been widely circulated as well in Europe as in America.

The count received this communication with assurances, of his own high satisfaction at its purport, and of his opinion on that it would prove equally satisfactory to the Emperor, as far as he should lay it without delay. He said that with regard to the friendly and commercial relations with the United States, it was the Emperor's fixed determination to maintain them so far as depended upon him in their fullest extent. He asked me if I had any objection to his communicating to the British government itself that part of my information to him which related to France. I said that, on the contrary as the British government had in the course of our discussions with them frequently intimated the belief that the American government was partial to France, and even actuated by French influence. I supposed that the knowledge of this frank and explicit statement, with due consideration of the time and occasion upon which it was made, must have a tendency to remove the prejudice of the British cabinet, and I would hope produce on their part a disposition more inclining to conciliation.

Yesterday the Count sent a note requesting me to call upon him again, which I accordingly did. He showed me the draught of a dispatch to the Count Lieven, the Russian ambassador in England, which he had prepared to lay before the Emperor for his approbation, and which related to the subject of my conversation with him, particularly in regard to the intentions of the American government with reference to France; instructing Count Lieven to make it known to Lord Castlereagh, and to us, if for the purpose of convincing the British government of the error in supposing that of the United States of any subserviency to France, in the expectation that it would promote in the British ministry the disposition to peace with the United States, which he (Count Lieven) knew His Imperial Majesty had much at heart, believing it equally for the interest of both powers and also for that of his own empire. The Chancellor said that as this dispatch would refer to what I had verbally stated to him in our preceding conversation, he wished to have submitted to the Emperor, that I should peruse it to satisfy himself that he had connectedly represented the purport of my communication to him, and he desired me, if I should find any inaccuracies or variation from what I had said to him, to point it out to him, that he might make the despatch perfectly correspond with what I had said. I did accordingly notice several particulars in which the exact purport of what I had said might be expressed with more precision. He immediately struck out the passages which I noticed in this manner from the draught, and ordered them to be exact conformity with the ideas I had intended to convey. The changes were inconsiderable, and were no otherwise material than as I was desirous of the utmost accuracy in the relation of what I had said under the authority of your despatch.

This communication of the settled determination of the American government not to contract any more intimate engagements with France, will thus be made to the British ministry with my full consent. The Chancellor's despatch does not say that he was authorised by me to make it. It merely relates the substance of that part of my conversation with him, and directs Count Lieven to use it with a view to promote the purpose of pacification.—The Chancellor understands that my consent was merely my own act, without authority from you; my motive in giving it was the same with that of his instruction to Count Lieven, because I believed its tendency would be to promote the spirit of pacification in the British cabinet. I told the Chancellor I was aware that its effect might be different. That the very certainty that we should not seek or even accept of any community of cause with their most divided enemies, might make them more indifferent to a peace with us. But, in calculating the operation of a friendly message, even upon the mind of an inveterate enemy, I had an irresistible impulse to the conclusion that it will be generally like itself. I asked the Chancellor whether he had received an answer from England upon the proposal of the Emperor's mediation. He said that, without accepting or rejecting it, they had intimated the belief that it would not be acceptable in America.

I am, &c.
(Signed) JOHN Q. ADAMS.
Extract of a Letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, dated St. Petersburg, 26th June, 1813.

"On the 15th inst. I had an interview with the Chancellor Count Romanzoff, at his request, when he informs me that he had received answers from Mr. Dasselhoff to the despatches of which Mr. Harris was the bearer. That the President had accepted the Emperor's offer of mediation, and that Mr. Dasselhoff had sent him a copy of your answer to him, expressive of that acceptance. He then put into my hands your letter to Mr. Dasselhoff of March 11, with the tenor of which the appearance of the much gratified part which he said he should have thought it right to transmit to the Emperor. At the same time English newspapers and a circular received here, mentioning the appointment of Messrs. Gallatin and Biscail, but intimating, strongly the determination of the British government to reject the mediation. A few days after, I received from the Editor of the National Intelligencer of 15th April, containing an editorial paragraph concerning the appointment of those gentlemen, which I communicated to the Count on the 23d. I observed to him, that however the British government might think proper to act on this occasion, that of the United States would at least have manifested in a signal manner, at once its earnest and constant desire for a just and honorable peace, and its sense of the motives which had induced the Emperor's offer. That the President could not have adopted a measure better adapted to do honor to his Majesty's proposal, than by the appointment of two persons among the most distinguished of our citizens, to co-operate on the part of the United States, in accomplishing the Emperor's friendly and benevolent purpose; and that if it should eventually fail of being successful, at least the true and only source of its failure would be known. That he had received, since he saw me last, despatches from Count Lieven. That the British minister, in terms of much politeness, had intimated to him, that there was no sovereign whose mediation they should more readily accept than that of the Emperor, but that their differences with the U. States were of a nature involving principles of the internal government of the British nation, and which it was thought were not susceptible of being committed to the discussion of any mediation. The Count added, that it would remain to be considered, whether after this, and after the solemn step taken by the government of the U. States, it would be advisable to renew the offer to the British ministry, and give them an opportunity for a consideration. It was possible that further reflection might lead to a different resolution, and he should submit the question to the Emperor's determination. Different circumstances furnished other materials for deliberations."

Wednesday, Jan. 19.—Mr. Clay, in an appropriate address, resigned his station as speaker of the house [being appointed a commissioner to proceed to Gotzenburg]—and a resolution passed thanking him for the ability with which he had presided—for the resolution, yeas 144, nays 9. The house then proceeded to choose a speaker, the votes were, for Mr. Cheves 94; for Mr. Grundy 59—scattering 12. Mr. Cheves was accordingly declared duly elected and introduced to the chair; when he thanked the members for the honor conferred upon him, &c.

On Monday last the bill from the house of representatives to increase the bounty to recruits was referred to the committee on military affairs.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TRAITORS—actual and moral.—It is truly distressing to observe the prevalence of treasonable practices in the United States. We have, perhaps, more persons in this country so "well inclined" to the enemy that they think it no harm to "aid and comfort" him, in defiance of universal law, than all the world possesses. This dereliction of patriotism has its origin in that warmth of feeling that too many of us have felt for every thing that is English; in that deep rooted British influence that pervades every section of the union—that found its way into all classes of society, and penetrated into the most secret recesses of the heart through mediums so subtle, and so multitudinous, that it was almost impossible for the most prudent to defend himself against it. In addition to these potent causes for disaffection and treason, men high in authority, assert, and "holy men give scripture" to prove, that England is the "bulwark" of religion, of liberty and law, and so strengthen and support our predilection in favor of an enemy, richly deserving to be called barbarian, for his murders and cruelties. Blue lights are still exhibited at New London—a traitorous intercourse is kept up with the shore—the prisoners confined in Worcester jail have escaped, no doubt by assistance from without—and fire was communicated to certain articles preparing for the United States' vessels at Portsmouth. But we shall manage these things better anon.*

SUGARS that sold in Boston, a few weeks since for $30 per cwt. have been disposed of at 16 to 17 dols.

NEUTRALS.—Eight sail of Swedish [American owners] schooners were fallen in with on the 20th Dec. from New Haven for Bermuda, laden with live stock and provisions!—But congress has “destroyed” this “commerce.”

THE BRAYBLE sailed from Annapolis about 10 days ago, having received the answer to her despatches.

COM. PERRY.—A very splendid entertainment was given to this distinguished officer, in Tammany Hall, New York, on the 11th inst. We may insert a detailed account of it hereafter. The toast of the hero of Erie was “THE UNION OF THE STATES;” to which some attach a peculiar significance at this time.

THE BATTLE OF ERIE.—The London papers, thus announce Perry's victory.—'Tis pitiful—'tis wondrous pitiful.—London, Nov. 10.—The mail from Halifax states that our flotilla on lake Erie has been completely defeated by the American commodore PERRY.—It may, however, serve to diminish our vexation at the occurrence, to learn that the flotilla in question was not any branch of the royal navy; but was solely manned, equipped and managed by the public exertions of certain Canadians, who had formed themselves in a kind of lake fencibles. It was not the royal navy; but a local force; a kind of mercantile military.

FLAG OF TRUCE.—The sloop Perry arrived at Boston, bearing a flag, on the 14th, with despatches for col. Barclay, the British commissary. She had also several passengers, among them lieut. Bunn, late of the Chesapeake.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.—We have a variety of particulars yet to record that belong to the history of the late devastation of the Niagara frontier, which shall be duly noticed as soon as the facts are clearly substantiated. The sufferings of the people were horrible—many women were murdered, and all the slain appear to have been scalped by the allied forces. There was a smart skirmish at Buffalo.—The enemy appears to have re-crossed into Canada, except a strong detachment that holds fort Niagara.

THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.—Wilkenson's army remains as before. An attack upon Plattsburg was apprehended, and troops were detached for its defence. Col. Purdy commands there.

THE HEROES OF THE LAKES.—On Tuesday last com. Chauncey, on his way from Washington city to Sackett's Harbor; and com. Perry, on his way to the seat of government, passed through Baltimore.

THE NEGOCIATION.—The papers teem with the opinions of individuals as to the probable result of the negotiation to be opened at Gottenburg. We would hope the best; but if any suppose peace will be made by a relinquishment of our claims for justice, they will be disappointed. The government will make any arrangement, on reciprocal principles, that shall secure to our citizens safety from manstealing and piracy—they have no care as to the forms by which these things may be guaranteed—but they must and will be guaranteed by the treaty to be ratified by Mr. Madison. Nor will any changes in Europe alter the purposes of the president of the United States; we went to war for ourselves and will look only to ourselves—we have no concern about the “balance of power,” and will not dabble in the politics of emperors and kings. But, if Great Britain is sincerely desirous of peace, we apprehend some plan may be fallen on to satisfy and secure the just claims of the parties. It was the decided opinion of Mr. Bayard, before he went to Russia, that with the candid and liberal instructions given to him and Mr. Gullatin, a peace would be made, if they were met by the British at St. Petersburg with a disposition to bring about an adjustment of differences on honorable terms. What effect the late British victories in Germany may have upon their cabinet, is yet to be seen. OUR COURSE IS NOT CHANGED. We seek peace either by the “olive,” or the “arrows.”

From the National Intelligencer.

John Quincy Adams, (our minister in Russia) Jas. A. Bayard, (now at St. Petersburg) Henry Clay of Kentucky, and Jonathan Russell of Rhode Island, have been appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, commissioners to proceed to Gottenburg, to meet the commissioners from Great Britain, under her overture recently accepted by this government.

Jonathan Russell has also, in like manner, been appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of Sweden.

British official accounts of the recapture of Fort George, and capture of Fort Niagara.—From the Montreal Courier, of December 31, 1813.

Head Quarters, Quebec, Dec. 27, 1813.

GENERAL ORDERS.—The commander of the forces has received a despatch from lieut. gen. Drummond, containing a supplementary report from col. Murray, dated at Fort George, 13th December, correcting his statement of the preceding day, respecting the enemy having passed over his cannon, stores, &c. having since discovered in the ditch of the fortification one long 18 pounder, four 12's and several 9 pounders, together with a large supply of shot. Some of the temporary magazines, with a proportion of fixed ammunition, have been saved, and camp equipage for 1500 men has fallen into our possession.

The new barracks erected in the vicinity of Fort George and Chippewa, have, from the precipitancy of the enemy's flight, escaped being burnt.

H. Q. Upper Canada, Dec. 19, 1813.

Lieut. gen. Drummond congratulates the troops under his command upon the brilliant success which has crowned the attack made this morning on Fort Niagara. It was assaulted an hour before day-light, and after a short but severe contest, it was carried, with a very slight loss on our part; that of the enemy was 65 killed and 15 wounded—all by the bayonet; the remainder of the garrison, to the number of about 350 regular troops and artillery, were made prisoners; 27 pieces of ordnance were found in the fort. Our loss does not exceed 5 killed and 3 wounded. Lieutenant Nowlen, of the 100th regiment, a very promising young officer, is the only officer killed. The lieutenant-general has to regret that a severe wound which col. Murray has received, is likely to deprive the army of the service of that gallant officer for some time. The troops employed on this occasion were the 100th regiment, the grenadier company of the Royals, and the flank companies of the 41st regiment. Their instructions were not to fire, but to carry the place at the point of the bayonet.—These orders were punctually obeyed; a circumstance that not only proves their intrepidity, but reflects great credit on their discipline. Col. Murray expresses his admiration of the valor and good conduct of the whole of the troops, particularly of the 100th regiment, which led the attack. He also bestows his particular thanks on lieutenant colonel Hamilton, &c. [Here follow the names of several regular and militia officers who distinguished themselves.] Of the brilliant service of lieutenant Darwin of the 100th, who led the forlorn hope, and captain Fawcett of the 100th grenadiers, in entirely cutting off two of the enemy's picquets and surprising the sentries on the glacis and at the gate, by which means the watchword was obtained, and the entrance into the fort greatly facilitated, the colonel speaks in terms of the highest and most deserved praise.

* Some interesting particulars regarding the confinement and treatment of these officers, held in retaliation, are omitted for want of room.—Five of the nine that escaped have been caught.

Lieutenant-general Drummond will perform a most grateful duty in bringing under the notice of his royal highness the prince regent, through his excellency the commander of the forces, the admirable execution of this brilliant achievement on the part of every individual concerned. The useful services of the militia volunteers in launching the boats and rowing the troops across the river, were not unnoticed by the lieutenant-general.

The lieutenant-general has received from major-general Riall a very favorable report of the zeal and alacrity of the detachment of the royal Scots, under lieutenant-colonel Gordon, and the 41st battalion companies under major Friend, who advanced under the major-general's command to dislodge the enemy from the heights of Lewistown—Their steadiness and regularity under circumstances of great temptation, were highly creditable to them. Nothing could more strongly indicate their anxious wish to meet the enemy, and the lieutenant-general has only to regret that his rapid retreat from Lewistown heights, did not afford to major-general Riall an opportunity of leading them to victory.

Lieutenant-general Drummond begs that Major-generals Riall and Vincent will accept his acknowledgements for the assistance he has received from them in making arrangements for the late operations.

Lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, 160th regt. is appointed to command fort Niagara, and the lieutenant-general will recommend that the same command money be annexed to it as was granted at fort George.

A board of survey, composed of lieutenant-colonel Hamilton, commandant, president, major Holcroft, commanding royal artillery, and a captain of the 100th regiment, members, will assemble as soon as possible in fort Niagara for the purpose of taken an exact account and inventory of the immense quantity of ordnance, stores, arms, provisions, clothing, &c. captured in that place.

Extract of a letter from an officer at Halifax, to his friends in Philadelphia.

On board the prison ship Malabar,
Halifax Harbor, Dec. 18, 1813.

"In my last letter I wrote you that I had great expectations of getting home soon. But I am now sorry to say that every hope of that kind has vanished; for since writing the last, we have all been put in close confinement.

"Nine of us are put into a hole, six feet long and five wide, and I fear it will be still worse if possible. But as long as I keep my health, (let what will happen) my enemies shall never have it in their power, to say a murmur escaped me. As I have a clear conscience, and feel innocent of every thing but that of which I shall ever feel proud, defending an injured country.

NEW LONDON, Jan. 12.

More blue lights.—On Sunday night, at about 10 o'clock, blue lights were again exhibited on both sides of the river, and were answered by all the British ships. At this time a sloop was passing fort Trumbull. The lights were distinctly seen by a number of military and naval officers.

Quebec, Dec. 23, 1813. *

On Monday last the remaining American officers on parole at Beaufort, were brought to town and put into close confinement, agreeably to the general orders of the 18th instant. We understand that some indulgence is to be extended to generals Winchester, Chandler and Winder.

Extract of a letter from an officer at French Mills, to his friend in Washington.

"The 49th British regiment had upwards of 200 men killed and wounded on the 11th ult. and are now in Montreal, reduced the last year, from 1100, to 300. They buried 187 men after the late affair.—The number of their wounded is concealed."

NAVAL.

Two Baltimore vessels arrived at NORFOLK last week, laden with sugar. One from New-Orleans, the other from Cuba.

The ship Felicity from Cadiz for Boston, was burnt by the British frigate Endymion, "though she had a license."

The Shannon, sir Philip Broke has arrived in England.

It is stated that the British on our coast already begin to feel the effects of the embargo in a deficiency of the delicacies they have been indulged in. In proportion as that measure presses on the enemy will it be murmured against by their "friends."

POSTSCRIPT.

The employment of all hands in setting up the important documents that appear among the proceedings of congress (received at a late hour, compared with our general arrangements) has compelled the editor to omit several articles designed for insertion in this number: among them a digest of the late accounts from Europe. We merely say at present, that the power and valor of the allies—the defection and desertion of the German princes, at his utmost need—with several untoward accidents, have compelled Bonaparte to cross the Rhine, with the remnant of his army. He arrived at Paris early in November and convoked the senate, and called out 400,000 men. There had been several dreadful battles; and the great thing to be wondered at is, that this chieftain saved any thing, amidst such a complication of difficulties.

"TURREAU'S LETTER."—A message was received from the president by the house of representatives on Thursday, enclosing a letter from the secretary of state; saying that no such paper remains on the files of his office; also a letter from Mr. Graham chief clerk in that department, who states his recollection of having translated a letter from gen. Turreau to Mr. Smith, that was withdrawn; and supposes the one recently published may have been that letter. He knows not how the translation was obtained. A circumstance he mentions corroborates the belief that Turreau was compelled to withdraw that letter. *

The Embargo Law.

(CIRCULAR.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 24th, 1813.

SE.—The provisions of the act of the 17th December, 1813, "laying an embargo on all ships or vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," of which a copy is enclosed, so far as they apply to ships and vessels, and to exportations that may be attempted by their means, relate to such as are of the following descriptions:

1. Public armed vessels, possessing commissions from any foreign power, which are not affected by the act.

2. Private armed vessels, duly commissioned by any foreign power in amity with the United States, and also private armed vessels of the United States, duly commissioned under the act of June 25th, 1812.—These are to be permitted to depart, having on board only the proper and necessary stores, provisions, armament, furniture and equipment for their cruise; but they are not to take on board any merchandises or cargo of any description, for the purpose of trade or traffic either with the enemy, or with a neutral, or for exportation; and the collectors of the customs are authorised and enjoined carefully to examine, search and effectually ascertain that there is no such merchandises or cargo on board, and if any such be found to seize it and cause it to be landed and proceeded against by the district attorney, as forfeited to the United States.

3. Foreign merchant vessels. These may proceed on their voyages with the cargoes they have on board other than provisions, military and naval stores at the time they are notified of the act: but they must sail with their officers and crews composed wholly of foreigners belonging to nations who were in amity with the United States at the time of their arrival: and they must carry from the United States, no American citizen who shall not produce a passport permitting him to depart, furnished under the authority of the president of the United States. All foreign vessels, therefore, which have on board, at the time when they are notified of the act, (and the collectors are hereby directed to notify them as soon as the act is received) any provisions, military or naval stores, are immediately to reland the same. If they shall have any other cargoes or merchandises on board, they may proceed to sea with them or in ballast; and for effecting the prohibition imposed upon such vessels, against carrying out of the United States any American citizen, the collector is to cause every such vessel immediately before and at the time of her departure to be carefully searched and examined.—The officers and crew are to be mustered in his presence, or in the presence of an inspector, assigned to attend to that service, and compared with a list to be made out and delivered to him by the master of the vessel for this purpose. The inspector is to remain on board after the vessel is under way, to see that no American citizen comes or is taken on board, and, unless there be danger of falling into the hands of the enemy, is to leave the vessel only when the pilot leaves it. The clearance or permit for the departure of the vessel, is to be placed by the collector in the hands of the inspector, and is to be delivered by him to the master of the vessel only when he quits the same; and not to be delivered to him at all, but is to be brought back by the inspector in the pilot boat, if any American citizen shall come or be taken on board from a boat or in any other manner after the vessel has got under way. Foreign merchant vessels after being notified of the act, are to take on board no cargo of any description whatever, nor any specie; and the collectors are required to use all the means in their power for detecting any attempt to evade this prohibition, and particularly the attempt to carry away provisions or specie; the last of which, from its small bulk, is most liable to concealment and clandestine exportation. In those ports and places where there are banks, it is recommended to the collectors to have an understanding with the officers of those institutions, whose interest is principally concerned that the specie should not be drained from the country, and who, it is presumed will readily act in concert with the collectors upon this subject. Through them, and in every other way in their power, they will endeavor to obtain information of those persons who may have drawn out or collected specie with the probable intent of sending it abroad, that such collections of specie in private hands may be watched, and that if it should be found under the circumstances described in the tenth section of the act, it may be taken into custody, in the manner there pointed out. Foreign merchant vessels arriving in the United States after the promulgation of the act, can in no event depart in any other way than in ballast, and with their necessary sea-stores; as to the sufficiency of which, the collector is in every instance to judge, and to take care that under this pretext, unreasonable quantities of provisions and necessaries be not taken out of the United States.

4. American vessels of every description, (excepting private armed vessels duly commissioned under the act of June 25th, 1812,) which shall be in port at the time when notice of the act is received at the custom-house, if they shall have any cargo or lading on board, whether intended for exportation or for transportation coastwise, are either to discharge the same, or to give a bond with two or more sufficient sureties, in double the value of the vessel and cargo, not to proceed on the intended voyage or trip, until permitted to do so, agreeably to the provisions of the act. The bond to be thus taken will be of the form annexed marked A. If the cargo is not discharged or the bond given, the collector will take possession of the vessel and cargo, as directed by the 3d section of the act. No vessel or boat whatever (excepting such as shall have received permission under the authority of the president of the U. States, as pointed out in the 4th section of the act) can take on board any cargo. This prohibition extends as well to coasting and fishing vessels and boats, as to registered and non-registered vessels. Vessels licensed for the coasting trade or fisheries cannot depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit, and no clearance or permit is to be granted to any vessels, excepting to such as may be designated to the collectors, under the direction of the president of the United States, pursuant to the first and fourth sections of the act.

Under the fourth section of the act, the president authorises the collectors, and they are hereby empowered to grant permissions to vessels or boats, whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers or lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, or the territories thereof, in those cases where, in their opinion, there is no danger of the embargo being violated. The extent of this permission, in relation to each vessel or boat to which it is granted, nor as it respects the articles permitted to be transported, and the limits within which such transportation is to be confined, is to be specified in the instrument of permission to be delivered by the collector to every such vessel or boat, and which will be of the form annexed marked B. It is to be granted in no case in which the vessel, in performing the permitted voyage or navigation, will even for a short space, leave what is properly called a bay, river or sound, and be compelled to be at sea; and no permission is to be granted to a vessel or boat in any case, for the transportation of provisions, naval or military stores to or in any part of a bay, river or sound, occupied by the fleets or ships of the enemy, or in which there is reason to apprehend danger of falling into their hands. Previously to granting this permission in every case, a bond must be given by the owner, owners, consignee, or factor of the vessel or boat, with one or more sufficient sureties, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of the vessel or boat, as specified in the fourth section of the act. This bond will be of the form annexed marked Bb. A monthly return of all the permissions granted under this authority, thus commated by the president to the collector, is to be transmitted to the secretary of the treasury, of the form marked Ba. Manifests of the cargoes taken on board these vessels each voyage or trip, must be delivered by the masters to the collector or surveyor—and certificates of the landing of the cargoes, are to be delivered to the master on every voyage or trip, if they shall acquire it, and may be of the form annexed marked C. As many cargoes may both be taken in and landed at places where there is no officer now stationed for receiving the manifests or granting the certificates of landing, it may be necessary, and the collectors are hereby authorised to appoint temporary inspectors at proper places for the sole purpose of receiving manifests of cargoes, and granting clearances and certificates of landing. Duplicates of all these papers should be sent by them to the collector. It may not be necessary in every instance, that the inspectors should actually be present when the cargo is landed, they may in such cases as shall be directed by the collectors, take as evidence of the fact the certificate of any respectable citizen not interested in the matter. And there may also be situations where such evidence may be received by the collector or surveyor without the intervention of an inspector. The compensation of the temporary inspectors appointed for these purposes must consist wholly of wages to which they will be entitled.

On the sale or transfer of any ship or vessel, or in any case in which a new register or license is to be granted, or in the sale of any vessel not entitled to register or license, if it shall become necessary by a warrant, return, document, or in any official transcript made at the custom-house, to recognize the validity of the same, as required by the sixth section of the act, a bond with one or more sureties shall be taken in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of the ship or vessel, that such ship or vessel shall not, during the continuance of the act, transgress or infringe any of its provisions. The form of this bond, to be executed by the former owner, is given under the letter D.

As clearances of American vessels are expressly prohibited by the first section of the act, unless to cases under the special direction of the president of the United States, which prohibition is repeated in the eighth section, the bonds required in the seventh section from vessels licensed for the fisheries, or those bound on a whaling voyage, are not to be taken; and vessels of those descriptions are not to be cleared without further provisions and instructions on that subject.

By the tenth section of the act, the collectors are invested with the power to take into custody any of the articles there enumerated, whether on board of any ship or vessel, or in any vehicle used for transportation by land, or, under other circumstances which afford reason to believe that they are intended to be exported, and to hold them until bond with sufficient sureties shall be given for the landing or delivery of the articles in some place of the United States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of their being exported.—The eleventh section of the act, in prescribing the mode in which the defence of a collector is to be conducted, if he shall be called upon by any individual to answer, judicially, for his acts done under this law, is intended to shield him from vexatious and unjust prosecutions. But he is not to proceed under the tenth section of the act, to take the articles therein mentioned into his custody, unless there be circumstances, other than mere suspicion, to induce a belief that a violation of the law is intended. Such may be the information of persons employed to assist in, or entrusted with the knowledge of the designs of the parties; former violations by them, of this law, or of other restrictive laws, or of the revenue laws of the United States; an unusual accumulation of articles suitable for exportation in suspicious places; shipments to islands, out harbors or places open to the sea, beyond the wants or necessities of those places, &c. A sound direction must be exercised by the collectors; and is confidently trusted, that in no instance will personal feelings or any other improper motive, produce a procedure that will give any just cause for complaint. With such a mode of executing the law, it is hoped that no occasion will arise for resorting to the means placed, by the twelfth section of the act, at the disposition of the president, for carrying its provisions into effect, or repressing attempts forcibly to oppose it.—But if such dispositions shall at any time be manifested, and such steps taken in opposition to the law as can only be prevented or repressed by the use of force, the collectors, by direction of the president of the United States, are hereby empowered to call to their aid, any of the naval or military forces of the United States, or militia in the service of the United States, that may be within such convenient distance as to afford them the requisite assistance.

By order of the president of the United States.

Turreau's Letter.

The president of the United States on Thursday last transmitted to the house of representatives the following message:

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

I transmit to the house of representatives a report of the secretary of state, complying with their resolution of the 19th inst.

JAMES MADISON.

January 19, 1814.

The secretary of state to whom was referred a resolution of the house of representatives of the 12th inst. requesting the president to lay before the house any correspondence with or communication in writing from the late minister of France, on or about the 14th June, 1809, or by his successor since, prescribing the conditions on which their sovereign would consent to treat of amity and commerce with the United States &c. has the honor to make to the president the following report:

That of the transactions which took place in the department of state, before the secretary of state came into office, which was in the year 1811, he has no means of acquiring a knowledge other than from the archives of the department, or from the persons entrusted with their safe keeping.

That he has caused the files of the department to be carefully examined for a communication described by the resolution of the house of representatives, and that none such has been found of the date therein referred to or of any other date from the former minister of France, or from his successor, or any trace or evidence of such a communication; that he has also enquired of the chief clerk of the department who has been in that office since the year 1807 concerning the same, and whose statement is annexed.

That no such communication was ever addressed to the secretary of state by the present minister of France.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MONROE.

MR. GRAHAM'S STATEMENT

I know not how I can more clearly state every thing that I know relative to a letter which was recently published in some of the public prints, from general Turreau to Robert Smith, esq. and which I suppose to be the communication alluded to in the resolution of the house of representatives of the 12th inst. than by observing that when that letter as published was shewn to me by a gentleman of this office, I told him I could not say whether it was genuine; that some parts did not appear new to me, but that other parts of it did. We immediately looked at general Turreau's file, and no such letter was there. I then observed that if it was genuine, it must be the letter from gen. Turreau which had been withdrawn.

The fact of one of his letters which I had translated for Mr. Smith, having been withdrawn, I distinctly remember, though I cannot speak with certainty either of its date or of its contents, more than four years having elapsed since I saw it; but I remember it was considered exceptionable, and that Mr. Smith directed me not to put it on the files, but to lay it aside. I can add too that it was the only letter from general Turreau which to my knowledge was ever withdrawn.

This letter was withdrawn by a gentleman attached to the French legation, who called at the department of state to get it, and it was delivered to him either by Mr. Smith himself or by me under his directions. When this was done, I cannot now recollect nor have I any means of ascertaining, except by reference to a subsequent event which happened in the month of November 1809. I allude to the dismissal of Mr. Jackson. For I remember in a conversation I had with Mr. Smith respecting that occurrence at the time it took place, he observed that he supposed gen. Turreau would now be glad he had withdrawn his letter.

In what way the translation of this letter has got into the public prints, I know not, nor do I know where or by whom it was taken from this office.

JOHN GRAHAM.

Chief clerk of the department of state.
Department of state, 18th Jan. 1814.

Legislature of North-Carolina.

IN THE SENATE DECEMBER 16.

Mr. Branch, from the committee appointed on the subject, made the following report:

"The committee appointed to enquire into the political conduct of David Stone, esp. a senator from this state in the congress of the United States, respectfully report:

"That it was to have been expected that every man who valued the honor or the safety of his country, would not have withheld that aid which was indispensable to the preservation of both: much less was it to be anticipated that one who to the duties of a citizen had superadded the strongest professions of his approbation of the measures of the general government in entering into the war, who implicitly if not expressly avowed himself among the foremost of its supporters, would have adopted a course of conduct directly opposite to that expected by his constituents, and hostile to the honor and the interest of his country.

"This has been done by the honorable David Stone. The sentiments of the people of this state and of the legislature at its last session, were unequivocally in favor of a prosecution of the war in which the United States was engaged with Great Britain. Their opinions were known to Mr. Stone, and those professed by him were in unison with them. Under these impressions he was chosen a senator. No circumstance has since occurred to alter the opinions of the people of this state, or of that body by which he was chosen. No circumstance could occur which would authorize a change of these opinions, so long as we value our national character, and desire that the peace which we so ardently wish for may be obtained without disgrace. Yet we find, that for reasons which he has thought proper to withhold from the people of this state, the conduct of Mr. Stone has been directly in opposition to his professions, and we are forced to believe that he avowed principles which he did not possess or that he has without cause changed the course of his political conduct; whereby he has as far as his voice or his example could extend, jeopardised the safety and the interest of his country.

"Justice demands that those who are fighting our battles, should receive the support, confiding in which, they enlisted under our banners. Honor forbids the adoption of any measure by which our national character may be tarnished; and policy dictates a vigorous prosecution of the war by which we may obtain an early and an honorable termination of it.

"Resolved, therefore, That the said David Stone hath disappointed the reasonable expectations, and incurred the disapprobation of this general assembly."

The report being read, Mr. Murphy moved that it be recommitted for amendment. Motion negatived, 43 to 17. He then moved an indefinite postponement, which was also negatived, 41 to 19. The question on agreeing to the report was then put, and carried, 40 to 18.

The negatives were, Messrs. Bender, Bodinhamer, Caldwell, Fuller, Foy, J. Hinton, Johnson, McKinne, Murphey, Parker, R. Smith, Speight, Slade, Stewart, J. Smith, J. Wright, J. Williams, R. Williams.

The President's reply

To the senate and house of commons of the general assembly of the state of North Carolina.

I have received, fellow-citizens, your memorial of the 29th ult. representing the exposure of your state to danger on its sea-board, and requesting to be informed whether measures will be immediately taken by the national government for its protection.

The anxiety which you manifest for the security of the state under your particular care, cannot but be commended, and it would be highly agreeable to make a communication that would remove all occasion for it.

The legislature of North Carolina is too enlightened and too just not to be sensible that the protection to be extended by the general government over the union, must be proportioned to the aggregate means applicable thereto; and that, in distributing these, regard must be had to the comparative practicability and probability of attempts on particular states and places. Against occasional attempts, where there are so many points accessible by water, from an enemy having on that element a force so extensive and so readily concentrated, an absolute protection of every one is not possible. Considering the states as parts of the whole, the best defence of the whole must be kept in view, by the authority to which that is entrusted; and it fortunately happens that the security and interests of particular parts will often be comprehended in the effect produced by means more immediately applied to the protection of other parts.

These observations are not intended to preclude a due consideration of the particular case, stated in your memorial. They appeal only to the candor with which you will be sure to review the measures of the executive in relation to the general and particular defence of our country, and to the confidence claimed by the impartiality which has directed them.

With a view to the more convenient superintendence and protection of every part of the U. States, they have been partitioned into military districts. The officer allotted to that which includes the state of North Carolina, will be instructed, as soon as practicable, to visit and examine the situation of the exposed parts of the state, with a view to improvements which may properly be made in works of defence. He was about to make such a visit when he was lately called away to a more urgent, but temporary service. In the mean time, a colonel of engineers had been sent to examine the ports, and to make report on the subject of them.

The secretary of the navy has not been inattentive to the means of defence pending on his department, which were thought best adapted to the waters of North Carolina; and to the gun boats already allotted, the equipment of which has not been intermitted, a like number of armed boats of another modification will be added as soon as they can be made ready for service.

In making this communication, it will of course not be understood as superceding any auxiliary provisions which the state of North Carolina may think proper to make on its own account, as has been done by some of her states, in order to a more complete and particular security than it may be in the power of the general government to extend to every exposed situation throughout the United States.

Be pleased, fellow citizens, to accept assurances of my respect and my best wishes.

JAMES MADISON.

Legislature of South-Carolina.

The special committee to whom was referred so much of his excellency the governor's message, as relates to our foreign relations, respectfully submit the following address and resolutions.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sir—The legislature of this state on a former occasion by an unanimous vote expressed their approbation of the declaration of war against the kingdom of Great Britain. This we are satisfied was the only course which the United States could pursue, consistently with her honor and her interests. A recurrence to the causes of the war exhibits on the part of Great Britain a series of wrongs and insults, and on the part of the United States a lively solicitude for peace, and a degree of forbearance, which being misunderstood, but served to invite further aggression. To be dishonored in the eyes of other nations, and humiliated in our own, or to make a dignified appeal to arms was the alternative left to us. The faithful representatives of a high minded and honorable people could not hesitate, and the issue now rests with God and our country. To a stranger unacquainted with the nature of our political institutions, the valorous achievements and martial enterprize of our citizens will appear extraordinary when contrasted with the pacific policy of our government, and their long endurance of the violation of our national rights. This new development of the American character, will cause it to be held in high and deserved estimation, though reluctant to proceed to the effusion of human blood, yet roused and incensed, no nation is more formidable than a nation of freemen contending in vindication of their rights.

Animated by the same spirit which carried our ancestors gloriously through the revolutionary war, and ambitious to obtain the applause of their country, the most honorable distinction of an American citizen, our soldiers and seamen have performed deeds of gallantry which have shed a lustre on our arms, and carried high the reputation of the nation. But we must turn from this to a less pleasing subject. The manner in which the war has been carried on by Great Britain is such as to excite our warmest indignation, and such as would fully justify the U. States in considering her as having forfeited the rights and courtesies due to a civilized nation. Her conduct stamped with infamy is without parallel except it be found in the pages of her own history.

We take this occasion, sir, to express to you our decided approbation of the vigorous prosecution of the war, and particularly of the retaliatory measures adopted to cause its laws to be respected in the persons of our citizens.

We have seen with great satisfaction the olive branch frequently extended to our haughty foe, and we are free to add that we should consider an honorable peace as a desirable event; but if it cannot be procured without a surrender of our rights as a sovereign and independent people, we are ready to say, let the war be perpetual; it is an evil, it is true, but it is an evil more tolerable than national humiliation. It is not for us to prescribe to the general government the manner in which the war shall be conducted; but it must be permitted us to state our settled conviction, that to make the enemy feel its pressure with severity, is the most effectual means of bringing it to a speedy and honorable termination.

The United States hold a conspicuous rank among the nations of the earth, and her high destinies are indissolubly connected with her character and independence. We have only to be true to ourselves, and all will be well.

Therefore, Resolved, That JAMES MADISON, president of the United States, has by his energetic prosecution of the war, furnished a new claim to the confidence of his fellow citizens.

Resolved, That indemnity for our wrongs and satisfactory security for our rights as a nation, are the only terms on which an honorable peace can be bottomed.

Benedict Arnold.

Having several times alluded to the famous appeal and proclamation of Benedict Arnold, the editor was called on to insert them at length. He had already commenced a search for these curiosities, when they were presented to him in the "Standard of the Union," published at New York. We have marked a few of the passages, and added a note.

[FROM THE BRITISH "POLITICAL MAGAZINE."]

The famous general Arnold who abandoned the rebel service, and joined our army at New York, wrote the following address to the inhabitants of America, published in that town, October 7, 1780.

"I should forfeit, even in my own opinion, the place I have so long held in yours, if I could be indifferent to your approbation, and silent in the motives which have induced me to join the king's arms.

"A very few words however will suffice upon a subject so personal; for to the thousands who suffer under the tyranny of the usurpers in the revolted provinces," as well as to the great multitude who have long wished for its subversion, this instance of my conduct can want no vindication; and as to the class of men who are criminally practising the war from sinister views at the expense of the public interest, I prefer their enmity to their applause. I am, therefore, only concerned in this address to explain my self to such of my countrymen, as want abilities or opportunities to detect the artifices by which they are duped.

*The pointed resemblance of the passages in italic to a multitude of speeches, essays and paragraphs of the present day, will strike the reader with astonishing force. Indeed, one might be inclined to think that several of our orators had borrowed their ideas from Benedict. His abuse of congress—his terror of France—his eulogies on Great Britain, and to cap the whole, his regard of morality and religion, will be particularly noted.

"Having fought by your side when the love of our country animated our arms, I shall expect from your justice and candor, what your deceivers, with more art and less honesty, will find it inconsistent with their own views to admit.

"When I quitted domestic happiness for the perils of the field, I conceived the rights of my country in danger, and that duty and honor called me to her defence. A redress of grievances was my only object and aim; however I acquiesced in a step which I thought precipitate, the declaration of independence; to justify this measure many plausible reasons were urged, which could no longer exist, when Great Britain, with the open arms of a parent offered to embrace us as children, and grant the wished for redress.

"And now that her worst enemies are in her own bosom, I should change my principles if I conspired with their designs; yourselves being judges, was the war less just, because fellow subjects were considered as our foes? You have felt the torture in which we raised our arms against a brother. God incline the guilty protectors of these unnatural dissensions to resign their ambition, and cease from their delusions, in compassion to kindred blood.

"I anticipate your question, was not the war a defensive one until the French joined in the combination? I answer, that I thought so. You will add, was it not afterwards necessary, till the separation of the British empire was complete? By no means; in contending for the welfare of my country, I am free to declare my opinion, that this end attained, all strife should have ceased.

"I lamented therefore the impolicy, tyranny and injustice, which, with a sovereign contempt of the people of America, studiously neglected to take their collective sentiments of the British proposals of peace; and to negotiate, under a suspension of arms, for an adjustment of differences: I lamented it as a dangerous sacrifice of the great interests of this country to the partial views of a proud ancient and crafty foe. I had my suspicions of some imperfections in our councils, on proposals prior to the parliamentary commission of 1778; but having then less to do in the cabinet than the field, (I will not pronounce perceptibly as some may, and perhaps justly, that congress have veiled them from the public eye;) I continued to be galled, in the negligent confidence of a soldier. But the whole world saw and all America confessed, that the overtures of the second commission exceeded our wishes and expectations, and if there was any suspicion of the national liberality, it arose from its excesses.

"Do you believe we were at that time really entangled in an alliance with France? unfortunate deception! they have been duped, by a virtuous credulity, in the incautious moment of intemperate passion, to give up their felicity to serve a nation counting both the will and the power to protect us, and aiming at the destruction both of the mother country and the protection. In the pliancy of common sense, for I preferred to no casuistry, did the pretended treaty with the court of Versailles, amount to more than an overture to America? Certainly not, because no authority had been given by the people to conclude it, nor to this very hour have they authorised its ratification. The articles of confederation remain still unaltered.

"In the firm persuasion therefore, that the private property of an individual citizen of this country is as free from all conventional restraints, since, as before the malicious efforts of France, I preferred those to Great Britain; (thinking it infinite) wiser and safer to cast my confidence upon her justice and generosity, than to trust a monarchy too feeble to establish your independency, so perilous to her distant dominions: the enemy of the protestant faith, and fraudulently avowing an affection for the liberties of mankind, while she holds her native sons in vassalage and chains.

"I affect no disguise, and therefore frankly declare, that in these principles I had determined to retain my arms and command for an opportunity to surrender them to Great Britain; and in concerting the measures for a purpose in my opinion, as grateful as it would have been beneficial to my country, I was only solicitous to accomplish an event of decisive importance, and to prevent as much as possible, in the execution of it, the effusion of blood.

"With the highest satisfaction I bear testimony to my old fellow soldiers and citizens, that I find solid ground to rely upon the clemency of our sovereign, and abundant conviction that it is the generous intention of Great Britain not only to leave the rights and privileges of the colonies unimpaired, together with their perpetual exemption from taxation, but to superadd such further benefits, as may consist with the common prosperity of the empire. In short, I fought for much less than the parent country is as willing to grant to her colonies as they can be to receive or enjoy.

"Some may think I continued in the struggle of these unhappy days too long, and others that I quitted it too soon.—To the first I reply, that I did not see with their eyes, nor perhaps had so favorable a situation to look from, and that to our common master I am willing to stand or fall. In behalf of the candid among the latter, some of whom I believe serve blindly but honestly—in the bonds I have left, I pray God to give them all the lights requisite to their own safety before it is too late; and with respect to that herd of censurers, whose enmity to me originates in their hatred to the principles by which I am now led to devote my life to the re-union of the British empire, as the best and only means to dry up the streams of misery that have deluged this country, they may be assured, that conscious of the rectitude of my intentions, I shall treat their malice and calumnies with contempt and neglect.

New-York, Oct. 7, 1780.

General ARNOLD reports that the measures adopted by congress in admitting the French to make a settlement on Rhode Island, has shaken its authority to the centre.

By brigadier-general Arnold, a proclamation. To the officers and soldiers of the Continental army who have the real interest of their country at heart, and who are determined to be no longer the TOOLS AND WEAPONS of CONGRESS, OR OF FRANCE.

Having reason to believe that the principles I have avowed, in my address to the public of 7th inst. animated the greatest part of this continent, I rejoice in the opportunity I have of inviting you to join his majesty's arms.

This excellency sir Henry Clinton has authorised me to raise a corps of cavalry and infantry, who are to be clothed, subsisted, and paid as the other troops are in the British service; and those who bring in horses, farms, &c. have liberty to sell them: to every non-commissioned officer and private a bounty of THREE CENTS will be given, and as the commander in chief is pleased to allow me to nominate the officers, I shall with infinite satisfaction embrace the opportunity of advancing men whose valor I have witnessed, and whose principles are favorable to an union with Britain, and true American liberty.

The rank they obtain in the King's service, will bear a proportion of their former rank, and the number of men they bring with them.

It is expected a lieutenant colonel of cavalry will bring with him, or recruit in a reasonable time,

	75 men
Major of horse	50
Captain of ditto	30
Lieutenant of ditto	15
Cornet of ditto	12
Sergeant of ditto,	6
Lieut. colonel of infantry	75 men
Major of ditto	50
Captain of ditto	30
Lieutenant of ditto	15
Ensign of ditto	12
Sergeant of ditto	6

N. B. Each field officer will have a company.

Great as these encouragements must appear to such as have suffered every distress of want of pay, hunger, and nakedness, from the neglect, contempt, and corruption of congress, they are nothing to the motives that I expect will influence the brave and generous minds, I hope to have the honor to command.

I wish to lead a chosen band of Americans to the attainment of peace, liberty and safety, (the first objects in taking the field) and with them to share in the glory of rescuing our native country from the grasping hand of France, as well as from the ambitious and interested views of a desperate party among ourselves, who, in listening to French overtures and rejecting those from Great Britain, have brought the colonies to the very brink of destruction.

Friends, fellow soldiers, and citizens, arouse, and judge for yourselves—reflect on what you have lost—consider to what you are reduced, and by your courage repel the ruin that still threatens you.

Your country once was happy, and had the professed peace been embraced, your last two years of misery had been spent in peace and plenty, and repairing the desolations of a quarrel that would have set the interest of Great Britain and America in a true light, and cemented their friendship; whereas you are now the prey of avarice, the scorn of your enemies, and the pity of your friends.

You were promised liberty by the leaders of your affairs; but is there an individual in the enjoyment of it, saving your oppressors? Who among you dare speak, or write what he thinks, against the tyranny which has robbed you of your property, imprisoned your persons, drags you to the field of battle, and is daily deluging your country with your blood?

You are flattered with independency as preferable to a redress of grievances, and for that shadow, instead of real felicity, are sunk into all the wretchedness of poverty by the rapacity of your own rulers. Already are you disqualified to support the pride of character they taught you to aim at, and must inevitably shortly belong to one or other of the great powers their folly and wickedness have drawn into conflict. Happy for you that you may still become the fellow subjects of Great Britain, if you nobly disdain to be the vassals of France.

What is America but a land of widows, orphans and beggars?—and should the parent nation cease her exertions to deliver you, what security remains to you even for the enjoyment of the consolations of that religion for which your fathers braved the ocean, the heathen and the wilderness? Do you know that the eye which guides this pen, lately saw your mean and profligate congress at MASS for the soul of a Roman Catholic in purgatory, and participating in the rites of a church, against whose anti-christian corruption, your fathers aviators would have witnessed with their blood.

As to you who have been soldiers in the continental army, can you at this day want evidence that the funds of your country are exhausted, or that the managers have applied them to their own private uses; in either case you surely can continue no longer in their service with honor or advantage; yet you have hitherto been their supporters in that cruelty, which, with an equal indifference to yours, as well as the labor and blood of others, is devouring a country, that, from the moment you quit their colors, will be redeemed from their tyranny.

But what need of arguments to such as feel infinitely more misery than tongue can express. I therefore only add my promise of the most affectionate welcome and attention to all who are disposed to join me in the measures necessary to close the scene of our afflictions, which, intolerable as they are, must continue to increase until we have the wisdom (shewn of late by Ireland) in being contented with the liberality of the parent country, who still offers protection, with the immediate restoration of our ancient privileges, civil and sacred, and a perpetual exemption from all taxes, but such as we shall think fit to impose on ourselves.

B. ARNOLD.

New-York, Oct. 20, 1780.

Prisoners at Worcester.

To the editor of the Boston Patriot.—Sir, The Worcester Gazette, of the 5th instant, charges me, as marshal of this district, with having executed in a rude and unfeeling manner, the president's mandate for the imprisonment of the ten British officers, prisoners of war, confined in the gaol of that county.

That the reputation of the country may not be implicated, I publicly pronounce this charge, and others of a similar kind in the same paper, to be grossly and maliciously and totally false; and the writer, if an inhabitant of Worcester, must have known when writing the paragraph, that he was giving circulation to a falsehood, which has no color or pretence of truth.

That the public may judge of the manner in which these officers were treated, I take the liberty to state, that I arrived in Worcester about twelve o'clock at noon; and, by my deputy, requested the officers to meet me at major Mower's tavern, which they did, (with the exception of the German officers, who were quartered about two miles from thence;) the orders of the government were then stated to them, but at the request of the prisoners of war, (on their parole of honor not to avoid me) the execution of these orders was delayed until after they had dined, and it was after five o'clock in the afternoon when they were collected at the prison. During this time, the under keeper was employed in making the best accommodation for their reception, and I personally attended to see large and comfortable fires built, and that every arrangement for their convenience should be attended to. The officers behaved with great propriety, and the unpleasantness attached to the duties which had devolved on me, was increased by the rude and inflated conduct and language of ———, who most singularly stated himself to be counsel for prisoners of war, denied or doubted the right to confine them, etc.

*A name is inserted here, but the editor of the REGISTER cannot consent to give it record without publishing the reply of the accused, to which he has two objections, viz. its great length and superabundance of hard words. But he has laid it on file and may give it a place at a time of more leisure than the present.

geously abused the national government in their hearing, and openly declared "he was ready for rebellion, when British field officers were arrested?" FORGETTING THAT OUR OWN COUNTRYMEN OF EQUAL RANK, (and why may I not add of equal merit?) WERE RUDELY AND UNFEELINGLY CONSIDERED, WITH NOT HALF THE CONVENIENCES OR ACCOMMODATIONS WHICH THESE PRISONERS WERE ABOUT TO RECEIVE.

The mode of confinement was the best which the very friendly feelings of the sheriff, his deputy, the under-keeper and ———, could suggest. The prisoners were put into the debtors', and not criminals' apartments. Three dollars and fifty cents for each per week, was applied to their use, by the government, which sum supplied them with every luxury the country affords. Good feather beds, and blankets, were procured for them, and such was my anxiety that the unpleasant duty assigned me should be executed in the manner which the government directed, with as little personal inconvenience as possible, that on the tenth day of December, I addressed to colonel Grant a letter, of which the following is an extract:

"Marshal's Office, Boston, Dec. 10, 1813.

"Hon. Charles V. Grant, and the other gentlemen now confined at Worcester gaol, under a retaliatory order of the president.

"You will permit me, gentlemen, to avail myself of this occasion to state to you, that in obedience to the special orders of my government, I have given directions (and at the moment of your last arrest) that you be furnished with neat and decent beds and bedding, suitable to your rank and standing in society, as also with good provisions and firing, thereby to render your unpleasant situation as comfortable as the nature of the case will admit. It is the wish of the government you should be thus treated, and my constant endeavor shall be exerted to meet their intentions. If, therefore, it may unfortunately happen, that any neglect or deficiency may take place in your accommodation, I request your intimations to me therein, and the evil will be remedied without delay. In the execution of the unpleasant duty assigned me, I trust you will have been persuaded, I was actuated by a due sense of the very delicate situation each of us were placed in, and that the order was executed, without losing sight of the honorable situation you held with your king and country."—"You will be pleased to receive from me, as an individual, the tender of personal services, if I can be useful, and to accept the assurances, &c. (Signed,) J. PRINCE, Marshal."

It is true that "no state authority" was obtained or confided these prisoners. By a law passed February 26, 1790, the free use of the commonwealth's goals are ceded to the United States for the confinement of their prisoners; and this "state authority" gives the marshal the same right to put the United States' prisoners in gaol, that the sheriff has to put therein the prisoners of the commonwealth. This authority was used by me; but without any authority, the precautions I had taken to prevent their escape, were removed the same night, and intimations given of that hostility to government which would be equally willing to prevent their confinement, or favor their escape.

Before the prisoners were taken into close custody, and while, on parole, intimation was given to one of them of the probable cause of my visit to Worcester, and an offer made to him of a horse and chaise to assist his escape, which the officer (having more honor than the traitor who made it,) indignantly refused.

My orders from the commissary general of prisoners were to proceed with all delicacy possible, consistent with peremptory obligations imposed upon him. I have done so. The prisoners were neither hurried to gaol, nor harshly treated when confined. The angry and passionate declamations of their friends added nothing to their misfortune, nor did it intimidate the officers of the national government from effectually obeying the orders which they went to execute.

The personal scurrility which the Worcester paragraph contains, I pass by as the idle wind, which I regard not. My only object is to satisfy my fellow-citizens, that the fair and unsullied fame of our beloved country for humanity, and the virtues of civilization, have not been stained by any act of mine. If the friends of these British officers can as well excuse themselves for the escape which has recently been effected, as they can justify the country or its officers from the charge of rude and unfeeling conduct, it will be well for their personal character, and for the laws of the state.

JAMES PRINCE, Marshal Dist. Mass.
Marshal's Office, January 14, 1814.

By an advertisement of the marshal, it appears that nine of these officers made their escape from the jail, on the evening of the 12th instant. He describes their persons, and offers $500 reward for their apprehension, or so in like proportion for the number recovered, with reasonable expenses, and adds—

"And whereas there is just cause to believe that the said British officers detained as aforesaid, have received aid and comfort since their confinement, and are now secreted and assisted so as to effectuate their final escape by evil disposed and corrupt citizens, who prefer the interest of the enemy to their own country. To such aid to all others, I warn them of the consequences resulting from such traitorous conduct as giving counsel, aid and comfort to a public enemy, especially those situated as are these British officers—and while I call on the good citizens of the nation to be active and zealous in the premises—I do also offer a reward of Five Hundred Dollars, to any person or persons who having knowledge of such treacherous conduct may give information as may lead to a conviction of the traitors.

On the escape of those British officers the Boston Daily Advertiser has the following remarks. We know them are wind—but they may amuse our readers, and deserve remembrance:

"It is not true as reported, that a number of SPIRITED YOUNG MEN had determined to give marshal Prince those honors which our ancestors used to bestow on the obnoxious officers of the customs. They, to be sure, felt an indignation mixed with contempt at the arrogance of the latter part of this advertisement for the apprehension of THOSE GALLANT OFFICERS whom Mr. Madison has seized to answer for the lives of some self-acknowledged traitors. Who authorized Mr. Prince to characterize the alleviating the sufferings of the victims of a barbarous and cruel policy as "treason," and to offer a reward for the apprehension of such "traitors," we are yet to learn.

One would think the deepest malice would be satisfied with having taking up, and turned into apartments without any comforts but straw beds and a miserable rug those young men whose only crime was that of being born in the country of Montgomery and Gates or La Fayette, or of having served the same monarch whom Washington once served.

I tell marshal Prince to his head, that should he succeed in recapturing them, (if they are accessible) I will not hesitate to join in giving them the "aid and comfort" of all the luxuries which may alleviate their unmerited sufferings. Some men seem to feel only for culprits. If these officers had committed murder and piracy like Dalton or Tuily, we should then hear marshal Prince's humanity trumpet forth, his sending them a bottle of wine, and weeping over their fate.

If I had a brother, a father or a son now retained in Canada to answer for these said gallant officers, I would offer a reward of five hundred dollars to any one who would facilitate the escape of these Englishmen as the surest way of saving the life of my friend. I believe every humane man, every one who felt a horror (almost universal) at the idea of exposing not only the lives of these innocent men, but as many of our own officers, for some British traitors justly condemned by their own laws, felt a joy at their escape and pray that they may not be retaken. On the escape of these nine depend the lives of eighteen innocent human beings, the victims of Mr. Madison's novel policy.—Both Mr. Madison and Mr. Prince, if they wish to avoid the stings of remorse in this world and the guilt of shedding innocent blood in the next, ought to rejoice in the liberation of these men.

For my part I wish they only had marshal Prince on foot in pursuit. I think if they have any wind or bottom, I would take any odds against the lynx-eyed full blooded greyhound of Mr. Madison."

The following account of the escape of the prisoners is given in the Worcester Aegis:

"On the evening of Wednesday, the 12th instant, nine of the British officers confined in this town, effected their escape in the following manner.—Between nine and ten o'clock, the gaoler's assistant entered the room where these officers were confined, to see that they were safe and to lock them up for the night. He had no sooner stepped within the door, than the prisoners seized him, held a pistol to his breast, and threatened him with instant death if he made the least noise or resistance. They proceeded to make fast his feet and hands, and to put a gag into his mouth, so that he could neither move nor utter any distinctly audible sound. They then issued from the door and betook themselves to flight. In the course of half an hour, the young man, by violent struggling, extricated his feet and crawled into the gaoler's house, when the gag was removed, he made known what had taken place. In the course of the night, and during several days, pursuit was made, and five of the prisoners were brought back and safely lodged in prison. Four remain untaken. On Saturday, those in custody left town in carriages, for Pittsfield or Albany."

The Aegis adds, that in consequence of the loose manner in which the sheriff held the prisoners, arrangements had been made to convey them to a place of greater security. The fact is supposed to have been communicated to them. The sheriff the next day offered $20 a piece for their apprehension, but does not appear to have taken any other measure to re-possess himself of them.

Proceedings of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, January 23.—After disposing of many private petitions, the day was chiefly occupied by a committee of the whole, on the bill for an extension of enlistments. It was passed to a third reading.

Friday, January 21.—Mr. Robertson, after some remarks on the subject, among which he observed it was singular that there was nothing in the constitution or the law which points out the manner in which one of the most important rights belonging to man in his social character, is to be exercised, &c. offered the following resolution—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law for the exercise of the right of expatriation, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Laid on the table.

The bill which passed this house for filling the ranks and encouraging enlistments into the army of the United States, was returned from the senate with sundry amendments, the object of which was in the first place, to vary the mode of the distribution of the bounty, retaining the same amount, so as to give only twenty-five dollars on enlistment and a like sum on mustering, instead of fifty in each case, as proposed by the bill that passed this house; and in the next place, to vary the proposition granting eight dollars to every person procuring a recruit.

The house refused to agree with the amendments of the senate—94 to 54.

The engrossed bill authorizing the enlistment of certain regiments for five years or during the war, was read a third time.

After some speaking on the subject the previous question was called for, and carried 79 to 54—the main question was then put and decided in the affirmative 90 to 15.

The yeas and nays were—

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnard, Beall, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Butler, Caldwell, Calloun, Chappell, Clouton, Comstock, Condit, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Davis of Penn. NAYS.—Messrs. Baylies, of Mass. Bigelow, Brigham, Champion, Ely, Hale, Hufly, Mosely, Pearson, John Reed, Taggart, Ward of Mass. White, Wilson of Mass. Winter.—15.

The house then adjourned at a late hour.

Saturday, Jan. 22.—Mr. Ingersol reported a bill to fix the residence of the attorney-general at the seat of government.

The bill from the senate for the relief of the inhabitants of the island of Nantucket was passed, 105 to 8.

The amendments of this house to the senate's bill for extending the enlistments of certain regiments, were returned from the senate disagreed to; and the house, on motion of Mr. Troup, receded from its amendments.

The house insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the senate to the bill to provide for filling the ranks of the army. Committees of conference have been appointed.

Monday, January 24.—Mr. Law, of Con. after some remarks, in too low a voice to be heard by the reporter, called the attention of the house to the story about certain blue lights which had been put in circulation, and had received countenance by the publication of an official letter from one of our naval officers to the head of a department—and which was calculated to draw down odium on a part of the state which he represented. That letter to which he alluded contained a charge against certain persons in Connecticut, not exactly of their having afforded aid and comfort to the enemy, but of having afforded them intelligence, by means of those lights, which had the effect of aiding the enemy in their operations. The motion Mr. L. was about to make, was not, he said, induced by any belief that the report was correct; for he could not believe that his native town contained in its bosom men so abandoned as to light those torches. The conduct of those people in protecting the ships of war of the United States from those of the enemy during the last summer, precluded the suspicion of such a charge being correct as to them. Mr. L. took a brief view of the manner in which the state of Connecticut had patriotically defended the United States' squadron when the general government was unable to defend it from the blockading squadron of the enemy. In that service the state troops or militia had remained until November, at which time the United States had collected, as was supposed, a sufficient force to answer the purpose. The United States then having a garrison in the fort, it was presumed the commander of that force had kept up proper guards and patrols about the points in the neighborhood; and yet, in the month of December, on these very points these wicked lights, these torches of treason were said to have been exhibited. He could not believe, under these circumstances, that these lights were exhibited as represented, but that some delusion must have existed on the subject. It was proper, he conceived, that the fact should be enquired into, and placed on its proper footing, as it had been alluded to frequently in this house. With this view he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire whether any treasonable correspondence has been held, or information by means of blue lights or signals by fire given from the shore at or near the harbor of New-London in the state of Connecticut, to the blockading squadron off that harbor, whereby the enemy might learn the state, condition or movements of the American ships under the command of commodore Decatur now in that port; and that the committee be authorised to take evidence by deposition or otherwise as they may deem necessary, and report thereon to this house.

Mr. Mosely supported the motion. Mr. Grundy was willing such an enquiry should be made, if the matter were referred to the naval committee.

Mr. Fisk said he was sorry to hear a wish expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee for the proposed enquiry. When he looked at the principle of this motion, he trembled at the consequences of its adoption. What was the principle? It was nothing more than a proposition to exercise, through a committee of this house, the inquisitorial power to enquire whether treason has been committed in a particular instance. He hoped no such precedent would receive the sanction of the house.

Mr. Eppes and Mr. Jackson of Va. opposed it. Mr. Roberts moved to lay it on the table. Mr. Calhoun thought it a matter too diminutive to engage this house. The motion was finally laid on the table.

Townsend's letter again.—Mr. Roberts offered for consideration, without preface, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the message of the president, communicating a report to the secretary of the state, respecting the translation of a letter addressed by the late minister of France to the secretary of state, bearing date on or about the fourteenth of June, 1809, which it appear from said report has been irregularly withdrawn from the department of state, be referred to the committee of foreign relations, to investigate when, by whom and in what manner the said translation of a letter was so withdrawn, and when and in what manner it came into the possession of Alexander C. Hanson, a member of this house, and that the said committee be authorised to send for persons and papers.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun the resolve was amended, by a vote of 75 to 48, so as to substitute a select committee for the "committee of foreign relations."

Several members expressed their weariness with this matter. Mr. Grosvenor moved to amend the resolution by adding the following—"and also when and in what manner the original of such translation was withdrawn from the department of state." Several other members spoke to the resolution, and Mr. McKim moved that it should lie on the table, which was agreed to—ayes 80, nays 62.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole. Mr. Nelsen of Va. in the chair, on the bill for prohibiting the delivery of libelled merchandize or goods to the owners thereof, pending its trial.

After debate, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Tuesday, January 25.—Mr. Troup, from the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the bill, for filling the ranks of the army, &c. made a report, which was ordered to lie on the table—for the purpose of awaiting, it is presumed, the decision of the senate on the said report.

State advances of money.—The speaker laid before the house the following report:

War Department, 24th January, 1814.

Sir,—In obedience to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 15th instant, I have the honor to transmit the enclosed letter and account.

By the former it appears, that no claims (other than those of the state of Virginia) for monies advanced by states, or territories, in calling into the service of the United States, detachments of militia, are filed with the accountant of the war department; and by the latter is shown, the items in the accounts rendered by the state of Virginia, which have been adjusted under the authority of existing laws, and those which require legislative provision. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The hon. Mr. Cheves, speaker of the house of representatives,
Department of War, Accountant's Office,
January 22, 1814.

Sir—In conformity to the resolution of the 15th instant, I enclose a copy of a letter from the governor of Virginia, addressed to the secretary of war, and by him referred to this office; and a copy of my letter in reply to the governor, together with a copy of the list of disallowed charges, on settlement at this office on the 17th November, 1812, as well as the amount of the monies now standing to the debit of the state of Virginia, on the books of this office. There are no other documents in this office, touching the subject of the resolution of the house of representatives, no accounts being filed here for monies advanced by states or territories, in calling into the service of the United States detachments of militia. Respectfully, I am &c.

W. SIMMONS.

The secretary of war.

(Copy.)

Richmond, October 14, 1812.

Sir—Enclosed I transmit an account of the Commonwealth against the United States, and the vouchers in support thereof. I beg leave to suggest to you, the indispensable necessity of a prompt attention to this subject, as the contingent fund, upon which we have been compelled to draw for a great proportion of this account, is entirely exhausted, and claims against the state, which depend upon that fund for payment, are suspended. If a difficulty should arise to any of the items, it may be a subject of future discussion. In the interim it is important to us, that so much of the account as is admitted should be forthwith discharged. If convenient, a draft on the bank here will be most acceptable.

With high respect, &c.

(Signed) J. BARBOUR.

The secretary of war, Washington.

*Department of War, Accountant's Office,
Nov. 17, 1812.*

Sir—The secretary of war has referred to this office your letter to him of the 13th ult. together with the accounts accompanying it. These accounts, as well as those heretofore rendered by the state of Virginia, have been acted on, and such parts admitted as it is thought the military laws of the United States, existing at the time the disbursements were made, would authorize. A copy of the account current now enclosed, will shew you the items, composing the sum of $17,159 31, the amount admitted. And the accompanying statements embrace all the charges made by the state which have been disallowed, with the causes of such disallowance noted. Such of the rejected vouchers as are not on file in this office, were returned to Mr. Henning: a list of which is added to statement, No. 1, herewith. The balance in favor of the United States is $2114 10, as will appear from the enclosed account current.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) WM. SIMMONS.

His excellency James Barbour,

Governor of the state of Virginia, Richmond.

On motion of Mr. Epes, the report was referred to the select committee, having the subject under consideration.

The engrossed bill "for the more effectual enforcing of the non-importation laws, by forbidding the courts to deliver to the claimants, pending the trial, merchandize or other articles seized under the same," was read a third time and passed, by the following vote:—For the bill 87, against it 55.

So the bill was passed and sent to the senate, for consideration.

A committee of the whole went through and reported to the house a bill to prohibit the ransoming of vessels. The provision to take effect on the first day of April next.

FILLING THE RANKS, &c.

A message from the senate was read, concurring with the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the bill for filling the ranks, encouraging enlistments, &c.—and the house took up the message.

Mr. Troup stated that the report of the conferees had been made upon the principle of compromise, and amounted to this—that the house was to recede from its disagreement to the senate's amendment so far as relates to an increase of the land bounty, and the senate was to recede from its amendment to the bill respecting the money bounty; so that, if the bill was agreed to, the whole bounty in money would be 124 dollars to each recruit—50 on enlistment, 50 on mustering the recruit, and 24 on the discharge from service; the land bounty remaining as it has heretofore been. Mr. T. related the arguments which had been used in committee, &c. and recommended an acceptance of the report.

The report was accepted by the house without a division.

[So that the bill wants only the signature of the president to become a law.]

Mr. Hopkins (of N. Y.) after some introductory remarks in which he dwelt particularly on the burning of Newark and the distresses of the people on the Niagara frontier, offered the following resolution—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law for the indemnity or relief of those who have suffered losses by the irruption of the enemy on the Niagara frontier: and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Calhoun of S. C. observed that this motion embraced a novel principle; on which the house ought to have time to reflect, and therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. Troup rose chiefly to state a fact in relation to the burning of Newark.

The commanding officer in that quarter had been ordered by the secretary of war, to destroy Newark in one event only—when it should be absolutely necessary to the safety of fort George. It could only have become so in case of an attack on fort George, the enemy availing himself of Newark as a place of shelter. Now no attack had been made on fort George; and the burning of Newark was of course not consequent to any order of government, but the disobedience or misconduct of the commanding officer.

The motion of Mr. Hopkins was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Kilbourn introduced a resolution having for its object to increase the pay of the seamen on the lakes, on account of some objections they were stated to have to that service. After some remarks from Mr. Lowndes, Mr. K's resolution being on its passage, was negatived—Ayes 26.

Wednesday, Jan. 26.—The bill to prohibit the ransoming of ships or vessels, was passed; ayes 80, nays 57.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill to raise three additional rifle regiments.

After some time spent therein, in which one long speech was made without mentioning the bill before the house, the committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OUR FRIGATES.—There has been much debating and controversy in the British parliament respecting the frequent sailing and safe arrival of our frigates. The President, com. Rodgers, is particularly pointed at. Some say there is not force enough on the American coast, (though they have one hundred and sixty war-vessels in our seas,) and others that the force is not properly disposed; but the ministerialists say that the thing complained of is owing entirely to the enterprize of the Yankees. Lord Castlereagh said that "the demand [for men] on the American station had been prodigious." Mr. J. Baring declared that the "30 or 40 vessels in the Cheapeake had disgraced the country, as well by their ineffectiveness as by their mode of carrying on the war." Mr. Croker said that the British fleets had performed all that the country expected of them. The matter ended by voting 140,000 men for the naval service of the year.

MASSACHUSETTS.—In the house of representatives, January 14—Mr. Otis laid upon the table a resolve, expressive of the duty of the state of Massachusetts to aid the governor of Vermont and the people of that state, or any other state, with their whole power, in enabling them to support their constitutional rights, whenever the same shall be in danger of infringement from any quarter, and that it will be the duty of the legislature, whenever requested by the legislature of Vermont, or other state, upon due evidence of such infringement, to make provision by law for their effectual support. Ordered to lay upon the table of the house till further orders.

PENNSYLVANIA.—In the senate a few days ago, Mr. Gemmil, after some pointed remarks, presented to the chair the following resolution—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill granting to each one of the first fifteen hundred men, being inhabitants of this commonwealth, who shall before the first day of April next, enlist in the service of the United States, for and during the present war, a bounty of dollars in addition to the bounty which may be offered, for the same term of service, by the government of the U. States.

ENGLAND.—The London papers of the 5th of Nov. are filled with speeches in the British Parliament on the motions in the two houses for addresses to the prince regent in answer to his speech. The addresses were unanimously agreed to in each branch. The members of parliament and the London editors discovered that they were in high spirits.

Extract from speech of Lord Compton.

"He now would turn to the new world, and lamented that a nation professing principles of liberty, should have united in support of the most execrable despotism, and counteracted the progress of the cause of European freedom. He might be told, that America was not the ally of France. He knew that she had not signed and sealed a formal treaty of alliance with that country; but she had formed that species of alliance which was fully an equivalent, by giving her all the assistance of her power in the contest now waging. However, he hoped the hour of her awakening to her true interest drew near.

"She had already been roused from her dream of maritime superiority, by the thunder of the Shannon; and when she saw the heroic and successful resistance of Canada—when she found her commerce annihilated, her ports blockaded, her armies captured and destroyed, she must perceive the nullity of her efforts to injure our power; and, with the declining fortunes of France, her blindness must dissipate, her eyes open to the light, and her mind to wisdom."

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—The London Courier of November 4, contains the first account of Perry's glorious victory on lake Erie. The same day the prince regent makes his speech in which he says all our efforts against Canada had failed. And on the same day, Lord Castlereagh, the prime minister, writes a letter to our secretary of state, proposing negotiations for peace.

GEN. HULL.—Two lawyers have appeared at Albany, as counsel for gen. Hull, who has requested that his counsel may exercise the same privileges before the court martial as if in a court of law. This is contrary to precedent and practice; but the court will decide on the matter. Gen. Cass, Dr. Eastin, late secretary of war, col. Miller and several other important witnesses have arrived at Albany; and it is expected the court will now proceed in the regular examination of them.

TWISTING.—The London editors declare most solemnly that the fleet which Perry took on lake Erie was not a part of the royal navy, but a mere local force—a provincial thing, of no consequence at all.

PRISONERS.—Com. Berric of the Dragon 74, commanding the enemy squadron blockading the Chesapeake, lately observed to a private gentleman who went on board his ship with a flag from Norfolk, that he had about 160 American prisoners on board the squadron; that he had not the means of making them comfortable; but was compelled to keep them on half allowance of very bad provisions—that he was anxious to get rid of them, but no application had been made for their release—and rather than detain them in their distressing situation he would give them up on a bare receipt for them. Which being reported to general Taylor, at Norfolk, though he was not regularly authorised to interfere in the matter, he despatched a cartel with such proposals as it was in his power to make, and commodore Berric returned 139 of the prisoners, the rest being detained to condemn the prizes sent to Bermuda.

SMUGGLING.—We yet have a good deal of smuggling to the eastward. There has been a great trade with Halifax, but the "commerce," we think, is nearly "destroyed." Several valuable seizures have lately been made.

VIGILANCE.—The cartel ship Fair American lately sailed from New York with an United States messenger, and several other passengers for England—the messenger proceeds to St. Petersburg. After the sailing of the vessel, eleven persons were found snugly stowed away in different parts of the ship who has not procured passports. They were brought back in the revenue cutter, and while on board the cutter destroyed a number of letters and papers.

ALEXANDER.—It would be well for those who affect so much regard for the emperor of Russia, to weigh well his sentiment in regard to the war between the United States and Great Britain. See the documents inserted in the last number—the official note says—"His majesty who takes pleasure in doing justice to the wisdom of the United States of America, is convinced that it has done all that that it could to prevent this rupture." But it is all hypocrisy—we are England out of the question, Alexander would be disregarded. The same persons call themselves disciples of Washington and eddily talk of treason.

The British appear to have closely confined every American officer at Halifax. The gallant fellows, on several occasions, met the usage of the enemy with three cheers! There is no whining or whimpering. The soul of these men is embarked in the cause of their country; and

"Even in the dark and dreary damp of dungeons
The soul can rear its sceptre, smile at anguish,
And triumph o'er oppression."

MR. CLAY was to have left Washington City yesterday (Friday) for N. York, to embark for Gottenburg.

DISTRUCTION.—A Boston NEWSPAPER has killed off, and reduced a Virginia regiment that was 800 strong, to about 70 men, in a few months, by disease—and then adds the following pious and patriotic remarks:

"1st. It evinces a most sinful negligence in the medical department of the army. What a waste of human life has arisen from the pitiful policy which actuated the government in their appointments of the medical staff!

"2dly. From this peculiar mortality in the Virginia troops, we infer that southern constitutions are incapable of sustaining the hardships of a campaign in this rigorous northern climate.

"3dly. In this fact and in the dreadful destruction of the Kentucky troops at the beginning of the war; we may see the just judgment of God upon those parts of the country which have been most instrumental in plunging us into the wicked contest."

A REMARK.—The burning of Arcaule has excited great sensibility in certain members of congress, who never said one word in reprehension of the destruction of Beauregard's, Fredericktown, George town, Frederick-town, of the ravishments at Hampton, the murders by the British at the river Raisin, or of the devastation of the savages under the agency of the English.

"THE WELL INCLINED."—A party of 13 mounted infantry was sent out from Burlington, Vt. towards the lines, to look out for some dear lovers of "commerce," or in other words, smugglers. On their return after an unsuccessful search, they stopped to refresh themselves at a public house. While there, they were attacked by a gang of 30 armed villains, who immediately commenced a fire upon them. One of the soldiers was killed and five taken prisoners, by the smugglers. How superabundant is our country of scoundrels.

We have had the pleasure to notice the safe arrival of many very valuable American vessels within a few days last past.

WAR SHIP.—The ingenious and indefatigable Robert Fulton, (says the Aurora) we find has directed his attention to the employment of steam-boats for purposes of public defence, in the harbors and waters of the United States. The following is a copy of a certificate from some of our most distinguished naval officers, which is so explicit in description and so conclusive in the judgment given on it, that no remarks of ours are necessary, and could not add to the weight of the opinions given. We hope it will meet their attention where it should, to which its importance entitles it.

NEW-LONDON, January 3, 1814.

We, the undersigned, have this day examined the model and plans of a vessel of war, submitted to us by ROBERT FULTON, to carry twenty-four guns, twenty-four or thirty-two pounders, and use red hot shot, to be propelled by steam at the speed of from four to five miles an hour, without the aid of wind or tide. The properties of which vessel are: That without masts or sails, she can move with sufficient speed; that her machinery being guarded she cannot be crippled; that her sides are so thick as to be impenetrable to every kind of shot—and in a calm, or light breeze, she can take choice of position or distance from an enemy. Considering the speed which the application of steam has already given to heavy floating bodies, we have full confidence, that should such a vessel move only four miles an hour, she could, under the favorable circumstances which may always be gained over enemies' vessels in our ports, harbors, bays and sounds, be rendered more formidable to an enemy than any kind of engine hitherto invented. And in such case she would be equal to the destruction of one or more seventy-fours, or of compelling her or them to depart from our waters. We, therefore give it as our decided opinion, that it is among the best interests of the United States to carry this plan into immediate execution.

(Signed) STEPHEN DECATUR,
J. A. JONES,
J. BIDDLE.

NEW-YORK, Jan. 10, 1814.

We, the subscribers, having examined the model of the above described vessel of war, to be propelled by steam, do fully concur in the above opinion of the practicability and utility of the same.

Boston, January 18.

NEUTRALITY.—A Swedish schooner, which arrived at Gloucester a few days since, and was reported to be from St. Barts, but was seized on suspicion of coming from Halifax—disappeared on Sunday night the 16th inst. We are informed she had a custom-house officer and three men on board, and that a number of persons went on board the same night, and very quietly set them on shore.

MILITARY.

The Petersburg Volunteers, having returned to their homes, have been received by their fellow-citizens with singular honors. "The pride of Sparta (said the orator) were the heroes of Thermopylae—the pride of Virginia the heroes of Fort Meigs."

The agent for prisoners at Burlington, Vt. advertises one captain, one ensign and four sergeants, British officers, who unmindful of the honorable obligations contracted by them, have effected their escape in violation of their paroles. The ensign is a native of New-Hampshire, and the four sergeants were born in Vermont. The latter were young men, viz. 21, 27, 28 and 35 years of age, respectively.

A very considerable number of officers have lately started to return to the Canada frontier.

Recruiting.—Captain Gill, late first-lieutenant of the Baltimore volunteers, now of the U. S. Sea Fencibles, recruited a company consisting of 104 non-commissioned officers and privates, in twenty-nine days. We believe this company, with another that is raising, is to be in some degree attached to the flotilla designed for the defence of the upper part of the Chesapeake bay.

It is supposed that lieutenant-general Drummond has gone up for the purpose of attacking Devoit; but our force at that place is very respectable, and several corps of militia were about to march for the defence of the ground we had gained. Harrison will probably proceed to the frontier. The Indians appear faithful to the peace that we granted them.

The following is a list of the British corps now serving in Canada:—1st, (or Royals) 1st battalion; 8th, 13th, 41st, 49th, 89th, 100th, 103d, and 104th regiments; 10th Royal Veteran battalion; Royal Newfoundland, Canadian and Glangary Fencibles, corps of Voltigeurs; Watteville's and Meuron's regiments; 19th Light Dragoons; detachments of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers; Artillery drivers and corps of Royal Sappers and Miners with an extensive commissariat department.

The Creeks.—We are without distinct intelligence of the state of things in the Creek country; but we presume that nothing important has latterly happened.

Wilkinson's army.—We have very satisfactory accounts from this part of the national force. The men are comfortably provided, and so well fitted that if the enemy shall attack them we have no reason to fear the result. The general has recovered his health; he proceeded to Plattsburg and reviewed the troops at that post on the 11th instant. He has since been on to Waterford but was to have returned to the lines about a week since. He appears to be popular with the army, and to have excited the respect of the citizens on the frontier.

"We have it from good authority, (says a Burlington, Vt. paper) that 130 yoke of oxen have "gone over" to the British to assist in transporting their military stores, &c. This is very unpleasant."

Brigadier-general Winder, arrived in Baltimore, on Thursday last from Quebec, and proceeded yesterday for Washington city. He is said to be on parole and to return to Quebec.

One thousand men, of the North-Carolina militia, have been called for by major-general Pinkney, to march to Fort Stoddert, to relieve the Georgia troops.

The Burlington paper of the 21st inst. says that a party of dragoons under corporal Brecken, surprized the enemy's picket at Olatown and brought off a sergeant major and eight men. A British major Goodhue, with one private and a bugle horn, has been taken at Champlain. The major says he came out with a flag of truce, but lost it.

Extract of a letter from brigadier-general Floyd, to major-general Pickens, dated Fort Mitchell, Jan 29, 1814.

"By the Indians it is reported, that the army from Mobile, on the 30th ult. destroyed Choctawhatchee, an Indian town of SEVEN HUNDRED inhabitants, situated about thirty or thirty-five miles below the fork of the Coosau and Tallapoosa, and that a heavy firing of cannon and small arms has been since heard in the neighborhood of Tustigea, still higher up.

"They also state, that the British had arrived at Pensacola, and are holding out inducements to the war party of Indians to persist in their designs, by abundant presents of goods and ammunition: and that McQueen has sent a party to procure the latter article.

"I give this information as I received it."

Plattsburg, January 15.—At the time of the last alarm, the magistracy and other inhabitants of this place, addressed general Wilkinson on the subject of the public property stored here, and of their own critical situation. The letter was answered in a style of politeness indicating both the gentleman and the man of feeling—several bodies of infantry and dragoons were immediately ordered to march, and have since arrived at this place.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.

One good, at least, is likely to result from the incursion of the barbarians; which is a union of sentiment and of action among the people of the Niagara frontier. This wholesome spirit has been purchased dearly; but had it existed from the beginning, there is reason to believe that the late disastrous events might not have happened. The citizens have seen the British, and know the magnitude of the falsehood that says they are just and magnanimous. They find they must rally round the standard of their country, if they would preserve their own safety. Party politics have nothing to do with a foreign enemy, and the savage will not hold his tomahawk to ask, if the victim be a republican or a federalist.

Among the persons murdered at Lewiston and Schlosser, in addition to those already alluded to, were Miles Gillet and a young brother, Mr. Mack, Mr. Towbridge, Mr. Tiffany and captain Rose. They were stripped, scalped and had their hearts torn out. Several families, men women and children, were taken into Canada, confined together as prisoners.

Some straggling parties of the marauders in the neighborhood of fort Niagara, have been taken by the militia.

At Buffalo the enemy destroyed every house and building except the jail, a blacksmith's shop and one small house. They made a circuit round Buffalo of about two miles, and desolated the country. The schooners Ariel, Little Belt, and sloop Trippe, lying at Black Rock, were destroyed. Our loss in killed at Buffalo, was between 30 and 40, who were all mangled—besides this, about 70 of the wounded were afterwards murdered—the bodies of all were horribly mangled. The force that attacked Buffalo was commanded by major-general Riall, and consisted of about 1500 regulars, 500 militia, and 800 or 1000 Indians. They entered the place immediately on the retreat of major-general Hull with the militia, and committed deeds that honor blushes at.

Children have been separated from their parents and parents robbed of their children. The white and red enemy were alike savage and barbarous. The following incident is mentioned—and it is believed that many of the apparent Indians were really Englishmen, who cloaked their horrid propensities in the disguise of the savages.—"A white man, whose savage heart had induced him to adorn his person with an Indian dress, was shot near Daniel's inn, 14 miles from Batavia, by Dr. Turtelot, while attempting to make his escape from the guard. He was taken a prisoner a short distance from Buffalo, and was one among a party of Indians who had just plundered and set Hodge's brick house on fire. He was known to be a prominent leader among the Indians, stimulating them to the commission of the most wanton and cruel barbarities. There is but one wrong attending this transaction, that is, ever taking him prisoner."

The Canandaigua paper says—"We are sorry to learn that a number of Canadian citizens, old Tories, taken prisoners at Newark and sent into the United States, some time last summer, should be permitted at this important crisis to return to the enemy—but such is the fact. Several have passed through this village within a few days, on their way to Buffalo, who will undoubtedly be able to give the enemy very important information."

It appears that many were killed in fort Niagara after resistance had ceased. The whole were scalped.

The enemy crossed into Canada from Buffalo on the 1st inst. They yet hold Niagara, and probably will possess it some time, for it is a strong place.

Liberal subscriptions have been made at Albany and many other places for the relief of the sufferers by the incursion of the barbarians.

NAVAL.

The privateer True Blooded Yankee, fitted out in one of the French ports, is still successfully employed on the British coasts, making many prizes.

It appears that eight or ten French frigates are at sea. Two of them have lately been captured, under the very singular circumstances mentioned in the following article from a late British paper—"Naval twins.—The Weser and Traver. Some singular coincidences are connected with these frigates. Their keels were laid down on the same day; they were launched the same day; sailed the same day; were dismasted on the same day; were brought into Plymouth on the same day, and had a similar number of men and weight of metal. Their crews were entirely composed of young men from the age of 18 to 22, most of whom have volunteered into the British service. They were originally conscripts."

☞ This is inserted among our "events of the war" to shew British NATURALIZATION.

The Junon and Tenedos have arrived at Halifax from Boston bay—45 of the crew of the former were badly frozen: and 5 or 6 of the latter in irons for attempting an escape.

The Fly, from Jamaica for London, captured by the President frigate, has been recaptured by the Melpomene.

The freedom of the city of Dublin has been granted to captain Broke, of the Shannon.

A report prevailed in New-York, some days ago, said to have been founded upon the declaration of certain prisoners who had been on board the Orpheus frigate—that that frigate in company with a 74 had chased the President—that Rodgers waited for the frigate, (out sailing the ship of the line) and gave her three broadsides which shattered her dreadfully and killed and wounded 63 men, among them the captain—by this time the 74 had got as close as Rodgers thought necessary, and he went on his cruise. The story may be true, but we do not believe it.

A party of men were landed from the Herald sloop of war on the 22nd ult. who destroyed the fort lately erected at the Balize, mouth of the Mississippi.

Captain Porter has lost three of his prizes on our coast—viz. the Policy, Georgiana, and Mary-Ann, re-captured by the enemy.

The elegant privateer ship Jacob Jones, of 600 tons, carrying 20 twelve pounders and a picked crew of 127 men, lately sailed from Boston, for a cruise in the Indian seas.

The Erie flotilla.—It is stated that about 2000 men have collected at Erie for the defence of the flotilla at that place. They with capt. Elliott and his gallant sailors, we trust, will be competent to any exigency.

The Ontario flotilla.—We learn there are 400 ship carpenters employed at Sackett's Harbor. It is thought the enemy designs to attack that place from Kingston. If he does we do not fear but that he will be beaten.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant Claxton to his father in Washington city, dated MACEDONIAN, New-London, Jan. 19, 1814.

Dear father—For the two last days we have been all anxiety, an American captain returned on parole from the Ramilies, 74, a few days since, and communicated to commodore Decatur, a consultation he had with captain Hardy, in which the latter said "that now that two frigates were off, of equal force to the United States and Macedonian, that he should have no objection to a meeting taking place, but that he could not allow the challenge to come from the English commanders." The hunt was embraced in a moment, and captain Biddle dispatched with a challenge from our commanders. In the mean time every preparation was made, on our side, for an immediate engagement, which we all supposed no objection could be made to, the crew of both ships were called together, and addressed by their commanders, who made known to them the substance of the business then on foot, they were answered by three hearty cheers. Captain Jones concluded his short but pertinent address in the following words, spoken with great modesty, "my lads, our cruise will be short, and I trust a very profitable one." Captain Biddle went on board the 74, a signal was immediately made for the two commanders of the English frigates, and they went on board. Captain Hardy addressed them, "gentlemen here are two letters for you, it rests altogether with you to decide on the matter," Stackpole of the Statera, answered with the greatest affectionation "pon honor, sir, it is the most acceptable letter I ever received." The final answer was to be given yesterday. Captain Biddle returned and related the circumstances as I have mentioned. For myself I thought from the manner of Stackpole that he would be the first to finish, I am not able to say that he did, it is enough, that the captain of the Borer (sloop of war) came in yesterday and made known that they had declined meeting us. This circumstance has made a vast deal of conversation much to the credit of our commanders—it will probably be distorted into a hundred different shapes before it is done with, I have therefore given you a correct though brief account of it. The Endymion, mounts the same weight of metal with the United States and three or four guns more, and the Statera is superior to us by one or two guns. The disappointment is very great with us, for every soul calculated on taking her with ease. You see we must trust altogether to our heels.

Yours affectionately,

A. CLANTON.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

It is positively stated that the enemy in the bay have direct and immediate intelligence of every thing that passes at Norfolk, &c. It is supposed they obtain their information by means of certain active negroes they retain for the purpose. They also appear to be employed in building boats; keeping several negro sawyers constantly at work. The enemy is reported to have made a great distinction between their prisoners—for it is said that while the masters of northern vessels were suffered to mess with the officers, those from the south were kept forward among the men.

741. Brig ———, from St. Lucia, sent into Elizabeth city, (N. C.) laden with 140 hhd. and 200 barrels of sugar, by the Caroline of Baltimore.

742. Sloop Resolution, from Jersey for Lisbon with linen and paper—captured by the letter of marque schooner General Armstrong, on her passage from France, dispossessed of her cargo and given up to the prisoners.

743. Brig Phuibe, from Forney for Madeira, laden with butter and potatoes, captured by the same and sent to New York. The General Armstrong has arrived at New York.

744. Brig Commerce, from Martinico for Halifax, laden with rum and molasses, a prize to the letter of marque brig Flirt of New York, dismasted and otherwise severely damaged, as induced the prize crew to abandon her. She was burnt.

745. Schooner Fanny, from Trinidad, laden with sugar, carried into Charleston S. C. by the Revenge of Baltimore.

746. Brig Victoria, laden with 250 hhd. Jamaica rum, 40 hhd. sugar, and a quantity of coffee, sent into Savannah, by the Rapid, of Charleston.

747. Tryal, 200 tons, burnt by the Grand Turk.

748. Brig ———, from Lisbon, captured by ditto and ransomed for $8000.

749. Brig ———, from Halifax for England, laden with lumber, captured by ditto and burnt.

☞ The Grand Turk has arrived at Salem. Besides the above vessels, she captured and manned 2 valuable ships, 1 brig and 1 schooner. One of the ships is estimated to be worth $150,000. We wait their arrival. The G. T. cruized about 20 days in the mouth of the English channel. She had no fighting, nor was she chased by a vessel of war.

750. Schooner ———, laden with sugar, coffee, &c. sent into Sunbury, by the Patapsco, letter of marque, of Baltimore.

751. Pink Stern boat, said to belong to Herrings gut, with $20,000 worth of English goods, captured off George's river, by a row-boat privateer. He fears this is smuggling.

752. British packet Lapwing, 10 guns and 40 men, captured by the Fox of Baltimore, of 7 guns and 70 men after a desperate resistance, by boarding, in which 11 of the enemy were killed and 6 or 8 wounded. On board the privateer one man killed and three slightly wounded. The Packet has since been re-captured, but she had been divested of her valuable articles.

753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762. Ten enemy vessels, captured by the Caroline, of Baltimore, (in addition to several whose safe arrival we have noticed) divested of their valuable articles, and burnt, sunk, &c. The Caroline has arrived at Charleston, S. C. with a large amount of dry goods, &c. on board. She caught, also, two traitor vessels. The following is an extract from her log-book:—"Nov. 20, fell in with the American ship Osiris, Driggs, from Martinique bound to St.

Britholomews, with a cargo of molasses. Captain Driggs taking the Caroline for a British cruiser, showed his British license to captain Almeida, at the same time informed him that he had supplied Commodore Oliver, of his majesty's ship Valiant, off New-London, with a quantity of potatoes and apples, for which he was paid, and that he had no doubt if he fell in with an American privateer he should be hung. Put Mr. Canoning and prize crew on board the Osiris, and ordered her for the first American port."

The fate of two or three more of the Caroline's prizes is yet to be learned, being manned and ordered into port.

763. Sloop Osiris, (alluded to above) now called a Swede, having a British licence, prize to the Caroline, laden with molasses, arrived at Wilmington, N. C.

HOME MARKET.—An intelligent writer, speaking the "unbounded expansion of our commerce" in 1805—says "hence if we are prematurely urged to rival Europe in their own trades, it will be the natural result of transatlantic policy." What was matter of opinion has become fact.

There are now running in the neighborhood of Providence, R. I. no less than 120,000 spindles; these spindles make 110,000 lbs. of yarn each week, and consume about 6,000,000 lbs. of cotton per ann. The value of the cloth made from this yarn is estimated at $3,140,000 a year!

The greatest crop of cotton yet raised in the U. States, I do not believe, has exceeded 50 millions of pounds in a year. Here is a little spot—a speck of the United States, that requires at least one tenth of the mighty product; and mills for spinning cotton are to be found in every part of the union—many in Ohio, where less than 10 years ago the Indian hunted the deer. From this great attention to manufactures, it is very possible increased supplies of the raw material must be raised. It is the most profitable crop that the planter can raise, and the manufacturer in the United States can afford to pay him more for it than the European market has allowed. The idle talk about the "clearness of labor in America," is declining; and the enemies of manufactures who yet use this favorite phrase of my lord Sheffield, do not recollect how great a portion of the labor of spinning and weaving is done by machinery; and have to be told that a spindle in America, will do as much work as a spindle in England!—It is a truth, that the cost of transporting the cotton to Europe and bringing it back manufactured, calculated for the time when our intercourse with Great Britain was the least interrupted, (i. e. in 1804 or 5)—say for freight, insurance, duties and other charges, amounted to more money than the whole price paid for the labor bestowed on goods manufactured in the United States. We therefore cannot fear that our manufactories of cotton, wool, &c. will be affected, though peace should take place to-morrow. The present great profits may be reduced; but there is room enough for them to fall; while they yet may be as lucrative as any man should desire. At this time, a cotton mill is more valuable than a gold mine.

The greatest import of cotton into England was, I believe, in 1806-7—when, from all parts of the world, about 35 millions of lbs. were received, in one year. What a mighty business!—But, in from 3 to 5 years, we shall manufacture as great a quantity. The aggregate value, at the wholesale prices, may be roughly estimated at about 110 millions of dollars per ann. What a blessed "HOME INFLUENCE!" All this enormous amount of goods, we can and will

(if the world shall be at peace) undersell Great Britain in most manufactures of cotton, in the time above stated. We are not afraid of labor-saving machines; for they will not produce insurrections, starving whole societies; we have no import or export duties to pay, and many other advantages which the spirit and wants of her government cannot easily dispense to her manufactures.—Let us rejoice in these happy prospects, and exultingly point to the market at home for our surplus commodities.

HIGH TREASON.—The persons committed to Boston jail, charged with supplying the enemy with cattle at Provincetown, were examined before Judge Story. Their names are John and Ebenezer Hussey, who plead not guilty. It would be incorrect to pass judgment on these men until the affair is more fully investigated; but the facts deposed against them are pointed. One person, who was a prisoner on board the Majestic, declared he heard the officer direct the men to take the boats, as there were cattle coming down for them; it was proved that they had driven the cattle to the beach, in view of the enemy, and that one of them had a private conversation with the lieutenant of the Majestic, when he landed from that ship. The judge refused to admit them to bail.

DIRECT TAX.—The senate of Maryland originated and passed unanimously, a resolve to assume the payment of the state's quota of the direct tax; but the house of delegates refused to concur therein.

Law Intelligence.

From the New-York Advocate.

At the present term of the U. S. district court, held by the honorable William P. Van Ness, has been decided a very important point of prize law.—The property in question was claimed by Mr. Richardson, a naturalized citizen of the U. S. and had been shipped on board the Mary and Susan, an American vessel, to be imported into this country. The claimant, after his naturalization, returned to his native country, Great Britain, and continued to reside and do business there until some time after the breaking out of hostilities, when he came to the United States, and now lives in this city. His claim was rejected, and the property was condemned, upon the ground of his commercial residence or domicile being in the enemy's country at the time war was declared, and his intention to return and fix his future, permanent residence in the United States, was not announced with sufficient certainty, nor carried into effect in such a manner, as to render his naturalization available to avert the condemnation.

THE CHRONICLE.

Bonaparte, at Paris, appears to be making mighty efforts to regain the high stand he lately had. The French people seem to bear the reverse of his fortunes with magnanimity and firmness. He has had the address to persuade them that he was really victorious, but compelled to retire with loss, through the defection of his allies. It is represented that though the Saxons, as a body, deserted, the king remained faithful to his engagements; and is now a prisoner, dragged about by the Saxon generals, "the authors of the infamous treason." Powerful reinforcements are moving towards Mentz. It is not believed the allies will attempt to cross the Rhine. We have a report from Bordeaux, that a congress was to be held at Manheim to treat of a general peace. Some of the representatives have been named.

Lord Wellington is near Bayonne and it is said has commenced the bombardment of that place.

The Supplement.

The prospectus, with the receipts for those who desire the proposed supplement to the present vol. of the REGISTER, will have been forwarded to all the editor's agents by the last of next week. See the terms of it, in the paper of January 8, page 305. It is to contain twelve sheets, price one dollar; to be paid for on engaging the copy and no more to be printed than are engaged, by the middle of March next. This rule will be absolute; and gentlemen residing in places where there is no agent (if they desire to have it) will please to adopt some means, to make known their wishes to the editor, before the time stated. There are some powerful reasons for adopting this procedure, which will be explained hereafter.

The matter of the supplement will be exceedingly valuable, and the editor most earnestly recommends that every friend of the REGISTER should have it. Its contents will be miscellaneous; rich in contemporary biography, and many other departments, with some distinguished speeches in congress, &c. Any one not approving it, when received, may return it to the editor's agent, and have their money refunded, if applied for within a week after it shall come to hand.

Letters to the editor must be post-paid.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

*Gentlemen of the Senate,
and of the Assembly,*

It would have given me great satisfaction to have had it in my power to congratulate you on this occasion, upon the return and the advantages and blessings of peace. The government of the U. States, both before and since the commencement of the present war with Great Britain, has uniformly evinced a disposition to adjust, upon liberal and reciprocal terms, the existing differences between the two nations.—The appointment of envoys plenipotentiary, who repaired to Europe so early as May last, upon the proffered mediation of the emperor of Russia, furnishes an incontestible proof of that disposition. It does not appear that a spirit equally conciliatory, has influenced the councils of the enemy. The good offices of the emperor have been declined, and a proposition has been submitted to our government, by the prince regent, for transferring the theatre of negotiation to London or Gottenburgh. The president has given further evidence of his desire to terminate the calamities of war, by acceding to that overture also.—It is to be hoped, that the contemplated negotiation may result in the conclusion of an honorable and lasting peace. But, when we consider that pacific conferences are greatly pre-estimated by the proposed change of the place of treating; when we reflect upon the non-acceptance, by the prince regent, of the mediation of his illustrious friend and ally, upon the former inadmissible pretensions of the British government, and upon the terms of Lord Castlereagh's recent communication to the secretary of state, our hope of a favorable issue ought not to be sanguine. If the late proposition has proceeded from a willingness to rest our animity, upon principles which may be mutual and consistent with the established maxims of public law, the impending conferences will, very probably, eventuate propitiously. But we ought not to permit the hope of that result to lull us into a fatal security: for it may be that we must ultimately depend upon an unanimous, vigorous and successful prosecution of the unavoidable contest in which we are involved, for the establishment and security of our just rights.

It was not to be expected after so long a period of peace, that upon the first declaration of a war by the United States, a well organized and efficient army could be immediately brought into the field.—There was little of the experience of the revolution remaining in the country; and to develop military talents and national resources, and to give them the most wise and beneficial direction, is the work of time. In tracing the progress of our arms in the late campaign, however, there is as much cause of pride and congratulation as it was reasonable to hope for.

The navy has maintained, if not brightened the lustre of its antecedent character. Arduous battles and brilliant victories, surpassed by none recorded in the annals of history, and which have given splendor to the American name, have been fought and won by it. The capture of York, the taking of fort George, the conquest of Proctor's army, the subjugation of the western Indians, the successive victories over the Greeks, the defence of Sandusky, of Sackett's Harbor and of other places, were honourable to our arms, and have exhibited traits of conduct and intrepidity in the army that justify high expectations. These gratifying events, it is true, have been followed by some disappointments and disasters. Public expectation was highly excited by the last movement of the main army, and was greatly disappointed at the failure of the supposed object of that movement.

The recent invasion by the enemy of the western frontier of this state, and the extraordinary surrender to him of the garrison and fort of Niagara, the burning of flourishing villages and settlements, the pillage of private property, and the massacre of peaceable inhabitants of that frontier, by a savage foe, are melancholy occurrences, calculated to excite the liveliest sympathy for the sufferers, and to rouse the indignation of every friend of humanity and of his country. The conduct of the enemy during that invasion, was marked by a disregard of the rules of civilized warfare, and by a malignant ferocity. Many of our fellow-citizens who were at peace, with their families, were murdered and scalped. The bodies of many of those who were wounded or taken prisoners in the engagement at Black Rock, have been found mangled in the most shocking manner, by the tomahawk and scalping knife.

The distresses of the families who have thus become the victims of a cruel and unprecedented warfare, call for the immediate and liberal interposition of the legislature. The character and dignity of the state, as well as justice to our exposed and suffering fellow citizens, demand the exertion of its utmost power and resources, to punish the atrocities of the enemy, and to render that frontier secure in future from his incursions and cruelties.

The measures which were taken upon that emergency, with the requisitions, correspondence, orders and reports relating thereto, will be specially communicated without delay.

You will permit me, gentlemen, to remark in this place, that the want of some legal provision, whereby the burden of defence may be more equitably diffused, and the less wealthy part of the community relieved from the disproportionate share of actual service to which they are subjected by the existing laws, the want of legal power for enforcing summarily obedience to the authority delegated to the officers by the militia law, and to supply food, quarters and transportation for troops called out under state authority, render it impossible for the militia generals to repel invasions, immediately and effectually.

I must likewise be indulged in again soliciting the attention of the legislature to the propriety of raising corps of volunteers, of giving them suitable remuneration for their clothing, and an increase of pay. These corps might take the field upon any emergency, without the tedious process of detaching, assembling and organizing men from remote districts, and would perform any actual service which might legally be required, more usefully than detached militia.

By an act of congress, passed in June last, a direct tax was laid upon the United States; and in the apportionment, the sum of four hundred and thirty thousand, one hundred and forty-one dollars and sixty-two cents, has been imposed upon the state of New York. The same law distributes the quota of each state to the several counties thereof, but authorises the state legislatures previously to the first day of April next, to vary the apportionment, and entitles each state to a deduction of fifteen per cent. upon paying its quota into the treasury of the United States, before the 10th day of February next, and of ten per cent. if paid before the first day of May next. The limitation of time, to have the benefit of deduction of fifteen per cent. is extended by a late supplementary law, to the 20th day of February.—The advantages which will accrue to our citizens, and of course to the state, by the payment of this quota directly into the treasury, are too obvious to be enumerated. The saving to the citizens of the state, of about 65,000 dollars, and to the nation of the expense of assessment and collection, will amount to nearly one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The number of inhabitants, and the amount of wealth of the respective counties of this state, vary essentially from year to year; so that it is scarcely possible at any one time to make a perfectly equitable distribution of a tax amongst them. A considerable part of our unsettled lands are owned by non-residents. The inconveniences and sacrifices of the inhabitants of some counties, arising from their exposure to the enemy, and from the frequent calls which have unavoidably been made upon them, to perform actual militia duty, have been such, that it would at this particular juncture, be unreasonable and severe, to levy upon them any part of the direct tax. The state can advance the present tax without any material embarrassment of its treasury, or call upon its citizens.

In the year 1808, a loan at seven per cent. was made by the state to its citizens for their accommodation and relief under the then restrictive laws.—The privilege of borrowing from divers banks at five and six per cent. interest is reserved to the state in the acts giving or extending their several charters. It is therefore in our power to borrow at a moderate interest the amount of the direct tax before mentioned, to advance it for the benefit and accommodation of our citizens, and to appropriate and pledge for its repayment the securities taken for former loans by the state. The importance of this subject to our constituents and to the interests of this state, and of the nation, will, I trust, recommend it to your early and serious attention.

Soon after the last adjournment of the legislature two persons were convicted in this city of the crime of murder: the one as principal in the first degree, and the other as being present, aiding and assisting in the commission of the crime. I judged it to be my duty to suspend the execution of one of them. The report and documents upon which the respite was founded are now presented to you.

GENTLEMEN—The progress and success of domestic manufactures and improvements of every kind—the high price obtained by the husbandman for the products of his labor, and the general health, prosperity and tranquility (except in the lamented instances already noticed) which has prevailed within our state during the last year, call upon us to render fervent gratitude to that indulgent Providence who has mingled so many of the enjoyments and benefits of peace with the afflictions of war. Let us therefore implore him to continue his benedictions upon our beloved country, and to grant us unanimity, patriotism and wisdom to pursue, at this important session, the most essential interests of this state and of the union.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

Albany, January 25, 1811.

Legislature of Delaware.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives,

Called to the chief magistracy of the state, at this time of public difficulty, by the voice of my country, I feel the obligation imposed upon me, and am sensible of the gratitude due to my fellow-citizens.—In addition to their favor and partiality, I have to ask of them and of you, gentlemen, a liberal indulgence for such mistakes either from the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed, or from a misapprehension of the public welfare.

In relation to the war in which we are engaged, it may be observed, that whatever dangers or distresses may befall us—whatever embarrassments may ensue from the novel and critical situation of the country, it should be remembered that such dangers and embarrassments will not always be within the control of the administration, nor within the means of the state to prevent. Limited in regard to our resources, we must look for protection, support, and relief to the government of the United States. On congress is imposed the duty, and to them is given the authority of providing for the common defence; and it is both hoped and expected that the United States will be prepared to meet any invasion or hostile attempts which may be made on our shores the ensuing season. At the same time my earnest exertions shall not be wanting to employ in the most effectual manner, according to the provision of the laws, the power and energy of the state in repelling the enemy and in the protection of our fellow citizens.

The most fatal calamities attendant on republics spring from party struggles and from partialities to foreign nations, produced without a cause, and resting on no solid foundation. It is a political truth, universal, and, I believe, without exception, that nations never love each other, and that they are just, in proportion to the advantages they derive from justice. If we consult the history of the enlightened republics of Greece, or the more powerful republic of Rome, we shall find innumerable instances of their perfidy under the guise of love and friendship, and perhaps not a single case of disinterested generosity. The former, indeed, submitted to the intrigues and unbounded professions of the cunning and ambitious Philip of Macedon—the latter succeeded as much by her arts as her arms in forging chains for the nations of the earth, and in obtaining universal dominion.

In modern times our own knowledge affords a sad confirmation of the truth of ancient history. The examples, which Europe and the east furnish of the annihilation of the weaker governments, and the subjugation of the strong by their more potent allies and pretended friends, should never be forgotten.— If it should be our happiness to profit by the experience of others, and to learn wisdom by their misfortunes, we shall shun an alliance with any European power. On this interesting topic the advice of the great Washington should ever be had in remembrance, and it should dwell on our minds, that the patriots of our revolution who declared our right to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station, to which the laws of nature entitled us, pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their honor to hold the rest of mankind enemies in war, in peace friends. If we exceed these bounds, if we unite our destiny with any other nation, if peace or war is made to depend upon the ambition, convenience, or advantage of any other state, kingdom or empire; then indeed shall we cast our happiness and self-government into the hands of those who cannot and will not feel for us in adversity, nor rejoice with us in prosperity.

In respect to our internal affairs, at this period of your session, it is not to be presumed, that I thus new in office, should be prepared to propose many measures for the good of the state. But considering how essential to our internal improvements canals, drains, roads, and bridges are, I submit to the legislature the propriety of passing such general or special laws as will promote and encourage those objects. And as the safety of our fellow-citizens, and defence of our maritime boundary are of the highest importance, adequate and suitable arrangements should be made to meet the exigency of our affairs.

The expenses which we incurred in our military operations, the last spring and summer, and all other similar expenses which may arise in the course of the war, ought to be sustained exclusively by the federal government: I therefore recommend to you, gentlemen, for the keeping regular accounts of all future disbursements, and for the preservation of those already made or received by the commissioners heretofore appointed. I feel it incumbent on me to suggest to you, that application should be made to congress, or to the president for the reimbursement of last summer's expenditures, and for such as may in future accrue. It is unreasonable, that a section of the union exposed as we are, should be burdened exclusively, with repelling the attacks of the enemy. We have heretofore borne our full proportion of the charges of the general government; and no one who knows the disposition of the people of this state, their attachment to the constitution, and their patriotic affection to their fellow-citizens of the United States, will hesitate in believing, that they will acquiesce in contributing their share of all necessary taxes, imposts and excises, imposed by congress, both in war and in peace.

Should any matters occur, proper for me to lay before you, during the remainder of your session, they shall be made the subject of a future communication. In the mean time, I have no doubt, gentlemen, your labors will be directed to the preservation of the liberty, and the promotion of the security and happiness of our fellow-citizens; and in all your endeavors for the public good, I can assure you of my sincere and zealous co-operation, on all occasions requiring executive services.

And while with gratitude, we acknowledge the many civil and religious blessings we have enjoyed during a peace of thirty years—let us implore the favor of the Almighty Ruler of the universe, to direct and assist us, in time of difficulty and war, and to enable us to procure a speedy, honorable and permanent peace.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.

The following resolutions, relative to a national road, were offered by Mr. Duane, in the house of representatives, on the 11th January.

The legislature of Pennsylvania believe that an inland tide-water communication, between the Atlantic states, would strengthen the union and promote the prosperity of the United States in a greater degree than any other internal improvement; yet, when they reflect that vast resources will be necessary to the completion of such a great work, and that very many years must elapse before it can be placed even in a state of forwardness, they conceive that the general and state governments ought to adopt measures for opening and making a great national road, to be formed progressively to the north and south of the seat of the national government, until the whole extent of the country from Maine to the Mississippi shall have been connected.

Far from interfering with other improvements, either by canals or partial roads, the legislature of Pennsylvania believe that the formation of such a national road would assist every other public enterprise; that it would aid the civil or military measures of the national government; that it would develop and increase the resources of the individual states; and render the manufacturers of the north, the growers of the south, and the raisers of consumable produce of the middle states, mutually dependent upon, and serviceable to each other; and that it would produce an incalculable saving in the time, labor, and cost of transportation, especially during winter, when canals cease to be useful.

Impressed with these sentiments, and considering that the congress of the United States are not only most competent to decide upon the merits of such a proposition, but that they have the option to execute such a work by giving national aid, or to prevent its execution by withholding that aid; therefore,

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, That the senators representing this state in the senate of the U. States, be and they are hereby instructed, and that the representatives of the people of this state in the house of representatives of the United States, be and they are hereby requested, to propose and advocate the adoption of measures for opening and making a national road.

Resolved, That in case congress shall adopt measures for executing such an improvement, depending partly upon the concurrence and aid of individual states to give them effect, the state of Pennsylvania will cheerfully contribute such assistance as its means may enable it to extend.

Resolved, That the secretary of this commonwealth be, and he is hereby directed to transmit copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the senators and representatives, from this state, in the congress of the United States.

Legislature of Maryland.

IN SENATE.

Saturday, January 29.—On motion of Mr. N. Williams, the following resolution, viz.

Resolved by the senate of Maryland, That the president of the United States and the majorities of the congress thereof, are entitled to the decided approbation and ardent support of this body, and of the whole people of this federative republic, for their wise and energetic support and prosecution of the present just and necessary war against Great Britain, in defence of rights, the abandonment of which would be disgraceful and ruinous to our country—And that the gallant achievements of the army, and the brilliant victories of the navy of the United States, which have crowned our heroes in battle with imperishable glory, command our warmest applause, and excite our highest admiration.

By order, THOS. ROGERS, Clerk.— was read the first and second time by special order, and the question put, will the senate assent thereto?

The yeas and nays being required, appeared as follows:

Affirmative.—Messrs. Davis, (pres't) Brown, Fenwick, Frazier, Hawkins, Holbrook, L. Hollingsworth, W. Hollingsworth, Stephen and N. Williams—11.

Negative—(none.)

So it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

[While Baltimore was menaced by the enemy last summer, the city councils borrowed of the banks a considerable sum of money to be laid out for the military defence of the place, upon the pledge that they would exert themselves to obtain the passage of a law by the legislature, by which the property in the city and precincts, real and personal, might be taxed to refund it—for, at present, the mayor and city council have power only to levy a certain per centum on the valuations made by the county assessors, which is barely sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditures. Petitions to this effect were drawn up and signed by almost every person, having real or personal property of any considerable value, in the city and its precincts, without regard to party, for all had agreed that the city should be defended. A bill to allow the people of Baltimore the liberty to tax themselves, was introduced into the house of delegates some days ago. On the 13th ult. Mr. Crab moved that its further consideration be postponed until June next, amounting to a rejection in toto; the motion failed, yeas 19, nays 38—Mr. J. H. Thomas then moved to amend the bill by confining the assessment to the persons who had signed the petition praying for the passage of the bill; this was also negatived—and the bill finally passed—yeas 37, nays 30. The next day, the 14th, Mr. Long moved for a reconsideration of the bill; determined in the affirmative 41 to 36. Then—]

On motion by Mr. J. H. Thomas, the question was put, that the following be inserted as an additional section to the bill:

And be it enacted, That the governor and council shall appoint five persons of integrity and firmness, not residents of the city of Baltimore, as commissioners under this section, who, after having taken an oath to perform their duty justly and impartially, shall proceed to assess and value the damages sustained by Jane White, from the violence of the mob of Baltimore, committed on the house in Charles-street, of which she was proprietor, during the riots in the said city in the month of July, eighteen hundred and twelve, and shall assess and value the damages sustained by Alexander Contee Hanson and Jacob Wagner, esquires, from the violence of the mob aforesaid, in destroying the printing office of the Federal Republican, in Gay-street, and their furniture and other property in Charles-street, during the riots in said city in June and July, eighteen hundred and twelve; and that the said commissioners shall make return under their hands and seals, of their valuation of damages aforesaid, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, whose duty it shall be to pay and satisfy the same out of funds to be raised under the taxes authorised by law, before any other application thereof; and in case of the refusal or neglect of the said mayor and city council to pay, or cause to be paid, out of the funds so to be raised, the damages aforesaid, to the respective parties entitled to the same, their legal representatives or assigns, in that case the said mayor and members of the said city council, shall be liable, in their individual capacities, jointly or severally, to be sued by the respective parties aggrieved, in an action for money had and received, and a recovery may be had against them personally for the damages respectively assessed and valued as aforesaid.

The yeas and nays being required, appeared as follow:

AFFIRMATIVE.—Messrs. Plater, Millard, Causin, Blackiston, Boyer, J. rvis Spencer, Hands, Brown, Tamey, Turner, Stone-street, Ford, Parnham, Rogerson, Codman, Waller, Long, Stewart, Griffith, Toole, Hogg, R. Evans, F. M. Hall, Somerville, Callis, Wilson, Quantin, Handy, J. Thomas, Delaplaine, J. H. Thomas, Pater, Jones, Kilgour, Crab, Hilleary, Robinson, McCulloch, Howard—39.

NEGATIVE.—Messrs. Dorsey, Sellman, Belt, W. Hall, Blake, Randall, Harryman, Warner, Stansbury, Bennett, Martin, Jones, Spencer, S. Stevens, Bayly, Lushy, Le Compte, J. R. Evans, Claude, Duval, Burgess, Wright, Forward (of Wm.) Forward (of Jacob) Maulsby, Saulsbury, Culbert Willis, Barney, Donaldson, Tilgman, Mason, Kershner, Gabby—33.

So it was resolved in the affirmative. Mr. Donaldson then moved that the further consideration of the bill be referred to the next general assembly, which was carried—yeas 36, nays 35.

Tuesday Jan. 25.—Mr. John H. Thomas, from the committee delivers the following report and address

THE COMMITTEE

Appointed on that part of the communication of the Executive of this state, "which relates to the defenceless and unprotected situation in which the state has been left by the general government, the calamities of the war, and the means of defence," beg leave to report,—That in obedience to the order of instructions to them passed by the house, and in the spirit of the said instructions, the committee have prepared an address to the congress and president of the United States, from this house, in behalf of the people of Maryland, which is herewith respectfully submitted for consideration, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the honorable the speaker of this house be, and he is hereby requested, to cause three copies of the following address to be made out, to be signed by the speaker, in behalf of the house of delegates of Maryland, and attested by the clerk; that the speaker transmit one copy thereof to a member of the senate of the United States from this state, requesting him, in behalf of this house, to present the same to that body; that he transmit another copy thereof to a member of the house of representatives of the United States, from this state, requesting him in behalf of this house, to present the same to that body; and that he transmit another copy thereof to the said members jointly, requesting them as a deputation in behalf of this house, to present the same to the president of the United States; and likewise requesting them to receive any answer which may be returned thereto, to be forwarded to the speaker, who is hereby authorized, at his discretion, in case the session shall have closed before such answer is communicated, to cause the same to be published for the information of the good people of this state. By order,

LOUIS GASSAWAY, Clk.

To his excellency the president of the United States; and to the honorable senate, and the honorable the house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled:

The house of delegates of the state of Maryland, immediately representing the interests and feelings of the people of the state, are impelled by urgent impressions of public duty, to address the constituted authorities of the union, on the awful condition of national affairs, and the exposed and defenceless situation in which the state of Maryland has been hitherto left by the general government, under the impending calamities of war.

The principles on which the national compact was founded, are too recent in the recollection of the American people to require the aid of illustration at this period.—It is well known, that the weakness and incapacity of the old confederation, to afford the means of safety and protection, to the several members of the confederacy, produced a prevailing sense of the necessity of some more efficient form of government, invested with adequate powers to provide for the common defence and promote the general welfare. As an important concern of the general welfare, it was also anticipated, with confidence, that under this form of government, the just interests of commerce, connected as it is with the agricultural interest and other occupations of an industrious community, would be faithfully and effectually preserved. To this reasonable hope and expectation, we are chiefly to ascribe the sacrifices and concessions made by the navigating states, and more especially by our patriotic brethren of New-England, in procuring the adoption of the federal constitution. The state of Maryland, sincerely concurred in the ratification of that instrument, but her wise men, who advocated the new system, it is presumed, would have been anxiously perplexed, if they could have foreseen that this government would prove, in its operation, no less incompetent or unavailing for the purposes of common defence, than the confederation which preceded it; while on the other hand, it might become in its course of policy, the destroyer, instead of the protector of commerce—the inflictor of intense suffering, instead of being the benign guardian of the public security and happiness.

More than nineteen months have now elapsed since congress declared war against England. There is reason to believe, that a much longer period has gone by, since this fatal measure was first contemplated. We would ask, whether there is any portion of the union with the exception of Long Island, more open and liable to the ravages of a maritime foe, than the state of Maryland? And situated as it is, with the seat of the national government on its confines, so acceptable to a hostile force—is there any part of the continent, which it could have been supposed would more obviously attract the active operations of an enemy, designing to harass the physical strength of the country, and to distract and dissipate the views of its rulers in their avowed plan of foreign conquest? Is there, in short any section of the common league which, from various considerations of prudence and of duty, the general government was more peculiarly bound to guard by a prompt and vigilant preparation for defence?

We are next constrained to enquire, what has there then been done or provided by the national government, for the security of a state so precariously circumstanced, against the visitations of a war, which that government had chosen its own time to declare, and which appears to have been familiar to its contemplation for a considerable series of time before it was actually declared?

If we do not say how little has been attempted for our protection, and in what way even that little has been rendered, it is because we wish not to publish our own humiliation to the world, and we would not betray the extent of our weakness to the enemy. It is, because we are desirous of preserving a becoming measure of respect to the national authorities—while in the exercise of a constitutional privilege we perform a requisite duty to our constituents, the freemen of Maryland, by making a frank representation of their complaints and dissatisfaction.—The mere shew of resistance, heretofore exhibited, having in fact rather tended to provoke than repel attack, the people on the exposed points of our shores, despairing, after what has passed, of obtaining a sufficient defence from the government, are becoming in some parts of the country, inclined almost to regard with fear, the approach of those semblances of military aid, which are occasionally sent among them—because they have perceived that this casual parade, instead of giving them assistance in the hour of danger, rather invites destruction from an exasperated and unresisted foe, whose fury it is possible they might sometimes escape unnoticed. And yet, the history of the revolution will attest, that in the most trying times of the republic, the spirit of Maryland has never been surpassed in valor, fortitude and fidelity.

If the war is to be continued, the miseries we have already endured may be tender mercies in comparison with those which are to be apprehended. A character of ferocity, unknown to the civilized usages of modern warfare, seems about to be given to this contest. The government of the United States has distinctly announced its purpose of protecting the subjects of the enemy, taken in arms, while in the act of invading the territories of the power under whose dominions they were born, and to whom their allegiance was naturally due; and this protection to British traitors, is to be accomplished by a system of sanguinary retaliation, which in its consequences may occasion the sacrifice of every American officer and soldier, the ignominious death of all our unfortunate countrymen, who are now held as prisoners and hostages by the enemy. In addition to this cause of apprehension, the example of useless barbarity displayed under the command of the general of the forces that lately abandoned fort George, in Upper Canada, in committing to the flames the whole town of Newark, of which our army had been in the undisputed possession, may, in the course of a few months, bring upon our coast the most direful vengeance which a powerful and enraged enemy can inflict, and may subject our towns and villages, and farms and habitations bordering on the water, to all the horrors of the most ferocious and extensive desolation.

We therefore earnestly entreat the national authorities to take these circumstances into immediate and serious consideration; to provide the means and munitions of defence; and to furnish a real-efficient regular force, to be stationed in the state, so as to save its property and its citizens from the worst evils and ravages of unrelenting hostility. The efforts of the state itself, for its own protection have been already exerted in a manner necessarily burdensome and vexatious to its people; and the state has been compelled in the course of the last year, to seek resources on its own credit, for defraying the expenses of defensive measures, which it might well have been hoped, would have been seasonably and adequately prepared under the superintending care and providence of the government of the union. The aggregate amount of expenses thus incurred is not now ascertained, as the accounts are not all yet liquidated, and there are vouchers still to be procured. But we trust, that provision will be made by congress for re-imbursing these expenses, and others of a similar nature, which may be unavoidably incurred; and that as soon as a proper estimate can be exhibited, the heavy advances of money which the state may have been obliged to make, for purposes especially enjoined on the general government by the terms of the federal constitution, will be promptly and fully remunerated.

Having briefly urged these considerations, there remains an indispensable obligation on this house, in compliance with the known wishes and sentiments of their constituents, to submit an earnest petition to the president and congress of the United States, for a speedy restoration of the blessings of peace, and an essential change in that mistaken policy, whose effects are now so unhappily to be seen in the privations and afflictions of the land. It might be deemed intrusive, and it would be altogether irksome, to enter now into a minute examination of the causes of the present war. It is believed to be, at this time, sufficiently ascertained, that the flagrant deception of the French government, practised in relation to the pretended repeal of its predatory edicts, was chiefly instrumental in producing a state of things in this country, which unfortunately led us into the existing hostilities with England. The documents before congress during the last and preceding sessions, it is presumed, have conclusively shewn, that the alleged repeal of the French edicts, by the letter of the fifth August, 1810, was only a conditional proposition as its terms implied; and that there was no authentic form of a repeal of an earlier date than the decree of the 28th April, 1811, which is expressly bottomed on the previous compliance of our government with one of the conditions of the letter referred to, in enforcing the non-intercourse against England, by the act of March, 1811. This act was in conformity with the tenor of the president's proclamation of the 2d November, 1810, declaring "the fact," that on that day the French decrees were repealed, so that they ceased to violate our neutral commerce. It has become abundantly apparent, since the date of that proclamation, that in point of fact, the French violations of our commerce, were continued after that date; as in point of form, it has also appeared, that there was no absolute repeal until nearly six months subsequent to the issuing of the proclamation; and that this formal repeal, which, if timely used, might have produced the revocation of the British orders, so as to prevent the present war, was not officially announced to our government, or to its minister at Paris, until more than a twelve-month after the period at which it is dated. In the report of the secretary of state made to congress on this subject at the last session, it is stated, "that the light, in which this transaction was viewed by this government, was communicated to Mr. Barlow in the letter of the 14th July, 1812, with a view to the requisite explanation." The notice taken of the subject in the letter of the secretary of state, to Mr. Barlow, of the 14th July, 1812, thus cited, is to be found at the close of the letter, which concludes in these words: "On the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, I shall feel at liberty to make many observations, which have already occurred, until all the circumstances connected with it are better understood. The president approves your effort to obtain a copy of that decree, as he does the communication of it afterwards to Mr. Russell."

It is possible that Mr. Barlow might not have understood this paragraph as an instruction, "with a view to the requisite explanation." But as the report of the secretary further stated, that Mr. Barlow's successor had been "instructed to demand of the French government an explanation," the people of the United States might have been induced to expect that this important matter would be fully developed; and we have therefore seen with serious concern, by the late message from the president to congress, "that the views of the French government have received no elucidation since the close of the last session." This concern is heightened by the recollection that for a series of years past, an unhappy mystery has hung over the communications with that same government, whose public outrages have violated all the rights of this nation, and have heaped upon those who administer its affairs every species of contumely and insult.

A review of these circumstances, so remarkably characteristic of French fraud, furnishes, in the opinion of this house, strong additional inducements for terminating this disastrous contest with England. As soon indeed, as the foul artifice of the French ruler was disclosed, and more especially after the revocation of the British orders was made known, we should have deemed it fortunate, if the government had availed itself of the propitious opportunity of reinstating the relations of peace with the power with whom we had been thus embroiled. The claim of impressment, which has been so much exaggerated, but which was never deemed of itself a substantive cause of war, has been heretofore considered susceptible of satisfactory arrangement in the judgment of both the commissioners, who were selected by the president, then in office, to conduct the negotiation with the English ministry in the year 1806, and who now occupy high stations in the administration. Believing that this, and all other causes of difference, might be accommodated between the two countries, provided the agents on both sides were actuated by a sincere wish for a just accommodation, we cannot but feel anxious for an event which would relieve the people from the pressure of those burdens, and losses, and dangers, that are now to be encountered, without the prospect of attaining a single object of national benefit.

From the progress and occurrences of the war, as far as it has been conducted, it must be obvious, that the conquest of the Canadian provinces is not to be effected without an immense effusion of blood and treasure. The conquest, if effected, we should be inclined to regard as worse than a doubtful boon. We want no extension of territorial limits; and the genius of our republican constitution is not suited to offensive wars of ambition and aggrandizement. A war of this nature is calculated to introduce doctrines, and habits, and evil passions, which are inimical and dangerous, to the liberties and morals of the nation. To carry it on, the nation has been subjected to various impositions, which will be more oppressive, because all the resources of trade are suppressed, and agricultural enterprise is deprived of its reward. The taxes are multiplied, while the means of payment are diminished, and the ordinary comforts and necessities of life are greatly enhanced on the consumer. To carry on the war, it has been thought advisable entirely to cut off commerce; and the bitter tribulation of the Boston port bill of 1774 is again to be recalled on an infinitely more extended scale. Upon the poor gleanings and remnant of trade the more precious for being all that was left, the complicated rigors of the embargo act lately passed, will complete with an unsparing severity the work of destruction, which British cruizers could not accomplish.

The people whom we represent, are suffering severely under the operation of this baleful policy, against which we would solemnly remonstrate. But when we cast our eyes further, and look to its effects in another part of the continent; when we consider the still greater miseries of the people of New-England, accustomed to live on navigation, and now deprived of the ordinary means of subsistence; when we reflect also on the aggravated causes of disgust to that invaluable people, who perceive that, by the formation of new states out of the limits of our ancient territory, they must necessarily lose all share of influence in the national councils, where other interests, as they suppose, have already obtained an injurious ascendancy; when we meditate on the possible tendency of these irritations, added to all the difficulties of the immediate and general distress, although we have full confidence in the faithful integrity of our eastern brethren, yet, as they are men, we are free to confess, these reflections render us deeply and doubly solicitous, that peace should be restored, without delay, for the relief of the people and the salvation of the Union.

Convinced as we have been, that the war might have been avoided, and that peace might be restored, without dishonor to the country, the present conjuncture seems to us highly favorable for a reconciliation with England, if it is fairly and honestly desired. The late auspicious events on the continent of Europe, have humbled the power of the proud oppressor of the earth. With the malignity of the spirit of evil, he had stood on his "bad eminence," the scourge of the world, the disseminator of bloody discord and dissension among the nations. Wherever his arms or his arts could reach, he has been the fell disturber of the tranquility and happiness of every region. If the sceptre of the tyrant is not irreparably broken, we may at least hope, that inmits are permanently set to his inordinate sway. We trust that "the wicked shall now cease from troubling;" and viewing him as the atrocious author of all the wanton and dreadful strife, which pervades the old and new world, we do hope that his tremendous capacity for mischief being terminated or restrained, no barrier will remain against a renewal of friendly intercourse between those powers, that have been opposed to each other in battle array by the violence and frauds of the arch-enemy of human liberty. We would therefore ardently implore the constituted authorities of this nation, that the negotiations about to be instituted may be carried on with a just and earnest intention of bringing them to an amicable result; that the evils of this unprofitable and pernicious war may not be protracted; and that peace with all its blessings and advantages, may soon be permitted to dawn again on our shores, to cheer the gloom of disquietude that now exists, and to dispel the darker terrors of a tempest, which threatens, in its continuance, to consign the dearest hopes, the harmony and the liberties of this united empire, to irretrievable destruction.

Read and ordered to be printed and made the order of the day for Friday, when it was adopted.

PROSPERITY.—The president of the U. States on the 27th and 28th ult. signed the bills for filling the ranks of the regular army, &c. see page 373.

Proceedings of Congress.

SENATE.

Monday, Jan. 31.—The senate resumed the consideration of the bill in addition to the act allowing a bounty to the owners, officers and crews of privateers; which was amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[This bill was passed on Tuesday—it appropriates $200,000 for the purpose of paying a bounty of $100 for every prisoner captured on the high seas and brought into port by private armed vessels.]

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the importation of certain (British) articles.

Mr. Giles moved that the bill be recommitted for further amendment—Negative, 15 to 13.

The blanks in the bill having been filled, it was read the third time and passed—Yeas 16, nays 12, as follows:

For the passage of the bill—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb of Geo. Elds, Campbell, Claer, Coudit, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacey, Leib. Morrow, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Worthington.

Against its passage—Messrs. Dagzart, Dana, Fromentin, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Jan. 27.—Much business of a private or local nature was presented and disposed of—

Mr. King (of Mass.) after some remarks introduced the following resolutions;

1. Resolved, That the representatives of the people in congress assembled, cannot consistently with the provisions of the constitution and the nature of our government, refuse to consider any resolution offered by any one of said representatives. Therefore,

2. Resolved, That the refusal by the majority in this house to consider the resolution offered by one of the representatives of the people of Massachusetts, on Friday the 14th of Jan. 1814, asserting the right of the people and of the respective states to a free state coasting trade, interdicted by an act of congress, was an infringement of the right of the representative, and of the privilege of a member of this house, to be heard on this floor in behalf of his fellow citizens, and an injury to the people. And therefore,

3. Resolved, That the decision of the majority of this house, not to consider the resolutions before named, offered by a member on Friday the 14th inst. on the subject of the state coasting trade, be and the same is hereby rescinded.

And to provide against such abuse in future.

5. Resolved, That the following be added to the rules and orders of this house, viz: That every original motion or resolution in writing, offered by any member (the nature, reason, and object being first stated by him, if he sees fit) shall be immediately received by the clerk and read, and thereupon be before the house for consideration, to be disposed of as the house may judge right. And such resolutions and motions shall be in order, and be called for by the speaker, immediately after reports from select committees; and if any question of priority arise, it shall be decided in the order of states, as in the case of petitions.

A question having been raised whether these resolves did not come under the rule which requires propositions to amend the rules of the house to lie on the table one day before taken up,

The speaker decided that the three first resolutions were not of that character.

The yeas and nays having been called on the consideration of these resolutions—

Mr. Culpepper of N. C. called for a division of the question, so as to take it first on the first resolve.

He said he would vote for considering the first, but he could not vote for considering the others.

The question on proceeding to consider the first resolve was decided in the negative by yeas and nays.

For consideration	43
Against it	92

The speaker having stated the question on the 2d and 3d resolves—

Mr. Murfree of N. C. enquired whether the speaker was required, by the rules or practice of the house, to put the question of consideration on every motion, no matter how preposterous, that should be proposed. Was such a motion as these resolves embraced in order?

The speaker replied, that however he might regret the matter and language of this motion there was no discretion reposed in him as to the propriety of putting the question on it. The motion was therefore in order.

Mr. Gaston of N. C. required a division of this question:

And the question was accordingly taken on the consideration of the 2d resolution, and decided in the negative.

For consideration	17
Against it	115

The question was then taken on the consideration of the 3d resolution, and decided in the negative as follows:

For consideration	21
Against it	102

So the house resolved that it would not now consider either of the three first resolutions offered by Mr. King. The other lies on the table for one day according to a rule of the house.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill to raise three regiments of riflemen. After considerable debate, the committee rose and reported the bill to the house.

Friday, January 28.—After the usual minor business, the house proceeded to consider the bill for raising three rifle regiments. Much debate was had, but at length a motion offered by Mr. Ridgely, being so modified as to authorise the conversion of five regiments into riflemen, instead of raising three, prevailed—97 to 55; and the bill being further amended on motion of Mr. Rich, so as to leave it discretionary with the president to use the authority vested therein, was, after the usual formalities, passed.

On motion of Mr. Jackson of Va. the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Pitkin of Con. in the chair; and took up Mr. Jackson's motion to amend the constitution, so as to vest in congress the power to lay a duty on exports, to make roads and canals, and to establish a national bank, &c. After Mr. Jackson had explained the reasons and motives that induced him to introduce the motion, the committee rose, had leave to sit again, and the house adjourned until Monday.

[A bill granting the petition of Paul Cuffe has passed both houses of congress.]

[The following are the names of the members of congress who voted against Mr. Findley's motion of thanks to the late speaker, Mr. Clay, viz. Messrs. Hanson, Grosvenor, Pickering, Davenport, Gaston, Lewis, Pearson, Pitkin and Sheffey.]

Monday, Jan. 31.—Many petitions were presented and referred.

The speaker laid before the house the following report from the secretary of war:

War Department, January 28.

Sir—Conformably to a resolution of the honorable the house of representatives of the 31st July last, requiring the secretary of war to lay before the house a view of the unsettled accounts in the offices of the accountant of this department, and of the paymaster of the army, and to suggest measures to secure the accountability of the public agents, and to prevent the accumulation of unsettled accounts connected with the war department—I have to report that a satisfactory view of the unsettled accounts in either of these offices has not been and (agreeably to the enclosed statements of the paymaster of the army and of the accountant) cannot be rendered by them within any definitive period of time.

The better to secure the accountability of public agents, and to prevent the accumulation of unsettled accounts, I have the honor to suggest—1st. That an office be established, in which all accounts, whether in specie or in kind, connected with the military and Indian departments, shall be adjusted, accredited and settled, conformably to rules and regulations to be prescribed by the treasury department: and,

2d. That to render efficient the pay department of the army, which is now best adapted to a small and peace establishment—and to secure the regular and punctual payment of the troops, a new organization be adopted, to consist of a paymaster-general of the armies of the United States with such deputy, district and assistant paymasters, as the exigencies of the service may require—neither of whom shall belong to the line of the army.

With great respect, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG

The Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The report and documents were referred to the committee of ways and means.

After some time spent in considering the bill to allow further time of payment to the purchasers of public lands, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Mr. Jackson's proposition to amend the constitution of the United States.

No disposition appearing to debate the same—

The committee immediately rose, and reported their agreement to said resolution, and the house took up the report.

The question having been stated on concurring with the committee in their agreement to the first member of said resolution (granting to congress the power of taxing exports)

After some remarks from several members, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Pickens of N. C. the house took up the report of the committee of the whole on his proposition to amend the constitution, so as to establish an uniform mode of election, by districts, of the electors of president and vice-president of the U. States.

Messrs. Wright, Yancey and Rich advocated, and Messrs. Grosvenor and Ward (of Mass.) opposed the resolution.

The question on concurrence with the committee of the whole in their disagreement to the amendment, was decided as follows:

For concurrence.

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Avery, Bard, Barlies, of Massachusetts, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Brigham, Brown, Burwell, Champion, Ciley, Clifton, Constock, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Davenport, Davis, of Penn. Denorellis, Dewey, Earle, Ely, Eppes, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk, of N. Y. Forst, Geddes, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hall, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hopkins of N. Y. Howell, Huff, Ingersoll, Ingham, Kern, Kerstew, Kilbourn, Law, Lefferts, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, Moffit, Mosely, Markell, Nelson, Oakley, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Phansbort, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea, of Penn. Roberts, Riggles, Sherwood, Smith, of Penn. Sturges, Tallmadge, Tammhill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson, of Mass. Whit—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Abston Archib. Barnet, Early, of Virg. Beech-

Orridge, Caperton, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappel, Clark, Condit, Conrad, Creighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Davis, of Mass., DeShaz, Torney, Franklin, Gaston, Gholson, Goldsborough, Gordin, Grundy, Harris, Hawes, Hubbard, Humphreys, Humberford, Irving, N. Y. Jackson, of R. I. Jackson, of Virg., Kennedy, Kent, of N. Y., Kent, of Mt. King, of Mass., King, of N. C., Lewis, Lowndes, Mason, McKim, McLean, McIntenry, Moor, Murfree, Newton, Onasby, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Rhea, of Ten. Rich, Robertson, Sage, Shelby, Scales, Stanford, Taggart, White, Williams, Wilson, of Penn. Wright, Vance—64.

So the house resolved to concur in the disagreement to Mr. Pickens' resolution.

Mr. Hall of Geo. who voted in the affirmative, rose to move a reconsideration, with a view to endeavor to obtain an amendment which would make it acceptable to him, viz: to make the election uniform by general ticket, instead of by districts;

But before the question was put on this motion the house adjourned.

Mr. Eppes, from the committee of ways and means reported a bill to authorize a loan of millions of dollars.

Tuesday, Feb. 1.—The unfinished business of yesterday being called up—

Mr. Hall of Geo. withdrew the motion he made before the house yesterday adjourned, to consider the vote on Mr. Pickens' resolutions. He said he was informed it was in the contemplation of some gentleman to originate a new and distinct motion embracing the object he had in view.

Mr. Mason offered a resolution to close the session on the 7th of March. Laid on the table.

[A good deal of other business was done, not sufficiently interesting, either as news or for records, to notice in this work.]

Wednesday, Feb. 2.—Mr. Goldsborough presented the remonstrance of the house of delegates of the state of Maryland—(see page 375.) which was read. Mr. G. moved that it should be on the table and be printed.

Nearly the whole day was spent in discussing and speaking of this article. The result was, that the house refused to print it—aves 63, nays 28.

A message was received from the president of the United States, communicating a report of the secretary of war, made in pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of the 31st Dec. calling upon the president for information relative to the failure of the American arms on the northern frontier.

This report comprises simply an immense mass of documents of about 600 pages, embracing the correspondence of the secretary of war with generals Dearborn, Wilkinson, Hampton, Lewis, Harrison, McClure and other military commanders, and various correspondence between those and other officers of the United States army. The message and documents were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COM. PERRY.—We prepared for the press some account of the very splendid entertainment given to com. Perry, in Baltimore, on Tuesday last, which accident compels us to postpone for the next paper.

OUR NAVY. The British generously metamorphosed our frigates into ships of the line, some time ago—and now by a mere dash of the pen, build for its whole squadrons of frigates—take the following in evidence, from a late London paper:

"About a week after the arrival of Sir John B. Warren, in the St. Domingo with the Poictiers, it was known that commodore Rodgers with six frigates, was in Boston harbor; and it became a matter of extreme regret and disappointment that a dash was not made against them; the crews must have burnt them or given them up!"

SPECIE. A quantity of specie, about $140,000, was boxed up in New-York, some days ago, and forwarded for Boston, ostensibly for the "New-England Bank." Mr. Gelston, collector of the port of New-York, seized it, under a clause of the embargo law, and it brought back and deposited in the Manhattan Bank. When the collector shall be satisfied that the money was really destined for Boston he will, doubtless, restore it. In the mean time the stockholders of the New-England Bank have petitioned the legislature of Massachusetts to demand of the president of the United States, the restitution of the money illegally seized by the collector of the port of New-York, and the punishment of the offender. The petition has been committed; and the committee to whom the same was referred, commenting severely on the act of Mr. Gelston, have directed the governor to express to the president of the United States, the great sensibility which the legislature of Massachusetts feels at the outrage; its expectation that the money will be immediately restored, &c. and that the president will, moreover, as an "atonement" to the injured citizens of that commonwealth, remove the collector from office. The report and resolutions passed both houses.

CASH. The Albany Argus says,—"Such has been the demand for specie in this city, for the Canada market, and for the banks, that ten per cent. premium has been paid for it, in exchange for paper."

We are satisfied that mighty efforts will be made to supply the enemy with this useful article; but would hope the vigilance of our officers may render the commerce too hazardous. British government bills are at a great discount in Canada, as, indeed, they are in all parts of Europe and America, and the bait is tempting.

SMUGGLING.—Though we regret there is reason to believe that a good deal of this business done, we are happy to observe that valuable seizures are frequently made—perhaps they may check the commerce.

"COMMERCER."—A smuggler to the eastward, on bearing of the tight provisions of the embargo law, set fire to his vessel, in great rage at the "destroyers of commerce," and she was consumed. Have the smugglers and neutrals determined to—give up the ship? Goods to the value of 25 or $30,000 were lately seized near Portland, Maine, but the gang of traitors made their escape.

MANUFACTURES.—The eastern papers teem with notices of new manufactures. They increase very rapidly in New-Hampshire and Massachusetts; and must and will bring about a home feeling, too seldom an inmate of the counting house.

THE HEROES OF BATT.—Commodore Perry publicly acknowledges in the National Intelligencer of Monday last, the receipt of $51 55 from the Baptist Society of Fredericksburg, Va. and $200 from James De Wolf, Esq. of R. I. as donations to the brave men who were wounded in the battle on Lake.

COMMONORE PERRY partook of a splendid entertainment provided in honor of him, at Washington city, on the 25th ult. Several of the high officers of state, and many of the members of congress, with a great number of the most distinguished citizens were present. The sentiments delivered, after the cloth was removed, were full of pith and patriotism: take the following as examples—

The United States of America—Rich in resources and dignified in policy—attached to peace—undaunted in war.

The principles of the declaration of our independ dence—Withered be the apostate hand that would abandon them.

Our rights—to be secured by negotiation if they can—By cannon law if they must.

The freedom of the seas—America acknowledges no maritime right paramount to her own.

The Union—A bulwark which denies menace and defies attack.

By Henry Clay, Esq.—The policy which looks to peace as the end of war—and to the war as the means of peace.

By the speaker of the house of representatives—“Don't give up the ship.”

THE ROAD TO PEACE.—In the senate of the United States, when the bill for increasing the bounty to recruits, &c. was before that house, gen. Smith, of Maryland, concluded a very pithy speech with the following pungent remarks:—“In time, my opinion is, that to ensure an honorable peace, we ought to be prepared by land and sea to carry on the war with effect. Fill your army, garrison your large cities, and in addition to your ships of war, purchase and put to sea thirty fast sailing schooners to deplete on the commerce of your enemy; then your envoys will be respected. Neglect or refuse to do so, and the enemy will impose his own terms.”

NIAGARA FRONTIER.—The assembly of New-York, by a unanimous vote, granted $50,000 for the relief of the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier. The corporation of the city of New-York, voted $3,000, and that of Albany gave 1000. (L) The vote of the assembly has been indefinitely postponed by the senate.

FROM THE LAKES we have nothing particular since our last. Capt. Elliot seems well prepared for the camp at Erie; and the militia collected there are full of spirit. They are stated at 1950 men, under gen. Mead. The lake was open on the 17th inst. and will probably remain so during the winter, which is considered fortunate for us. A fellow has been taken up at Erie as a spy; he was recognized as one of the enemy who was at the burning of Buffalo, and is in confinement.

PLATTSBURG.—The following is general Wilkinson's reply to the application of the magistrates and citizens of Plattsburg for protection against an expected incursion of the enemy—it does honor to his head and heart:

“MALONE, Jan. 5th, 1814.

“Gentlemen—I received yesterday, at 1 o'clock, P. M. your address of the 2nd inst. and within an hour after, the courier was on his return, with such orders and instructions as may, I trust, place you in safety, against any attack from the enemy, until I can reinforce you with a column of men, the front of which will be with you to-morrow, and if my convalescence should continue, I shall follow a day or two after.

Devoted to the service of our common country, next to its independence and honor, it is a duty, as pleasing to me as it is solemn to afford all the protection in the power of the troops I command, to the persons and property of my fellow citizens.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant.

JAMES WILKINSON.

FESTIVALS.—There have been several festivals in the United States in honor of “Alexander the Deliverer”—but Alexander the Mediator has not been toasted. How is it?

PUBLIC PRISONS.—It is among the happy peculiarities of the United States, that their government has no public prison. Every other nation in the [civilized] world has its bastilles, towers, castles, &c. which open and shut at the command of their administration

The several states composing our republic have, we believe, unanimously, by law permitted the use of their common jails for the purpose of confining the prisoners of the United States. It is needless to remark, that thus circumstanced, our government cannot inflict in secret those punishments and privations which give horror to the prisons of Europe.

The late confinement of certain British prisoners, held in retaliation, in the jail at Worcester, Massachusetts, has excited great sensibility among the leading men in that state.—In the present temper of the majority of the legislature, it is probable the law of 1798, (which granted the use of the jails of that state to the United States,) will be repealed. Indeed, a bill was brought forward ten or twelve days ago, explanatory of that law, and directing the sheriffs “to discharge the prisoners of war” in ten days after the passage thereof unless previously discharged by the United States. It is not our design to speak of the motives that urge this procedure, nor extol that sensibility which feels for the enemy—but to call the public attention to the effect it may have. As society is situated, the government of the United States must have prisons; if the states refuse the use of their common jails, an absolute necessity exists for the erection of prisons, to be controlled only by the officers of the United States, whose doors shall open and shut by order of the president, or judges of the United States' courts. In almost every state, certain pieces of ground have been ceded to the United States; in Massachusetts there are several; and on each of them we may see, a few years hence, a prison of the United States. Let the people reflect a moment and see the danger resulting from the headlong proceedings of infuriated party. If the good sense of Massachusetts shall not reject this opposition to the general government, the present session of congress will hardly close without the passage of a law for erecting a government prison within the state of Massachusetts.

BRITISH “MODERATION”—and very “liberty” loving “and religious.”—From a Halifax paper, Jan. 8.—“In contemplating the effects that are likely to recur from the overthrow of Napoleon—the inhabitants of this and our sister provinces cannot fail to be gratified at the predicament in which his pander Madison is placed; that monster with all the vices which blacken the character of the French ruler, without a scruple of the shadow even of virtue to throw into the opposite scale is now at the mercy (thanks to Almighty justice) of the nation he vainly and impudently endeavored to destroy, and with it the freedom and happiness of the world—That Great Britain is entitled to every assistance she may deem it proper to demand from her allies is undeniable; that they will grant all she wishes is equally certain—what then has America to hope? rather what has she not to dread! Destitute as she is of a single excuse to extenuate her monstrous guilt, of a single claim to mitigate the punishment that awaits her manifold crimes; greatly have we cause to rejoice, but not without a mixture of fear, judging from former events, that this opportunity of humbling an unnatural and unprincipled enemy, and preventing a repetition of his base designs, may also be lost.—It is not the wish, perhaps would not be the interest of G. Britain, to recompense her rebellious colonies, but a portion given to her allies, would at once secure those she wishes to retain, and do good to the Americans in spite of themselves, BY GIVING THEM A GOVERNMENT!!!”

“GOOD BY ACTORS!”

LIEUT. W. W. SMITH. It is with deep regret we inform our readers that the account published in our last paper of the death of this young hero has been confirmed by a letter which his brother, the post-master of this city, has just received from general Wilkinson.

The anxiety which has been so generally manifested to ascertain the fate of lieutenant Smith, induced us request an extract of the letter for publication, which has been furnished, and is in these words:

"Your gallant brother is no more—he died on the 2d of December. He was wounded through the hips, bore his sufferings with vast firmness, and met death with a smile. He begged that his regimental coat might be buried with him under his head. It is a fact that so conspicuous was this youth's gallantry and so mortal his fire, that a British subaltern fired three shot at him, and gave two or three platoons the same direction."

The death of this young officer may be considered a public misfortune; for like our lamented fellow-citizen Pike, he received a military education, and like him possessed all the qualifications requisite to form an able commander. Had it pleased Heaven to spare his life, he would no doubt in due time have held a distinguished rank in the army; but he died at the age of eighteen. Sacred however be the will of Providence. His death has been a glorious one, and his name will be handed down to posterity with honor.—Fredonian.

By his excellency lieutenant general sir George Prevost, Baronet, commander of his majesty's forces in North America, &c. &c. &c.

To the inhabitants of his majesty's provinces in North America.

A PROCLAMATION.

The complete success which has attended his majesty's arms on the Niagara frontier, having placed in our possession the whole of the enemy's posts on that line, it became a matter of imperious duty, to retaliate on America, the miseries which the unfortunate inhabitants of Newark had been made to suffer upon the evacuation of fort George.

The villages of Lewiston, Black Rock, and Buffalo, have accordingly been burned.

At the same time that his excellency the commander of the forces sincerely deprecates this mode of warfare, he trusts, that it will be sufficient to call the attention of every candid and impartial person, both amongst ourselves and the enemy, to the circumstances from which it has arisen, to satisfy them that this departure from the established usages of war has originated with America herself, and that to her alone, are justly chargeable, all the awful and unhappy consequences which have hitherto flowed, and are likely to result from it.

It is not necessary to advert to the conduct of the troops employed on the American coast, in conjunction with his majesty's squadron, under admiral sir John B. Warren, since they were neither within the command, nor subject to the control of his excellency, their acts cannot be ascribable to him, even if they wanted that justification which the circumstances which occasioned them, so amply afford.

It will be sufficient for the present purpose, and in order to mark the character of the war, as carried on upon the frontiers of these provinces, to trace the line of conduct observed by his excellency, and the troops under his command, since the commencement of hostilities, and to contrast it with that of the enemy.

The first invasion of Upper Canada took place in July, 1812, when the American forces, under brigadier general Hull, crossed over and took possession of Sandwich, where they began to manifest a disposition so different from that of a magnanimous enemy, and which they have since invariably displayed, in marking out, as objects of their peculiar resentment, the loyal subjects of his majesty, and in dooming their property to plunder and conflagration.

Various instances of this kind occurred both at Sandwich and in its neighborhood, at the very period when his majesty's standard was waving upon the fort of Michilimacinae, and affording protection to the persons and property of those who had submitted to it: Within a few weeks afterwards, the British flag was also hoisted on the fortress of Detroit, which, together with the whole of the Michigan territory, had surrendered to his majesty's arms.

Had not his excellency been actuated by sentiments far different from those which had influenced the American government, and the persons employed by it, in the wanton acts of the destruction of private property, committed during their short occupation of a part of Upper Canada, his excellency could not have failed to have availed himself of the opportunity which the undisturbed possession of the whole of the Michigan territory, afforded him of amply retaliating for the devastating system which had been pursued at Sandwich and on the Thames.

But strictly in conformity to the views and disposition of his own government, and to that liberal and magnanimous policy which it had dictated, he chose rather to forbear an imitation of the enemy's example, in the hope, that such forbearance would be duly appreciated by the government of the United States, and would produce a return to the more civilized usages of war.

The persons and property, therefore, of the inhabitants of the Michigan territory, were respected, and remain unmolested. In the winter of the following year, when the success which attended the daring and gallant enterprize against Ogdensburgh had placed that populous and flourishing village in our possession, the generosity of the British character was again conspicuous, in the scrupulous preservation of every article which could be considered as private property; such public buildings only being destroyed as were used for the accommodation of troops and for public stores.

The destruction of the defences of Ogdensburgh, and the dispersion of the enemy's force in that neighborhood, laid open the whole of their frontier on the St. Lawrence, to the incursions of his majesty's troops, and Hamilton, as well as the numerous settlements on the banks of the river, might, at any hour, had such been the disposition of his majesty's government, or of those acting under it, been plundered and laid waste.

During the course of the following summer, by the fortunate result of the enterprize against Plattsburgh, that town was for several hours in the complete possession of our troops, there not being any force in the neighborhood which could attempt a resistance. Yet even there, under circumstances of strong temptation, and when the recent example of the enemy in the wanton destruction at York, of private property, and buildings not used for military purposes, must have been fresh in the recollection of the forces employed on that occasion, and would have justified a retaliation on their part, their forbearance was strongly manifested, and the directions his excellency had given to the commander of that expedition, so scrupulously obeyed, that scarcely can another instance be shown in which during a state of war, and under similar circumstances, an enemy, so completely under the power and at the mercy of their adversaries, had so little cause of complaint.

During the course of the same summer, forts Schlosser and Black Rock, were surprized and taken by a part of the forces under the command of major general De Rottenburg on the Niagara frontier, at both of which places personal property was respected, and the public buildings alone were destroyed.

It was certainly matter of just and reasonable expectation, that the humane and liberal course of conduct pursued by his excellency on those different occasions, would have had its due weight on the American government, and would have led it to have abstained, in the further prosecution of the war, from any acts of wantonness or violence which could only tend unnecessarily to add to its ordinary calamities, and to bring down upon their offending citizens a retaliation, which, though distant, they must have known would await and certainly follow such conduct.

Undeterred, however, by his excellency's example of moderation, or by any of the consequences to be apprehended from the adoption of such barbarous measures, the American forces at fort George, acting, as there is every reason to believe, under the orders, or with the approbation of their government, for some time previous to their evacuation of that fortress, under various pretensions, burned and destroyed the farm houses and buildings of many of the respectable and peaceable inhabitants of that neighborhood. But the full measure of this species of barbarity remained to be completed at a season when all its horrors might be more fully and keenly felt by those who were to become the wretched victims of it.

It will hardly be credited by those who shall hereafter read it in the page of history, that in the enlightened era of the 19th century, and in the inclemency of a Canadian winter, the troops of a nation calling itself civilized and christian, had wantonly, and without the shadow of a pretext, forced 400 helpless women and children to quit their dwellings, and to be the mournful spectators of the conflagration and total destruction of all that belonged to them.

Yet such was the fate of Newark on the 10th of December, a day which the inhabitants of Upper Canada can never forget, and the recollection of which cannot but nerve their arms when opposed to their vindictive foe. On the night of that day, the American troops under brigadier-general McClure, being about to evacuate fort George, which they could no longer retain, by an act of inhumanity disgraceful to themselves and to the nation to which they belong, set fire to upwards of 150 houses, composing the beautiful village of Newark, and burned them to the ground, leaving without covering or shelter those "innocent, unfortunate and distressed inhabitants," whom that officer, by his proclamation, had previously engaged to protect.

His excellency would have ill consulted the honor of his country, and the justice due to his majesty's injured and insulted subjects, had he permitted an act of such needless cruelty to pass unpunished, or had he failed to visit, whenever the opportunity arrived, upon the inhabitants of the neighboring American frontier, the calamities thus inflicted upon those of our own.

The opportunity has occurred, and a full measure of retaliation has taken place, such as it is hoped will teach the enemy to respect, in future, the laws of war and recall him to a sense of what is due to himself as well as to us.

In the further prosecution of the contest to which so extraordinary a character has been given, his excellency must be guided by the course of conduct which the enemy shall hereafter pursue. Lamenting, as his excellency does, the necessity imposed upon him of retaliating upon the subjects of America the miseries inflicted on the inhabitants of Newark, it is not his intention to pursue further a system of warfare so revolting to his own feelings, and so little congenial to the British character, unless the future measures of the enemy should compel him again to resort to it.

To those possessions of the enemy along the whole line of frontier which have hitherto remained undisturbed, and which are now within his excellency's reach, and at the mercy of the troops under his command, his excellency has determined to extend the same forbearance and the same freedom from rapine and plunder, which they have hitherto experienced; and from this determination the future conduct of the American government shall alone induce his excellency to depart.

The inhabitants of these provinces will in the mean time be prepared to resist, with firmness and with courage, whatever attempts the resentment of the enemy, arising from their disgrace and their merited sufferings, may lead them to make, well assured that they will be powerfully assisted at all points by the troops under his excellency's command and that prompt and signal vengeance will be taken for every fresh departure by the enemy, from that system of warfare, which ought alone to subsist between enlightened and civilized nations.

Given under my hand and seal of arms at Quebec, this 12th day of Jan. 1814.

GEORGE PREVOST.

By his excellency's command,

E. H. BRENTON.

[The foregoing is a pure "British official"—and abounds with wilful and evident falsehoods. It was made for the "party in America."]—ED. REG.

MILITARY.

General Wilkinson's late visit to Waterford had for its object the forwarding certain measures for the defence of Sackett's Harbor, which is menaced by the enemy, which having put into train, he returned rapidly to his army at French Mills. It is said that he had learned that sir George Prevost designed to attack him, but that he entertained no fears for such event. It appears very evident that the enemy contemplates some dashing expedition, having hired or pressed a great number of sleighs.

Promotions. Brigadier-generals Izard and Brown, have been appointed major-generals in the army of the United States—and colonels Alexander M'Comb, and Thomas A. Smith have been promoted to the rank of brigadier-generals.

Brigadier-general Parker arrived in Norfolk, the 22nd ult. to command at that post. He is an excellent officer.

Pittsburg, January 19. A letter has been received from Samuel Douglas, esq. commanding the Pittsburg volunteers, by the editor of the commonwealth, dated at Meadville, January 10, which states that from the enemy's taking so many sleds from the neighborhood of Buffalo, the American troops all felt confident of his determination to cross to Erie as soon as the ice can bear him. If he does not come to Erie, says Mr. Douglas, my company will unanimously volunteer to assist in dislodging him from Fort Niagara.

The Creeks.—The first army from Tennessee has been nearly disbanded. Major-general Jackson however held his position, soon expecting to be reinforced. A letter to the editor of the Register from Nashville, dated the 14th inst. says that a brigade of volunteers, for sixty days, had marched, who were supposed have reached him some time before that date.—2500 militia were raising to march in a few days from West Tennessee, and about the same number in East Tennessee, to join general Jackson. Colonel Williams' regiment of twelve months regulars, is ordered into the Creek country. General Blount, of Tennessee, on calling out the requisition of militia says—

“Tennesseans have done much by their valor, but much remains to be done to effect the object of government in this campaign in a desirable manner, and as is contemplated by the general government for the general good, and for the immediate and special benefit of the state. Let it be the pleasure of Tennesseans, as it ever has been, to aid in an accomplishment of the views of the government of our choice, which is found to be acutely engaged in securing and protecting us against the rude attacks of savages, who have heretofore drenched our frontier with the blood of innocent women and children. Now is the accepted time—act all—act promptly and vigorously—such conduct will soon put an end to the campaign against the enemies of our peace, and will secure to Tennesseans the important benefits which they have sought for years, with the best efforts of government in their favor in time of peace. And above all, they should afford to the world an additional unequivocal evidence of their attachment to our government—this the president most confidently relies on.”

The Cherokees and Choctaws, with a considerable number of the Creeks remain faithful. They have, of themselves, lately conducted several active enterprises against the hostile Indians. A letter from Savannah has the following paragraph—

“It is reported from good authority, that Colonel Hawkins, who has been endeavoring for many years to keep peace with the Indians, now says that half of the Creek warriors must be exterminated, in order to prevent their killing the other half, who are friendly to the United States”—and the work of death, I believe, is progressing regularly and certainly—probably 4 or 5000 will be the number sacrificed to British arts and policy.

NAVAL.

The United States frigates Presidant, Constitution, Essex and Adams are at sea, as are also the brigs Enterprise and Battle-ship. Several sloops of war will probably soon be on the ocean. All these have spread their canvas without asking “permission” of the British! The Adams, commanded by the gallant Harris, got out of the Chesapeake about fifteen days ago—the Constitution yet lies near Norfolk—and so it is, that the wind which might serve her to get down the river, will not carry her out of the bay. It is again reported that Rodgers had a brush with a frigate, not the Orpheus. Perhaps, he may have come a-head two of them. The present rumor says, that the Acosta has arrived at Block Island (off New-London) and that the men who came ashore in the boat said, they had fallen in with the President and brought her to action, receiving from her three or four broadsides, by which they lost many men, and then had more than forty of the wounded in the cockpit—but that the 74 which was in co. with the Acosta, and about two guns short distance at the commencement of the action, coming up, Rodgers turned tail to them and went on his way.

The U. S. sloop of war Argus was launched at the navy-yard, Washington city, on Saturday last, in the presence of a great assembly of spectators, among whom was commodore Perry, the foreign ministers, many members of congress, and other distinguished persons. After the launch many ladies and gentlemen partook of some refreshment prepared in a very handsome style, the elegant mace band enlivening the scene by appropriate airs. The company separated at an early hour much delighted with the entertainments of the day. The Argus is of the size of the Thetis and Hercules, and is the first vessel of her class that has been launched since the last law for increasing the navy; some of which are nearly ready for sea.

It is stated that the keels of a very heavy frigate and of two brigs, have been laid at Sackett’s harbor. The letter of marquis schooner Herald has arrived at Charleston from New-York. On the 23d ultimo, on the southern coast, had an engagement with a schooner under British colors. At 4 o’clock, P. M. she disappeared; supposed to have been sunk.

An American privateer of 24 guns sailed from Bordeaux in October last.

BLOCKADE OF NEW-*LO*NDON.

From the *New-*London Gazette, Jan. 20.—“On Monday last rear-admiral Cockburn arrived before this port, with his flag, we understand, flying on board the Sceptre 74, accompanied by the Victorious 74, captain Talbot, Acosta frigate, captain Kerr, one other frigate, and two sloops of war. The actual blockading force now consists of three 74s—four frigates—two sloops of war and a gun-brig.”

As the British have no land forces, no great anxiety is felt for the safety of *New-*London; yet commodore Deontie judging more correctly of what he had to depend on, went up the river on the 27th. It is intimated full faith is not given to the commanding general. By some prisoners who have come from the fleet on parole, it would appear that the enemy have abandoned their original design of attacking *New-*London, as they suppose it would be attended with great loss. It is further said COCKBURN is to return to the CHESAPEAKE.

BLOCKADE OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

The enemy has been moving in the bay. We do not learn that they have performed any gallant exploit since our last. The Virginia militia are pouring into Norfolk. Many of them are from the mountains of the interior.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Victorious, of 74 guns, was ashore on the south side of Fisher’s Island, near *New-*London, on the 31st ult. It is thought she will not be got off. The Sceptre, 74, is said to be “hogged” so that admiral Cockburn has changed his flag to the Albion. This is excellent news, and we think it is true.

We have a report received at *New-*York from Sackett’s Harbor, that general Wilkinson had made a dash at the enemy, and captured 900 men with 12 pieces of heavy artillery, intended for the naval armament at Kingston, and on its way to that place.—We believe general Wilkinson has broke up his encampment at French Mills, supposed to have been designed to proceed to Sackett’s Harbor, but the above is only a report.

A letter from St. Mary’s county, Maryland, dated the 31st ult. states that one 74, two brigs and a schooner were in the Potomac coming up.

News from Europe, via the West Indies, received at Philadelphia, reports that Holland, Switzerland and a great part of Italy, had thrown off their dependence on Napoleon. The prince of Orange was to proceed to Holland with 20,000 English troops. The French army at Deerden had surrendered, say 16,000 men. Wellington is said to have beat Soult near Burgundy, and to have taken 3000 prisoners.

Nothing important in congress on Thursday.

No. III.

The Russian mediation—The nomination of Mr. Gallatin one of the envoys &c.—and his rejection.

On the 21st of May last the following message from the president of the United States was laid before the senate.

To the Senate of the United States.

"Commissions having been granted, during the recess of the senate to the following persons, I now nominate them to the same offices respectively annexed to their names; Albert Gallatin, John Quincy Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be jointly and severally envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of the emperor of Russia; to negotiate and sign a treaty of commerce with Great Britain; and the said John Quincy Adams, Albert Gallatin, and James A. Bayard, to be jointly and severally envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of commerce with Russia.

"(Signed) JAMES MADISON.

Washington, May 20th, 1813.

On the 3d of June following the senate passed the following resolution in relation to the message:

"Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the senate whether Albert Gallatin, commissioned as one of the envoys to treat of peace and commerce with Great Britain, and of commerce with Russia, retains the office of secretary of the department of the treasury, and in case of his so retaining the same, to inform the senate under what authority, and by whom, the powers and duties of the head of the treasury department are discharged during the absence of Albert Gallatin from the United States."

On the 7th June the president caused the following reply to be laid before the senate:

To the Senate of the United States.

"In compliance with their resolution of the 3d inst. the senate are informed, that the office of the secretary of the treasury is not vacated; and that in the absence of Albert Gallatin, commissioned as one of the envoys to treat with Great Britain and Russia, the duties of that office are discharged by William Jones, secretary of the navy, authorised therefor according to the act of congress, entitled "An act making alterations in the treasury and war departments," passed May 8th, 1792.

"JAMES MADISON.

Washington, June 7, 1813.

In this stage of the business it first became my duty to deliberate, and to act upon the subject. The president commences his message of the 29th of May by informing the senate, that during its recess commissions had been granted to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, &c. &c. This measure is presumed to be founded upon the powers granted to the executive and contained in this clause of the second section of the second article of the constitution of the United States.

"The president shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Whether the president was authorised to grant commissions to fill offices, de novo, which had not been before filled, under the power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, is a question not without its difficulties; and upon which I have not made up a final opinion. My disposition strongly is, to give the words of the constitution the most liberal construction in favor of the right of the executive to exercise the power—but whether it can be done consistently, with the real meaning or spirit of the words just quoted, I have the most serious doubts; and these doubts are materially increased by adverting to another clause of the constitution, which evidently intended to grant the general power of appointment, to which the clause just mentioned seems rather an exception than an original grant of power. The clause alluded to is in the same article and section, and in the following words:

"He (to wit, the president) shall have power by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." (Then follows the clause in question.)

But it is not my intention at this time to enter into the examination of this question. It is doubtless an important one, and ought to be settled by a solemn decision; but my object in presenting this subject to you at this time is merely to give you a full view of the transactions connected with it, and more particularly to remind you, that whatever commissions may have been granted, to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard, during the recess of the senate, must necessarily have expired at the end of the last session, and, of course, a new commission after that period was indispensably necessary to give a constitutional sanction to all or any of their acts done thereafter, and that as Great Britain had not, in all pro-ability commissioned any envoys previous to that period, the commissions to be granted under the approbation of the senate might be considered as the only commissions under which the envoys could act, the former having expired according to the provision of the constitution, and consequently withholding a commission from one of the envoys would have less influence upon the proceeding than if they had really been engaged in the full exercise of their diplomatic functions. Another circumstance of very material consideration, in my judgment, is connected with the constitutional limitation of the first commissions granted to envoys, &c. It is the time of their leaving the United States. This took place, as will appear by the public prints, not more than twelve or fourteen days previous to the meeting of the senate; when, it appears to me, there could not exist any reasons sufficient to justify this movement at that particular moment, and of course it must be considered as premature and precipitate. But many and very cogent reasons existed why it ought to have been longer delayed. The principal reasons are, that our government at that time had received no assurances that Great Britain would accept the overture at all; in which case their leaving the United States at any time would be a work of supererogation and considerable expense; and strong reasons existed, as it is believed, to induce an opinion that she had no intention to accept it. The one was the astonishing successes of their allies on the continent of Europe, preceding and about that time—another was, that the minister of foreign affairs, lord Castlereagh, as I am informed and believe, was officially apprized of the overture on the part of Russia, as early as the month of February preceding, and probably in the early part of the month; and the most sullen silence upon the subject had been observed by that cabinet, until after the sailing of our envoys had been announced in London. I do not mean to inquire into the objects of this precipitation, either as they relate to its effects upon the mediation itself, or upon the peculiar circumstances of one of the gentlemen employed under it; nor whether the dignity and honor of the United States have been consulted thereby; nor what impression it will probably make at home or abroad, if Great Britain should finally reject the overture altogether. My object merely is to show, that the necessity which impelled this movement, was not very urgent at the time, and that a becoming patience of two or three weeks would have enabled the president to consult the senate upon the measure in the usual constitutional way, without risking so many novel and hazardous experiments upon fundamental principles, as necessarily accompanied the proceedings, which did take place. The first of these consists in the attempt to unite in one person, two incompatible offices; the second to substitute another person to perform the duties of secretary of the treasury during his voluntary absence from the United States, for an indefinite time. In my judgment, it requires the most profound attention, duly to appreciate the importance and tendency of these principles, and from the many superficial observations I have heard made on them, I am satisfied, that they have not received such attention from the public.—This consideration furnishes an inducement with me to be particularly accurate in my examination of both questions. The union of two or more incompatible offices in one person, is not only hostile to the genius and spirit of the constitution, and people of the United States; but I do not recollect a single instance in which it has been sanctioned by the senate since I have had the honor of a seat in that body. Questions have often occurred, whether two offices proposed to be united in one person, were incompatible or not; but the incompatibility once admitted, a rejection would always be the consequence. At the time of the nomination of general Dearborn to the office he now holds, he was collector of the port of Boston, and notwithstanding he was one of the popular idols of that day, the senate came to a solemn pause, and the nomination was not confirmed, until some informal understanding took place between the president and the majority of the senate, as I was then informed and believe, that an arrangement was made, by which his son was to be made collector in his stead, and that he should not in the mean time receive the compensations attached to both offices; and then, and not until then, was the nomination approved. Believing that the president did not possess the power to make such an arrangement, which essentially consisted in a power to suspend the operation of laws, and disapproving of the whole proceedings accompanying the nomination, as well as the nomination itself, I then incurred the popular odium attached to voting against it. Whether the object obtained, was worth the hazard of such important principles, the public can better now determine. The case of the nomination of Mr. Jay to be envoy extraordinary to London, is cited, and by republicans too, as a precedent in favor of the late proceedings. There are precedents to follow, and precedents to avoid. There never was a stronger one of the latter character, than the nomination of Mr. Jay.—Those who press it strongest, as a precedent, disapproved it most, and will not now admit the conviction of a former error in the disapprobation; whereas many of those who formerly justified it, are now disposed to admit the conviction of an error in their former justification. What then is this but presenting an acknowledged error as a precedent to sanction the adoption by another error? Surely such a precedent ought to be avoided, not followed.

I know of no person in the United States, who disapproved of that proceeding more, as I then understood, than the president, Mr. Gallatin and myself; and I have lately been called upon to sanction, and perhaps to transcend the principle in the person of the one, upon the nomination of the other of these gentlemen. And the refusal to sacrifice the convictions of my own mind for their accommodation, has submitted me to extreme censure, although these convictions are not impaired, but strengthened by further reflection. Besides, when the republicans were endeavoring to oust the federalists from power, and substitute themselves in their stead, did they tell the people that, if through their favor, they should become possessed of power, they would then quote the very federal errors, for which their authors were denounced before the people by them to justify their own conduct? Did the republicans then tell the people, that they would even transcend federal precedents? That they would resort to forced constructions of the constitution, and the laws, to effect favorite objects, through the agency of favorite individuals? On the contrary, did they not most manfully pledge themselves to the people, to administer the government in the true unsophisticated spirit of the constitution and of the laws? That these pledges were given is most true—and now to resort to the most manifest and indisputable of the federal errors for justification, is to me most strange. Such a precedent surely can have no charms for republican orthodoxy. It certainly can have none for me, who have been both an agent and a witness to all these scenes. To me, it is a circumstance of heartfelt consolation to know, that in a course of more than twenty years public service, my conduct has invariably borne evidence of the sincerity of my professions; that I nerer, on any occasion, yielded my political principles to the force of circumstances, nor to the declaim of party spirit, nor to partialities for men. This plea of the force of circumstances is often visionary—seldom more visionary than on the present occasion. But the case of Mr. Jay, is not precisely analogous to the present one. One great objection to that case was, its tendency to subject the judicial department to an undue influence with the executive. In that respect it was worse in my judgment, than the present case. But the incompatibility was not so palpable in that, as in the present case; nor attended with such serious consequences. There were other judges who, in the absence of the chief justice, might perform all the necessary judicial functions. Besides, the courts are in session only a small portion of the year, and the absence of the chief justice might not be longer, than the interval between the courts. In this case, the duties of two offices might be performed by the same person. I mention these circumstances, merely to show the difference in the two cases; not because I approve of the proceedings in either; for in the case of Mr. Jay, I do think the duties of the two offices so incompatible, as to render the appointment extremely objectionable. But the duties of the secretary of the treasury and of envoy extraordinary to a foreign power, are palpably and absolutely incompatible, nor do I believe, that any person can be legally, and constitutionally appointed, to perform the duties of secretary of treasury in his voluntary absence beyond the limits of the United States. This may be presumed to have been the opinion of general Washington when he nominated Mr. Jay; because it was believed at that time, that Mr. Hamilton, then secretary of the treasury, was preferred by him as well as by the whole federal party, for that mission, and that Mr. Hamilton himself was very desirous of the appointment; but upon examining the constitution and the laws, it was determined not to exceed the powers of the executive, and from that cause the original intention was reluctantly abandoned. I have lately received assurances from respectable sources, that such was the case. To ascertain the first point, I beg to introduce the provisions of the law, detailing some of the duties of the secretary of the treasury, from which it will appear, that they must be executed in the city of Washington, and no where else, and at all periods of the year. They are in the following words:

“That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of the public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue, and the public expenditure; to superintend the collection of the revenue, to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns, and to grant under the limitations herein established, or to be hereafter provided, all warrants for monies to be issued from the treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law, to execute such services relative to the sale of the lands belonging to the United States, as may be by law required of him, to make report and give information to either branch of the legislature, in person or in writing (as he may be required) respecting all matters referred to him by the senate or house of representatives, or which shall appertain to his office, and generally to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.”

After an attentive perusal of the provisions of this law, no other effort of the mind is necessary to determine the palpable and absolute incompatibility between the duties of the secretary of the treasury, and those of an envoy extraordinary to a foreign power, than to understand the distinction between here and there, between Washington and St. Petersburg. Because, however extensive may be the moral endowments of the secretary's mind, he must be wanting in personal ability. His person cannot be present at Washington and St. Petersburg the same time, and the duties of the two offices do require to be performed at the two places at the same time—And of course, they are essentially incompatible with each other. The first duty pointed out by the provisions of the law, for the secretary to perform, is to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue. This is unquestionably an important duty. How has it been performed?

The meeting of congress, which did take place only a few days after the departure of our envoys, was known to be intended expressly for the improvement of the revenue; what was its disappointment; when, upon its meeting, it was informed, that the secretary, whose first duty it was, under the law establishing the treasury department, to prepare the plan for the improvement of the revenue, had a few days before its meeting, without even the plea of urgent necessity, voluntarily absented himself from the United States; and thus unexpectedly deprived congress of the aid of his splendid financial talents; and that too, on the very first occasion which had occurred in the government, to render their full and prompt exertions indispensably necessary? However correct may have been his motives, it is in vain to urge in justification of his conduct, that the secretary left behind him a prepared plan for the improvement of the revenue. It is well known, that this plan was presented to congress under very questionable circumstances; and besides the presentations of a plan of revenue, at a preceding session of congress, was not a performance of all the duties required of the secretary under the law, to the congress upon which had fallen the unpleasant and difficult task of laying the taxes for the improvement of the revenue—for by pursuing the further provisions of the law, it will be found, that it is also made the duty of the secretary to give information to either branch of the legislature in person or in writing (as he may be required) respecting all matters referred to him, &c. Now it is well known, that the plan for the improvement of the revenue, left behind him, was inchoate and imperfect. It required much explanation. It was his indispensable duty under the law to be present to give it either in person or in writing, as might have been and would have been required of him, probably by both branches of the legislature, if he had not put it out of their power by voluntarily absenting himself from the United States.

But these provisions require of the secretary the performance of another duty of no trivial importance. It is “to grant, &c. all warrants for monies to be issued from the treasury in pursuance of appropriations by law.” The appropriations at this time, certainly exceed thirty millions of dollars. Is this a duty to be also performed by a person not known to the constitution, nor recognized by law? Was this a charge to be voluntarily parted with by the secretary of the treasury; and for him still to hold the office of the head of that department? Your laws are almost every where interspersed with important duties to be performed by the secretary of the treasury; but one, requiring peculiar attention at this time, is contained in the section of an act of congress passed the third of March, 1797, in the following words:

“That whenever any person or persons who shall have incurred any fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability, or shall have been interested in any vessel, goods, wares, or merchandize, which shall have been subject to any seizure, forfeiture or disability by force of any present or future law of the United States, for the laying, levying or collecting any duties or taxes, or by force of any present or future act concerning the enrolling and licensing ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries, and for regulating the same, shall prefer his petition to the judge of the district, in which such fine, penalty, forfeiture or disability shall have occurred, truly and particularly setting forth the circumstances of his case, and praying that the same may be mitigated or remitted, the said judge shall inquire, in a summary manner, into the circumstances of the case, first causing reasonable notice to be given to the person or persons claiming such fine, penalty or forfeiture, and to the attorney of the United States for such district, that each may have an opportunity of showing cause against the mitigation or remission thereof, and shall cause the facts which shall appear upon such enquiry, to be stated and annexed to the petition, and direct their transmission to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, who shall thereupon have power to mitigate or remit such fine, forfeiture, or penalty, or remove such disability, or any part thereof, if, in his opinion, the same shall have been incurred without wilful negligence, or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same; and to direct the prosecution, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease and be discontinued, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable or just."

This clause confers upon the secretary of the treasury judicial powers of the highest and most delicate character; and makes him literally chancellor of the exchequer. It was scarcely possible to appreciate the importance and delicacy of this judicial power. It is a chancery power, almost without limit or rule, depending almost exclusively upon the mere discretion of the secretary of the treasury; to be decided on in his private chamber, without jury, without auditors or spectators, &c. &c. Ought there not to be unusual confidence reposed in the personal integrity and talents of the judge entrusted with the execution of such important, delicate discretionary powers? Some idea of the importance of this power may be formed, from the recollection that not long since, nineteen millions of dollars at one time, from particular circumstances, were subjected to this discretionary power, to be settled between the secretary and the claiming merchants at his chamber.—Under circumstances so delicate, and for an amount so enormous, the secretary was then very willing to incur the responsibility of making the adjustment. But on that occasion, the power was resumed by congress, not without serious imputations being thrown against the proceeding, as trenching upon the secretary's prerogatives.

Judicial powers are in their nature unalienable.—They depend for their performance upon the personal confidence reposed in the judge. What, then, has become of this power, during the absence of the secretary? Is it to remain dormant, or is it to be executed? If dormant, in what situation is the whole mercantile class placed by the absence of the secretary? If to be executed, by whom? Every reflecting man must know that the substitution of the secretary of the navy, Mr. Jones, is an argument, so far as it relates to his execution of the powers of the treasury personally, merely nominal. At least that inference is inevitable from a statement made to congress by himself. One of his first acts after taking possession of the navy department was to call for assistance in the execution of its duties; they being seemed too burthenome for an individual. The duties, it is believed, have not decreased; how then so shortly afterwards could he find himself not only competent to the discharge of all the duties of his own department, but those still more arduous and important in their character of the treasury, superadded? I am informed and believe, that the real operative part of the business is performed by persons entirely unknown to constitution or law for such objects, the mere dependent clerks of the treasury department, and the name of Mr. Jones is added to complete the formal part of it. This statement is not intended to insinuate aught against Mr. Jones. I have long enjoyed the pleasure of an acquaintance with that gentleman, and it now adds to that pleasure to declare that he possesses my full and entire confidence. My sole object is, to lay before you an entire and candid statement of the most material laws, and facts, affecting this question, that you may be able impartially to estimate the consideration, operating on those gentlemen, who refused to sanction these proceedings with their approbation.

This leads me to consider, whether the executive is invested with the power under the provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States, to appoint any person or persons to perform the duties of secretary of the treasury during his voluntary absence from the United States. And it is a subject of no small regret to me to believe, that the president has unintentionally mistaken his powers in this very important and delicate respect. I have at the same time so much confidence in his candor and magnanimity as to believe that, upon a more critical attention to the constitution and laws, he would acknowledge the mistake. The sole ground upon which the president places his authority is contained in the following section of the act passed the 8th of May, 1792, to which he refers in his last reply to the resolution of the senate upon the subject.

"That in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the secretary of state, secretary of the treasury, or of the war department, or of any officer of either of the said departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States in case he shall think it necessary, to authorise any person or persons at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease."

The words from which the president has inferred the exercise of this power, are, "absence from the seat of government." It is said that the secretary of the treasury is absent from the seat of government, and therefore the president may, under the law, and did appoint a person to perform his duties during such absence. This construction regards merely the letter of this particular clause of the law, detached from every other, and obviously disregards the meaning and spirit of the clause itself, as well as every other part of the law. The object of the law was, to provide a remedy for certain cases of necessity, which had been omitted in the provisions of the constitution. The construction of the law therefore, ought not to be extended beyond its own object.—The words "absence from the seat of government," evidently mean a necessary absence, pre-existing any power given to the president by the law, and evidently create a condition precedent to the exercise of any power whatever under it. The event must happen before the power accrues. Now, what are the powers exercised by the president under these words? First, the power to create the absence, and then the power to appoint in consequence of the absence thus created, not in consequence of any necessary absence pre-existing the exercise of any power whatever under the law, but on account of an absence created by the president himself from an exercise of power not given by the law. Where are the words in the law, which could be construed to intend to give the president a power to create an absence? There are none. The words in case "of absence from the seat of government," certainly do not. They are only intended to describe one condition, upon which the power is to accrue, and that condition must precede the exercise of any power whatever under the law. But there is another objection to the exercise of the power in question, under the words "absence from the seat of government." They do not describe the case, which has happened, and upon the happening of which the president has ventured to exercise the power. The actual case, which has happened, is this. The secretary of the treasury has voluntarily taken a voyage to St. Petersburg. Now I deny that this case is described by the words "absence from the seat of government;" because those words do not only not convey an affirmative idea of a voyage to St. Petersburg, but do imply a negative idea against it. These words so far from conveying an idea of a voyage beyond the limits of the United States do distinctly imply a presence within the United States. No man, who intends to inform another, that a third person intends to take a voyage to Europe, would expect to make that impression upon the mind by informing him, that the third person intended to be absent from the seat of government. Because so far from conveying that impression they would distinctly imply a presence within the U. States. The minor proposition, is never used to comprehend the major. But the most formidable objection to the president's construction, is, that it militates directly, as I conceive, against the provisions of the constitution, and surely, that interpretation ought always to be given to the laws, that will support and not destroy constitutional provisions. The 2d section of the 2d article of the constitution, after authorizing the president "to take the opinion in writing of the principal officers in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of the respective offices, &c." contains this provision,—"And he (to wit, the president) shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not therein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." Then follows an exception to the general course of appointment, by investing congress with the power, by law, to vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the president alone, &c. This exception is contained in the following words:

"But the congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

The plain language of the constitution is this—The president shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint all the officers of the government, especially the principal officers, but the congress may by law vest in him alone the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper. Congress is certainly restrained from changing by law, under any circumstances, the constitutional course of appointing the principal officers, which can only be done, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and not by the president alone. How does the power exercised under the law by the president alone, comport with these provisions of the constitution? Are not all these wise and necessary limitations and restrictions provided in and by the principle of construction put upon this law, would enable the president, first to create the absence (to use the words of the law) "of the secretary of state, secretary of the treasury, or of the secretary of the war department, or of any other officer of either of the said departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof;" and then to appoint all these officers alone, and without the advice and consent of the senate. It happens by a strange and singular fatality in this interpretation of the law, that the president claims the appointment alone, of those very principal officers, the appointment of which by the president alone, congress has no power even by law to vest in the president alone, according to the provisions of the constitution; whereas his power does not extend to the appointment alone of such inferior officers, as by law congress may constitutionally vest in him alone. Surely the law never could intend, and does not mean such a palpable contradiction to the provisions of the constitution, for the law only intended to provide, from a principle of necessity, for unprovided cases. The whole section of the law taken together, clearly explains its own object, for it cannot escape attention that according to its provisions, the cases of absence and disability described, are to be such, as that the person affected by them, cannot perform the duties of his office; nor it never can be fairly contended, that the abandonment of the duties of an office, can imply an inability to discharge the duties of such office. Besides, if the secretary cannot discharge the duties of the office of secretary of the treasury, it is proof positive of the incompatibility of the two offices in question; because the test of positive incompatibility is the positive inability of the same person to discharge the duties of two offices at the same time. But the extent of this unfortunate interpretation of the law does not stop here. On the 13th of Feb. 1795, congress again resumed this subject, and probably presuming that the powers given to the president by the former act had been rather indefinite, passed another law with a view to its limitation, consisting of a single section, in the following words:

"That in case of vacancy in the office of secretary of state, secretary of the treasury, or of the department of war, or of any office of either of the said departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices, until a successor be appointed, or such vacancy be filled: provided that no one vacancy shall be supplied, in manner aforesaid, for a longer term than six months."

Now this law clearly implies that there are vacancies in these principal offices, when the incumbents cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, yet the president informs the senate in his message on the 3d of June, 1813, that the office of secretary of the treasury is not vacated; although Mr. Gallatin was actually at that time commissioned as an envoy extraordinary, &c. and absent on a voyage to St. Petersburg.—This interpretation completely evades the limitation of this law. The law having provided the limitation for vacancies, and the president having determined "that the office of secretary of the treasury is not vacated;" of course Mr. Gallatin's case is thus excepted out of this general limitation which applies only to vacancies, and brings the claim of power by the president to this point—that he may under the law create the absence of all the principal officers just described, and may alone, without the advice and consent of the senate, appoint substitutes for them at his pleasure for an indefinite time. Now, fellow-citizens, let me entreat your impartial attention to some of the consequences of this assumption of power under the interpretation of the laws in question—On no subject has the constitution been more scrupulously attentive, than to secure to the people of the United States, the fair and honest disbursements of their public monies. It first provides, "that no money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." It then in substance provides, that no person shall be entrusted with the disbursement of the public monies, but one, who shall be first elected for that purpose by the president and approved by the senate of the United States; a body composed of two members from each state in the union. These provisions together with the checks provided by the laws establishing the treasury department, &c. have been deemed insufficient securities for this great object; peculiarly great at this time, when the appropriations amount to a sum so enormous. All these securities the people have a right to demand of the government, and to know the persons invested in these high trusts.—Have they all these securities at this time? They certainly have not. The person exclusively known by the constitution, for the most material agency in this important business; one of whose special duties under the law is "to grant all warrants &c. for monies to be issued from the treasury in pursuance of appropriations made by law," is absent on a foreign embassy; and another person, no where recognized by the constitution is formally performing this high, responsible duty in his stead. The present president is well known to be amiable and unambitious.—His predecessor was amiable also, and unambitious; but his competitor for the presidential chair, with an equal vote by the people, is well known to have been both enterprising and ambitious. It was scarcely less than a miracle, considering the stratagems he employed for that purpose, that he was not placed in the presidential chair. Now endeavor to imagine for yourselves any plan which could more effectually facilitate the schemes of ambition than the assumption of a power to send the principal officers of the treasury from the country, and to substitute in their stead creatures devoted to the selfish purposes of an ambitious president. To exemplify the case more particularly. Suppose Aaron Burr your president, with a power to send all the principal officers of the treasury department out of the country, and to substitute in their stead, without the advice and consent of the senate, some of "his choice spirits, who are tired of the dull pursuits of civil life, &c." would you have much confidence, that your public monies would be honestly disbursed in pursuance of appropriations made by law? And do you believe, that there is but one man in the United States possessing Burr's propensities for personal aggrandisement?—Recollect, too, that the enterprising and ambitious always cover their selfish projects, with precedents afforded by the amiable and unambitious. Of course, such precedents cannot be too scrupulously, and diligently guarded against in times of security and confidence. This consideration is entitled to double force at this moment, when the only justification of the very case before us is founded upon a precedent, and that precedent itself, founded upon an acknowledged error. From these, and other enumerated considerations, I gave my most hearty concurrence to the following resolution adopted by the senate on the 15th day of June last. I sincerely hope, that after the effervescence of the present moment shall be dissipated, the principle it embraces will receive a conspicuous place in every republican textbook, regardless of the names which may be found on either side of the question.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the senate the power and duties of the secretary of the department of the treasury, and those of an envoy extraordinary to a foreign power, are so incompatible, that they ought not to be and remain united in the same person."

What is the principle asserted by the negative of this resolution? That the powers and duties of the secretary of the department of the treasury, and those of an envoy to a foreign power, are not so incompatible, but that they ought to be, and remain united in the same person. What is this, but asserting the sinecure principle in its worst form; in the most operative, beneficial offices, and not merely in the nominal, lucrative ones? What is this, but a change of principle, with a change of men? How entirely the opposite of the just and lofty pretensions of republicanism? Obedience to principles, not men—after all, for what object, upon what ground, have all these delicate principles been hazarded?

The object was surely laudable. It was to restore peace to the country. Amiable solicitude for peace certainly impelled the conduct. Its motive entitles the author to every indulgence.—Yet, although the motive for the conduct be pure and laudable, the principles asserted by it in their practical effects partake nothing of the motive which dictated them.—The ground of the proceeding, in my judgment, was most delusive and unfortunate. It must have been, that Mr. Gallatin was better qualified to discharge the duties of both these high incompatible offices, than was any other gentleman in the United States to perform the duties of either of them. Nothing less than this could be pleaded in justification of the attempt to unite in the same person, two incompatible offices, under circumstances so inauspicious to the object.—It is certainly very complimentary to the individual, who has been honored with this presidential distinction, and may perhaps tend to advance his personal aggrandisement. But considering that this individual was born without the limits of the United States, and that accident alone cast him upon our shores, I am unwilling to state what I conceive, ought to be the just and proper effects of this compliment, upon the feelings of every man, woman and child, whose happy destiny gave them birth within the limits of the United States—who upon such birth inhaled the true armor patriæ, and have cherished the holy passion up to the present moment.

For what is this passion, but an affectionate preference of one's own country, and own countrymen, to foreign countries and foreign countrymen? Yet even this exalted and honorable affection of the human mind, the fruitful parent of so many virtues, and virtuous deeds, which in all ages has stimulated individuals to heroic actions, and splendid exploits, which has often exalted nations to the highest pitch of grandeur and prosperity, must now hide its diminished head, beneath that visionary expanded philanthropy, which, in its excess, gives the preference to foreigners, over one's own countrymen. Yet this ideal philosophy of the mind never yet had warmth, nor energy enough, to stimulate the bosom to one heroic deed, nor in any way to contribute to the exaltation of any one nation. But the principle of the union of incompatible offices, has an unhappy bearing upon the very basis of our fundamental institutions. They are all founded upon the principle, that the people of the United States possess a capacity to govern themselves. They presume, that one man at least may be found competent to the discharge of the duties of each office, however important they may be. Selecting one man for the discharge of the duties of two incompatible offices, whether an American or foreigner, militates directly against this principle, and tends to question its political orthodoxy.

From these considerations, although others might be justly resorted to, I felt myself reluctantly constrained in the discharge of my high official duties, to advise the president not to appoint Mr. Gallatin one of the envoys under the mediation. It was impossible for me laboring under the impressions produced by these reflections, to give my consent to the measure, so long as Mr. Gallatin held the office of secretary of the treasury, without sacrificing every honest conviction of my own judgment. My reluctance arose, from the strong desire I unfeignedly felt, to give the plan for obtaining peace, approved by the president, the fairest experiment in his own way. It is well known that I should have voted in favor of the nomination, if the president had deemed it proper to have nominated another person to be secretary of the treasury. Candor, however, compels me to acknowledge, that with the information I then received and believed, and which perhaps at some future period the public may possess, such vote would have been exclusively influenced by a spirit of concession, and a respectful deference for the views of the president. By superficial observers, the rejection of Mr. Gallatin is believed to have injurious effects upon the negotiation to be conducted under the mediation.—Would to God, there may be any negotiations, under the mediation to be affected in any way!! If there should be none, it must be agreed that the rejection could not have produced any great mischief in that respect, and it has certainly saved a great fundamental principle. But admitting the negotiations to proceed, what are the real effects, which will probably be produced by the rejection? Recollect, the envoys were to act jointly and severally; and that the commissions granted during the recess of the senate expired at the end of its last session. New commissions must therefore have issued, after the decision of the senate. The only effect, then, that could be practically produced by the rejection, if the president had thought proper to exert his powers on the occasion, would have been this, that some person might be appointed in Mr. Gallatin's stead, who would have borne out the new commission, and acted under it. If Mr. Gallatin had been approved, then the person bearing out the new commission, would have passed it over to Mr. Gallatin, who would have acted under it himself. The president had deemed it best not to appoint a substitute, and of course, it must be presumed, either that he was satisfied with the two who were approved, or that he had lost all confidence in the successful termination of the project. The power of the president to nominate a republican substitute, and his refusal to do it, afford a sufficient reply to the cavil set up, that the only republican was excluded by the senate. Because if the president had nominated any honorable, intelligent republican, laboring under no legal disability, I have no doubt but he would have received the unanimous vote of the senate. The alarm expressed by some, of the unfavorable impressions produced on foreign nations by the rejection, is certainly ideal and inconsiderate.—Upon what pretext would any foreign nation take offence, at our adherence to the fundamental principles of our own institutions, in appointing our foreign ministers? We have had abundant experience upon this subject to relieve us from all apprehensions in that respect. Mr. Short commissioned by Mr. Jefferson during the recess of the senate as minister plenipotentiary to Russia, and actually in Europe on his way thither, upon being nominated to the succeeding senate was unanimously rejected by that body. The president at his pleasure, has recalled other ministers from other nations without offence to any. Foreign nations have recalled their ministers from the United States at their pleasure without offence. Indeed no condescension could be greater or more reprehensible, than departing from the observance of the principles of our own institutions, in appointing our foreign agents, for our own objects, for the accommodation of any foreign nation whatever. As to the consideration of the loss of Mr. Gallatin's extraordinary talents by the rejection, I would observe that those, who calculate upon the efficacy of the excess of that gentleman's talents, beyond those of any other gentleman in the United States, in changing the views of the British cabinet, upon the subject of British maritime rights, risk their calculations for peace upon a forlorn hope indeed. I would not wish to derogate aught from the talents of Mr. Gallatin. They are certainly great, but I deem it no derogation to say, that in my opinion, there are many, very many gentlemen in the United States, possessing talents equally competent to all the purposes of his mission.

I have now, fellow citizens, given you a general and comprehensive exposition of the course of reflections, which influenced my conduct on this very interesting subject. I have laid before you, the whole of the constitution, and of the laws having any material bearing on the case in their original letter. If you will examine them with impartiality and attention, discarding the idle, malicious and senseless imputations of improper motives without a conceivably object, which have no existence, except in the unfortunate propensities of the minds which suggest them, and if they had, could in no respect alter the constitution or the laws, I cannot help flattering myself with the concurrence of your opinions upon the subject. If, however, notwithstanding the diligence I have employed to inform myself correctly, I should have taken erroneous views of the subject, I have the consolation to know that by collating the constitution and the laws affecting the case, I have furnished you with the means of correcting my unintentional errors. WILLIAM E. GILES.

Wigwam, Nov. 6, 1813.

Events of the War.

THE NIAGARA FRONTIER.

In the Legislature of NEW-YORK, Feb. 1.

The following message and documents, were received from his excellency the governor, and ordered to be printed:—

GEN. LEWIS—Pursuant to the suggestion made in my public communication at the opening of the session, I now lay before you a statement of the proceedings which have taken place relative to the invasion and defence of the Niagara frontier.

On the 26th day of November last, I received a requisition from the war department, a copy whereof, marked (A), accompanies this message. On the same day a general order for levying the detachment issued (B), with a blank for the number of men.— This order was enclosed to general McClure, then commanding on that frontier, with authority and directions to fill the blank with such number of men as would be competent, according to the authentic information he might possess of the number, situation and objects of the enemy's force in that direction, and I thereupon to transmit the order to major-general Hall.

Upon my return to this place from the southern frontier, on the 24th December last, an express delivered me communications from general McClure, and from general Hopkins, commandant of the Niagara brigade of militia, informing me that the enemy had crossed at Lewistown and burnt that village, and of their apprehensions for the safety of fort Niagara.—That the militia had been called forth en masse, and that about 400 of them had arrived.

The express stated, that he met bodies of troops going out, and that major-general Hall, commandant of the western division of militia, was on his way to that frontier.

The superintendent of the United States ordnance department in this city, immediately sent off 350,000 musket cartridges, 14,000 flints, 500 muskets, and a quantity of ammunition prepared for field pieces. There was also furnished from the state supply, at this place, 1000 muskets and cartridge-boxes, which have since been followed by 500 camp-kettles, and as many axes and shovels as could be procured, and by a quantity of musket cartridges belonging to the state, which was near Oswego.

Not having the means of immediate transportation at my command, the quarter-master general of the United States for this district, upon a requisition therefor, caused the state muskets and cartridge-boxes to be transported with those of the United States.

A copy of my answer to general McClure's letter (C), and also of a communication made to general Hall (D), is annexed.

On the 31st day of December, a despatch from general Hall (E), came to hand, which gave me reason to hope that further depredations of the enemy would be prevented. But on the 2nd of January, instant, an express brought a second despatch (F), giving the melancholy account of the destruction of Buffalo. Whereupon, colonel Lamb, one of my aids-de-camp, was directed to repair immediately to that frontier, with instructions to confer with general Hall and the other general officers of militia, and with plenary powers to comply with any request within the scope of my authority, and the resources of the state. By him, also, a remittance of some funds was made to major-general Hall, and at the same time, the general was invested with full and entire command over all the militia and means of defence west of Onondaga, for the purpose of resisting the invasion. On his arrival at Onondaga, colonel Lamb informed me that the enemy, except the garrison of fort Niagara, had returned into Canada. On his arrival at Batavia, he confirmed the information, and stated, further, that the people who had fled from their homes were returning to them, and that nothing more could be done by militia on that frontier, at present, than to support and protect the inhabitants against further encroachments. A copy of his final report is herewith submitted (H).

The paper marked (I), contains major-general Hall's official account of his arrangements, and of the battle with the enemy at Black Rock on the 30th of December last. Three reports have since been received from him. (K L O). The copy of an affidavit of Robert Lee, esq. who was taken a prisoner in fort Niagara, (M), also accompanies this message.

The preceding statement, communications and documents, furnish all the information in my possession relative to the late invasion, and will acquaint the legislature with all the measures which have been adopted in consequence of it. It will, I trust, satisfactorily appear from them, that the exertion of all the resources of the state, applicable to the protection of the western district, were promptly exerted in its defence.

It must be ascribed to a great waste or embezzlement of public property on that frontier, that there should have been any deficiency of arms or ammunition for repelling the late invasion; for a number of cannon and a great proportion of all the arms, ammunition and other military stores of every kind, belonging to the state, had been before forwarded to the arsenals at Canandaigua and Batavia, and to Buffalo, and to other places west of Canandaigua, and large quantities thereof had been deposited for the security of the inhabitants in the towns bounded by lake Ontario and lake Erie, and in other places. The whole of the public stores at Canandaigua, and westward of it, from the beginning of the war, have been subject to the orders of major-general Hall, and of every other general officer of militia who might be called into service to repel invasions. A message communicated to the legislature last year, with respect to the distribution of arms and military stores, and the annual report of the commissary of the state, will afford more particular information upon the subject.

I fully concur in the suggestion made by colonel Lamb in his report, which has been likewise mentioned by most of the militia officers of the west, that a description of force more permanent and more to be relied upon than detached militia, is indispensable.

I therefore beg leave to recommend the organization of two regiments of volunteers, of 1000 men each, and a battalion of mounted infantry or rifle-men, consisting of 400 men, who may repair to that frontier—relieve the detached militia now there, and remain in service for the time for which the former are bound to serve—that the wages of privates be increased by the state to ten dollars per month—and that the volunteers be permitted to choose their own officers. Should the legislature think with me on the above subject, there will be no difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of volunteers immediately. There are equipments belonging to the state, of every kind, west of Canandaigua, sufficient for twice the number of volunteers before mentioned.

Any other plans or arrangements which the wisdom of the legislature may devise for the emergency, will equally meet my cordial co-operation and support.

Many of the brave men who fell at Black Rock, were in the service of the state pursuant to the laws thereof. The laws of the United States may not extend to their families. Those also who were wounded or disabled may not come within the purview of the pension law of the United States. The exercise of further legislative authority will, therefore, be requisite, before the wounded can receive the benefit of the provision contained in the 70th section of the act organizing the militia of this state. Although that section does not extend to the families of those who fall in the service of the state, yet they have claims upon its protection and bounty which the legislature will readily discharge.

Accompanying his excellency the governor's message.

B Albany, Nov. 26, 1813.

Sir—Let me request you to authorise general McClure to garrison forts George and Niagara, in the event of general Harrison's leaving the Niagara frontier for Sacketts' Harbor.

Should the enemy abandon Burlington heights, as appears to be their intention, the garrisons need not be large. Much will depend on the character of the person left in command. To colonel Fleming it might be safely committed. His experience and other valuable qualities fit him for it. The garrisons may be composed either of volunteers or drafted militia: But of whatever description, it is desirable that their term of service should be more than one month.

Let me request the favor of hearing from you on this subject so soon as general McClure shall inform you of his arrangements.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) J. ARMSTRONG.
Governor Tompkins.

Albany, Nov. 28, 1813.

Sir—Having been informed recently, that the regulars is about to leave forts George and Niagara, and believing that there is imminent danger of invasion and distress of our fellow-citizens on the Niagara frontier, I have to request in pursuance of a requisition for that purpose, made through the secretary of the war department of the United States, that you will detach from your division of the militia of this state, and organize and order to that frontier, on or before the 10th day of December next, men, with the requisite number of officers, non-commissioned officers and musicians, who are to march to fort Niagara, in this state, and report themselves to, and obey the orders of, the commanding officer of militia on that frontier.

Your known zeal in protecting the inhabitants of the frontier of your division, and the emergency of the occasion will, I trust, call forth your utmost exertions to comply with this order.

With great consideration, I have the honor to be sir, your obedient servant,

Major-general Amos Hall.

Albany, Dec. 24, 1813

Sir—I have this moment arrived from New-York, and have received your communication detailing the disastrous state of things on the Niagara frontier.—With my letter of the 26th of November last, you were furnished with an order on major-general Hall, to detach from his division such number as you should judge sufficient to garrison forts George and Niagara and to protect the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier. Upon my arrival here, I learn for the first time, that the former has been destroyed, the village of Newark burnt, and fort Niagara made the depot of all the cannon, military stores and equipments on that frontier, with but a handful of men to garrison it. I was not apprized of the intention to evacuate fort George, or to destroy Newark, otherwise I should most assuredly have given direction to have that frontier supplied with a considerable force, to guard against the consequences of the irritation and disposition to retaliate, which the burning of Newark would naturally excite, on the west side of the Niagara river.

Major Bumford has forwarded the following articles:

350,000 musket cartridges,

14,000 flints,

500 muskets, and a quantity of ammunition for field pieces.

Should any further supplies be required, they shall be forwarded immediately. The articles in the state arsenals at Canandaigua and Batavia, are already subject to the orders of militia generals. I understand general Hall has gone out. He will, of course, have the command, and, I have, therefore, addressed a communication to him, containing authority to call for additional numbers of men, and to repel the invasion promptly and effectually. I have also written to the secretary of war, and will communicate the answer and instructions of the president, so soon as they may be received. I hope you will have been able, before the receipt of this, to have expelled, if not destroyed, the invading force.

I am, sir, with regard, your obedient servant,
(Signed) DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.
Gen. George McClure.

Sir—On the 26th November last, an order was issued for a sufficient detachment from your division, to secure the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier during the winter. The number was left blank, with directions for general McClure to fill it, and deliver the order to you. It was presumed that as he had commanded on the frontier during the fall, he was the best judge of the quantum of force requisite for the above purpose. I was, therefore, much surprised on my return from New-York, this day, to learn the weak and disastrous state of that frontier. The express informs me that you had proceeded, or would proceed to the lines in consequence of that information. The whole of your division is placed at your disposal for the purpose of repelling the invasion, and driving the enemy from our state. You are charged with the command of that frontier for that purpose, and will exert yourself to the utmost to put a prompt and effectual stop to the incursions and depredations of the enemy, by expelling, and if possible, by destroying them.

350,000 musket cartridges, 14,000 flints, 500 muskets, and ammunition for field pieces, have been forwarded by major Bumford, to Canandaigua, where they will be subject to order. The nature of the service to be performed on this occasion, cannot give rise to any questions about the liability of militia to perform it, as the resistance of invasion is the only object. You will consider yourself vested with liberal powers and authority to effect that object, and you will doubtless be zealous to accomplish it.

If there be no other quarters, you can take possession of the houses and other buildings at Buffalo and Black Rock, which I am informed are principally abandoned, and of the huts at Williamsville. You will keep a good look out on the Ridge road, and prevent the enemy from destroying the arsenal and stores at Batavia.

The public property delivered out and not used, under your orders, is to be returned and secured before the militia be dismissed. There was great negligence and waste with respect to the military stores at Niagara, in November and December, 1812, and in the beginning of 1813.

The contractor's agent, major Allen, ought to be notified of the quantity of provisions which may be required, and you will permit me to suggest, that unless you can arm all the militia which may arrive and be unarmed, you had better dismiss them or send them into the interior, until they can be armed; as without arms they will not add to your force, but will exhaust your provisions and deprive the frontier inhabitants of the means of support during the winter.

I am, sir, with great regard, your ob't serv't.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

Maj. gen. Amos Hall,

Buffalo, Dec. 26th, 1813—Evening.

SIR—On my receiving information of the enemy's crossing the Niagara river and taking the fort, I immediately set off for that frontier. On my arrival at Batavia, I found a number of volunteers assembled. I tarried one day at that place, to forward them on to the frontier, and make arrangements for those who should follow.

I this day arrived at Buffalo and assumed the command of the troops (being all volunteers) now on this station. The whole number here and at Lewistown, &c. may amount to 2000 of all descriptions. The enemy have made their appearance opposite Black Rock and an invasion is to be expected.

The troops now out can be kept but a few days.—The troops called out on your excellency's last requisition, cannot all arrive at this place until the middle or last of the week. The order did not reach me until the evening of the 16th instant.

Our loss in the capture of Fort Niagara has been immense. What number of brave men have been sacrificed, we have not yet been able to learn. It must have been great.

Several inhabitants have been killed at Lewistown, and among whom it is not ascertained there are any women or children.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

(Signed)

AMOS HALL.

Head-quarters, Niagara Frontier,Dec. 30, 1813—7 o'clock, P. M.

SIR—I have only a moment to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th inst. and to add that this frontier is wholly desolate. The British crossed over, supported by a strong party of Indians, at a little before day this morning, near Black Rock. They were met by the militia under my command, with spirit, but overpowered by the numbers and discipline of the enemy the militia gave way and fled on every side. Every attempt to rally them was ineffectual. Their purpose was obtained, and the flourishing village of Buffalo is laid in ruins.—The Niagara frontier now lies open and naked to our enemies. Your judgment will direct you what is most proper in the emergency. I am exhausted with fatigue and must defer particulars until to-morrow. My valuable lives are lost.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. HALL, maj. gen.

(H.)

Albany, January 29th, 1814.

SIR—Agreeably to your excellency's orders, I left this city on the 4th instant, and proceeded with all possible dispatch to the Niagara frontier. On my arrival at Bloomfield, in the county of Ontario, I met general Hall, who was on the point of returning to Batavia, to collect the troops who had been detached under your excellency's order of the 26th November, which amounted to 1600 men; and also of another detachment of 1000 which he had ordered out on authority subsequently given him.

On my arrival at Batavia, I found that the inhabitants of that place and the country west, as far as Buffalo, on the main road, had, on receiving information of the landing of the enemy, fled and left their homes, but were generally returning. I proceeded to Buffalo and found that flourishing village totally destroyed. The only buildings remaining in it are the gaol, which is built of stone, a small frame house, and an armorer's shop. All the houses east of Buffalo, on the Batavia road, for two miles, excepting log houses, are also destroyed, and almost every building between Buffalo and Fort Niagara, along the river, had, I was informed, shared the same fate.

The enemy had with him at Black Rock and Buffalo, a number of Indians, (the general opinion in that country is about 200) who pursued their accustomed mode of horrid warfare, by tomahawking, scalping and otherwise mutilating the persons who fell into their hands. Among the victims of their savage barbarity, was a Mrs. Lovejoy, who was tomahawed and afterwards burnt in her own house.—The conduct of these savages, has struck the minds of the people on the Niagara frontier with such horror as to make it absolutely necessary, that a more efficient force than the ordinary militia of the country should be employed for its protection to prevent its becoming entirely depopulated.

There was, when I left Batavia between 5 and 600 militia at Williamsville and its vicinity, under the command of general Hopkins, and about the same number on the Ridge road, near the arsenal, under the command of colonel Hopkins. It was the intention of general Hall, who was at Batavia, to make up the number at each of these stations to 1000 men. There were also at Batavia about 100 regulars under the command of major Riddle; who had received orders to march to Williamsville.

As the enemy had re-crossed into Canada, leaving no part of his force in our territory, except the garrison of Fort Niagara, I did not think it necessary for me to remain in the country, or to exercise the plenary powers with which you were pleased to vest me; especially as the authority given to general Hall appeared to me to be amply sufficient to enable him to give a temporary protection to the frontier. I am decidedly of opinion, however, that it is absolutely necessary, that a force of a more permanent and substantial nature than that at present under his command, should be provided with as little delay as possible.

Sir, I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant,

ANTHONY LAMB

*Head-quarters, Niagara frontier, January 6th 1814.*To his excellency the governor of the state of New-York.

SIR—The confusion into which every thing was thrown by the events of the 30th December, and the imperious necessity of taking precautionary measures against the advances of the enemy, put it out of my power to furnish at an earlier period a detailed account of the operations on this frontier, during my hitherto, unfortunate and embarrassing command—add to this, the extreme difficulty of collecting authentic facts, relative to our loss, since the forces under my command were of that multiform description, which they necessarily were, being composed almost wholly of volunteer militia and ex-empt, hastily and confusedly assembled in the moment of alarm, and dissipated by the events of a battle.

The storming of Fort Niagara and the burning of Lewistown, presaging further devastation, threw this whole country into the most violent agitation; on the moment, and without any previous preparation, I hastened to Batavia, with a view to take such measures as might be within my power, to repel the enemy and protect the frontier. I hastily collected from the militia and volunteers of Genessee county and the brigade of general Wadsworth, in Ontario, a considerable force. But generally deficient in arms and ammunition, and the necessary conveniences of a camp. In the evening of the 22d December, gen.

McClure, with the regulars under command of major Riddle, arrived in Batavia, and on the morning of the 23d, signified by a letter, his desire that I would take the command during this moment of general alarm. I accordingly proceeded to organize in the best manner in my power, the forces then at Batavia, and with the arms and ammunition collected from different sections of the country, and what little could be procured from the arsenals at Canandaigua and Batavia, I was enabled to get under march on the 25th for Lewistown, a body of infantry about 150 strong, under lieutenant-col. Lawrence, supported by one company of cavalry under command of captain Marvin, with orders to proceed and join a corps of militia, said to be 200 strong, under command of lieutenant-col. Atchinson, which was stationed at Forsyth's, on the Ridge road, fifteen miles east from Lewistown, to collect and save all the ammunition in his power, which had been removed from the arsenal at Lewistown, and was then dispersed on the road and different parts of the country, and with instructions to act as circumstances and the nature of his force would permit against the enemy; and if practicable to effect a junction with the main force at Buffalo, by the way of Manchester, Schlosser, and thence up the river to Black Rock; leaving as a reserve the corps under colonel Atchinson, at their station near Lewistown. I then ordered the remainder of the troops to Buffalo, with the exception of the regular forces, over whom I assumed no command.

On the morning of the 25th I proceeded to Buffalo, leaving general McClure at Batavia with instructions to organize such detachments of volunteers as might arrive, and direct their march for Buffalo. I arrived in Buffalo on the morning of the 26th, and there found a considerable body of irregular troops of various descriptions, disorganized and confused—every thing wore the appearance of consternation and dismay. On the same day I issued an order to the several commandants of corps, for a return of the number of effective men under their command; and an order to captain Camp, A. D. Q. M. general for the return of the ordnance and ordnance stores, in the quarter-master's department; a copy of which return, I have heretofore had the honor to forward to your excellency, and which sufficiently exhibits the destitute condition of that department. On the 27th I ordered a review of all the troops under my command at Buffalo and the Rock, when I found my numerical force to be as follows:

At Buffalo, under lieutenant-col. Boughton, of the cavalry and mounted volunteers, 129; lieutenant-colonel Blackslee, of Ontario exempts and volunteers, 433; lieutenant-col. Chapin, of the Buffalo militia, 136; lieutenant-col. Mallory, of the Canadian volunteers, 97; major Adams, of the Genessee militia, 332. At the Rock were stationed under the command of brigadier-general Hopkins, 382 effective men, composed of the corps commanded by lieutenant-col. Warren and lieutenant-col. Churchill, exclusive of a body of 37 mounted infantry, under command of captain Ransom; 83 Indians under command of lieutenant-col. Granger, and one piece field artillery, a six pounder, and 25 men, commanded by lieutenant Steely—making my aggregate nominal force on the 27th, to be 1711 men: add to this a regiment of Chataugue militia, under command of lieutenant-col. McMahan, which arrived at Buffalo on the 29th, about 300 men, which swells my force to 2011, which was reduced on the morning of the alarm, by desertions, to less than 1200; and so deficient were my supplies of ammunition, that a greater part of the cartridges for colonel McMahan's regiment were made and distributed after they were paraded on the morning of the battle.

The movements of the enemy already indicated their intention of attacking the village of Buffalo or Black Rock, which left me not a moment's repose from the arduous duty of preparing the most effective means in my power for meeting the enemy with the crude force under my command. On the 28th, I was so fortunate as to procure such information as to the enemy's movements, from a citizen who made his escape from Canada, as to leave me no doubt as to their intention.

In the evening of the 29th, at about 12 o'clock, I received information that our horse patrol had been fired on a short distance below Canjokaties Creek, and one mile below Black Rock. Lieutenant Boughton, an enterprising and brave officer, who commanded the patrol, had his horse shot under him. The enemy advanced and took possession of the Sailors battery near Canjokaties creek. The troops were immediately paraded and stood by their arms. I was yet uncertain at what point the enemy would attack me: the darkness of the night was not favorable for making observations. I was apprehensive the enemy designed to make a feigned attack below Black Rock, for the purpose of drawing off my force from the village of Buffalo, preparatory to a landing above the village, intending thereby to take it by surprise—at the same time being anxious to anticipate the enemy's landing, and meet them at the water's edge, I gave orders that the troops at the Rock, commanded by colonels Warren and Churchill, (general Hopkins being at that time absent from camp) to attack the enemy and endeavor to dislodge them from the battery and drive them to their boats. The attempt failed through the confusion into which the militia were thrown, on the first fire of the enemy and the darkness of the night: they were dispersed and not again embodied under their proper officers through the day. I then ordered the corps under major Adams and the corps under colonel Chapin to make the attack. This was attended with no better effect. The men were thrown into confusion by the enemy's fire, and after skirmishing a short time, fled, and were not again embodied through the day. I then ordered the corps under the command of colonel Blakeslie to advance to the attack; and at the same time I put the remainder of my troops in motion for the same point and proceeded by the hill road to Black Rock. On approaching the village at Black Rock, I discovered a detachment of the enemy's boats crossing to our shore and bending their course towards the rear of general Porter's house. The day was now beginning to dawn. I immediately countermanded the order given to colonel Blakeslie to attack the enemy's left and directed them to form and attack the enemy's centre at the water's edge.

I now became satisfied as to the disposition and object of the enemy, which I ascertained to be as follows:

Their left wing composed of about 800 regular troops and incorporated militia, and 150 or 200 Indians, were disposed below Canjokaties creek, and had been landed under cover of the night. With this force the enemy designed to cover their left, out-flank our right and cut off our retreat by the woods. With their centre, consisting of about 400 of the royal Scots commanded by colonel Gordon, the battle was commenced. Their right, which was purposely weak, was landed near our main battery, under cover of a high bank, and was merely calculated to divert our force from the principal attack: the whole under the command of lieutenant-general Drummond, conducted to the attack by major-general Riell. Thereupon ordered the enemy's left wing, which was discovered to be wheeling upon our right, to be attacked by the Indians under command of lieutenant-colonel Granger and the Canadian volunteers under command of colonel Mallory. At the same time I posted the regiment under command of colonel McMahan at the battery, as a reserve, to act as emergencies should require. The attack was commenced by a fire from our 6 pounder under lieutenant Seely, below general Porter's house, and one 24 and two 12 pounders at the battery under command of lieutenant Farnum, of the 21st U. S. infantry, acting as a volunteer. At the same time the enemy opened a heavy fire from their batteries on the opposite side of the river, of shells, spherical and hot shot, and ball. The regiment under command of colonel Blakeslie, about 400 strong, were regularly in a line, together with detached bodies from other corps, amounting, according to the best estimate I can make, in all about 600 men. These few but brave men, commenced the attack with musketry upon the enemy in their boats and poured upon them a most destructive fire. Every inch of ground was disputed with the steady coolness of veterans, and at the expence of many valuable lives. Their bravery, at the same time that it casts a lustre over their names, reflects equal disgrace on those who fled at the first appearance of danger—and whom neither intreaties nor threats could turn back to the support of their comrades. Perceiving that the indians on whom I had relied for attacking the enemy's flank, were offering us no assistance—and that our right was endangered by the enemy's left, I gave directions for the reserve, under command of colonel McMahan, to attack the enemy in flank on our right. But terror had dissipated this corps, and but few of them could be rallied by their officers and brought to the attack. Of this corps there were some who merit well of their country—but more who covered themselves with disgrace. The defection of the indians and of my reserve, and the loss of the services of the cavalry and mounted men, by reason of the nature of the ground on which they must act, left the forces engaged, exposed to the enemy's fire in front and flank. After standing their ground for one half hour, opposed to veteran and highly disciplined troops, overwhelmed by numbers and nearly surrounded, a retreat became necessary to their safety, which was accordingly made. I then made every effort to rally the troops, with a view to renew the attack on the enemy's columns, on their approach to the village of Buffalo. But every effort proved ineffectual—and experience proves, that with militia, a retreat becomes a flight, and a battle once ended, the army is dissipated. Deserted by my principal force, I fell back that night to the Eleven Mile Creek, and was forced to leave the flourishing villages of Black Rock and Buffalo a prey to the enemy, which they have pillaged and laid in ashes. At the Eleven Mile Creek I collected between two and three hundred men who remained faithful to their country. With those I preserve the best show of defence in my power, to cover the fleeing inhabitants and check the advances of the enemy. The enemy have gained but little plunder from the public stores. The chief loss has fallen upon the individual sufferers. Eight pieces of artillery fell into the hands of the enemy—of which but one was mounted on a travelling carriage. What little remained of the public stores, capable of being moved, is preserved through the exertions of captain Camp, of the quarter-master's department, whose bravery is only equalled by his active zeal for the public service. It is not in my power to give a particular account of our loss in killed in wounded, as the wounded were generally got off by their friends and taken to their homes, and our dead were mostly buried by the enemy. But from the best information I can collect, our loss is about 50 killed and perhaps 40 wounded. In prisoners our loss is ascertained to be 69—twelve of whom are wounded. The enemy's loss must be much greater, as many were killed in their boats before landing. Their loss may reasonably be presumed in killed and wounded, at not less than 200. Lieutenant-colonel Boughton, of the light dragoons, is among our slain. He was a good officer and a valuable citizen. I regret that it is not in my power to do justice to all those who were engaged on this day. The veteran Blakeslie and his corps were pre-eminently distinguished. There were of the broken remains of other corps many officers and soldiers whose bravery and conduct merits my warmest praise; but having fought irregularly and in detachments, I cannot designate to do them that justice they deserve. The good conduct of lieutenant Seely and lieutenant Farnum, who had charge of the artillery, was particularly noticed. The cavalry under colonel Boughton, and mounted volunteers under major Warner, receive my thanks for their prompt obedience of orders, and the valuable services rendered in the fatiguing duties of patrolling—And, it is a matter of regret, that the nature of the ground on which we contended, deprived me of that support which I might confidently expect from their bravery. To lieutenant Frasier, of the United States infantry, I tender my thanks for the voluntary services which he rendered me as one of my staff. To my two aide-camps, majors Hosmer and Norton, I cannot withhold my warmest thanks for their cool deliberate bravery, and the alacrity with which they executed my orders from the first movements of the troops in the morning to the close of the day.

I have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's most obed't and humble serv't. A. HALL, Maj. Gen.

[EXTRACT.]

Head Quarters, Batavia, January 13th, 1814.

His excellency, Daniel D. Tompkins, governor.

Sir.—Since my last communication, there has not any thing of importance transpired on this frontier, materially affecting us. On the 8th instant, a detachment under the command of general John Swift, (a volunteer) and lieutenant col. C. Hopkins, with a party of about 70 men, surprized a party of the British, who were procuring wood, about half a mile from the fort, fired upon them, killed four of the enemy, lost one of their own men, and took eight prisoners. Subsequent to which, a large force of the enemy were observed to be in motion, which induced our troops on that station, to fall back four or five miles, to a more defensible position, the affair ended here, and all is quiet. In consideration of our feeble force, I have cautioned the commandant on that station against indulging too much in rash enterprizes, until our reinforcement shall have arrived, which may be expected here in 7 or 8 days. I have ordered on to the arsenal at this place, a sufficient supply of arms and ammunition for the forces now on this frontier, and of those expected soon to arrive; so that I flatter myself that within a few days I may be able to pronounce this frontier safe against the encroachments of the enemy.

I regret to add, that our loss, in killed, on the 30th ult. proves to be greater than I had supposed; on re-possessing the ground, we find that our dead were yet unburied. There have been already collected about 50 bodies, and probably there are some yet undiscovered in the woods. The cannon were not removed by the enemy, (excepting the 5-pounder,) nor are they materially injured. The enemy admit their loss, in killed and wounded, to be 300.

I have the honor to remain, sir, most respectfully, your most obed't and humble serv't.

Batavia, Jan. 14, 1814.

His excellency governor Tompkins,

Sir—I have nothing to communicate worth remark, since my letter of yesterday. Every thing remains quiet at present on this frontier.

There is one thing I omitted to mention, I believe in my last, which is of much consequence.—There is very little camp equipage for the troops already in service, and the quarter-master's department gives little encouragement of any being provided. It will be impossible for the troops to continue in service without cooking utensils. The detachment now mustering, of 1900 men, will want at least 300 camp-kettles. I know not how they are to be obtained. They are not in our country. I am in hopes there have been some forwarded which will arrive in season.

Col. Lamb will be able to give you the particulars of our situation, more fully than I can write.

I have the honor to be &c.

ROBERT LEE, late of Lewiston, in the county of Niagara, and state of New-York, gentleman, of the age of forty-two years, being sworn on the holy evangelists, deposes and saith, that some seven weeks immediately preceding the 19th of December last, he, this deponent, resided in fort Niagara, for the purpose of attending to private business—that about 4 o'clock in the morning of the said 19th, the said fort was attacked or entered by the British. The garrison was not alarmed when the enemy entered the gates of the fort. Some firing took place after they entered the works, particularly between the guard at the south-east block house and the sick in the hospital, at the red barrack, on the part of the Americans with the enemy. This deponent is positive that there were about 400 men, of all descriptions, in the fort immediately before taken, and that 359 of that number were capable and willing to bear arms in that way, to wit, firing on the enemy from the block houses. The principal resistance the enemy met with, was from the sick in the red barrack, as this deponent is informed, and from what he saw, he believes were nearly all slaughtered. The British force that took possession of the fort, were in number about 400, commanded by col. Murray, who was wounded in the arm in entering the gate, and was succeeded in command by col. Hamilton. From the British order of congratulation, that issued on the same morning, it appeared that the Americans lost 65 in killed and 15 wounded, which wounds were principally by the bayonet, as expressed in the order; but the above order issued very soon after they took possession of the fort, and did not include a number that were found bayoneted in the cellars of the houses. This deponent thinks that our loss, in killed, in the whole, amounted to 80. It was a matter of frequent conversation and exultation amongst the British non-commissioned officers and soldiers, whilst his deponent was under guard, that they bayoneted the Americans, notwithstanding their crying out for quarters.

A subaltern and about twenty privates made their escape from the fort by scaling the pickets. Capt. Leonard, the American commander, was at the time the fort was taken, at his farm, about two miles distant, and hearing the attack, made towards the fort, and at no great distance from it was made prisoner by the enemy and kept in close confinement for two days and an half, and how much longer this deponent does not know.

The American soldiers were kept two days in close and miserable confinement, without the use of provisions and with a very scanty supply of wood and water. At the expiration of which the citizens and soldiers were crossed over the river and lodged in a part of what had been the British magazine, at Fort George, the residue in open plank and board huts—in both situations it was impossible to lay down. The magazine was so filthy, that many of the prisoners became infested with vermin, and in that situation remained seven days. The citizens were then removed to a brick building up near Queens-town, where they were so much crowded, that no kind of comfort was to be taken either by day or night. The supply of provisions was not only scanty, but of the very worst kind. Beef of the most inferior and repulsive quality, and bread the quality of which cannot be described—the water that they used both there and at the magazine, they had to purchase.

This deponent believes, that through the influence of an individual in Upper Canada, himself, together with ten other Americans, were permitted, on the 13th inst. to cross to the United States. The residue of the citizens to the amount of about seventy, were marched on the 12th, under a strong guard, to Burlington Heights. And this deponent was informed, that from thence they would be sent to Kingston. The women and children taken at and near Lewiston were stripped of their clothing and taken across the river. And, further this deponent saith not.

Extract—dated Batavia, Jan. 29, 1814.

Sir,—Nothing important has occurred on the frontier since I last wrote you. Our scouting parties from the camp near Lewiston occasionally approach within musket shot of fort Niagara. It is ascertained that the enemy keep no guards without the fort. The garrison from the best information that can be obtained, consists of 250 or 300 men, commanded by col. Young, of the 8th regiment. There has been but little appearance of force seen of late opposite Black Rock and Buffalo.

The second detachment of troops are coming in daily, and as fast as they can be organized, are marched on to Williamsville and the cantonment near Lewiston. There being neither axes nor camp kettles on hand in the quarter-master's department, I have been obliged to order a partial supply to be purchased by the assistant-deputy-quarter-master-general at this place until a supply shall arrive.

My force may be calculated as follows:

1st detachment 600 at most.

2d detachment 1200, possibly, making at most, 1800 men.

This force will be stationed at Williamsville and near Lewiston, and nearly equally divided.

You will judge whether the force now on his frontier is sufficient for its defence. If you should consider it necessary to have an additional force, permit me to suggest the propriety of ordering a detachment from some of the other divisions, for it will be almost impossible to detach another regiment from my division. I have the honor to be, &c.

A. HALL.

His Excellency Gov. Tompkins.

COMMODORE PERRY AT BALTIMORE.

On his way returning to Newport, R. I. where he is stationed for the present, com. Perry made a stop in Baltimore, and spent Monday, Jan. 31, Tuesday, Feb. 1, and Wednesday, the 2nd, with us. On the evening of the 31st ult. he visited the Circus. That spacious building was incompetent to receive the mighty crowd that rushed onward to greet him.—The house was filled, and literally examined, long before the entertainments began; and when the hero entered, he was received with deep, loud and continued acclamation. On Tuesday, agreeably to previous arrangements, he was entertained at Barney's "Fountain Inn" in a manner that we beg to be indulged in communicating and recording a detail of, for reasons that may be urged hereafter.*

The great room at the Fountain Inn was selected for the occasion. Some of our most distinguished citizens, viz. captain George Stiles, captain Samuel Sterett, major Isaac McKim and major Thomas Tennant,—(two "republicans," two "federalists," four "Americans")—had been appointed the committee of arrangement; and to their united zeal and perseverance, aided by the correct taste and disinterested exertions of Mr. John Findlay, (on whom the burthen of preparing the decorations principally fell) the citizens of Baltimore were indebted for an entertainment presenting an harmonious whole, that has rarely been surpassed. Nor must Mr. Barney, who furnished the feast, be forgotten; every thing that was luscious and good,—that was pleasing to the palate or delightful to the eye, was presented in ample form and bounteous profusion.

At the head of the room was a large transparent painting, reaching almost across the hall, representing the battle on Erie. The accomplished artist had happily seized that moment, when com. Perry, "at 45 minutes past two, having thrown out the signal for close action," bore up in the Nagara and "passed a-head of their two ships and a brig, giving a raking fire to them from the starboard guns, and to a large schooner and sloop, from the larboard side, at half pistol shot distance. The smaller vessels having at this time got within grape and cannoner distance, under the direction of captain Elliot, and keeping up a well-directed fire, the two ships, a brig and a schooner surrendered, a schooner and a sloop making a vain attempt to escape." [See official despatch, page 61.] The painting was finely executed, and its effect was charming.† At the head of the tables was the representation of the stern of a ship, labelled "Nagara," on which, as on the quarter deck, were placed the president of the day, Edward Johnson, esq. with the two commodores Lewis and Barney and captains Spence and Ridgely, of the U. S. navy, and other invited guests. In front of these rose, as in a great column, a bundle of eighteen arrows, braced together by mussy bands, on which were inscribed the names of Hull, Jonas, Decatour, Bainbridge, Lawrence, Ludlow, Bronckes, Allen, Perry, in large letters of gold. From the centre of the arrows rose a top-gallant-mast and yard, bearing a flag on which was inscribed the memorable despatch, "we have met the enemy and they are ours." The pedestal was ornamented with naval emblems and wreaths. Over the whole was suspended the American Eagle, bearing in his beak a scroll, lettered "A nation's gratitude the hero's best reward." This effigy was so managed that, with outstretched wings, it passed, occasionally, over the company. The windows of the rooms were elegantly curtained with the "striped heading" spangled with stars, and which ever way the eye turned it fell on some object to delight the sense, and gratify the patriotic enthusiasm that overflowed every bosom. The music gallery was filled with gentlemen amateurs, and their excellent performances added not a little to embellish and adorn the whole.

The vice-presidents were Joseph H. Nicholsen, esq. captain Samuel Sterett, major Isaac McKim, colonel James Biquet, captain George Stiles and major Thomas Tennant; and the company amounting to between two and three hundred gentlemen, sat down to dinner a little before five o'clock. Dignified order, with heart-felt animation and joy, held uninterrupted sway, until about nine in the evening, when the company broke up and each one went home rejoicing that he had seen that day so honorable to all concerned in the tribute of gratitude to the hero of Erie.

The following were the toasts drank on this occasion:

1. Our Country.—May Union, the Palladium of our political safety and prosperity, be the primary object of patriotic desires.

2. The splendid Victories of our infant Navy.—Precursors of more brilliant achievements.—Already has our proud, and hitherto triumphant foe, been forced to exclaim, "When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war."

3. The President of the United States.—From youth to age, the assertor of American rights and human freedom.

4. The memory of Washington.—Whose first act was a defence of his Country, and whose last breath an exhortation to Union.

5. The Vice-President and Heads of Department.—A band of American Revolutionaries, re-assembled in front of their countrymen.

6. The Judiciary of the United States.—Firm, wise and independent.

7. The wars of Europe.—May the millions sacrificed to mad ambition, teach us to estimate more highly our own free Constitution.

8. The Mission to Gottenburg.—May it produce a speedy and honorable peace. [3 cheers.]

9. Our Maritime and Social Rights.—With peace if possible; but our Maritime and Social Rights untouched forever. [3 cheers.]

10. Agriculture, Manufactures and the Arts.—Real sources of national independence and greatness—prosperity to them.

11. The Army of the United States.—When more experienced in the art of war, honor and the love of country will render it invincible.

12. The Navy of the United States.—

Old Ocean sounds its praise—

The Lakes re-echo the sound— [9 cheers.]

13. The Pillar of our Naval Glory.—Like the pillar of the cloud and of fire, may it eternally direct the true course to national honor and prosperity.

14. The 10th of September, 1813.—Rendered memorable in the annals of our country by the decisive and glorious victory on lake Erie. [9 cheers.]

[As the several toasts were announced, the music struck up a patriotic air. But when this was repeated by the vice-president, the company directed its attention in silence towards the musicians wondering why they did not play. Suddenly the roll of a drum, as if first at a great distance, was heard behind the transparency, and every eye was turned that way. The roll grew louder and louder, and having reached its entire force, down came the British flag from the enemy's ship in the foreground of the picture—then the full band struck up Yankee Doodle, and the British flag was hoisted under the American design! Very few of the company were aware of this—it is folly to attempt to describe the feelings it excited.]

15. The brave who have fallen in the present war—May the names and valorous deeds of a Pike, a Lawrence, a Burrows, and an Allen, live for ever in the affectionate recollections of that country for which they died.

16. The American title to eminence—Wisdom and goodness, patriotism and disinterestedness, the defence of the country and defeat of its enemy.

17. Captain Jesse Elliot—Second in command on lake Erie—a brave son of Maryland, and an honor to his country. [9 cheers.]

18. The Fair Sex—Next to the approbation of God and Country, their smiles are the Hero's reward.

By Commodore Perry.—COMMERCE—May she continue to dispense her favors with a liberal hand, on her favorite Port—Baltimore. [9 cheers.]

The ladies of Baltimore also rivalling the gentlemen in respect for the defenders of their beloved country, invited commodore Perry to a ball, which was given in honor of him on the night of the 2d instant. The assembly room was prepared and furnished in the most elegant manner; but we have not received a particular account of the entertainment. The hero left this city the next morning, delighting all by the modesty of his deportment. Speaking of his appearance here, the editors of the "Baltimore Patriot," selected the following happy quotation from the great poet of nature:

"You would have thought the very windows spoke!

"So many greedy looks of young and old,

"Through casements darted their desiring eyes

"Upon his visage; and that all their walls,

"With painted imagery, had said at once,

"JESU PRESERVE THEM!"

Copy of a letter from captain J. H. Dent, commanding on the Charleston station, to the secretary of the navy, dated Charleston, 31st January, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that yesterday morning, about 4 o'clock, I received information express from Stono, that the United States schooner Alligator had been the evening before chased in by an enemy's squadron, and attacked in the night by a detachment of boats. I immediately repaired to the place, and ordered two barges round, and a detachment of seamen over land, from the Nonsuch to her assistance. About 3 A. M. I got on board the Alligator, then some distance up the river. I received the following information from sailing master Basset, her commander; that he sailed on Saturday morning from the river of North Edisto, for Charleston—soon after leaving the bar, discovered an enemy's squadron, consisting of a frigate, a heavy brig, and a hermaphrodite, which gave chase to him—wind light from the S. W. he found that the frigate would cut him off from Charleston, and in the evening run into the river, and hove to; the enemy then close off the bar, and from their manœuvres was of opinion they intended to send in their boats. He stood up the river about two miles, and anchored, prepared for action. About a quarter before 3 P. M. the moon very bright, discovered six of the enemy's boats shove off from under the marsh, abreast him and within pistol shot (having under cover of the marsh, with muffled oars, approached this near without discovery)—he immediately gave them a broadside, which was returned; cut his cable and made sail; when the action continued for 20 minutes, close on board at soon after making way, the pilot was unfortunately mortally wounded, and the schooner grounded; at that time their two largest barges were disabled, and about musket shot distance astern, when they retreated, and have not since been seen. The Alligator's rigging and sails, from the topsail yard down, are literally cut to pieces, and but few shot in her hull, two men killed and two wounded, one severely, and the pilot (Mr. Hatch, a very respectable master of a vessel in this port, having a large family depending entirely on his exertions for support) mortally wounded. Great credit is due to sailing master Bassett, his officers and crew, for defeating a force so greatly superior in numbers, as there could not have been less than 140 men opposed to 49. The enemy, by the information received from the inhabitants immediately on the river, must have suffered severely, as there was great confusion on board them while retreating, and the largest boat appeared to be so much injured as to require the assistance of the others. I left the schooner last night in Wappoo Cut, and will be here as soon as the weather will admit. When I receive Mr. Bassett's official report, I shall do myself the honor to forward it for your further information.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

J. H. DENT.

Hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy.

The following is the official account of the attack on the U. S. schooner Alligator, by the British barges, as transmitted to commodore Dent:

U. S. schooner Alligator, Wappoo, Jan. 31, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you, that the U. S. schooner Alligator, under my command, was attacked on the evening of the 29th instant, then lying to an anchor in Stono river, and abreast of Coles' Island, by six boats from an enemy's squadron off the mouth of the river, and succeeded in beating them off, after a warm action of 30 minutes. I have to regret on this occasion, the loss of two men killed and two wounded; one of the latter, the pilot, Mr. Robert Hatch, severely. This brave man fell at the helm, exhorting those around him to take good aim at the enemy. I hope his good conduct will entitle him to your notice. It is impossible to ascertain what loss the enemy sustained; but from suddenly ceasing their fire from the two large launches, and the other boats joining them immediately, I am induced to believe they suffered severely, as the schooner grounded, and they did not renew the action. The sails and rigging of the schooner are much cut, but no damage sustained in the hull. I cannot conclude without rendering my thanks to the gallant officers and men you did me the honor to place under my command, for their meritorious conduct, which alone prevented the schooner from falling into the hands of an enemy of more than treble our number.

With great respect, &c.

R. BASSETT.

J. H. Dent, Esq., commanding naval officer, Charleston.

List of killed and wounded.

Killed, Joseph Bates, seaman; William Fields, seaman.

Wounded, Mr. Robert Hatch, dangerously; James McGee, severely.

Extract from the log-book.

Jan. 30, 1814—Pleasant weather, wind S. W., at 1 p. m. anchored abreast of Coles' Island; at 4, p. m. the frigate and brig close in with the breakers, when, after lying too some time, made sail and stood to the southward. From their movements, I was of opinion they would attempt to cut us out of the night; every preparation was accordingly made to receive them. At 30 minutes past 7, p. m. six boats were discovered under the south side of the river and under cover of the marsh, with muffled oars—when within speaking distance, they were hailed, and receiving no answer, a musket was fired, which they returned with a shower of musketry and grape shot, accompanied with three cheers—a broadside was returned, the cable instantly cut, and sail made on the vessel—there being at this time a light breeze from the southward and westward. The enemy's boats were then distant about thirty yards, when a heavy fire was opened from our battery and small arms, and kept up by the enemy for 20 minutes, when they were compelled to drop astern in great disorder. About this time the schooner grounded on a shoal, the pilot being wounded in the early part of the action—the boats were not seen again.

SUMMARY NOTICES.

The senate of New York have originated a bill appropriating $50,000 for the relief of the inhabitants of the Niagara frontier. The house of assembly has refused to assume the payment of the states' quota of the direct tax. Gen. Wilkinson took up his quarters at Plattsburg about the 20th ult. Nothing new in the north. Gen. Harrison has resumed the command of his district, but no important event has lately transpired in that quarter. There has been much violent debate in the legislature of Massachusetts—but all is working for the best. Falmouth, Cape Cod, (Ms.) has been cannonaded by the English, who fired 300 shot on the town; several houses injured, but no person hurt. The seventy-four that was aground near New London has been got off. Brig. Gen. Claiborne had gained a victory over the Creeks, killed many of them, burnt two of their towns, and destroyed vast quantities of their supplies. A large body of the Creeks in another part of the country attacked Gen. Floyd, with great address and impetuosity, but they were defeated with loss. They left thirty-seven dead on the field; we had seventeen killed. The official details of these battles are received, and will be inserted of course. Albert Gallatin has been appointed one of the mission to Gottenburg. George W. Campbell, of Tennessee, has been appointed secretary of the treasury. It is stated that Richard Rush, comptroller of the treasury, is to be attorney-general of the United States vice Mr. Pinkney, resigned. In congress, the proceedings were not very important until Wednesday, when Mr. Eppes, from the committee of ways and means (the bill for the loan being before the house) reported an estimate of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1814, to which he added many highly interesting statistical facts. It is with much regret that these things are postponed, but they must lay over.

THE CHRONICLE.

It was briefly noted in our last that Holland, &c. had thrown off their dependence on Napoleon. It appears indubitable that the Dutch have risen and driven out the French. Some small parties of the allied forces have entered Holland, and a provincial government has been formed in the name of the Prince of Orange. Switzerland has levied a military force and declared itself neutral. All the princes of the confederation of the Rhine have joined the allies, or are subject to them; Austria has recovered some part of her former possessions in Italy; where, however, Bonaparte was with a well-appointed and entire army. But the colossal power of Bonaparte is mightily shaken, and it will cost rivers of blood to regain the stand he lately had, if it be possible. The former great fault of the allies against France was their quarrels with each other; if they avoid that rock, Napoleon will have enough to do to hold his power in France, the Rhine being his boundary on the north. The Texel fleet of 15 sail of the line and 4 frigates, has fallen into the hands of the English, after a hard fight.

The Armed Neutrality of 1780.

The editor of the REGISTER believes that the following important papers, which should belong to this work of reference, will, at the present moment, be doubly acceptable to his readers. [See page 407.]

“THE DECLARATION OF THE KING OF DENMARK AND NORWAY TO THE COURTS OF LONDON, VERSAILLES AND MADRID.

“If the most exact and perfect neutrality, with the most regular navigation, and the most inviolable respect to treaties, could have exempted the commerce of the subjects of the king of Denmark and Norway from the inroads of the powers with whom he is at peace, and kept it free and independent, it would not be necessary to take measures to insure to his subjects that liberty to which they have the most incontrovertible right. The king of Denmark has always founded his glory, and his grandeur, upon the esteem and confidence of other nations. It has been his rule, from the beginning of his reign, to testify to all the powers, his friends, a conduct the most capable of convincing them of his pacific intentions, and of his desire to contribute to the general happiness of Europe. His proceedings have always been conformable to these principles, against which nothing can be alleged; he has, till now, only addressed himself to the powers at war, to obtain a redress of his grievances; and he has never wanted moderation in his demands, nor acknowledgments when they received the success they deserved; but the neutral navigation has been too often molested, and the most innocent commerce of his subjects too frequently disturbed; so that the king finds himself obliged to take proper measures to assure to himself and his allies the safety of commerce and navigation, and the maintenance of the inseparable rights of liberty and independence. If the duties of neutrality are sacred, the law of nations has also its rights avowed by all impartial powers, established by custom, and founded upon equity and reason. A nation independent and neutral, does not lose by the war of others the rights which she had before the war, because peace exists between her and all the belligerent powers. Without receiving or being obliged to follow the laws of either of them, she is allowed to follow, in all places (contraband excepted) the traffic which she would have a right to carry on, if peace existed with all Europe, as it exists with her. The king pretends to nothing beyond what the neutrality allows him. This is his rule, and that of his people: and the king cannot accede to the principle, that a power at war has a right to interrupt the commerce of his subjects. He thinks it due to himself, and to his subjects, the faithful observers of these rules, and to the powers at war themselves, to declare to them the following principles, which he has always held, and which he will always avow and maintain, in concert with the empress of the Russias, whose sentiments he finds entirely conformable with his own.

“I. That neutral vessels have a right to navigate freely from port to port, even on the coasts of the powers at war.

“II. That the effects of the subjects of the powers at war shall be free in neutral vessels, except such as are deemed contraband.

“III. That nothing is to be understood under the denominations of contraband, that is not expressly mentioned as such in the third article of his treaty of commerce with Great Britain, in the year 1670; and the 26th and 27th articles of his treaty of commerce with France, in the year 1742; and the king will equally maintain these rules with those powers with whom he has no treaty.

“IV. That he will look upon that as a fort blockaded up, into which no vessel can enter without evident danger, on account of vessels of war so stationed there as to form an effectual blockade.

“V. That these principles shall serve for rules in law proceeding, and that justice shall be expeditiously rendered, by the maritime regulations, conformably to treaty and usage received.

“VI. His majesty does not hesitate to declare, that he will maintain these principles with the honor of his flag, and the liberty and independence of the commerce and navigation of his subjects; and that it is for this purpose he has armed a part of his navy, although he is desirous to preserve, with all the powers at war, not only a good understanding, but all the friendship of which the neutrality can admit. The king will never recede from these principles, unless he is forced to it. He knows his duties and his obligations, he respects them as he does his treaties, and desires no other than to maintain them. His majesty is persuaded, that the belligerent powers will acknowledge the justness of his motives; that they may be as averse as himself to doing any thing that will oppress the liberties of mankind, and that they will give their orders to their admiralty and to their officers, conformably to the principles above recited, which tend to the general happiness and interest of all Europe.

“Copenhagen, July 8, 1780.”

“A COPY OF THE MARITIME TREATY BETWEEN THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA AND THE KING OF DENMARK, ACCDED TO BY THE KING OF SWEDEN AND STATES GENERAL OF THE UNITED PROVINCES.

“ART. I. Their respective majesties are fully and sincerely determined to keep upon the most friendly terms with the present belligerent powers, and preserve the most exact neutrality: they solemnly declare their firm intention to be, that their respective subjects shall strictly observe the laws forbidding all contraband trade with the powers now being, or that may hereafter be, concerned in the present disputes.

“II. To prevent all equivocation or misunderstanding of the word contraband, their imperial and royal majesties declare, that the meaning of the said word is solely restrained to such goods and commodities as are mentioned under that denomination in the treaties subsisting between their said majesties and either of the belligerent powers. Her imperial majesty abiding principally by the Xth and XIth articles of the treaty of commerce with Great Britain; the conditions therein mentioned, which are founded on the right of nations, being understood to extend to the kings of France and Spain; as there is at pres-sent no specific treaty of commerce between the two latter and the former. His Danish majesty, on his part, regulates his conduct in this particular by the first article of his treaty with England, and XXVth and XXVIIIth of that subsisting between his said majesty and the king of France, extending the provisions made in the latter to the Catholic king; there being no treaty a. l. hoc, between Denmark and Spain.

“III. And whereas by this means the word contractant, conformable to the treaties now extant, and the stipulations made between the contracting powers, and those that are now at war, is fully explained; especially by the treaty between Russia and England of the 29th of June, 1766; between the latter and Denmark, of the 11th of July, 1870; and between their Danish and most christian majesties of August 23d, 1742; the will and opinion of the high contracting powers are, that all other trade whatsoever shall be deemed and remain free and unrestrained.

“By the declaration delivered to the belligerent powers, their contracting majesties have already challenged the privileges founded on natural right, whence springs the freedom of trade and navigation, as well as the right of neutral powers; and being fully determined not to depend in future merely on an arbitrary interpretation, devised to answer some private advantages or concerns, they have mutually covenanted as follows:

“First, That it will be lawful for any ship whatever to sail freely from one port to another, or along the coast of the powers now at war.—2ndly, That all merchandize and effects belonging to the subjects of the said belligerent powers, and shipped on neutral bottoms, shall be entirely free; except contraband goods.—3dly, In order to ascertain what constitutes the blockade of any place or port, it is to be understood to be in such predicament, when the assailing power has taken such a station as to expose to imminent danger any ship or ships that would attempt to sail in or out of the said ports.—4thly, No neutral ships shall be stopped without a material and well grounded cause; and in such cases justice shall be done to them without loss of time; and besides indemnifying, each and every time, the party aggrieved, and thus stopped without sufficient cause, full satisfaction shall be given to the high contracting powers for the insult offered to their flag.

“IV. In order to protect officially the general trade of their respective subjects, on the fundamental principles aforesaid, her imperial, and his royal majesty have thought proper, for effecting such purpose, each respectively to fit out a proportionate quota of ships of war and frigates. The squadron of each of the contracting powers shall be stationed in a proper latitude, and shall be employed in escorting convoys according to the particular circumstances of the navigators and traders of each nation.

“V. Should any of the merchantmen belonging to the subjects of the contracting powers sail in a latitude where shall be no ships of war of their own nation, and thus be deprived of the said protection; in such case, the commander of the squadron belonging to the other friendly power shall, at the request of such merchantmen, grant them sincerely, and bona fide, all necessary assistance. The ships of war and frigates, of either of the contracting powers, shall thus protect and assist the merchantmen of the other: provided nevertheless, that under the sanction of such required assistance and protection, no contraband be carried on, nor any prohibited trade contrary to the laws of the neutrality.

“VI. The present convention cannot be supposed to have any relative effect; that is, to extend to any differences that may have arisen since its being concluded; unless the controversy should spring from continual vexations which might tend to aggrieve and oppress all the nations of Europe.

“VII. If notwithstanding the cautious and friendly care of the contracting powers, and their steady adherence to an exact neutrality, the Russian and Danish merchantmen should happen to be insulted, plundered, or captured, by any of the armed ships or privateers belonging to any of the belligerent powers: in such case the ambassador or envoy of the aggrieved party, to the offending court, shall claim such ship or ships, insisting on a proper satisfaction, and never neglect to obtain a reparation for the insult offered to the flag of his court. The minister of the other contracting power shall at the same time, in the most efficacious and vigorous manner, defend such requisition, which shall be supported by both parties with unanimity. But in case of any refusal, or even delay in redressing the grievances complained of; then their majesties will retaliate against the power that shall thus refuse to do them justice, and immediately agree together on the most proper means of making well founded reprisals.

“VIII. In case either of the contracting powers, or both, at the same time, should be in any manner aggrieved or attacked, in consequence of the present convention, or for any reason relating thereto; it is agreed, that both powers will join, act in concert for their mutual defence, and unite their forces in order to procure to themselves an adequate and perfect satisfaction, both in regard to the insult put upon their respective flags, and the losses suffered by their subjects.

“IX. This convention shall remain in force for and during the continuance of the present war; and the obligation enforced thereby, will serve as the ground-work of all treaties that may be set on foot hereafter: according to future occurrences, and on the breaking out of any fresh maritime wars which might unhappily disturb the tranquillity of Europe. Meanwhile, all that is hereby agreed upon shall be deemed as binding and permanent, in regard both to mercantile and naval affairs, and shall have the force of law in determining the rights of neutral nations.

“X. The chief aim and principal object of the present convention being to secure the freedom of trade and navigation, the high contracting powers have antecedently agreed, and do engage to give to all other neutral powers free leave to accede to the present treaty, and, after a thorough knowledge of the principles on which it rests, share equally in the obligations and advantages thereof.

“XI. In order that the powers, now at war, may not be ignorant of the strength and nature of the engagements entered into by the two courts aforesaid; the high contracting parties shall give notice, in the most friendly manner, to the belligerent powers, of the measures by them taken; by which, far from meaning any manner of hostility, or causing any loss or injury to other powers, their only intention is to protect the trade and navigation of their respective subjects.

“XII. This convention shall be ratified by the contracting powers, and the ratifications interchanged between the parties in due form, within the space of six weeks, from the day of its being signed, or even sooner if possible. In witness whereof, and by virtue of the full powers granted us for the purpose, we have put our hands and seals to the present treaty.

"Acceded to, and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the court of Sweden, at Petersburgh, the 21st of July, 1780, and by the states general accepted November 20, 1783, and signed at Petersburgh, January 5, 1781, with the addition only of article

"XIII. If the respective squadrons, or ships of war, should meet or unite, to act in conjunction, the command in chief will be regulated according to what is commonly practised between the crowned heads and the republic."

Kentucky Legislature.

Monday, January 10.—Mr. Mills read and laid on the table the following resolutions:

The legislature of Kentucky, claiming a right to express their opinion on national measures—to censure a departure from rectitude, or applaud a correct course of conduct practised by the officers of the Union, now attempt to declare the sentiments of the members composing this body, and as we believe of our constituents, on the present interesting crisis of our foreign relations, and the internal concerns of the general government. We deem this a privilege, which we cannot abandon, either as individuals, or in a corporate capacity.

We have hitherto declared a decided opposition to the embarrassing edicts of Great Britain, calculated to lessen our independence, and degrade our character as a nation among the empires of the world.—This state was not the last to recommend an appeal to the sword as the ultimate redress; she still deems that decision the only wise alternative; and she will not be the first to retrace her steps, and recede from that momentous resort so imperiously demanded by the interest of the nation, with whose welfare, our own as a state is not only connected, but completely identified. Still deeming it important, while engaged in the arduous struggle, and feeling the vicissitudes of war, to brace the arm and strengthen every nerve of the nation, this legislature concurs in the following resolutions, as expressive of the sense of the state.

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Kentucky, that we still firmly adhere to the general government, and retain our attachment to the federal constitution, which binds us together, and with the fate of which we combine that of our own existence.

Resolved, That we still possess an unabated confidence in the present administration of our national government now vested in the hands of the executive competent to steer the helm of state between the vortex of domestic faction and the menaced rocks of foreign war.

Resolved, That the overtures of peace made to the British government by ours, since the declaration of war, and the speedy acceptance of the abortive mediation of Russia, are irrefragable evidences (if evidence was wanting) of the necessity of the war, and a sincere desire of peace.—But those advances on our part have reached a point, below which no independent government ought to descend.

Resolved, That the restriction on our commerce lately enforced by an embargo, is wise, expedient and politic—and repays privation and self denial, by preventing the supplies of the enemy, from our own resources. We cordially approve its adoption, and doubt the patriotism that hesitates to submit to the national sacrifice.

Resolved, That the governor of this state be and he is hereby requested, to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the president of the United States and each of our senators and representatives in congress.

Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, February 3.—Mr. Fisk, of N. Y. offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire in what manner the contracts for supplying the army of the United States have been made and executed, and to what extent the general officers have interfered in such contracts prejudicially to the public interest and the rights of individuals. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Troup, of Geo. the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Stafford in the chair, on the bill authorising the president to retain in service certain volunteer corps.

Mr. Troup stated the object and design of the bill. By a law passed in 1812, the president was authorized to accept the service of fifty thousand volunteers. Under this law, as many men as made up about six regiments had been called into actual service, viz., one regiment in New-Hampshire and Maine, two in New-York, one regiment partly organized in Virginia, two in the state of Louisiana and the Mississippi territory. Their terms of service were daily expiring—but a certain number yet remained in service. It had been understood that a certain portion of them, amounting to perhaps a thousand men were willing to serve during the war under their own officers. Many of the officers had proved themselves worthy, and entitled themselves to the approbation of their government. The object of this bill was to enable the government to accept the services of such men as were thus disposed to serve during the war.

No objection being made, the committee rose and reported the bill.

After several motions to amend the bill, one of which went to limit the number to be called into service to 1000 men, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Friday, February 4.—Mr. Lowndes, of S. C. from the committee of naval affairs, reported the following resolution.

Resolved, That the president be requested to present a sword to the nearest male relation of midshipman John Clark, who was slain gallantly combating the enemy in the glorious battle on lake Erie, under the command of captain Perry, and to communicate to him the deep regret which congress feels for the loss of that brave officer.

The resolution was twice read, and subsequently ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[It appears that the name of the deceased was omitted or overlooked, in the former resolution on this subject.]—En. Rie.

The volunteer bill alluded in yesterday's proceedings, was passed.

Mr. Calhoun, of S. C. moved that the committee of the whole be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, on the petition from New-York, for the establishment of a national bank, and that the same be re-committed to the same committee, with a view of making a further motion on that subject.—Agreed.

Mr. Calhoun then said that it would be found that the committee of ways and means had decided against that report, on the ground of unconstitutionality of establishing such a bank as that asked for in the petition. Mr. C. wished to enquire into the expediency of establishing such a national bank within the district of Columbia, the power to which it could not be doubted came within the constitutional powers of congress. For all practicable purposes he believed such a bank would be as useful as that which was proposed. To come at his object, Mr. C. proposed the following motion:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing a national bank, to be located in the district of Columbia.

Mr. Hanson made a motion about Turreau's letter which the house refused to consider.

Saturday, February 5.—The proceedings of Saturday were chiefly of a local and uninteresting nature. In the course of the day, Mr. Ingersoll submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house such information as may be obtained respecting the general post-office establishment of the U. States.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Monday, February 7.—Mr. Cutbert, the new member, from Georgia, vice Mr. Bibb, appeared and took his seat.

After several private petitions had been disposed of—

The house resumed the consideration of the bill "to provide for the return to their own districts of vessels detained by the embargo, in districts other than those where they are respectively owned or being."

Many motions were made to amend the bill, some of which produced considerable discussion—the house adjourned without a decision.

Tuesday, February 8.—The house resumed the unfinished business of yesterday respecting embargoed coasters. It was finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill that passed the house some days ago for the conversion of five regiments of infantry into riflemen, being returned from the senate with an amendment that went to raise three regiments of riflemen instead of converting the five as aforesaid, a long debate took place which terminated with a vote to concur with the senate's amendment—yeas 81, nays 67.

Wednesday, February 9.—Mr. Newton, from the committee of commerce and manufactures made an unfavorable report on the bill from the senate to permit the departure of Paul Cuffe, &c. Referred to a committee of the whole. Mr. Grundy presented a resolution of the legislature of Tennessee, to alter the constitution of the United States so as to limit the term of service for senators of the United States to four years—referred.

The engrossed bill for the relief of embargoed coasters [which permits them to return to the places where they belong] was read a third time and passed by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Bard, Barnett, Baylies, (of Mass.) Bayly, (of Va.) THE LOAN FOR 1814.—On motion of Mr. Eppes, of Va. the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Nelson, of Va. in the chair, on the bill to authorise the loan of

The bill having been read through—

Mr. Eppes rose to move to fill the blanks in the bill, and to state the reasons for its amount, and why the loan bill had been introduced at this stage of the session, before the appropriation bills were reported, and of course before it could be precisely ascertained what the amount of these appropriations would be. He then made the following statement of

Estimated receipts and expenditures for the first quarter of the year 1814.
Cash in the treasury, 1st January, 1814, including sums subject to previous appropriations, about	4,700,000
From customs and public lands	1,800,000
Internal revenue	700,000
Direct tax, amount payable by the states which have assumed about	1,159,000
Loan of seven and a half millions	3,650,000
Treasury notes	1,970,000
	<hr/> 8,579,000
	<hr/> $13,079,000

Estimated Expenditures.

Civil, Diplomatic, Miscellaneous	450,000
Military expenses	6,000,000
Naval do.	1,800,000
Public debt—
Treasury notes	1,014,000
Dividend payable on the 1st of April, on the funded debt in addition to monies of sinking fund in hand, about	1,000,000
	<hr/> 10,264,000

Would leave on the 1st of April $2,815,000

From this statement of the receipts and expenditures of the first quarter of the year, it appears important that the loan should be put in operation, so as to insure from that source a sufficient sum in aid of the revenue, to meet the expences of the next quarter.

The expenditures of the year 1814 are estimated as follows:

For the civil list including the principal and interest of the public debt	$13,900,000
For the military establishment	24,550,000
For the naval establishment	6,900,000

Amounting altogether to 45,350,000

The funds to meet this expenditure are estimated as follows:

Revenue derived from customs and the sales of public lands	$6,600,000
Internal revenue and direct taxes	3,500,000
Balance of the loan of 7,000,000	3,650,000
Balance of treasury notes	1,070,000

Cash in the treasury on the 31st day of December, after deducting 3,500,000 dollars estimated as sufficient to satisfy appropriations made prior to that day, and leaving applicable to the service of the year 1814

1,180,000
16,000,000

So that there remains to be provided for by loans

29,350,000

To meet this deficiency it is proposed to authorise a loan for 25,000,000

Treasury notes for 5,000,000

Making altogether the sum of $50,000,000

The estimate for the military department being made on the full complement of 63,422 officers and men for the year, and one month having already expired, it is presumed that a deduction from the expenses of the military department, may be made, sufficient to cover the additional bounty recently authorised, and that 650,000 dollars will be sufficient to meet any other expence which may be authorised during the present session of congress. The sum to be borrowed is much larger than any loan heretofore authorised in this country—it is fully equal to two years revenue in the most flourishing period of our commerce. Our experience, however, has shewn that a faithful application of the funds of the nation in times of peace, will enable us to pay off, within a reasonable period, any debt which may be contracted during the war. In eleven years, during the present and former administrations, 46,000,000 dollars of the principal of the public debt were paid off. Without taking into view, therefore, the progress of population and wealth, we are authorised to say, that the resources of the nation, without any system of internal taxes, are sufficient in times of peace to discharge in twenty-two years a debt of 92,000,000 dollars principal. During the five years of the present administration, the preparations for war, and the war, have caused an immense increase of the debt—that increase, however, is greatly below what the enemies of the administration have endeavored to make it.

The increase of debt in every country, where the interest is regularly paid, (and in this it always has been) will be the difference between the principal borrowed and the principal paid. A statement, therefore, of the principal paid and of the principal borrowed during the five years of Mr. Madison's administration, will shew the actual increase of the debt.

Principal Paid.
1809	$3,586,479 26
1810	5,163,476 93
1811	5,543,470 89
1812	5,253,668
1813	4,022,700
Principal paid	$23,551,795 08
Principal received from loans during the same period.
1809	0,000,000
1810	2,750,000
1811	0,000,000
1812, 11 million loan	10,184,700
1813, 16 million loan (annuities included)	18,109,377
1813, 7½ 3,850,000 do.	4,362,600
Treasury note 1812	5,000,000
Treasury note 1813	3,930,000
The principal borrowed	44,336,677 51
The principal paid	23,554,785 08

Leaves $20,781,881 43

For the actual increase of the debt from the commencement of Mr. Madison's administration to the end of the year 1813. This estimate includes the premium paid by way of annuity or discount, and the addition which has been stated is of a debt bearing six per cent interest.

It may perhaps on the present occasion be expected that something should be said as to the prospect of obtaining a loan. In proportion as you increase the sum to be borrowed, you will always increase the difficulty of obtaining money. The quantum in market whether specie or stock, will always have an important bearing on the value of the article. The ability of a community to lend must depend on its income or on the value of its productive industry and its circulating medium. What is that amount in the United States? It is with some degree of diffidence I attempt such an estimate. If, however, in making this attempt I shall succeed in calling to this subject the attention of others better qualified to develop the resources of the nation, I shall rest satisfied.

The improved land on which the direct tax under the act of 1798 was collected, was 163,476,686 acres and valued at that time at $479,293,253, rather more than three dollars per acre. It is presumed the same land may now be averaged at six dollars per acre, which will give

For the valuation of improved land	$982,480,000
The dwelling houses under the same act were valued at 140,683,984 dollars. They may now with safety be estimated at double that sum	280,000,000
The unimproved lands after deducting all the claims on them amount to 400,000,000 acres, at two dollars	800,000,000
The other personal property including slaves is estimated at	300,000,000
The capital embarked in commerce, previous to the war, allowing for exports and imports	100,000,000
The bank capital at present amounts	75,000,000
Turnpike, canal, toll bridge and insurance stock, &c.	30,000,000
Total	$2,567,480,000

The income arising on this capital may be estimated as follows:

Profit on improved land, two per cent. on 982,480,000	$19,649,600
On personal property including dwelling houses, 580,000,000 at 4 per cent.	23,200,000
15 per cent. on the capital employed in commerce	15,000,000
3 per cent. on 75,000,000—the amount of bank capital	6,000,000
Turnpike, canal, insurance and other stock, six per cent. on 30,000,000	1,800,000
Product of all other occupations including manufactures as stated in the last census	172,000,000
Total	$235,849,600

In the year 1798, the whole value of the annual produce of the industry of the United States was estimated, by an able and intelligent writer, on a population of 4½ millions, at 37½ millions sterling, or 168,000,000 dollars—vide Cooper's Political Arithmetic, 47. According to the same estimate for our present population it would be 390 millions. This estimate would be 64,000,000 above what I have rated it at, and induces me to repose some confidence in the estimate I have made.

The writers on political economy differ as to the proportion between the amount of the circulating medium and the productive industry. Their calculations vary from one-fifth to one-thirtieth—one-thirtieth, minimum of Smith, on 237,845,600 would give something more than 7,000,000 of dollars for the necessary circulation of the United States—his maximum, one-fifth, would give something more than 47,000,000 dollars. If then 47,569,120 dollars is sufficient for the actual circulation, the whole of the circulating medium above that sum might be locked up or drawn from circulation without producing inconvenience or pressure. But money borrowed by the government is not drawn from circulation, but is instantly thrown back on the community, and becomes a part of the general circulation.

The question then is, what is the amount of circulating medium? The bank capital has been stated at 75,000,000; on this capital we may calculate with safety on a circulation in notes and discount of 100,000,000. From this sum deduct 47,569,120 dollars, the maximum of what is deemed necessary for circulation, and the sum remaining, viz: 52,430,880, constitutes the ability of the monied capitalists to loan—of this sum we propose to borrow 30,000,000. Having shewn the ability to lend, the only question remaining is, will it be the interest of those who hold the monied capital to advance it to the government? A monied capitalist will always pursue his interest. In deciding this question, the calculation will be made on peace or war. No prudent man will loan his money without taking into view both these events. In the event of peace an immediate rise in the price of stock affords a certain prospect of profit. As an investiture of money it is more safe than in banks, inasmuch as individuals may fail and the nation cannot. For a merchant whose capital, in consequence of the present situation of the country, is withdrawn from commerce, it is a better investiture than in manufactures.

The money invested in manufactures cannot be withdrawn without loss in the sale of the buildings and machinery necessary for carrying them on. The stock however of the United States could at once be converted into money at considerable profit, and his capital again stored to its former channel. If therefore peace shall take place, to which I confess I look forward with some degree of confidence, the present loan combines all the advantages of safety, profit, and a command at will of the capital invested. If on the contrary these expectations shall be disappointed and the war continue, our limited commerce must leave unemployed a large surplus capital. It is true that the increasing demand for our manufactures may afford employment for a part of this capital.—To those however who have formed commercial habits and look forward to resuming their accustomed occupations, such an employment of capital cannot be desirable. The stability of our credit founded on a punctual compliance with our engagements, must be gratifying to every American. During 27 years the faith of the nation has never been questioned—our credit has grown with our strength—our resources are ample—to bring them into action requires nothing but union and energy.

Mr. Bigelow of Mass. followed Mr. Eppes in debate, but not in the course of his remarks, or on the merits of the bill. He should not vote for the loan, he announced because it was for the support of war unprovokedly declared and erroneously conducted.

To shew the inexpediency of the declaration of war he entered into a particular historical review of our measures affecting foreign relations for several years past, commencing with Mr. Jefferson's refusal to lay the treaty with Britain negotiated by Monroe and Pinkney, before the senate. Mr. B. spoke an hour.

Mr. MAZM of Md. in a pithy speech recalled the attention of the house from the excursive range taking by Mr. Bigelow, to the present state of the nation—to things as they actually exist; on a full consideration of which he declared he must vote for the bill, &c.

The committee then rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Thursday, February 10.—The house resumed, in committee of the whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize a loan for the service of the present year.—Mr. Pitkin and Mr. Shepley spoke against the bill; but while the latter was speaking a message was received from the president—after which the committee rose reported progress and the house adjourned.

The message from the president contained the following report:

Sir—In conformity with a resolution of the house of representatives of the 30th July, 1813, copies have been prepared at the treasury, of the accounts in detail of the different ministers plenipotentiary, envoys extraordinary and secretaries of legation, and consuls appointed under the authority of the United States, from the commencement of the present government; also accounts of the expenses incurred in the treaty with Algiers and the payments which have been made under that treaty; and accounts of all other expenditures in relation to the Barbary Powers, including those occasioned by the war with Tripoli, and the making of peace with that regency.

Which several accounts I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the house of representatives.

I have the honor, &c.

W. JONES,

Acting secretary of the treasury.

The president of the U. States.

The report and voluminous documents, comprising several large volumes, were ordered to lie on the table.

Friday, February 11.—After hearing many private petitions, and transacting some minor business, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the loan bill; when Mr. Shepley resumed his discourse and spoke upwards of three hours. Mr. Rhea, of Ten. followed in a short speech, the committee rose, reported progress and had leave, &c.

Saturday, Feb. 12. Many petitions were presented and referred.

The house in committee of the whole resumed the consideration of the loan bill—Messrs. Rhea, Humphreys and Finley spoke in favor of the bill; and Mr. Culppeper against it. The committee rose for want of a quorum, and the house adjourned before the last had finished his speech.

Monday, Feb. 14. The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Kennedy of N. C. in the chair, on the report of the committee of pensions and revolutionary claims, unfavorable to the petition of Mary Cheevers.

[The memorable circumstance of this case need scarcely be repeated. For the information of those, however, to whom the case may not be familiar, it may be well to state them. The petitioner was the mother of two noble fellows, of her own name, seamen on board the frigate Constitution, both of whom were killed in the memorable engagement between that vessel and the British frigate Java, on whom she as well as her daughter, was entirely dependent for support. By their death she is left destitute of the means of subsistence, and petitions congress for relief. The committee reported against it on the ground of the inexpediency of making particular provisions for such a case, as not being more entitled to relief than many others which might occur.]

A resolution was agreed to, that the committee of pensions &c. should be instructed to report a bill granting a pension or gratuity to the petitioner.

The loan bill was then taken up. Mr. Culppeper finished his speech. Mr. Hanson then spoke, and Mr. Ingersoll got possession of the floor and said a few words, when the committee rose and the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 15. The president by a message communicated the resolutions of the legislature of Pennsylvania, respecting retaliation, &c. heretofore inserted in the REGISTER.

Mr. Taylor of N. Y. reported a bill in addition to the act "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes," which was twice read and committed.

Mr. McKim of Md. rose to offer a resolution, the object of which was to ascertain the actual resources of the nation. He said he had long regretted the want of it, because he conceived it a species of information very essential to those who conduct the concerns of the nation. Any one who had attended to the course of the recent debate on the loan bill, would perceive the difficulty which had arisen from want of it. Assumed ground had been resorted to as to the basis of arguments, for the want of facts. It is impossible for an individual to manage well his private concerns, when he has not a correct knowledge of their situation; and would be equally impossible for congress duly to manage the fiscal concerns of the nation, without an adequate knowledge of its resources. Under a conviction of the correctness of this view, he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be directed to report to this house some practical mode of producing, at stated periods, an account of the internal resources of the country, in natural products, agriculture and manufactures, together with such means of improving these resources, and promoting trade and intercourse between the different sections of the country, as in their opinion the public good may require; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The house in committee of the whole, resumed the consideration of the loan bill. Mr. Liversoll finished his argument, and was followed in debate by Mr. Montgomery, of Ky. Adj.

Wednesday, Feb. 16.—After the usual course of business, the house resumed the consideration of the loan, in committee of the whole. Mr. Montgomery finished his speech in favor of the bill, and Mr. Pearson spoke against it, &c. Adjourned.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PEACE PROSPECTS.—An opinion generally prevails that a peace will be speedily made between the U. States and Great Britain. It is, however, very difficult to say on what that opinion is founded.

We have a mighty mass of matter by a late arrival at Boston from England. It appears, that the emperor of Russia had a second time offered his mediation to England, which was a second time refused. It is stated, that on the 23d of Nov. our ministers were preparing to leave St. Petersburg, by the way of Berlin and Copenhagen for Gottenburg, where a ship was getting ready to bring them home. The following articles are satisfactory—

"ST. PETERSBURG, Oct. 19.—Her majesty the empress, on Sunday last, granted audiences to Messrs. Adams, Gallatin and Bayard, in the quality of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiaries from the United States of America. This mission extraordinary has caused universal satisfaction here. It is wished, that it be completely successful, and that the re-establishment of peace between his Britannic majesty and the republic of the United States, may free the navigation and commerce of our empire, from the only restraint which it can experience since the renewal of the ties of the strictest friendship with England. This striking proof of friendship and confidence, which the republic of the United States has given to the emperor, and the distinguished choice which it has made of its plenipotentiaries, are much applauded."

"LEXHOV, Dec. 27.—Mr. Dallas, secretary to the legation of Messrs. Gallatin and Bayard to the court of Russia, is arrived. It is supposed that the object of his mission is to obtain from this government a distinct exposition of the terms on which the court of London will accede to a peace with the U. States."

Perhaps, the idea of a speedy peace between us and our enemy, may be founded on some of the following facts and circumstances:

The emperor of Russia, "ALEXANDER THE BELIEVER," on many recent occasions, has distinctly avowed a determination to contend for and preserve the freedom of the seas, on the principles laid down by the parties to the famous "armed neutrality" in 1780, the ground work of which was, that "five ships made five goods," and that no port could be considered blockaded that was not actually invested by a competent force, so that no vessel could enter without "evident danger." &c. (see page 401.) It also appears, that the allied princes, viz. the emperors of Russia and Austria, with the King of Prussia, and, perhaps, some of the minor powers who had joined the league, have tendered a liberal peace to the "emperor of the French," [see the "Chronicle"] without the concert of Great Britain; and that, instead of suffering her dictation, they have acted for themselves, to curtail, but not to destroy, the power of Napoleon—that having prescribed bounds to the domination of France, on the land, their next great business may be to give freedom to the seas, the favorite object of the chief of the confederacy. It is true, lord Castlereagh said, in parliament, that the allied princes had acted in concert with the British government; but we are not bound to believe every thing his lordship says, being satisfied that the British agents were not parties to the declaration published at Frankfurt, Dec. 1. The first intimation they received that a peace was contemplated, was by Bonaparte's speech, in which he said "we had agreed to the preliminaries." What—has lord Castlereagh acknowledged Napoleon Bonaparte as emperor of the French?—has he raised "the usurper" to the imperial dignity? has he made a "legitimate prince" and one of the "Lord's anointed?" out of "a revolutionary cut-throat?" The story does not tell well, and we cannot give credit to it. The British cabinet had never more serious cause for alarm than when the news reached them. If they refused to accede to the propositions of the allies (accepted by France) their late friends might become enemies; if they acceded, many valuable colonies, with a rich commerce, must be given up to France, Holland and Spain. If Bonaparte be compelled to relinquish his conquests a like requisition will be made of Great Britain. An honest principle applies equally to all parties: it was this that hurried lord Castlereagh to the continent; and he will resort to every species of intrigue and corruption to divert the allies from their peaceful purpose. We think he will fail. For if the "magnanimous Alexander" did not consult him, before he pledged himself to the world, as to the course he would pursue; it is hardly to be expected he will retract what he has done, at the suggestion of the underling. And, as to Austria, though she may have wished the power of Napoleon lessened, it is impossible to believe she would have it destroyed, as is Great Britain's daring design, that she may hold the colonies, and monopolize their trade.

The great probability is there will be peace on the continent, the "French empire" being left, perhaps, the most powerful in Europe—England will not come into the measure—the commerce of the allies will revive—questions of "neutral right" will be excited, and possibly the whole may unite in adopting measures to regain the freedom of the seas from those who have usurped it. Something like this appears to be the prospect in England, if we may form an opinion by what we see in the ministerial papers. For ourselves, judging of things as presented, we heartily rejoice at the defeats of Napoleon; for it does not appear that the allies will become the tools of British domination at sea, more than the supporters of Bonaparte's power on the land.

If the emperor of Russia is, indeed, that great and good man that all the English told us he was—and as I myself have believed; for he is the only sovereign prince that I ever spoke of with respect—how much is it to the credit of the government of the United States that he has so decidedly approved all our proceedings?—that he has twice interfered to reduce our enemy to a sense of justice, or at least to a candid discussion of existing differences?—There is nothing, perhaps, that is calculated to place the conduct of our government on higher ground in the estimation of Europe, than the facts connected with the business of the Russian mediation.

In the multitude of difficulties that present themselves to the British cabinet, pressing upon it from all sides, it is believed the very liberal terms on which we are willing to make peace may be accepted, as a kind of protection from the higher demands that the powers of the continent seem about to make upon them. But, however our own affairs may terminate for the present, we take it for granted, that the repose of the world will never be secured until the maritime power of our enemy is greatly reduced. In the apprehension that this may be attempted, the British printers have already begun to abuse "Alexander the deliverer," and the Russian consul at Boston has rebuked them for it.

It is thought that some important intelligence has not yet been divulged. The Boston Daily Advertiser of the 19th instant says—"We continue to-day the details of foreign news contained in English papers received by the Ann Alexander as late as the 25th and 27th of December. That there is something yet in reserve we have every reason to believe, and what is worse, we have the mortification to know that it will not be divulged so long as it is possible to keep it a secret. It is obvious that no commercial speculations could be founded on any thing that has hitherto been suffered to transpire—it is not less certain that certain houses in this town have ordered large purchases of certain articles of southern produce. We leave it to others to surmise the probable nature of the information of which they are exclusively possessed—it is enough for us to repeat the assurance that there is still something behind the curtain."

Since the preceding was in type the following articles were received—we publish them, though we give little faith to them.

Extracts of a letter from Boston, dated Feb. 12.—"It has been the opinion among the mercantile part of our citizens that the ship Ann Alexander (arrived below this port on Sunday evening last from Liverpool) brought something of importance not yet disclosed to the public, which opinion has been prevalent ever since her arrival.

"The owner of that ship has arrived in town—he states that Mr. Adams wrote to Mr. B. G. Beasley, U. S. agent for prisoners of war at London, and to Samuel Williams, esq. that peace would speedily take place between this country and Great Britain; as the negotiations were in train; that Messrs. Beasley and Williams, on the receipt of this information, despatched a messenger express to Liverpool with the same, and directed the Ann Alexander to proceed to the United States forthwith.

"It is evident something of a favorable nature had transpired previous to the sailing of the Ann Alexander. Such seems now to be the general opinion here; and that it is suppressed from the public, for speculative purposes.

"It is well ascertained that an express was sent to the southward on Sunday night last, before it was generally known that a ship had arrived below—in fact it was not generally known till nine o'clock on Monday morning.

"Despatches for government per the Ann Alexander went on in the mail of Wednesday morning last; they may give us the information, now a secret to the public.

"It has been very recently reported here this day, that an armistice had been concluded between the two countries; but I have not been able to trace it to any source."

The New-York Gazette says—"It was reported in this city, this morning, that our commissioners had agreed on the outlines of a treaty with lord Walpole, wherein it is stipulated, that seven years be allowed to settle the question of impressment and citizenship."

But, the National Intelligencer of Thursday last, observes—"It has been said despatches were received by our government by the late arrival from Britain, and that some news of interest has been received in Boston which is yet suppressed for the purposes of speculation.

"As to the former of these intimations, we have not heard, and therefore do not believe that any official letters or despatches have been received of more than ordinary moment; and, as to the latter, we conceive that even mercantile cupidity, powerful as is its influence, could not suppress any information of general interest to the community for so many days as have elapsed since the arrival of the Ann Alexander."

PEACE AND WAR. A London paper says, the American prizes brought into Plymouth only, during the present war, have been sold for half a million of pounds sterling.

Though we do not believe the half of this, we are anxious to know how great a proportion of these vessels would have been sent into the same port, if we had been at peace? Before the war, the British captured every vessel they could, bound to and from France, &c. and they have been even less successful in making prizes since, in the European seas.

HOME INTELLIGENCE.—Bills were before the senate of Massachusetts to incorporate the Boston Porcelain and glass company; the Dedham manufacturing company; the Stoughton Gay cotton manufacturing company; a file company; and W. Boylston's manufacturing company.

COMMERCIAL.—The ravings of smugglers at the embargo has brought to the recollection of the editor of the "Columbian Patriot," the following anecdote: "It is well known the Dutch merchants, during the most bloody struggles between their nation and Louis 14th, were in the daily habit of selling ammunition to the enemy. Prince Maurice took the liberty one day to reprimand one of these merchants for the practice, who replied—'My lord, if I could by sea, carry on an advantageous traffic with Hell, I would run the risk of scorching my sails!'"

THE DIFFERENCE.—Several French frigates are reported at sea, and some of them have committed great depredations on their enemies. But it seems they can hardly peep out of port without being taken; whereas the only complaint that some of our officers have is, that they cannot get out. It is glorious sport for an English frigate to come athwart a French frigate; and a 74 is the word, when one of our's is to be looked for.

EMBARGOED COASTERS.—The great hardship of the embargo law in preventing the coasting vessels from returning to the places to which they belonged, has been loudly talked of. It is curious to refer to the yeas and nays in congress (see page 404) on a bill for the relief of the owners of the vessels so detained.

TRADE.—The following facts are stated in a way that commands our entire belief—

"December 25, (while the Albion of 74 guns, lay in Tarpaulin cove,) the prisoners were given to understand that they should all be landed that day, and their paroles were actually making out, when two persons came off, with a load of fresh beef—the man who came on board was habited as a Quaker, and being known to several of the prisoners, was openly accused of being a traitor, and given to understand that as soon as they were released they would cause him to be apprehended—the man, in consequence of these threats and fearful, if the prisoners were permitted to land immediately, he should be apprehended, applied to captain Devonshire, for his assistance, who caused the prisoners to be detained, and those of them who had called the man a traitor, &c. to be put in irons.—The man, after receiving his pay for his beef, staid on board the ship until the 27th, when he went on shore—the other man said he had nothing to do with the business, having merely come off to get a license for a vessel, which captain Devonshire refused to supply him with, referring him to commodore Hardy, as the proper person to give him one."

COMMONWEALTH CHANCEY, returning to the lake through New-York, partook of a splendid entertainment prepared in honor of him, in Washington Hall. The company consisted of about 350 gentlemen.

STR. JAMES L. YEO.—This blustering bully who desired, when in the Southampton frigate to meet capt. Porter in the Essex, that he "might break his d—d sword over his head, and drive him forward among the men," &c.—who, on Ontario, always considered that "better part of valor was" to run away from Chauncey, and which, unfortunately, he was able to do by the superior sailing of his vessels in squadron, has done with his pen what his heart would never permit him to think of. It is, however, justice to the recreant to say, that his discretion, in not fighting, served his country more than his valor could have accomplished—and if the fellow had claimed the only merit that belongs to him, of running away from an inferior force, we should have commended him for his truth: but that is not expected in a "British official."

The London Courier, of Nov. 22, contains com. Yeo's official account of the partial engagement between him and commodore Chauncey, on the 11th September, on lake Ontario. Yeo says—"Being becalmed off Genesee river, the enemy's fleet of 11 sail, having a partial wind, succeeded in getting within range of their long 24 and 32 pounders; and from their having the wind of us, and the dull sailing of some of our squadron, I found it impossible to bring them to close action. We remained in this mortifying situation 5 hours, having only 6 guns in all the squadron, that could reach the enemy, (not a carronade being fired;) at sun-set a breeze sprung up from the westward, when I steered for the False Duck Islands, under which the enemy could not keep the weather-gage, but he was obliged to meet us on equal terms; this, however, he carefully avoided. I cannot but conceive it fortunate that none of our squadron have received any material damage, which must have been considerable had the enemy acted with the least spirit, and taken advantage of the superiority of position they possessed. I have to regret the loss of Mr. Ellery, midshipman, and 3 seamen killed and 7 wounded.

LAKE ERIE was still open at our last accounts from that place. It will not, in all probability, be frozen this winter, and until it is, any attempt of the enemy to take the fleet would be preposterous. Three persons have been taken up at Erie as spies.

ERIE, Jan. 28. Letters have been recently received by major-general Meade, from general Hall, commanding on the New-York frontier, advising him that the enemy is concentrating a large force on the Niagara strait, and that he has received a reinforcement of 1500 regulars from Kingston. A short time will determine whether this force is to be sent against Malden or this post, or against both.

It is correctly ascertained that the British are building vessels on lake Huron. In all probability their plan is to attempt the reduction of the squadron here; should they fail in this, to re-take Malden and erect batteries so as to prevent our vessels sailing until they have a fleet built large enough to cope with ours.—They will not surrender the supremacy upon an element they have vauntingly called their own without another struggle.

A considerable regular force we understand has been ordered on here by the general government.

CAPTAIN LEONARD who commanded at Fort Niagara, is represented to be "running at large" at Montreal, and to have sent for his family. Some of the militia and citizens who were taken at Buffalo, &c. have been permitted to return to Plattsburg, on parole. Colonel Chapin had been sent to Quebec.

NEW-LOXDOX. We have nothing new from this place where lies a very interesting portion of our little navy, blockaded up by the British. We are pleased to learn, however, that great cordiality exists between the land and sea forces, contrary to what has been insinuated.

HEROISM.—The following extraordinary instance of heroism is noticed in a Georgia paper:—"The signal bravery displayed by the detachment of our army in the battle of Autossee, is the theme of general admiration. In this affair our troops acted more like veterans than militia, and the feats of many officers and privates would do honor to Spartan valor. We shall particularly notice the conduct of one man, whose sufferings have been equal to his intrepidity. Quarter-master William A. Tennille, the worthy son of an excellent revolutionary soldier, had his horse shot under him while charging the indians. The horse falling on him, Mr. Tennille with some difficulty extricated himself—he was alone surrounded by enemies, and had scarcely recovered his feet before his right arm was broken by a musket ball, and he received a wound in his thigh—the indians rushed forward to tomalawk him—but presenting his pistol, they recoiled until they discovered it had missed fire—the savages again advanced—by this time he had drawn his sword, and wielding it in the left hand, kept his assailants at bay until our troops made a second charge, cut the indians to pieces and rescued this admirable young soldier, who for extraordinary bravery and presence of mind deserves to be ranked with the best heroes of ancient Rome."

We are sorry to mention that Mr. Tennille's arm has been amputated near the shoulder. He is said to be on the recovery."

INSANITY.—A tool of the junta to the eastward that talks of dissolving the union to shew its regard for "federalism," and the precepts of Washington, has the following paragraph, on the late news from Europe—

"Men of New England! Arise! Imitate the glorious example shewn you by the Hollanders—Shake off the French yoke—unshakle commerce—dissolve the continental system—raise the shout of 'UR ORANGE, DOWN BONAPARTE!' Expel his slaves, spies and agents, who are now draining you of your treasures, devouring your substance, and leaving nought but misery and despair! Let it not be said that the sluggish Dutch and heavy Germans possess a more ardent love of liberty, or more determined hostility to slavery."

THE NEGOCIATION.—From the Boston Gazette—
"Why did not Britain propose to treat here as well as in London? Because we were aggressors in fact, and her ministers have been so often duped by our great men, that she would not trust any men with her maritime rights at a distance from home?"

THE NIAGARA SUFFERERS.—Albany, Feb. 4.—The committee in senate appointed on the resolution from the assembly, appropriating $50,000 to this object, considering that no monies can rightfully be drawn from the treasury unless authorised by a law of the legislature, recommended the appointment of a committee to bring in a bill for that purpose; which has been brought in and passed the senate. The bill appropriates $40,000 for the relief of the sufferers in the towns of Harland, Porter, Cambria, Schbaser and Buffalo, to be applied by the supervisors of the respective towns, the amount to be apportioned by Joseph Ellicott of Batavia, William Wadsworth of Genesee, and Daniel Davis of Caledonia, commissioners named in the bill. It also appropriates $5,000 for the relief of the Tuscarora Indians and $5,000 for the Canadians who have taken refuge in this state, to be applied by the before named commissioners.

The committee in this city appointed to receive the donations for the relief of the sufferers on the western frontier, acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of the following sums:—$76 50, being a collection made in the Methodist church in this city; also, $320 collected in St. Peter's church; from Mr. Bernard, $460, the receipts of a benefit at the theatre given by him; $9 from the children at Mr. Upfold's school; $431 from the children at Mr. Young's school; and, in addition to the liberal subscriptions of the citizens, a bale of sundries, consisting of apparel, blankets, sheets, cloths, muslin, &c. estimated at $370, and $80 in cash, from the inhabitants of the town of Greenville, in the county of Greene.

By order,

JOHN COOK, Sec'y

MARSHAL'S OFFICE, NEW-YORK, Feb. 12.—"Persons who wish to forward letters by the corvette John Adams, either to the British dominions, by way of Gottenburg, or to the continent of Europe, must leave them (open) at the marshal's office, to be examined. Such as are allowed will be put on board, under the care, and subject to the directions, of Mr. Clay and Mr. Russell. JOHN SMITH, Marshal."

Salem, Feb. 8.—Arrived cartel ship Bostwick, Brown, from Halifax, 4 days, with 305 prisoners, among which are about 200 soldiers, who have been conveyed in carriages to Charlestown. Many of them appeared to be in a sickly condition, and some almost destitute of clothes.

About 700 prisoners remained in Milville prison, and 300 were on board the Success prison-ship.

GENERAL HULL. The trial proceeds with great dignity and with all proper dispatch. It is stated that the evidence against the accused will probably be closed by the 1st of March.

The very interesting series of documents laid before the house of representatives by the secretary of war, on the call for information as to the "failure of the campaign," shall be commenced in the Register to be published this day fortnight, (which will be the first number of vol. VI.) and continued with as little intermission as possible, until completed.

MILITARY.

A Plattsburg paper of January 23, says—"Major-general Wilkinson arrived in town on Wednesday last. He has taken quarters in this village."

The governor of Pennsylvania has detached 1000 men for the protection of Erie.

The Norfolk papers abound with accounts of the marks of respect paid to brigadier-general Taylor, who since the declaration of war has chiefly had the command at that place. He retired at his own request, and was succeeded by brigadier-general Parker, of the United States army.

Extract of a letter from general William Clark, governor of the Missouri territory, dated "Saint Louis, Jan. 15, 1814.

"I was visited about two weeks ago by a deputation of the Pottowatomies, on the subject of peace. I did not enter into any arrangements with them, but recommended them to leave hostages, and referred them to the commanding officer. They have left at Belle Fontaine seven hostages. Those Indians say, that the tribes near them are not friendly. The Kickapoos, Winnebagoes and others, towards Prairie des Ouen, have not come in for peace as was expected. There is but little doubt but that they will continue hostile as long as they can; or until the upper lakes and Prairie des Chienn are in our possession and garrisoned by strong posts.

The sooner this object is effected the better, as an early possession of the Upper Mississippi is immensely important in securing the entire tranquility of our frontier. The Indians inform me that Dixon is with the Sioux's, keeping alive British influence."

Head-Quarters, Cincinnati, January 19.

GENERAL ORDERS.—Maj. gen. Harrison assumes the command of the eighth military district, as it is designated by the arrangement of the war department of the 1st of May last.

The officers commanding corps, posts and recruiting districts, will forward their returns as directed by the military regulations, to the assistant adjutant-general's office at this place. The utmost punctuality is expected.

Brigadier-general Howard is appointed to the brigade lately commanded by brigadier-general Cass. General Howard will proceed immediately to Detroit, and assume the command of that post and its dependencies. Colonel Russell, of the 7th regiment infantry, will command the troops within the Indiana, Illinois and Missouri territories, excepting the post of Fort Wayne: the officer commanding the latter, will report immediately to head-quarters; and all the posts south of the Miami-of-the-Lake, that are garrisoned by the Ohio militia, including those stationed at Put-in-Bay, will be under the orders of general Gano.

Lieutenant-colonel Croghan is appointed to do the duties of assistant adjutant-general, until the arrival of major Butler, of that department.

By order of the general.

JOHN O'FALLON, Aid-de-Camp.

CINCINNATI, Jan. 27.—His excellency the governor has politely furnished us with the following information:

About 1000 Indians of the Miamis have arrived at 2d Wayne, one-third warriors, the residue women and children, all in an impoverished state—The warriors are furnished with small quantities of ammunition to hunt; and draw half rations of meat and flour—the women and children one quarter rations.

The Pottawatamies were a few days since coming on to fort Wayne with all their families, in a state of starvation—they have eaten most of their poor horses—every day they halt and bury some of their party—and the delays occasioned by their funeral ceremonies have retarded their arrival at the fort.

In consequence of instructions from the war department, the governor has issued orders for detailing, organizing and holding in readiness, to march at a moment's warning, 1400 of the Ohio militia, apportioned from each of the five divisions of the state.

Chillicothe, Feb. 3. Orders have been issued to convene all the new recruits within the state at the principal rendezvous in Chillicothe, preparatory to their taking up the line of march for the headquarters of the north western army.

General Harrison will hold a council with the chiefs of the north western Indians at Dayton, during this week, for the purpose of concluding peace.

Adjutant and inspector general's office.

Washington, 14th Feb. 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The British commander in chief in Canada having in a proclamation dated at Kingston on the 4th day of September, 1813, declared, that a parole lawfully given does not forbid the exercise of any military functions other than that of "bearing arms in the garrison or in the field"—and there being no desire on the part of the United States to question the correctness of this declaration—It is therefore ordered, that all officers of the United States, prisoners of war on parole, are liable to be called to the discharge of the following duties—

1st, Recruiting.

2d, Drilling recruits.

3d, Guarding stores and prisoners of war in the interior, &c.

4th, Paying the troops and making purchases on account of the United States.

All prisoners of war on parole will accordingly report themselves for these duties to the officer commanding the district in which they may happen to reside: and, failing to do so, if non-commissioned officers or privates will be apprehended and confined, and if officers will be dropped from the rolls of the army. By the order of the secretary at war.

J. B. WALBACH, adj. gen.

MILLEDGEVILLE, Jan. 31.

An express from general Pinckney to the governor arrived here last night with the following important intelligence.

Head-quarters, fort Hawkins, Jan. 30, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor of enclosing for your information, copies of despatches received early this morning from general Floyd: This additional proof of the good conduct and gallantry of the troops of the state in which you preside must be highly gratifying to your excellency. Be pleased to accept my sincere congratulations thereon.

Col. Milton and a detachment of regulars, will speedily reinforce the army.

I have the honor to be very respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant. TH. PINKNEY.

His excellency gov. Early.

Camp Defiance, (48 miles west of Chatahoochie) January 27, 1814.

Major gen. PINKNEY,

Sir—I have the honor to acquaint your excellency that this morning at 20 minutes past 5 o'clock, a very large body of hostile Indians made a desperate attack upon the army under my command. They stole upon the sentinels, fired on them, and with great impetuosity rushed upon our line: In 20 minutes the action became general, and our front, right and left flanks were closely pressed, but the brave and gallant conduct of the field and line officers, and the firmness of the men, repelled them at every point.

The steady firmness, and incessant fire of captain Thomas's artillery, and capt. Adams' riflemen, preserved our front lines: both of these companies suffered greatly. The enemy rushed within thirty yards of the artillery, and captain Broadnax, who commanded one of the picquet guards, maintained his post with great bravery, until the enemy gained his rear, and then cut his way through them to the army—on this occasion, Timpooche Barnard, a half breed, at the head of the Uchies, distinguished himself, and contributed to the retreat of the picquet guard; the other friendly Indians took refuge within our lines, and remained inactive with the exception of a few who joined our ranks—as soon as it became light enough to distinguish objects, I ordered majors Watson's and Freeman's battalions to wheel up at right angles with major Booth's and Cleveland's battalions [who formed the right wing] to prepare for the charge. Captain Duke Hamilton's cavalry [who had reached me but the day before] was ordered to form in the rear of the right wing, to act as circumstances should dictate. The order for the charge was promptly obeyed, and the enemy fled in every direction before the bayonet. The signal was given for the charge of the cavalry, who pursued and sabred fifteen of the enemy, who left thirty seven dead on the field—from the effusion of blood, and the number of head dresses and war-clubs found in various directions, their loss must have been considerable, independent of their wounded.

I directed the friendly Indians, with Merriweather's and Ford's rifle companies, accompanied by captain Hamilton's troop, to pursue them through Caulebee swamp, where they were trailed by their blood, but they succeeded in overtaking but one of the wounded.

Colonel Newman received three balls in the commencement of the action, which deprived me of the services of that gallant and useful officer. The assistant adjt. gen. Hardin was indefatigable in the discharge of his duty, and rendered important services; his horse was wounded under him. The whole of the staff were prompt, and discharged their duty with courage and fidelity. Their vigilance, the intrepidity of the officers, and the firmness of the men, meet my approbation, and deserve the praise of their country.

I have to regret the death of many of my brave fellows, who have found honorable graves, in the voluntary support of their country.

My aid-de-camp, in executing my orders, had his horse killed under him: general Lee and major Pace, who acted as additional aids, rendered me essential services, with honor to themselves, and usefulness to the cause in which they have embarked. Four waggon and several other horses were killed, and two of the artillery horses wounded. While I deplore the loss sustained on this occasion, I have the consolation to know, that the men whom I have the honor to command have done their duty. I herewith transmit you a list of the killed and wounded, and have the honor to be most respectfully your obedient servant.

JOHN FLOYD, B. G.

Total killed, 17: total wounded 132.
(Signed,) CHARLES WILLIAMSON, n. s.

N. B. One of the wounded since dead—5 of the friendly Indians killed, 15 wounded.

Copy of a letter from brig. gen. Claiborne, of volunteers, to the secretary of war, dated Fort Claiborne, east bank of Alabama, 85 miles above Fort Stoddart, January 1st, 1814.

Sir—On the 13th ult, I marched a detachment from this post with a view of destroying the towns of the inimical Creek Indians, on the Alabama, above the mouth of the Cahaba. After having marched about eighty miles, from the best information I could obtain, I was within thirty miles of a town newly erected on a ground called Holy, occupied by a large body of the enemy, under the command of Wetherford, the half breed chief, who was one of those who commanded the Indians that destroyed the garrison at Mims in August last, and who has committed many depredations on the frontier inhabitants. I immediately caused a stockade to be erected for the security of the heavy baggage and sick. On the morning of the 22d the troops resumed their line of march, chiefly through woods without a track to guide them. When near the town on the morning of the 23d, my disposition for attack was made.—The troops advanced in three columns. With the centre column I advanced myself, ordering Lester's guards and Wells' troop of dragoons to act as a corps of reserve. About noon the right column, composed of twelve months' volunteers, commanded by colonel Joseph Carson, came in view of the town called Eecanachaca (or Holy Ground) and was immediately vigorously attacked by the enemy, who were apprized of our approach, and had chosen their field of action.

Before the centre, commanded by lieutenant colonel Russell, with a part of the 3d regiment of United States' infantry and mounted militia riflemen, or the left column, which was composed of militia and a party of Choctaws under Pushanuttaha, commanded by major Smoot of militia, who were ordered to charge, could come generally into action, the enemy were repulsed and were flying in all directions, many of them were casting away their arms.

Thirty of the enemy were killed, and judging from every appearance many were wounded. The loss on our part was one corporal killed, and one ensign, two sergeants, one corporal and two privates wounded.

A pursuit was immediately ordered; but from the nature of the country, nothing was effected. The town was nearly surrounded by swamps and deep ravines, which rendered our approach difficult, and facilitated the escape of the enemy. In the town we found a large quantity of provisions and immense property of various kinds, which the enemy, flying precipitately, were obliged to leave behind, and which, together with two hundred houses were destroyed. They had barely time to remove their women and children across the Alabama, which runs near where the town stood. The next day was occupied in destroying a town consisting of sixty houses, eight miles higher up the river, and in taking and destroying the enemy's boats. At the town last destroyed was killed three Indians of some distinction. The town first destroyed was built since the commencement of hostilities, and was established as a place of security for the inhabitants of several villages. The leader Wetherford, Francis, and the Choctaw Siquistur's son, who were principal prophets, resided here. Three Shawnese were among the slain.

Colonel Carson of the volunteers, lieutenant colonel Russell of the 3d regiment United States' infantry, and major Smoot of the militia, greatly distinguished themselves. The activity and zeal of the assistant deputy quarter master general, captain Wert, and of my brigade major, Kennedy, merit the approbation of government. I was much indebted to my aide de camp lieutenant Calvit of volunteers, to lieutenant Roberson of the 3d regiment, and major Caller of militia, who acted as my aids on that day, for the promptness and ability with which they performed their several duties. The officers of the different corps behaved handsomely, and are entitled to distinction.—Courage animated every countenance, and each vie with the other in rendering service. I have taken the liberty of communicating to you directly, in consequence of the distant station of the general commanding the district, and also for the purpose of forwarding to you the enclosed original document which was found in the house of Wetherford. It shows partially the conduct of the Spaniards towards the American government.

The third regiment has returned to this place, and volunteers are on their march to Mount Vernon near Fort Stoddart for the purpose of being paid off and discharged, their terms of service having generally expired.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

FERD. L. CLAIBORNE,
Brig. gen. of vols.

His excellency John Armstrong.

THE SPANIARDS.—The following letter from the governor of Pensacola to the Creek Indians, was found by general Claiborne, of the volunteers, and forwarded to governor Blount:

PENSACOLA, 29th Sept. 1814.—Gentlemen, I received the letter that you wrote me in the month of August, by which, and with great satisfaction, I was informed of the advantages which your brave warriors obtained over your enemies.

I represented, as I promised you, to the captain general in Havanna, the request (which the last time I took you by the hand) ye made me, of arms and munitions—but until now I cannot yet have an answer. But I am in hopes, that he will send me the effects which I requested; and as soon as I receive them, I shall inform you.

I am very thankful for your generous offers to procure me the provisions and warriors necessary, in order to re-take the post of Mobile;—and you ask me at the same time, if we have given up the post of Mobile to the Americans? To which I answer, for the present, I cannot profit of your generous offer—not being at war with the Americans; who did not take Mobile by force—since they purchased it from the miserable officer, destitute of honor, who commanded there, and delivered it without authority:—by which reason, the sale and delivery of that place is totally void and null—and I hope that the Americans will restore it again to us, because nobody can dispose of a thing that is not his own property:—in consequence of which, the Spaniards have not lost their right to it; and I hope that you will not put in execution the project which you tell me of, to burn the town; since those houses and properties do not belong to Americans, but to true Spaniards.

To the bearers of your letter, I have ordered some small presents to be given. And I remain, forever, your good father and friend.

MANNIQUE.

Cambridge, S. C. Jan. 27.

The detachment of United States volunteers, which we mentioned in our last, consists of 900 infantry, 100 artillery, and 85 cavalry. They assembled agreeably to orders on Tuesday last, at Abbeville court house, under the command of colonel Nash, with the exception of about 150 infantry. To supply this deficiency we learn that an express was sent yesterday to gen. Elmore, to forward the number with all possible dispatch, from his brigade—the other brigades have furnished their quotas. The men are in high spirits, and the promptitude and alacrity with which they have obeyed the call of their country, is a strong pledge that they will not suffer the laurels gained by the sons of the west to wither in their hands.

NAVAL.

Falmouth, Cape Cod, (Ms.) was cannonaded by the British brig Nimrod, of 18 guns, on the 4th inst. nearly the whole day. She lay in close with the place and fired about 300 shot, but killed or wounded no person. Several houses were injured. The captain of the Nimrod had demanded the delivery of two field pieces at that place, which being refused, he gave two hours notice that he would bombard the town. The inhabitants were secured by an entrenchment they had prepared; and have requested some heavy guns of the governor that they may resent such proceedings in future.

The 74, that was aground on Fisher's island, has unfortunately got off, supposed to be much injured. Several valuable vessels have lately got into the Chesapeake and Delaware, the blockades to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is stated that about the 20th of Dec. there were no less than thirty-five English vessels, prizes, lying in St. Maloes, sent there by the American and French privateers.

There is reason to believe that ruffian Cockburn has again arrived in the Chesapeake, with some additional vessels.

The United States' frigate Constellation, captain Gordon, (says a Norfolk paper of the 12th) went down on Thursday last to Hampton Roads, with an intention to proceed to sea, but the wind falling very light, she returned on yesterday to Crany-Island, where she is now anchored.

The Essex frigate.—From a London paper of Dec. 24.—By letters from St. Helena of the 15th Oct. accounts are received that the Georgian and Atlantic, which had been captured by the Essex American frigate, were fitted out as emiziers, and sent to the Gallipagos in search of the Charlton and New-Zealand whalers, which it was feared they would capture. They were then to go to New Holland in search of more South-sea men. The indispensable was at Tombay.

COMMODORE RODGERS.—The story of his having had a monster with the Orpheus, originated from this circumstance:—The Orpheus in company with the Albion 74, on their passage from the coast for Bermuda, fell in with the President frigate; and commodore Rodgers, under his topsails only manœuvred in hopes to lead the Orpheus out of the reach of the 74, but the Albion, while the Orpheus was chasing the President, kept so close as to prevent the commodore's wished for single combat. The President ultimately filled away, and soon ran the Albion and Orpheus out of sight.—N. F. Gaz.

THE PRIZEMENT.—On Tuesday evening, (says the Newport paper of the 10th inst.) passed this harbor for Bristol, Swedish brig Felce, 19 days from St. Barts. Capt. Rathbone, of this town, passenger, informs us that he saw a Barbadoes paper, which stated that com. Rodgers had captured, 60 miles to windward of that island, TEN SAIL of the London fleet, all of which he burnt, except one, given up to the prisoners, after taking out the most valuable parts of their cargoes. The Barbadoes paper contained the names of the vessels captured—and further states, that previous to com. Rodgers' capturing those vessels, he fell in with a ship which had been captured, with a number of others, by a French frigate. Com. Rodgers threatened to send them to the United States, to retaliate for the conduct of the British government relative to the cartel which he sent into England on his former cruise; they were, however, permitted to proceed. Only about eighty sail out of nearly two hundred, which sailed under convoy from London, had arrived at Barbadoes; and it was apprehended fifty or sixty had been captured or lost in the gale which dispersed the fleet. It was conjectured at Barbadoes, that com. Rodgers had gone in pursuit of the Cork fleet, of sixty sail, under convoy of two sloops of war; accordingly three frigates had been despatched in pursuit of him.

DISPERATE ACTION.—Wilmington, (N. C.) Feb. 6. Arrived on the 27th ult. the privateer schooner Globe, Richard Moon, commander, of Baltimore. On the 1st of November last, off Madeira, saw a sail, bore down on her and exchanged broadsides—supposing her a man of war brig, hauled off; the Globe received one nine pound shot under her larboard quarter between wind and water—watched the backing and filling of two brigs in Funchal Roads. Nov. 2d, the two brigs still manœuvring in the Roads—at 9 p. m. saw them under way and gave them chase—at 10 being equally lost sight of them—at 6 a. m. saw them at the S. W. and gave chase. Nov. 3, at fifteen minutes past two the heaviest brig commenced firing her stern guns which was instantly returned—at half past twelve sheered up alongside and boarded, the schooner sheering off, the first and second-lieutenants and three seamen were left on the enemy's deck and it is supposed were killed. By this time the other brig had bore up and passed across our bows and gave us a raking broadside, which dealt destruction to our sails and rigging, rendering the schooner quite unmanageable. In this situation we lay alongside the heaviest brig until we completely silenced her, and compelled her to strike at half past three. All this time the other brig lay on our quarter pouring broadside after broadside within half pistol shot. Finding the heavy brig had struck, we with much difficulty got the Globe before the wind and commenced close action with the other brig 'till half past four, when discovering our vessel in a sinking condition, having seven shot between wind and water, we hauled to windward to take possession of the brig which had struck, when she again hoisted her colors and gave us a broadside and was seconded by her consort, which compelled us to haul off, but with reluctance, to repair damages, having the greater part of our standing and running rigging shot away and not a sail but was perfectly riddled and almost useless. The above two brigs were privateers, as we saw the one that struck throw the mail overboard—one of 18 and the other of 16 guns, all brass 12 pounders, as we found two 12 pound double-headed shot in our hull. We have every reason to believe we killed a great number of men on board both vessels, numbers being shot down by the musquetry, and among the rest the captain and first officer of the brig that had at one time struck.

Killed—John Harrison, 1st lieutenant, John Smith, 2d do. Joshua Brown, Richard Blair, James Thelis, Samuel D. Smith and Sandy Forbes, seamen.

Wounded—Richard Moon, commander, severely, Noah Allen, prize-master, do. John Frinks, do. slightly, seamen, — Oliver, since dead, Asa Hart, do. do. Ab. Hinhart, do. do. — Fortune, Job E. Wheeler, P. Short, F. Sturt, T. Jifford, J. Arnold, J. Beatty, John Wilson, John Mitchell and Daniel Milton, slightly.

While refitting at the Grand Canary on the 13th November a Spanish brig arrived from St. Croix, Teneriffe, and informed us of the arrival of a British brig, a packet of 18 guns and another of 14, much cut up in her hull and having 27 men killed in an engagement as they said with an American privateer on the 2d November. The Globe mounts nine 9-pound carronades.

Official account of the loss of the U. S. schr. Ferret.
Folly-Island, February, 1814.

Sir—I am sorry to acquaint you of the entire loss of the United States' schooner Ferret. This unfortunate circumstance occurred last evening, on the North breakers of Stony Inlet.

I am happy to say none of her officers or men were lost or injured. They have lost every thing belonging to them, and would suffer much, was it not for the kindness of Mr. Darley and Mr. Henland, who have rendered them services.

I am making preparations to proceed to the wreck with a vessel, to save what articles of rigging and sails I can get at. I am in hopes to get some of her guns, which I threw into the hold. Finding the vessel half full of water, I apprehend her drifting out in deep water, should she be lightened, would render our situation more hazardous.

Mr. Brailsford, whom I have sent on with a proportion of my crew, will inform you more particularly of the circumstances which the present haste I am in will not allow me to do, as fully as I could wish.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

LAWRENCE KEARNEY,

Lieutenant com. the U. S. schooner Ferret.

Commodore J. H. Dent, commanding naval officer, Charleston.

American Prizes.

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
And not a sail, but by permission spreads."
British Naval Register.

764. Hermaphrodite brig Cossack, from Martinico to Bermuda, laden with 133hhds, 2 tierces, and 68 bbls sugar, sent into Georgetown, S. C. by the letter of marque schooner General Stark, of 2 guns and 12 men, on her passage to St. Domingo. The General Stark had previously re-captured an American vessel and manned and ordered her into port, and at the time of capturing the Cossack had only eight men on board, three of which with a boy brought in the prize and her crew [12 in number] all safe. This is truly "yankee enterprise"—the General Stark belongs to Salem. The bounty allowed to our letters of marque and privateers (in the reduction of duties) on the cargo of this vessel, is equal to nearly $4000.

765. Schooner Jasper, from Surinam, laden with coffee, sugar and rum, a prize to the Caroline of Baltimore, sent into Georgetown, S. C. It is stated this vessel would have been wrecked and lost on the bar, but for the meritorious exertions of lieutenant Mork, of the U. S. navy.

766. Schooner Rebecca, from Halifax for Bermuda, cargo live stock and provisions, sent into Portsmouth, by the Grand Turk.

767. Schooner Agnes, from St. Johns N. F. for Bermuda, laden with fish, sent into France.

768. Brig Criterion, a traitor vessel, laden with 30hhds rum, captured by the Caroline of Baltimore, and sent into Stonnington, Com. This vessel has been tried and condemned for the use of the captors.

The G. T. had also captured two other very valuable vessels and manned them for the United States—and was left in chase of a ship, all which had belonged to a fleet that had sailed under convoy, but separated in a gale. Allowing this vessel's cargo to be worth £75,000, the bounty, in the reduction of duties, of itself, is equal to sixty or seventy thousand dollars!!!

773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, eight vessels captured by the True Blooded Yankee, and burnt off the coast of Ireland.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By an arrival at Boston, we have London dates of the 25th December. The most important features of the intelligence are—

The people of Holland have driven out the French established a provisional government, and invited the return of the prince of Orange; who entered Hagu in triumph, amidst the acclamations of the people on the 3d or 4th Dec.!!!

Switzerland has declared herself neutral—and, having organized a government, has raised a considerable army for the defence of the country. Napoleon, in his speech to the senate, says he has recognized that neutrality.

In Hannover the old electoral authorities have resumed the government.

The Confederation of the Rhine, as organized by France, is entirely broken up. The allied princes appear to be engaged in some measures for the preservation of order, &c. It is possible and probable that the greater part of the German princes will remain nearly as they were, the kingdom of Westphalia, &c. being dissolved. See the statistical table in vol. 1, page 24, of the WEEKLY REGISTER.

The allied powers have offered peace to Napoleon, and will "confirm to the French empire an extent of territory that France under her kings never knew." Bonaparte tells his senate that he has signed the preliminaries of peace. This has excited great sensations in England; for it is insinuated that these proceedings were had without the concert of the British government; and lord Castlereagh himself proceeded to the head-quarters of the confederated princes. The ministerial papers seem unwilling to make peace with France; they cannot brook the idea of acknowledging Bonaparte as emperor of the French: and Castlereagh, who understands the business of buying and selling as well as any man, has probably gone over to prevent it.

The prince of Eckmühl, with a corps of 25,000 men and a magnificent train of artillery, with large supplies of ammunition, &c. was near Hamburg on the 11th December in a strong position, and aided by the Danes, may perhaps check the movements of Bernadotte in that quarter.

Dantzic was yet in the hands of the French on the 12th Dec. But, in general, the power of Napoleon may be considered as extinguished beyond the Rhine.

From Italy our accounts are not so perspicuous.—It is to be presumed, however, that, with the exception of some territories round the head of the Adriatic, the country is yet under the authorities of Bonaparte, as "king of Italy." In his speech, above alluded to, he says, he "is satisfied with the sentiments which his people of Italy have testified"—and in a letter to the duke of Lodi, he says, he is assembling an army of 100,000 men at Turin, "and will not, under any circumstances, abandon his people of the kingdom of Italy." He also says, that Naples had continued faithful in alliance with him; but there are rumors of the contrary.

Denmark, also, remained faithful to her treaties with France. Surrounded as she is by her enemies, her fate is their hands. England and Sweden agreed "in the name of the Holy trinity" to despoil her of Norway; but Alexander will probably prevent it.

In Spain there does not appear to be many French troops. The seat of government was about to be re-established at Madrid. There has been terrible fighting between Wellington and Sault near Bayonne. From the statements, it is likely that each may claim the victory. They have contended with uncommon obstinacy, and great loss.

Extracts from Napoleon's speech to the senate, Dec. 19.

"Splendid victories have raised the glory of the French arms during this campaign; defections without parallel have rendered those victories useless—all has turned against us. France itself would be in danger but for the union and energy of the French.

"I have never been seduced by prosperity. Adversity will always find me superior to its attacks.

"I have several times given peace to nations when they had lost every thing. From a part of my conquests I have raised thrones for kings who have forsaken me.

"I had conceived and executed great designs for the prosperity and happiness of the world. A monarch and a father, I feel that peace adds to the security of thrones, and to that of families. Negotiations have been entered into with the allied powers: I have adhered to the preliminary basis which they have presented. I had then the hope, that before the opening of this session the congress of Manheim would be assembled; but new delays, which are not to be ascribed to France, have deferred this moment, which the wishes of the world eagerly call for."

The account of the capture of the Terzel fleet is not confirmed. It was thought that Antwerp and the Scheldt fleet might fall into the hands of the allies.

Official declaration of the allied powers.

The French government has ordered a new levy of 300,000 Conscripts. The motives of the senatus consultum to that effect contain an appeal to the allied powers. They, therefore, find themselves called upon to promulgate anew in the face of the world, the views which guide them in the present war; the principles which form the basis of their conduct, their wishes, and their determinations.

The allied powers do not make war upon France, but against that preponderance, haughtily announced—against that preponderance which, to the misfortune of Europe, and of France, the emperor Napoleon has too long exercised beyond the limits of his empire.

Victory has conducted the allied armies to the banks of the Rhine. The first use which their imperial and royal majesties have made of victory, has been to offer peace to his majesty the emperor of the French. An attitude strengthened by the accession of all the sovereigns and princes of Germany, has had no influence on the conditions of that peace. Those conditions are founded on the independence of the other states of Europe.—The views of the powers are just in their object, generous and liberal in their application, giving security to all, honorable to each.

The allied sovereigns desire that France may be great, powerful and happy; because the French power, in a state of greatness and strength, is one of the foundations of the social edifice of Europe.—They wish that France may be happy—that French commerce may revive—that the arts, those blessings of peace, may again flourish; because a great people can only be tranquil in proportion as it is happy. The powers confirm to the French empire an extent of territory which France under her kings never knew; because a valiant nation does not fall from its rank, by having in its turn experienced reverses in an obstinate and sanguinary contest, in which it has fought with its accustomed bravery.

But the allied powers also wish to be free, tranquil and happy themselves. They desire a state of peace, which by a wise partition of strength, by a just equilibrium may henceforward preserve their people from the numberless calamities which have overwhelmed Europe for the last twenty years.

The allied powers will not lay down their arms, until they have attained this great and beneficial result, this noble object of their efforts. They will not lay down their arms, until the political state of Europe be re-established anew—and immovable principles have resumed their rights over vain pretensions, until the sanctity of treaties shall have at least secured a real peace to Europe.

Frankfort Dec. 3, 1813.

It is stated that the royal family of Portugal were preparing to return to Lisbon at the last date from the British.

It is said the British propose to lay up 20 or 30 ships of the line, as unnecessary in the present relative maritime strength of the world, and to equip with their crews a greater number of frigates.

A Vienna paper contains an official article declaring the dissolution of the Rhenish confederation.

A Caravan, with 3000 travellers, going from Mecca to Aleppo, was overwhelmed in the Arabian deserts, and all but 20 perished.

THE CHALLENGE. [We are authorised to give the following authentic and particular account of the late communications between the American and British squadrons on the New-London station. Com. Decatur is overshadowed with laurel and has erected a proud monument of fame for his country; and altho' the enemy in this instance has refused to permit the commodore to wrest from him a blood-stained trophy; there is no man whose heart American blood warms, does not exult at this victory of pride. The refusal of this challenge is a novel fact in the history of the world! When before have Englishmen refused to fight frigate to frigate; man to man, and gun to gun? Never.]—Boston Gaz.

A little more than a fortnight ago, Mr. Moran, a citizen of the United States, was landed from the British ship Ramilies, and not knowing commodore Decatur, stated in his presence, in Brown's tavern, New-London, that immediately previous to his being landed, captain Hope, of the Endymion frigate, being with him and Sir Thomas Hardy, in the cabin of the Ramilies, enquired of him, whether "he did not think the frigate United States, would not think it her better policy to annoy the British commerce, than to seek an action with that ship?" Sir Thomas Hardy then remarked, that he should be delighted to see a match between the Statura and Macedonian, as they were sister ships; that he would furnish men, and give room; but that he would not allow a challenge to come from his side. Commodore Decatur examined Moran as to the statement, and being satisfied of its correctness, resolved to offer to Sir Thomas and captain Hope, an opportunity to gratify their wishes. To this he was induced from having heard a number of other conversations of captain Hope, which led him to believe that the Endymion was considered equal at least by her commander, to any of our frigates; but principally, because captain Brooke, (now Sir Philip) had taken pains, in his note to captain Lawrence, to express his surprise that Commodore Rodgers, in the President, and captain Smith in the Congress, had avoided him in the Shannon, and captain Parker in the Tenedos, notwithstanding the repeated invitations given them by the coasters, &c. The commodore took it for granted, that if Sir Philip would avail himself of his chalk hieroglyphics on shingles and his remote innuendoes, to the common skippers of wood boats and lumber shallops, to impeach Rodgers' and Smith's willingness to meet and fight them on equal terms; that captains Hope and Stackpole, with Sir Thomas Hardy too, perhaps, if the American squadron should have a chance to get to sea, unobserved by them, (which the commodore is under orders to watch for and embrace,) would be expressing their surprise, that he should have taken advantage of the *easterly

*Our letter-writer ought to have noted, after this complaint of Sir Philip, that the wind being actually in the very point he mentions, obliged commodore Rodgers to beat out of the harbor, and consequently to cross the bay—whereas it being a fair wind for Sir Philip, he had every opportunity of seeking the commodore; and would probably have found him, had he been so disposed. — F. L. Gaz.

weather; and thus have avoided a combat, which they had repeatedly offered "on equal terms." The commodore, therefore, sent a note by captain Biddle, to Sir Thomas Hardy, in which he stated, that if Sir Thomas admitted Moran's statement to be correct, he should surmount the object "of who should give the challenge," and begged him to consider that as an invitation for the meeting between the U. S. frigates United States and Macedonian, and the British frigates Endymion and Statura; and that captain Biddle was authorized to make the necessary arrangements for an immediate meeting. When captain Biddle delivered the note, Sir Thomas said he should leave it to the captains of the frigates, and if they were desirous of it, he should certainly not interfere, or attempt to prevent it; professed that he thought the commodore's offer a very liberal one; that it was taking a great responsibility on himself; but if their frigates should be unfortunate, it would certainly break him; but if they were successful, he thought the government would make a bishop of him at least. He said they would take the night to consider of it.—Captain Biddle returned; and in the morning, captain Coote, of the Borer brig, came in with a despatch from Sir Thomas, in which he declined the meeting, notwithstanding captain Hope wished it very much, because he thought the Endymion not a match for the United States. With regard to her being a match, I will state, that two years ago, she was commanded by Sir Richard Buttun, and captured Mr. White, the present master of the United States; at that time, they sneeringly complimented Mr. White, by telling him, she was the only frigate they had in commission, that could cope with our Constitution; she had been in ordinary since, until within four months, and we understand has been put in commission, and sent to sea, with unlimited orders to cruise in pursuit of one of our frigates.—She is undoubtedly of more tonnage—heavier armament, and a larger complement of men than any frigate they have now afloat. She mounts two more guns than the United States, and of the same calibre on her main deck. When it was objected that the United States threw a greater weight of metal at a broadside than she did, (which is owing to the United States' carronades being heavier than hers) commodore Decatur offered to dismount till their force was precisely equal; but captain Coote replied, that they did not consider two or three guns of any consequence—"the difference was in the men"—the crews were every thing." [And the editor of the Columbian is informed, that commodore Decatur, after offering to reduce his battery until the enemy should say it was low enough, also, after stating the number of his crews, pledged himself not to increase them, and offered to let the adversary augment his to any amount he pleased.] No further communications have taken place between the parties.*

New-LONDON, Feb. 9.—We have heard it rumored that Sir Thomas Hardy was desirous that the Macedonian and Statura should meet singly, as she was the sister ship of the Macedonian, and on fair terms.—We can only profess our utter disbelief in this report, from the evidence furnished by Sir Thomas' refusal to allow the Endymion to encounter the U. States, after com. Decatur proposed to reduce their armaments to a precise equality.

[Should a match be made up between the Macedonian and Statura, we should expect to see some of the scenes of the battle of Issus re-exhibited; and Statura, like her namesake the proud daughter of Darius, after courting a match with the Macedonian, consent to be espoused by the victor when he shall have brought her into captivity by conquering the arms which protected her.]

Mr. Giles' Letters.

OBSERVATIONS ON NO. III, OF MR. GILES' ADDRESS.

[By a correspondent of the Virginia Argus.]

In proceeding to the examination of the 3d number of Mr. Giles's address, I am constrained to remark upon the unfairness of his conduct in undertaking to "presume," for the president, the grounds upon which the executive acted. It is undoubtedly allowable for him, when writing in his own vindication, to assume for himself what latitude of legal or moral motive he may think proper: but where there is no evidence that the president took any particular clause of the constitution or provision of law as authority for what he did, then there is a manifest impropriety in Mr. Giles's saying that such clause or provision was the authority by which the president was guided. If an argument may be managed in that way; if a writer may not only devise his own reasoning, but invent the essential part of that which is to be opposed to him, it would, indeed, be marvellous if he did not batter down every thing before him, and secure a complete triumph! And yet it is thus that the able senator, whose third labor is now before me, has dealt with Mr. Madison, who, he "presumes," in granting commissions to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams and Bayard, took that step in virtue of the following clause of the 2d section of the second article of the constitution of the United States.

"The president shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

And upon this constitutional provision, with great apparent diffidence, he suggests a doubt, "whether the president was authorised to grant commissions to fill offices, de novo, which had not been before filled!" Now, if I believe Mr. Giles serious in his suggestion that this clause was the ground work of presidential procedure in the case in question, what must I think of his understanding? And if he is not serious, what can be said for his sincerity? We have heretofore seen him, with hypocritical acumen, dissecting words; but here we find him blundering about a meaning from the plainest phraseology. How can a "vacancy happen," except with regard to an office already filled? And who besides Mr. Giles, will doubt that the provision of the constitution which is quoted, refers exclusively to offices previously occupied? It must have been the second paragraph of the second section of the second article of that instrument, most clearly, under which the executive took the measure of issuing commissions to Messrs. Gallatin, Adams and Bayard, for in that paragraph his power to do so is indisputably manifest. It says:

"He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," &c. &c.

Will it be contended that the word "nominate" relates entirely to a nomination made to the senate, and that a commission cannot properly issue in a new case of an ambassador, or minister, until such nomination has taken place? I answer to this cavil, that no law is necessary to create the office of ambassador, or minister; that offices of that description are considered as always existing; and that it is for the president alone to determine when they shall be filled. As he is the sole judge of the time when a new ambassador is necessary, and as that time is indicated by the exigency of public affairs, he is necessarily controlled, and compelled to act, by such exigency. If, for example, Great Britain had notified us, that she had appointed certain ministers to meet ministers on our part, at any certain place to adjust terms of peace, and the senate did not happen at the time to be in session, it will hardly be insisted on that the business ought to have been postponed till the senate could be convened by special notice, or should meet agreeably to law. Ambassadors, and other public ministers, are, in a special manner, the very essence of executive authority, in our intercourse with foreign powers. They are agents, not designated in any country by statute law; but are the creatures of the law of nations. Wherever, in any nation, the chief executive authority is placed, there, altogether, exists the power to institute embassies, missions, &c. you will no where find, in our constitution, provision for creating ambassadorial or foreign ministerial offices. The very being of such offices, exists entirely in the will of the president. He may cause them to be filled at any moment; he may also vacate them whenever he chooses. When, in the recess of the senate, the national exigencies render a new minister indispensable, in the opinion of the executive, a commission issues of course, until the senate meets. During its session, the president, according to the injunction of the constitution, nominates, and the senate assents or rejects: If the senate rejects, the executive may nominate another person to the same post. This course of proceeding has in some instances, been pursued, in relation to consuls, who are included in the same clause of the constitution which relates to the appointment of ambassadors, and must therefore follow the same rule. It was never, I believe, formally objected to in the case of consuls by the senate. The nomination of Mr. Short, who was unanimously rejected, was not negatived because he was commissioned before he was nominated to the senate; but, as I have understood from a good source, on account of some personal objections. In truth, if the president could not forthwith commission, at the instant he decided the new public minister to be necessary, he would on some occasions, inevitably lose all the advantages to be derived from opportunité. It is evident to me, that it is not the business of the senate to decide upon the policy or impolicy of appointing ambassadors and other public ministers: Their duty, I apprehend, consists in preventing improper individuals from occupying those posts.—“The senate,” as Mr. Giles states in his No. II, “is the passive preventive power.” But how preventive? Why, by rejecting the men nominated by the president. If that body can exercise a negative upon all missions, at their first institution, as well as upon the individual designated to personify them, then, it is manifest, the executive is thrown out of his peculiar constitutional line, as the political guide of the United States with respect to other countries. He would no longer be, what Mr. Giles allows him to be, “the active originating power.” Hence, I hold the resolution of the senate, in the case of Mr. Russell, declaring it “inexpedient” to send a minister plenipotentiary to Sweden, to be a species of usurpation of the executive function. It may be asked, where, in that case, is the check upon the president? I answer, in the power of withholding money, which congress possesses. Withhold his pay, and the minister is defunct. The check, growing out of the preventive power of the senate, is also formidable. It obstructs, by refusing to approve persons nominated. But in no instance can the senate, as I conceive, constitutionally, discuss and determine, in form, concerning embassies or missions. The same paragraph of the constitution which renders the advice and consent of the senate necessary with regard to ambassadors and public ministers, also requires their advice and consent to the making of treaties. The president, says the constitution, “shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties.” But it is not alleged before the treaty is made, or in the making it, the executive shall consult the senate whether he shall make a new treaty or not. When the treaty is framed, then it is laid before the senate, and that body either ratifies or condemns it. If the senate could partake in the power of designating when new missions should be instituted, it would, as a correspondent attribute, be associated with the president in the reception of ambassadors and other public ministers. But we find that is not the fact. The constitution enjoins the president alone to receive them. The senate cannot constitutionally even claim access to the executive documents nor are the instructions given to our public ministers laid before them, except at the pleasure of the president. All which circumstances go to prove, that the senate is not viewed by the constitution as a tribunal to decide, in the first instance, with respect to the expediency or in expediency, the policy or impolicy, of executive measures. The passive, preventive negative on persons nominated, is the limit of the senatorial power in this respect. How that body can undertake to determine a new ministerial institution inexpedient, when it has not, and is not contemplated to have, a full view of the whole executive ground, is to me astonishing. The attempt to penetrate the presidential intellect in an unlawful form, I have already exposed; and I have no hesitation in saying, that the closer the senate is confined to its strict constitutional authority, the better for our liberties. When we reflect that it is, in its nature, a perpetual senate, and that it only wants the abolition of party spirit among its members, and the introduction of an esprit du corps, to make it absolute, there is every reason to tremble for the integrity of the constitution. The president will scarcely ever fail to give proper information to the senate, he will do that, in general, for his own sake, in order to justify himself to the people, to whom he is responsible. But to let the senate, at the first blush, into all his opinions; to take counsel of the senators, in senate, as to the propriety of his measures in their incipient state, and to be guided entirely by their votes, would be to relinquish his own peculiar function, and to resort for guidance to a tribunal which the constitution does not indicate. The senate is designated as an adviser AFTER nominations, not BEFORE them. The only constitutional advisers before nomination, are the heads of departments, whose opinions the president may require in writing, if he is disposed to do so.

But, let opinions vary as they may on this topic, the question appears to have been determined entirely in favor of the executive; for, notwithstanding Messrs. Bayard and Adams were commissioned before they were nominated to the senate, they were approved by that body; and, if any further approval were wanting, it may be found in the voice of the people, who, in a great measure, are about to give a verdict for the president and against Mr. Giles. If there had been sufficient time to lay the nominations before the senate, prior to the issuing of the commissions, it might have been well enough to have pursued that course; because, in that case, delay would have made no difference as to the object in view. There was not, however, sufficient time, all things considered, to wait for the meeting of that body. I know that those who think with Mr. Giles, will at once reply to this observation, as Mr. Giles has said himself, that the time at which our envoys left the United States, was not more than twelve or fourteen days previous to the meeting of the senate. This answer supposes that the senate would, immediately on its meeting, have proceeded to act upon the nomination of the envoys; which, in my opinion, could not have been depended on, as I shall attempt to demonstrate.

The respect which every good citizen is disposed to pay to the institutions of his country, induces him, when speaking of any branch of the government, to treat it as if it proceeded to fair objects, by the direct road of pure reason, impelled by motives of virtue alone. Yet, at the very moment that this language is held, for the sake of decorum, and in consequence of those observances which the world deems indispensable in form, there is not a solitary individual who has the least knowledge of political affairs, that does not know, and believe, that in most of the branches of government, and particularly in those composed of numbers, private motives, of ambition, hatred, friendship, or revenge, mingle with considerations of public utility or national policy.—As an instance of this it is notorious, at the city of Washington at least, that the senators of the United States were, at the last session of that body, split into three parties; to wit: A party friendly to the executive and his measures; the federal party; and a party of disaffected republicans, at the head of which was Mr. Giles. With such a senate containing two parties, equal in number to that which was well disposed to support the policy of the executive, how could expedition be looked for, especially in an affair so delicate as that of the Russian mediation, where there was so much room for misrepresentation.

and so many persons disposed to discolor facts?—The federal party, following its usual and well-known course, would naturally seek to embarrass, in hopes to profit by confusion; and the party which was directed by Mr. Giles, discontented and restless, would not fail, if it could only act upon a plausible pretence, to throw obstacles in the way of harmony and promptness of proceeding. It was also well understood that Mr. Giles was the implacable enemy of Albert Gallatin; and it was confidently believed at the time, that he would oppose the nomination of the secretary of the treasury, by every contrivance that he could imagine. Procrastination, therefore, would have been the unavoidable effect of postponing the issuing of the commissions, until the approbation of the senate had been obtained. Such procrastination would have blasted the benefit, in relation to public opinion, which the acceptance of the Russian mediation, was calculated to secure. It is known to Mr. Giles, and to every man of experience, who is acquainted with the nature of our government, that public opinion is every thing; that without it, no description of politicians can manage the national affairs, particularly in a period of war, with any vigor whatever. It was all important, therefore, for the executive to engraft public opinion; and that could only be done by impressing the people, by acts with a conviction of the real disposition of the president with regard to peace and war.—By the act of accepting the Russian mediation without the least hesitation, the most incredulous could not doubt that it was the sincere desire of Mr. Madison to seize every fair occasion to procure peace; and this conviction gave additional energy to our citizens in prosecuting the war, which they were taught most truly to view as just and necessary, and not to be continued a day longer than it was possible to restore peace upon conditions with which the public were well acquainted, and which the best heads in the nation, some even of the federal party, admitted were the least we ought to exact. It is very true, as Mr. Giles says, that in the introductory stage of the Russian mediation, the cabinet of London observed the “most sullen silence” upon the subject. But her partisans in this country were on the watch; and it is indisputably certain, from particulars and manoeuvres which the honorable Mr. Pickens has developed, that had the executive wavered in accepting the emperor of Russia's offer, or had he for the instant declined it, those partisans would have come out and denounced him as a war-hawk, not in the least disposed to make peace, although it was proposed to him from such a respectable quarter as Russia. Nay, it is highly probable, that the British cabinet itself, bursting its “sullen silence,” would have seized the occasion to declare its acceptance of the mediation, and thus corroborating the clamor here, have given a bias to public opinion which the president might have found it extremely difficult to counteract. Now, it is to be observed, that in accepting the mediation of Russia, it became proper to give some proof of the acceptance, to do some act, by which the people might see, or hear, that the president had accepted. The act most natural and proper, was the designating the envoys, and issuing commissions to them. For, had he not issued the commissions until the senate met, it would not have been an actual acceptance of the offer, but a promise to accept, which promise would remain to be fulfilled on the meeting of the senate. And that body, consisting, at that time, of three different parties, two of them hostile to the executive, and equal to the one that was friendly, would, upon every rational estimate of its proceedings, impede the consummation of the executive promise, so as to render it doubtful, for a month or six weeks whether the mediation would eventually be accepted or not. The proceedings of the senate being all that time kept secret, the people might suppose the president was not sincere in his desire for peace; the outcry of British partisans would have been thus countenanced, public opinion might have fluctuated, and the executive have thus lost the benefit which subsequent events have shewn that he has derived from the course he pursued. It will be seen that I speak with frankness; and I presume that what I state, however unpleasant it may be to the affected delicacy of some double dealing politicians, is in a style that will be understood and credited by men of plain sense, who pursue, in all their investigations, nothing more than the good of their country. I do not, indeed, profess to write for posterity; but endeavor to instil that truth, in which posterity delights, into the minds of the present generation. It was not for the executive to wait the determination of Great Britain, before he acted upon the Russian mediation. In every respect that would have been an impotent policy. It would have been to follow, where we had invariably professed to lead. By acting without a knowledge of what the enemy would do in the affair, we went forward upon our own motives, shewing thereby an independent resolution, not to be tricked or deceived by the artifices of the British ministry. If any inference could be drawn, relative to the mediation, from what Mr. Giles calls “the astonishing successes of the allies of Great Britain on the continent of Europe,” surely it must be favorable to the object of the emperor of Russia's offer. Who was the principal of those successful allies? Russia, most undoubtedly. Might it not, therefore, be reasonably expected, that that very Russia, whose alliance was so useful and precious to the British, would have great influence with our enemy in bringing him to an admission of the wrongs he had done us, and to a stipulation for a cessation from them in future? This head of the argument might be pushed much further, with great advantage to the executive; but as Mr. Giles has not insisted on the part of his address to which it has reference, as material, I will pass on to the pith of his strictures on the nomination of Mr. Gallatin.

As the basis of his objection to Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Giles states two propositions:

1. That the appointment of envoy, is incompatible with the post of secretary of the treasury.
2. That the substitution of a person to perform the duties of secretary of the treasury, in the place of Mr. Gallatin, was unlawful.

The whole amount of what Mr. Giles says upon the first proposition is, as I understand it, this: That the office of secretary of the treasury involves many important and delicate duties, which require a constant attendance at the treasury department in Washington; and that Mr. Gallatin, not being possessed of the power of ubiquity, cannot perform the functions of envoy at St. Petersburg, and those of secretary in Washington city, at one and the same time. This, I presume, will all be admitted; and I cannot conceive why Mr. Giles should have gone into such a detail of law and reasoning to prove it, unless it were to procure an opening for some of those hard hits, which, by broad insinuation, he makes at Mr. Gallatin. These hits, in my opinion, are not perfectly fair, especially against an absent man: nor are they conformable to the doctrine of Mr. Giles himself, who strenuously contends for the sanctity of notices, and their preservation from the rude implications of political commentators!

It will be perceived, however, that there is no force in the arguments in support of this first proposition, unless the second is completely established: for, if the president may lawfully substitute a person to perform the duties of secretary of the treasury in the absence of Mr. Gallatin, then, of course there is no incompatibility between the offices of envoy and secretary: as, in that case, Mr. Gallatin can perform the functions of envoy at St. Petersburg and the substitute can perform the functions of secretary at Washington. The first question, therefore, to be examined, is, had the president lawful power to appoint a substitute to Mr. Gallatin, under the circumstances? Mr. Giles thinks he had not: I think he had.

On the 8th of May, 1792, congress passed an act, which the following is a section, now in force:

"That in case of the death, absence from the seat of government, or sickness of the secretary of state, secretary of the treasury, or of the secretary of the war department, or of any officer of either of the said departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices, until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease."

It was under this section of law that the executive appointed William Jones, esq. to perform the duties of secretary of the treasury in the absence of Mr. Gallatin. The power of the president, it may be observed, in case of absence is clear and explicit. But Mr. Giles objects that Mr. Gallatin's "absence from the seat of government" is not the absence contemplated by the act of congress; and that Mr. Madison created the absence; and of course the necessity for a substitute, which he alleges is unlawful. Yet he nowhere produces any legal provision in support of his opinion. He makes a long argument, it is true, to show what the law intended; which, however, is not in any way sustained by what the law expresses; and where the expression is clear it is out of all rule to assert an intention by construction. Noy, in his maxims, tells us that "all acts of parliament (and, in like manner, all acts of congress,) as well private as general, shall be taken by reasonable construction, to be collected out of the words of the act only." Mr. Giles goes into a construction not warranted by the words of the act; for those words are without the least restriction, and do not limit the distance to which the head of a department may travel, either in or out of the country. The section which I have quoted was made, it will not be denied, for the accommodation or personal convenience of the heads of departments, when they might wish to be absent on private business, or were detained at home by sickness. If, then, they are thus to be indulged on their own account, an envoy be substituted by temporary incumbents for such a case, how much stronger is the reason for constructing their absence to admit of a substitution when the public interest call them abroad? As to Mr. Giles's criticism, that the phrase, "absence from the seat of government," does not include absence from the United States, because a minor proposition does not embrace a major, it is sufficiently answered by the consideration, that the "seat of government" is merely referred to in the law as the place of political residence of the secretaries; and if they are absent from that, all other places, far or near, are indifferent in the eye of the act of congress. I may also observe, that the president is made the judge of what kind of absence renders the appointment of a substitute expedient: for the words of the section are, "in case he shall think it necessary," and, "at his discretion." That he created the absence which rendered the exercise of this discretion indispensable, is no solid objection; there being no law to prohibit the head of a department from becoming an envoy, nor any provision restraining the executive from nominating a secretary to that post. What is said concerning Mr. Jay, does not apply; and if it did, the sentiment against it is nothing but opinion. Long as the republicans have been in power, they have never enacted any thing to prevent the case of Mr. Jay from operating as a precedent. His appointment, nevertheless, was, as Mr. Giles avows more inadmissible than Mr. Gallatin's; and moreover, it was not analogous. In Mr. Jay's case, the executive selected his envoy from the judiciary; whence the republican party insisted on an incompatibility, on account of the intermixing of the members of two separate and independent branches of the government. Mr. Gallatin, on the contrary was a member of the executive administration; and consequently there is no incompatibility on that score, nor does Mr. Giles pretend that there is. This distinction fully vindicates Mr. Madison's consistency; as he may very cordially have disapproved of Mr. Jay's nomination, have very cheerfully nominated Mr. Gallatin, and still be a strict adherent to the republican principle avowed in 1794.

But there is another act on the subject of absence from the seat of government, which Mr. Giles quotes, and I will quote likewise. It was passed on the 13th of February, 1795, and is in these words:

"That in case of vacancy in the office of secretary of state, &c. whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorise any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices, until a successor be appointed, or such vacancy be filled: Provided, That no one vacancy shall be supplied, in manner aforesaid, for a longer term than six months."

This law, does not profess to alter, or repeal, the section enacted in the year 1792. The title of it states that it is to "amend" the act containing that section. Now, one law may amend another law, by adding to its provisions; and this is the case with the act before me. The law of 1792, and that of 1795, are separate acts, and the president may select which he pleases to proceed upon. They do not interfere with each other, the "case of vacancy" in the latter, not having any expression referring to "absence from the seat of government" as expressed in the former. Both the acts are regarded as existing, according to the rule laid down by sir WILLIAM BLACKSTONE, page 99, volume I, where he says, "if by a former law an offence be indictable at the quarter sessions, and a latter law makes the same offence indictable at the assizes; here the jurisdiction of the sessions is not taken away, but both have a concurrent jurisdiction, and the offender may be prosecuted at either; unless the new statute subjoins express negative words, as, that the offence shall be indictable at the assizes, and not elsewhere." The act of 1795 has no negative words, constraining the president to appoint under it, and not under the section of that of 1792; his power to appoint under the first, is not taken away by the last, and he may, according to the legal rule, appoint in virtue of either of the two acts that he may think most applicable to the case.

In truth, the law of 1792, and that of 1795, are materially different in their object. The one speaks of "absence from the seat of government, or sickness;" the other speaks of an absolute "vacancy."

In the one instance the appointment of a substitute for a secretary may endure "until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease;" in the other only for "six months," or "until a successor be appointed, or such vacancy be filled." If the reader will note, with the least precision, the different phraseology of the two provisions, he will at once confess that they must have been made for different purposes: for, how do the words "a successor be appointed" or "vacancy be filled," correspond with the words "until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease," which latter do not allow room for a "successor," nor suppose any "vacancy" whatever?

My own opinion is, that the section of the act of 1792 was intended by the legislature, to enable the executive to indulge a valuable officer of his department, in reasonable conveniences, or to employ him at a distance from the seat of government, at home or abroad, temporarily, "at the president's discretion," in promoting the public welfare; and that the act of 1795 was, on the other hand, intended to put it in his power to check the idleness of such heads of departments or others, as might be disposed to loiter away their time, at a distance from their official duties; inasmuch as if he should authorise a substitute to officiate for such idlers under the act of 1795, it would save the executive from the unpleasant alternative of peremptorily dismissing them. It would signify, that the president gave to their absence the character of a vacation to their offices, to which he might nominate them again or not, as he might deem best for the public interest, it being indispensable, by the act of 1795, that "a successor" be appointed to fill the "vacancy" mentioned. Mere absence is evidently not vacancy; and therefore vacancy cannot apply to mere absence. The issuing a commission to Mr. Gallatin, did not, by any prevailing law, vacate his office of secretary of the treasury. The president, who is the best judge of his own intentions, did not mean that the one should vacate the other. Hence, when he informed the senate that the office of secretary of the treasury was not vacated, he acted in a manner strictly conformable to truth and law.

Having, as I think, fully proved that the executive had ample power to appoint a substitute for the secretary of the treasury during Mr. Gallatin's absence, Mr. Giles's proposition concerning the incompatibility of the duties of Mr. Gallatin's two offices falls to the ground. And here I will take occasion to remark, that the resolution of the senate, which asserts such incompatibility, is founded upon a palpable error, as after I have quoted the resolution itself, I will make apparent:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the senate, the powers and duties of the secretary of the department of the treasury, and those of an envoy extraordinary to a foreign power, are so incompatible, that they ought not to be, and remain united in the same person."

This resolution, adopted on the 15th day of June last, had special allusion to Mr. Gallatin. Yet it was well known to all the senators at the time, that the powers and duties of secretary and envoy were not, practically, united in his person: He still held the appointment of secretary of the treasury; but Mr. Jones was the acting secretary whilst Mr. Gallatin was charged with the business of envoy. In this respect, therefore, there was, virtually, no union of incompatible duties. So distinctly was this marked, that Mr. Gallatin relinquished his salary as secretary as soon as Mr. Jones was commissioned; and Mr. Jones himself receives no compensation for the services he renders in that respect. The amount of the salary is saved to the public during the whole time of Mr. Gallatin's absence. But the chief error of the resolution consists in its assuming, by inevitable implication, that the two offices were to "remain united" in his person. It was universally known that the entire mission to St. Petersburg was a temporary thing. In its very nature it was temporary; and I will undertake to say, without the fear of contradiction, that there was not a single senator who voted on the occasion, that did not believe that Mr. Gallatin would return to Washington in the autumn or winter of the present year, or, at the utmost, early in the year 1814.—Then, with what kind of justice or propriety, could a resolution be adopted, to bear directly upon Mr. Gallatin, asserting the perpetuation of two offices in his person, when the contrary was notorious? I have often endeavored to account for the adoption of this resolution by the senate; and, with the most unfeigned respect for that body, I can satisfy myself in no other way, than by supposing it to have been voted by most of the majority of the members without due examination. It is impossible they should have voted for it, if they had perceived the glaring error which it embraces.

In support of his main argument, Mr. Giles assumes that Mr. Jones, as a substitute for Mr. Gallatin, is merely a nominal officer; and thus, by reducing the former to a sign manual, insists upon the necessity for the presence of the latter at Washington. On what does Mr. Giles found that assumption? Why, he alleges that the inference is inevitable from a statement made to congress by Mr. Jones himself. And what was this statement? "One of his first acts (says Mr. Giles) after taking possession of the navy department, was, to call for assistance in the execution of its duties; they being deemed too burdensome for an individual." In this part of Mr. Giles's address I do not hesitate to charge him with what the logicians call the suppositio veri. He has not told the whole truth. In our courts of justice a witness is sworn to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." This form of oath is meant and is necessary to draw out all the pertinent circumstances in the case. If Mr. Giles had been sworn according to this form, he would have told the people that the assistance which Mr. Jones called for, was not intellectual assistance: It was not that kind of assistance which appertains to the capacity to investigate and determine the points of his secretary's administration of the navy. It was altogether a different kind of aid that he wanted and asked for. It was the assistance of clerks that he solicited; or clerks, not to interfere with the peculiar duties of secretary, but to record, to copy, and to file away letters and papers, which the prevalence of war accumulated in a greater proportion than formerly.

* The following is the letter of Mr. Jones calling for the aid alluded to:

Navy Department, Feb. 6th, 1814.

SIR—The papers marked A. and B. which I have the honor herewith to transmit, have been prepared in obedience to the act of 21st April, 1806, regulating and fixing the compensation of clerks, &c.

As the act referred to requires, that I should report to congress whether the business for clerks has increased or diminished, have the honor respectfully to observe, that the business must necessarily have considerably increased, among other causes tending to produce an increase of the business of the department, the war in which we are engaged, and the recently authorised increase of the navy, have obviously had this tendency; and I would recommend an additional appropriation sufficient to enable me to employ two able clerks, in addition to the number already employed. I have the honor to be,

(Signed) W. JONES

How speaks of the "out" of the secretary.

This sort of aid is always asked for as the business, or in other words the clerking, mechanical part of the public duties increases. The post-master-general and other officers frequently solicit such aid. No body imagines it is because they are incompetent to the duties—to the duties which are strictly their own. The requisition for additional clerks, therefore by Mr. Jones, was no proof that the peculiar, personal duties of the secretary of the navy, were deemed by him "too burthensome for an individual." The president superintends the whole of the departments of government; yet if there were twenty more departments, he might still superintend them. The division of business under different heads, no doubt enables him to go through with government affairs in a prompt and a satisfactory manner; and, in some degree, the secretaries may derive aid in minor matters, in the extension and formal part of business, from some of their clerks. But as to principles, and rules of procedure, the secretaries, under the direction of the executive, must always themselves determine. Mr. Giles does not deny that Mr. Gallatin had prepared, previously to his departure for St. Petersburg, all the revenue bills; and this was all that was necessary, in any important point of view, from the treasury, at the extra session of congress in May. Whatsoever deficiencies there might have been in those bills, they were such as could be supplied by the "dependent clerks of the treasury," as well as by any body else; for they were nothing more than the blanks that remained to be filled in relation to the direct tax, and other particulars, which any man, who understands arithmetic and is entitled to the reputation of a legislator, with a very little industry, might readily supply.—That the defects of the bills could be supplied, in the absence of Mr. Gallatin, is proved by the fact, that they were supplied; as the bills were enacted into laws, with as much expedition as any laws, equally interesting to the community, ever were. With respect to the chancery powers of the secretary of the treasury, they are not so much liable to caprice as Mr. Giles imagines: There are certain established rules, which from the institution of the department, have grown up, and furnish precedents for almost every possible case. These render the administration of the office easy in that particular, and within the scope of such facilities as common clerks usually possess. There is another thing to be considered: In the treasury department there are several responsible officers of high trust. These are the auditor, the register, the treasurer, and the comptroller, who is next in dignity to the secretary himself, and is always a man of abilities: Witness, Gabriel Duval, Esq. the late comptroller, now an associate judge of the supreme court of the United States; and Richard Bush, Esq. who, prior to his appointment to that office, was attorney-general of the state of Pennsylvania. All these aids, it may be well imagined, enabled Mr. Jones to proceed very accurately with the routine of treasury business, in addition to the business of his own proper office. Before new extraordinary duties are required, Mr. Gallatin will have returned. It ought not to be forgotten, likewise, that the executive is consulted in person, even when Mr. Gallatin is at the seat of government, in all doubtful and delicate cases. From these considerations, it is perceptible that the sarcasm which Mr. Giles levels at the absent secretary loses its edge; for how can it be said that he withdrew from his post when he had the fairest chance of exhibiting his financial talents, and when he was most wanted, knowing, as we do, that he left behind him bills so matured that congress would pass them into laws with little or no variation? This belongs me to speak of Mr. Gallatin as a foreigner and of his abilities.

I am not conscious of being fond of foreign born men. I am sure that I love my country. What I mean by my country is not the mere soil on which I tread, further than its scenes and its varieties furnish generous affections to the heart, and rational thoughts to the understanding. My country consists of my parents, living or dead, and of the memory I have of them; of my relatives and their connexions; of the youth with whom I have been bred, and have grown up to manhood; of the moral and political images with which I have been impressed, and which have become so familiar as to be essential to my happiness; of the prosperity which exists among my fellow citizens; of the noble spirit which they manifest on great occasions; and of the splendid train of thoughts that this spirit may inspire. Go where I will, my country, in the likeness of what I mention, will follow me. And so, I presume, will any man's country follow him. Every one at bottom, I am convinced, likes his own country best. But there may be motives for a man's leaving his native land. His parents, his relatives, his acquaintances, the original images of his mind, may wound and disgust him; he may not occupy the rank he thinks he merits; he may be unfortunate in business; he may be persecuted for his religion or his politics, and may fly for refuge or promotion to a strange community. There is, nevertheless, not one, I believe, that, let him enjoy the station he craves at home, would seek to naturalize himself abroad. But if, for whatever cause, an emigrant should arrive among us, and by our laws be converted into a citizen, I would not, for that reason, look upon him with vain jealousy and discontent. I would not make my country, every man's country, without probation: But when, according to law, the stranger had regularly approved himself worthy, and been admitted into our society, I would not churlishly refuse to him the rights, in their utmost latitude, which his new character confers. It is not denied that Mr. Gallatin is a naturalized citizen; it is not denied that he may be legally promoted to the first offices under the president: it must be confessed that he has rendered considerable services to the republican party—to that party which is now in the ascendant; and Mr. Giles himself does not deny him to be a man of talents. Then why not make him enjoy? Why not take him, for a season, from the treasury, and employ him usefully for the public in another situation? Would it have been just, after all his services, to have sent him to St. Petersburg at the price of his office of secretary? Let the majority answer.

Mr. Giles, however, is of opinion that "there are many, very many gentlemen in the United States, possessing talents equally competent to all the purposes of his mission." But what is meant by this word "talents" concerning which we every day hear so much? Are we not often imposed upon by it? By a man of "talents," I understand one who has a good natural capacity, disciplined by study, and application in any line or lines of business, to great and superior dexterity in that line or those lines. In respect to these, he will, in that case, be a man of "talents." There are, I doubt not, in the United States, many men of a good, and, perhaps, superior, capacity for diplomatic talents, to Mr. Gallatin. But where is the man that is out of office, and would be willing to act, who has had Mr. Gallatin's discipline in relation to the object of this mission? He has grown up with the republican party; he is acquainted with all its principles and reasonings; he has been the coadjutor of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and all the republican worthies; he is intimately informed of all the sentiments of the present executive concerning commerce, impressment, and territorial limits; and, above all, he has presided for twelve years over the treasury department, from which he could not avoid gaining a deep insight of our trade with all quarters of the world, and be thereby better qualified to regulate that which will be carried on between the United States and Great Britain on the return of peace. On the whole, I do not see how the president could have made a more proper selection.

I shall close these observations, without dwelling upon the frightful picture which Mr. Giles has drawn, of what might possibly happen, if such a man as Aaron Burr were president. It is sufficient to say, that for extreme evils there are extreme remedies: Nor will I discuss the case of general Dearborn and his son, but that is to be judged of on its own merits. But, in relation to the latter, I will remark, that the president could make no binding bargain to appoint the son successor to his father. If the senate would not consent to the father's being a major-general, without the "arrangement" to which Mr. Giles alludes, then the accusation lies, not against the president, but against the senate, for so disgraceful a commerce. It is for Mr. Giles to settle the affair with his honorable colleagues.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.

RESOLUTIONS.—The people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, to promote the general welfare and secure the blessing of liberty to themselves and to their posterity, did ordain and solemnly adopt a constitution for the United States. "This government, the offspring of our choice, (says Washington) unimpaired and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, has a just claim to our confidence and support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. And the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts, merits the frown of indignity." This constitution, the palladium of our political prosperity and safety, declares that congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them, as may be employed in the service of the United States. The constitution also declares that "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land." It also further declares, that it is treason against the United States to levy war against them, to adhere to their enemies or to give them aid or comfort. In pursuance of the powers thus vested in the congress of the United States, they did pass laws providing for the calling the militia into the service of the United States and for their government while in that service, enacting, that while employed in such service they should be subject to the same rules and articles of war as the troops of the United States; and also imposing a penalty on all those who should encourage or promote desertion among the troops in said service.

In the face of those constitutional provisions, and laws enacted by congress in pursuance thereof, the legislature of Pennsylvania behold with astonishment and high disapprobation the executive of a sister state issuing his proclamation ordering a detachment of the militia of that state, then in the service of the United States, to desert that service, and return to their respective homes. With no less astonishment and disapprobation do they behold a resolution laid on the table of the legislature of another state, evidently intended to intimidate, or to prevent the congress of the United States from directing the president to institute a legal inquiry whether or not the constitution and laws of the U. States have been violated by the aforesaid proclamation, accompanied by a threat that if such inquiry is instituted they will aid in resisting it—a procedure calculated to add to the calamities of the war in which the United States have been compelled in defence of their liberty and independence, the horrors of a civil war, which may result in the severance of the union, and prostrate the only free government on earth. Deprecating such an event, and feeling it as a duty which we owe to ourselves, our government and our country, to express our high disapprobation and abhorrence of all measures calculated to produce such disastrous consequences, and our determination to support the general government in all constitutional and lawful measures, in bringing to justice all those who violate the constitution and the laws of the United States, and who, either directly or indirectly, adhere to or afford aid or comfort to our common enemy—We do, therefore resolve:

First—That the legislature of this commonwealth views with the utmost concern and disapprobation, every attempt to screen from just punishment any individual or individuals, however elevated by station, who may violate the constitution or laws of the United States, or who may, directly or indirectly, adhere to or afford aid or comfort to the enemies of our beloved country.

Second—That we will to the utmost of our power, as a legislature or as individual members of society, support the general government in all lawful and constitutional measures to bring to justice infractors of the laws and constitution of the United States, and all abettors and aids of the enemies thereof.

Third—That the governor be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the president of the United States, with a request that he will lay the same before congress.

MISCELLANEOUS.

VIGILANCE. The following directions from the department of state, to the collectors of the customs, immediately strikes at a very considerable "trade" that we believe has lately been carried on; and which, from the reduction of duties on prize goods, would doubtless have grown into great importance. This will add fresh fuel to the chimneys of smugglers, as it closes, we hope, the chief door that the embargo had left open.

Department of State, January 21, 1814.

SIR—The president directs, that in future you issue no commissions to private armed vessels, unless they have a complement of at least twenty officers and men, and an armament in proportion to the number of persons. Nor even then, without the construction, equipment and preparation of the vessel shall manifestly indicate the properties and design of a cruiser. He directs, moreover, that you immediately revoke all commissions heretofore issued by you to those of less effective force. In case of application hereafter for commissions for vessels of this inferior class, you are to report the same to this department, with a statement of all the circumstances within your knowledge, that may lead to a probable estimate of the real objects of such small cruizers.

I remain, sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

To the collector of the customs, Savannah.

BALTIMORE VESSELS.—In page 33, we stated that a very large portion of the honest trade of the United States was carried on in the "wonderfully constructed Baltimore schooners," and repeated the suggestion, made many months ago, as to the employment of a number of them, or others of the like excellent model, to destroy the commerce of the enemy. In proof of what we said, we have made out a list of Baltimore vessels, an account of whose safe arrival to or from foreign ports, reached this city in the space of a month, ending on the 16th instant. The number of the voyages amount to thirty-five—we could give all the names, and say where and when they arrived; but prefer to state the fact generally. Among them, we notice the names of Pike, Perry, Harrison, Governor Shelly and Decatur. Some of those vessels are of great size, measuring from 300 to 350 and 400 tons. In the space of time above stated, accounts of the capture of only two of our vessels were received. The force of these facts cannot be duly estimated except by recollecting how easily, the Chesapeake may be blockaded, and how closely it has been invested.

NATIONAL BANK.—Outlines of the bill reported to congress, by the committee of ways and means.—The bank is to be located within the district of Columbia; the capital not to exceed thirty millions, divided into shares of $100 each. The charter to continue for twenty years; the style of the corporation to be the "President and Directors of the National Bank."

The President of the United States to cause a subscription to be made to the stock as a part of the capital stock, to an amount not exceeding six millions, and the bank to loan the amount of subscription at six per cent. as long as the United States shall hold the stock; four millions to be reserved for the respective states, the governors of each of which to cause a subscription to be made to the said stock as part of the capital stock. The bank is to have twenty-five directors, five of whom to be appointed by the president of the United States. Directors in the mean time to be David Clarkson, Jb. Barker, John Wells, Charles Wright, George Davis, Isaac Lawrence, Wm. Gray, Thos. Hazard, jun. G. Bryan, G. Price, J. Sergeant, M. Eyre, J. Fisher, J. Peace, J. A. Buchanan, I. McKim, Robt. Oliver, J. Cox, J. McKim, J. P. Van Ness, R. Cutts, R. Brent, J. Taylor, Walter Jones, and T. T. Gantt, who shall appoint the times and places for receiving subscriptions to the stock. None other than citizens of the United States, actually resident therein, can vote by proxy. The bank may loan to the government fifteen millions, exclusive of the money loaned to make the subscription on the part of the United States. The corporation may demand 7 per cent interest.

It is thought the bill not pass in its present shape.

Messrs. Gray and Russell were to have sailed from New-York, in the corvette John Adams, for Gottenburg, on Thursday last ARMISTICE.—It is now distinctly understood (says the Democratic Press) that gen. Winder came to the United States with proposals from general Prevost as to an armistice with respect to the Canadas. We believe the proposition was promptly declined.

GLORIOUS NEWS!—The Gazette (says a London paper) contains despatches from sir George Prevost, confirming what we stated yesterday, respecting the repulse of the American force under gen. Hampton, consisting of seven thousand men, with ten field pieces, by three hundred Canadian fencibles and militia! an achievement which confers immortal honor on the Canadians!! This timely check, by less than a twentieth part of his force, appears to have entirely disconcerted the operations of general Hampton, who, we learn by a dispatch from sir George, dated the 4th ult. had entirely quitted the lower province, and was retiring to Four Corners.

NIAGARA FRONTIER.—To the editor of the Buffalo Gazette. Williamsville, January 29th, 1813. Sir, From the different statements which have appeared in the public prints, it appears to be the prevailing opinion that the scarcity of arms and ammunition at Buffalo, was a prime cause of the disaster which has befallen this part of the frontier. As those statements are calculated to poison and mislead the public mind, and to keep from the public the real causes of our present situation, by attaching the whole blame to government, or some officer whose duty it was to make the necessary provision for the defence of the frontier; when in fact the blame must and will rest alone on the disorganized and cowardly conduct in a great proportion of the troops who were on the frontier at that time, who deserted their ranks on the first appearance of the enemy.

I must beg leave to state the following facts.—On the morning of the 30th December, after having furnished to all who applied, both arms and ammunition, upwards of seven thousand rounds of musket cartridges remained in my possession, a great proportion of which was ordered to the Rock for distribution when required; but none being applied for, it was ordered back after the principal part of the troops had retreated, or rather deserted, from that place. Upwards of fifty stand of arms were on hand, and from 20 to 30 were daily repaired; in fact no one appeared who was not furnished. Upwards of three hundred stand (which had but a day or two before been furnished to the militia) were burnt in the different houses they had occupied as quarters, having deserted both the village and their arms, on the first assurance of the enemy having crossed.—At the house of Mr. Haddock, in which only one small company quartered, upwards of twenty of this brave company left their arms for the use of their friends, or any other persons who might wish to use them, they having deserted. Such, sir, are the men whose complaints are daily appearing in our newspapers, of government not affording them the common means of defence; when, if one half of the troops that were on duty the day previous to the action, had made use of half the means government had provided for them, the villages of Buffalo and Black Rock would still have been flourishing, and afforded sufficient shelter, not only for the troops who would have captured the invading foe, but for many distressed families, who are at this time living on the charity of their friends.

I would not be understood as wishing to censure the citizens of Buffalo and Black Rock, in the retreat on that morning, for many of them to my personal knowledge, fought while any probability remained of saving either of these villages.

I am, respectfully, sir, your humble servant,

JOHN G. CAMP, Ast. Dep. Q. M. Gen.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Head-Quarters, Quebec, 8th Jan. 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.

His excellency the commander of the forces has received a report from lieutenant-general Drummond communicating the report of captain Stewart of the Royal Scots, of a spirited and judicious attack made by Lieut. Metcalf, in command of a party of militia, consisting of 25 men, at McCreae's house, on the river Thames, by which a party of the enemy consisting of 3 officers and 35 soldiers, of the 26th U. States regiment, were surprised and taken prisoners. Four of the enemy were wounded, but no one of Lieut. Metcalf's party received any injury. The prisoners have been brought in.

(Signed) EDWARD BAYNES, Adj. Gen. N. A.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Head-Quarters, Quebec, 8th Jan. 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS,

His excellency the commander of the forces has the satisfaction of announcing to the troops, that he has received a dispatch from Lieut. Gen. Drummond, reporting the complete success of an attack that was made at day break, on the morning of the 30th Dec. on the enemy's position at Black Rock, where he was advantageously posted with upwards of 2000 men, and after a short but severe contest, the enemy was repulsed in the most gallant manner, and pursued in his retreat to Buffalo, where he attempted to make a stand, but on receiving a few rounds from the British pieces he abandoned that post also, and fled with precipitation to the 11 mile creek on Lake Erie, leaving 7 field pieces, and four schooners and sloops with a considerable quantity of ordnance and other valuable stores, which have fallen into our hands. The enemy suffered severely, but from the rapidity of his flight, 79 prisoners only are taken, among whom is Doctor or lieut. col. Chapin.

The corps under Maj. Gen. Niell consisted of detachments from the Royal Scots 21st (or King's) 41st, and the flank companies, of the 89th and 100th regiments, the whole not exceeding one thousand men.

The Lieut. General bestows the highest praise upon the undaunted courage, and patient submission of the troops, in contempt of the inclemency of the weather, and the hardships to which they were exposed.

No British officer has fallen on this occasion; lieutenant Ogilvie, 8th (or king's) and captain Fawcett, 100th grenadiers, were wounded, and it is supposed our loss does not exceed 25 killed, and 50 wounded.

Black Rock and Buffalo were burnt previous to their evacuation by our troops, together with all the public buildings and the four vessels. A considerable quantity of stores having been sent away before the conflagration.

EDWARD BAYNES, Adj. Gen. N. A.
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Head-quarters, Quebec, 9th Jan. 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.—His excellency the governor in chief and commander of the forces, has received from col. sir Sidney Beckwith, a report from captain Barker, of the frontier light infantry, stating the complete success of an expedition committed to the charge of that officer, against the enemy's post and depots at Derby, in the state of Vermont, which was taken possession of at day-break on the 17th Dec.—An extensive barracks for 1200 men, lately erected, was destroyed, together with the stables and store houses; and a considerable quantity of valuable military stores, have been brought away.

Capt. Barker mentions capt. Curtis and Taplin; lieuts. Messa and Bolwell, and ensign Boyntan, of the township battalions of militia, as having been most active with the volunteers of the militia, in the execution of this judicious and spirited enterprise.

EDWARD BAYNES, Adj. Gen. N. A.
CANADIAN LEGISLATURE.

January 13, 1814.—This day a session of the legislature commenced, when his excellency governor Prevost, addressed them in a speech, from which the following paragraphs are extracted:

"In turning our eyes to our shores, we have abundant cause for gratitude to the Supreme Giver of all good, for the termination of the late campaign in a manner so glorious to the British arms, and so disastrous to those of the enemy.

"The defeat sustained by him on the Chateaugay, where a handful of brave Canadians, repelled a powerful division of his army, and the brilliant victory obtained by a small corps of observation on the banks of the St. Lawrence, over the formidable armament commanded by major-general Wilkinson, have at the same time nobly upheld the honor of his majesty's arms, and effectually disconcerted all the plans of the enemy for the invasion of this Province.

It is also matter of further and sincere gratulation, that, notwithstanding the various events of the last summer, by which a footing was gained by the enemy in the upper province, they have since been compelled to abandon the greater part of it, and that the theatre of war has been transferred into their own territory, where Niagara their strongest fortress and the important posts of Black Rock and Buffalo have lately been wrested from them by British valor and enterprise.

In reviewing these events I cannot but contemplate with pride and satisfaction, the zealous discharge of duty which I have witnessed as well in the militia as in all classes of his majesty's subjects in this province, and which I consider the surest indication of their loyalty to their sovereign and of their determination to defend to the last extremity, this valuable portion of the dominions.

I shall direct to be laid before you, a statement of the provincial revenue of the crown, and of the expeniture of the last twelve months.

One of the measures adopted by you during the last session for supplying the exigencies of the public service has early lately come into operation, and as it promises to become a highly productive source of revenue, I confidently rely upon your liberality for such appropriations for the defence of the province as the nature of the contest in which we are engaged and the circumstances of times may require.

Notwithstanding the present favorable aspect of our affairs, and the security in which the province is now placed, from the discomfiture of the enemy's late attempt to invade it, we must still be prepared to meet with firmness, and to repel with vigor, whatever measures his presumption may again dictate for the accomplishment of his avowed object. I trust therefore, to your wisdom and vigilance to suggest, whatever may be necessary for this purpose, and to your loyalty and patriotism to submit to whatever further sacrifices the war may require, assuring you that his majesty's government, not unmindful of the exertions the province has hitherto made in its defence, is using every possible effort, consistent with the important demands upon it for other services, to strengthen and increase the military establishment under my command.

"Deeply sensible, that the situation in which I am placed, is as arduous and difficult as it is important—I am, notwithstanding, cheered and animated in the discharge of its duties, by the conviction that I shall always meet with your support, in maintaining the honor, and promoting the service of my sovereign. To forward the prosperity, and to preserve the integrity of this province, are objects of which I shall never lose sight, and confidently relying on your cordial assistance for their attainment, it will be my great ambition to be able faithfully to represent to his royal highness the prince regent, the loyalty, zeal, unanimity of his majesty's Canadian subjects, and to carry with me, whenever I shall return into the royal presence, the good opinion and the affection of the people of this province."

MILITARY.

A company of Rangers, 110 hardy fellows, passed through Urbana, O. Feb. 7, on their way to Detroit. Col. Croghan has also gone on to that post.

Jackson's victory.—The following very interesting intelligence was received at this office, (says the Georgia Journal) by express from fort Hawkins, on Saturday night last. In a letter to gov. Early on this occasion, general Pinkney thus notices the gallant conduct of general Jackson and his brave associates:

"This new instance of the intelligent bravery and good conduct of this officer, and of the courage and patriotism of the volunteers under his command, is highly gratifying, and does them infinite honor. It is very probable this diversion prevented the Oakfuskees from uniting with those collected at Hoshit-le-wau-le in their attack on general Floyd; and we were much favored by its having so occurred, that what was intended as a general diversion was timed with as much accuracy as if the most recent preconcerted dispositions had been made."

A late Buttaria paper says that about 2500 men of general Hall's division had rendezvoused at that place and marched to the frontier. The whole force on the Niagara lines, well provided with arms, &c. is said to exceed 4000 effective men.

Plattsburg, February 12, 1814.

The news. During the last week, immense quantities of military stores, &c. have arrived at this place from French Mills. It is understood that several regiments have marched for Sackett's Harbor, and that the main body of the army will be located at this place, after the public property shall have been removed from French Mills.

The "Virginia regiment," respecting which such exaggerated statements have been published, consisted, when it joined the army last fall, of about 550—instead of 800. And now consists of about 400. The statement, therefore, of 600 having been swept away by a destructive malady, &c. is nearly 450 from the truth.

Copy of a letter from general Jackson, of the Tennessee volunteers to general Pinckney.

Head-Quarters, Fort Strother, Jan. 29.

Maj. Gen. Thos. Pinckney,

Sir, I had the honor of informing you in a letter of the 31st ult. forwarded by Mr. McCandles [express] of an excursion I contemplated making still further into the enemy's country, with the new raised volunteers from Tennessee. I had ordered those troops to form a junction with me on the 10th inst. but they did not arrive until the 14th. Their number, including officers, was about 800; and on the 15th I marched them across the river to graze their horses. On the next day I followed with the remainder of my force, consisting of the artillery company, with one 6 pounder, one company of infantry of 48 men, two companies of spies, commanded by captains Gordon and Russel, of about 30 men each, and a company of volunteer officers, headed by general Coffee, who had been abandoned by his men, and who still remained in the field awaiting the order of the government; making my force exclusive of indians, 930.

The motives which influenced me to penetrate still further into the enemy's country, with this force, were many and urgent. The term of service of the new raised volunteers was short, and a considerable part of it was expired: they were expensive to the government, and were full of ardor to meet the enemy. The ill effects of keeping soldiers of this description long stationary and idle, I had been made to feel but too sensible already—other causes concurred to make such a movement not only justifiable but absolutely necessary. I had received a letter from captain McAlpin of the 5th instant, who commanded at Fort Armstrong in the absence of colonel Snodgrass, informing me that 14 or 15 towns of the enemy, situated on the waters of the Tallapoosa, were about uniting their forces and attacking that place, which had been left in a very feeble state of defence. You had in your letter of the 24th ult. informed me that general Floyd was about to make a movement to the Tallapoosa near its junction with the Coossee; and in the same letter had recommended temporary excursions against such of the enemy's towns or settlements as might be within striking distance, as well to prevent my men from becoming discontented as to harass the enemy. Your ideas corresponded exactly with my own, and I was happy in the opportunity of keeping my men engaged, distressing the enemy, and at the same time making a diversion to facilitate the operations of general Floyd.

Determined by these and other considerations, I took up the line of march on the 17th inst. and on the night of the 18th encamped at Talledega Fort, where I was joined by between 2 and 300 friendly indians: 65 of whom were Cherokees, the balance Creeks. Here I received your letter of the 9th inst. stating that general Floyd was expected to make a movement from Cowetau the next day, and that in 15 days thereafter he would establish a firm position at Tuckabochee; and also a letter from colonel Snodgrass, who had returned to Fort Armstrong, informing me that an attack was intended soon to be made on that Fort by 900 of the enemy. If I could have hesitated before, I could now hesitate no longer. I resolved to lose no time in meeting this force, which was understood to have been collected from New Yorcau, Oakfuskee and Ufauley towns, and were concentrated in the bend of the Tallapoosa, near the mouth of the creek called Emuckau, on an island below New Yorcau.

On the morning of the 29th your letter of the 10th inst. forwarded by Mr. McCandles, reached me at the Hillabee Creek, and that night I encamped at Entochapco, a small Hillabee village about twelve miles from Emuckau. Here I began to perceive very plainly how little knowledge my spies had of the country, of the situation of the enemy, or of the distance I was from them. The insubordination of the new troops and the want of skill in most of their officers; also became more and more apparent. But their ardor to meet the enemy was not diminished; and I had a sure reliance upon the guards; and a company of old volunteer officers, and upon the spies, in all about 125. My wishes and my duty remained united, and I was determined to effect, if possible, the objects for which the excursion had been principally undertaken.

On the morning of the 21st, I marched from Entochapco, as direct as I could for the bend of the Tallapoosa, and about 2 o'clock, P. M. my spies having discovered two of the enemy, endeavored to catch them but failed. In the evening I fell in upon a large trail, which led to a new road, much beaten and lately travelled. Knowing that I must have arrived within the neighborhood of a strong force, and it being late in the day, I determined to encamp, and reconnoitre the country in the night. I chose the best scite the country would admit, encamped in a hollow square, sent out my spies and picquets, doubled my centinels and made the necessary arrangements before dark, for a night attack. About 10 o'clock at night, one of the pickets fired at three of the enemy and killed one, but he was not found until the next day. At 11 o'clock, the spies whom I had sent out returned with the information, that there were a large encampment of indians at the distance of about three miles, who from their whooping and dancing seemed to be apprized of our approach. One of these spies, an Indian in whom I had great confidence, assured me that they were carrying off their women and children, and that the warriors would either make their escape or attack me before day. Being prepared at all points, nothing remained to be done but await their approach, if they meditated an attack, or to be in readiness, if they did not, to pursue and attack them at day light. While we were in this state of readiness, the enemy about 6 o'clock in the morning commenced a vigorous attack on my left flank, which was vigorously met; the action continued to rage on my left flank, and on the left of my rear for about half an hour. The brave general Coffee, with colonel Sittler, the adjutant-general, and colonel Carroll, the inspector-general, the moment the firing commenced, mounted their horses and repaired to the line, encouraging and animating the men to the performance of their duty. So soon as it became light enough to pursue, the left wing having sustained the heat of the action and being somewhat weakened, was reinforced by captain Ferrill's company of infantry, and was ordered and led on to the charge by general Coffee, who was well supported by colonel Higgins and the and the inspector-general, and by all the officers and privates who composed that line. The enemy was completely routed at every point, and the friendly indians joining in the pursuit, they were chased about two miles with great slaughter.

The chase being over, I immediately detached general Coffee with 400 men and all the indian force to burn their encampment; but it was said by some to be fortified. I ordered him, in that event, not to attack it, until the artillery could be sent forward to reduce it. On viewing the encampment and its strength, the general thought it most prudent to return to my encampment and guard the artillery thither. The wisdom of this step was soon discovered—in half an hour after his return to camp, a considerable force of the enemy made its appearance on my right flank, and commenced a brisk fire on a party of men who had been on picket guard the night before, and were then in search of the indians they had fired upon, some of whom they believe had been killed. General Coffee immediately requested me to let him take 200 men and turn their left flank, which I accordingly ordered; but, through some mistake, which I did not then observe, not more than fifty-four followed him, among whom were the old volunteer officers. With these, however, he immediately commenced an attack on the left flank of the enemy; at which time I ordered 200 of the friendly indians to fall in upon the right flank of the enemy, and co-operate with the general. This order was promptly obeyed, and in the moment of its execution what I expected was realized. The enemy had intended the attack on the right as a feint, and, expecting to direct all my attention thither, meant to attack me again and with their main force on the left flank, which they had hoped to find weakened and in disorder—they were disappointed. I had ordered the left flank to remain firm to its place, and the moment the alarm gun was heard in that quarter, I repaired thither, and ordered captain Ferrill, part of my reserve, to support it. The whole line met the approach of the enemy with astonishing intrepidity, and having given a few fires, they forthwith charged with great vigor—The effect was immediate and inevitable. The enemy fled with precipitation, and were pursued to a considerable distance, by the left flank and the friendly indians, with a galling and destructive fire. Colonel Carroll, who ordered the charge, led on the pursuit, and colonel Higgins and his regiment again distinguished themselves.

In the mean time general Coffee was contending with a superior force of the enemy. The indians who I had ordered to his support, and who had set out for the purpose, hearing the firing on the left had returned to that quarter, and when the enemy were routed there entered into the chase. That being now over, I forthwith ordered Jim File, who was one of the principal commanders of the friendly Creeks, with one hundred of his warriors, to execute my first order; so soon as he reached general Coffee, the charge was made and the enemy routed: they were pursued about three miles, and forty-five of them slain, who were found. General Coffee was wounded in the body, and his aid-de-camp, A. Donaldson, killed, together with three others. Having brought in and buried the dead, and dressed the wounded, I ordered my camp to be fortified, to be the better prepared to repel any attack which might be made in the night; determined to commence a return march to fort Strother the following day. Many causes concurred to make such a measure necessary, as I had not set out prepared or with a view to make a permanent establishment, I considered it worse than useless to advance and destroy an empty encampment.

I had indeed, hoped to have met the enemy there, but having met and beaten them a little sooner, I did not think it necessary or prudent to proceed any further: not necessary, because I had accomplished all I could expect to effect by marching to their encampment; and because if it was proper to contend with and weaken their forces still farther, this object would be more certainly attained by commencing a return, which, having to them the appearance of a retreat, would inspire them to pursue me. Not prudent, because of the number of my wounded; of the reinforcements from below, which the enemy might be expected to receive; of the starving condition of my horses, they having had neither corn nor cane for two days and nights; of the scarcity of supplies for my men, the indians who joined me at Taledaga having drawn none, and being wholly destitute; and because, if the enemy pursued me, as it was likely they would, the diversion in favor of general Floyd would be the more complete and effectual. Influenced by these considerations, I commenced my return march at half after ten on the 23d, and was fortunate enough to reach Enotchopco before night, having passed without interruption a dangerous defile, occasioned by a hurricane. I again fortified my camp, and having another defile to pass in the morning, across a deep creek, and between two hills, which I had viewed with attention as I passed on, and where I expected I might be attacked, I determined to pass it at another point, and gave directions to my guide and fatigue men accordingly. My expectation of an attack in the morning was increased by the signs of the night, and with it my caution. Before I moved the wounded from the interior of my camp, I had my front and rear guards formed, as well as my right and left columns, and moved off my centre in regular order, leading down a handsome ridge to Enotchopco creek, at a point where it was clear of reed, except immediately on its margin. I had previously issued a general order, pointing out the manner in which the men should be formed in the event of an attack on the front or rear, or on the flanks, and had particularly cautioned the officers to halt and form accordingly, the instant the word should be given.

The front guard had crossed with part of the flank columns, the wounded were over, and the artillery in the act of entering the creek, when an alarm gun was heard in the rear. I heard it without surprise, and even with pleasure, calculating with the utmost confidence on the firmness of my troops, from the manner in which I had seen them act on the 22d. I had placed colonel Carroll at the head of the centre column of the rear guard: its right column was commanded by colonel Perkins, and its left by colonel Stump. Having chosen the ground, I expected there to have entirely cut off the enemy by wheeling the right and left columns on their pivots, recrossing the creek above and below, and falling in upon their flanks and rear. But to my astonishment and mortification, when the word was given by col. Carroll to halt and form, and a few guns had been fired, I beheld the right and left columns of the rear guard precipitately give way. This shameful retreat was disastrous in the extreme: it drew along with it the greater part of the centre column, leaving not more than twenty-five men, who being formed by colonel Carroll, maintained their ground as long as it was possible to maintain it, and it brought consternation and confusion into the centre of the army, a consternation which was not easily removed, and a confusion which could not soon be restored to order. There was then left to repulse the enemy, the few who remained of the rear guard, the artillery company and captain Russell's company of spies. They however realized and exceeded my highest expectations. Lieutenant Armstrong, who commanded the artillery company in the absence of captain Deadrick, (confined by sickness) ordered them to form and advanced to the top of the hill, whilst he and a few others dragged up the six pounder. Never was more bravery displayed than on this occasion. Amidst the most galling fire from the enemy, more than ten times their number, they ascended the hill and maintained their position until their piece was hauled up, when, having levelled it, they poured upon the enemy a fire of grape, reloaded and fired again, charged and repulsed them.

The most deliberate bravery was displayed by Constantine Perkins and Craven Jackson of the artillery, acting as gunners. In the hurry of the moment, in separating the gun from the limbers, the rammer and picker of the cannon were left tied to the limber: No sooner was this discovered, than Jackson, amidst the galling fire of the enemy, pulled out the ramrod of his musket and used it as a picker; primed with a cartridge and fired the cannon. Perkins having pulled off his bayonet, used his musket as a rammer, drove down the cartridge; and Jackson using his former plan, again discharged her. The brave lieutenant Armstrong, just after the first fire of the cannon, with capt. Hamilton, of E. Tennessee, Bradford and McGovock, all fell, the lieutenant exclaiming as he lay, "my brave fellows, some of you may fall, but you must save the cannon." About this time, a number crossed the creek and entered into the chase. The brave capt. Gordon of the spies, who had rushed from the front, endeavored to turn the left flank of the enemy, in which he partially succeeded, and col. Carroll, col. Higgins, and capt. Elliot and Perkins pursued the enemy for more than two miles, who fled in consternation throwing away their packs and leaving 26 of their warriors dead on the field. This last defeat was decisive, and we were no more disturbed by their yells. I should do injustice to my feelings if I omitted to mention that the venerable judge Coker, at the age of 65, entered into the engagement, continued the pursuit of the enemy with youthful ardor, and saved the life of a fellow soldier by killing his savage antagonist.

Our loss in this affair was — killed and wounded; among the former was the brave capt. Hamilton, from East Tennessee, who had with his aged father and two others of his company, after the period of his engagement had expired, volunteered his services for this excursion, and attached himself to the artillery company. No man ever fought more bravely or died more gloriously; and by his side fell with equal bravery and glory, Bird Evans, of the same company. Captain Quarles, who commanded the centre column of the rear guard, preferring death to the abandonment of his post, having taken a firm stand in which he was followed by 25 of his men, received a wound in his head of which he has since died.

In these several engagements our loss was 20 killed and 75 wounded, 4 of whom have since died.— The loss of the enemy cannot be accurately ascertained; 189 of their warriors were found dead; but this must fall considerably short of the number really killed. Their wounded can only be guessed at.

Had it not been for the unfortunate retreat of the rear guard in the affair of the 24th inst. I think I could safely have said that no army of militia ever acted with more cool and deliberate bravery; undisciplined and inexperienced as they were, their conduct in the several engagements of the 22d could not have been surpassed by regulars. No men ever met the approach of an enemy with more intrepidity, or repulsed them with more energy. On the 24th, after the retreat of the rear guard, they seemed to have lost all their collectedness, and were more difficult to be restored to order than any troops I have ever seen. But this was no doubt owing to a great measure or altogether to that very retreat, and ought rather to be ascribed to the want of conduct in many of their officers than to any cowardice in the men, who on every occasion have manifested a willingness to perform their duty so far as they know it.

All the effects which were designed to be produced by this excursion, it is believed have been produced. If an attack was meditated against fort Armstrong, that has been prevented. If general Floyd is operating on the east side of the Tallapoossee, as I suppose him to be, a most fortunate diversion has been made in his favor. The number of the enemy has been diminished, and the confidence they may have derived from the delays I have been made to experience, has been destroyed. Discontent has been kept out of my army, while the troops who would have been exposed to it have been beneficially employed. The enemy's country has been explored, and a road cut to the point where their force will probably be concentrated when they shall be driven from the country below. But in a report of this kind, and to you who will immediately perceive them, it is not necessary to state the happy consequences which may be expected to result from this excursion. Unless I am greatly mistaken, it will be found to have hastened the termination of the Creek war, more than any measure I could have taken with the troops under my command.

I am, sir, with sentiments of high respect your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON, maj. gen.

NAVAL.

The President frigate com. Rodgers, has arrived at New-York, after a cruise of 70 days. We have not yet received particulars; but it is said she captured only three vessels.

A court-martial was lately held at Portsmouth, N. H. for the trial of William Harper, sailing-master in the United States navy, charged with cowardice in the action between the Enterprise and Boxer. He was acquitted in the most honorable manner. Captain Hull was president.

A New-York paper says—The extracts from London papers and Lloyd's lists, received by the Ann Alexander, furnish us for the last six weeks, up to the 24th of December, with the capture of ninety-six British merchant vessels, by American and French public and private armed vessels.

Five vessels arrived at Philadelphia from foreign places on the 21st. One was a Swede, from Stockholm, and three of the others belonged to Baltimore.

The Adams.—A vessel arrived at Salem on the 17th inst. that was boarded from the United States frigate Adams, capt. Morris, 21 days before, then 14 days out, off Bermuda. Captain M. sent letters to the secretary of the navy by this vessel.

The famous privateer Decatur has returned to Charleston, S. C. after a cruise of eighty days without making a single capture.

Commodore Chauncy, with 100 seamen, left New-York, on the 15th inst. for Sackett's Harbor. For which place, also, a number of long 32-pounders were forwarded a few days before.

The report that the British are building war vessels on Lake Haroon, is contradicted. Mitchilmakinac is yet held by the British. Dickson, the famous scalp dealer, is among the distant Indians to persuade them to join the British armies near Monroville. All snug at Detroit.

Extract of a letter from Nathaniel Shaler, commander of the private armed schooner Gov. Tomkins, to his agent in New-York—dated

"At Sea, Jan 1, 1813."

"Two days after dispatching the Nereid, I took a whaler from London bound for the South Seas; but she being of no value, I took out such stores, &c. I could stow, and being much lumbered with prisoners and baggage, I put them on board, and ordered her for Edinburgh. The chasing of this ship had taken me some distance from my ground, and owing to calms, I could not regain it until the 25th ult. when at sunrise, three ships were discovered ahead. We made all sail in chase. The wind being light, we came slowly up with them. On a nearer approach, they proved to be two ships and a brig.—One of the ships had all the appearance of a large transport, and from their manœuvres, to have concerted measures for mutual defence. The large ship appeared to be prepared to take the bulk of an action. Boats were seen passing to and from her. She had boarding nettings almost up to her tops, with her topmast studding sail booms out, and sails at their ends, ready for running, as if prepared for a running fight. Her ports appeared to be painted, and she had something on deck resembling a merchantman's boat. After all this, what the devil do you think she was? Why have a little patience, and I will tell you. At 3 p. m. a sudden squall struck us from the northward, and the ship not having yet received, before I could get our light sails in, and almost before I could turn round, I was under the guns, (not of a transport) but of a large frigate!—and not more than a quarter of a mile from her.

I immediately hauled down English colors, which I previously had up, set three American ensigns, trimmed our sails by the wind, and commenced a brisk fire from our little battery; but this was returned with woful interest. Her first broadside killed two men and wounded six others (two of whom severely, and one since dead)—it also blew up one of my sub-boxes with two 9-pound cartridges; this communicated fire to a number of pistols, and three tube boxes which were lying on the companion way, all of which exploded, and some of the tubes penetrated through a crevice under the companion leaf, and found their way to the cabin floor; but that being wet, and the fire screen being up, no further accident took place. This, together with the fire from the frigate, I assure you, made warm work on the Tompkins' quarter deck; but thanks to her heels and the exertions of my brave officers and crew, I still have the command of her.

When the frigate opened her fire on me, it was about half past 3. I was then a little abaft her beam. To have attempted to tack in a hard squall, would, at least have exposed me to a raking fire; and, to have attempted it, and miss, would have been attended with the inevitable loss of the schooner.—I therefore thought it most prudent to take her fire on the tack on which I was, and this I was exposed to from the position I have mentioned, until I passed her bow; she all the while standing on with me, and almost as fast as ourselves—and such a time as was played round my ears, I assure you, I never wish to hear again on the same key.

At four his shot began to fall short of us. At 4, 19, the wind dying away and the enemy still holding in, his ship began to reach us. We got out sweeps and turned all hands to. I also threw all the lumber from the deck, and about 2000 wt. of shot from the after hold. From about 5 p. m. all his shot fell short of us. At 5, 25, the enemy bore about, and I was glad to get so clear of one of the most quarrelsome companions that I ever met with.

After the first broadside from the frigate, not a shot struck the hull of the Tompkins, but the water was intended in a foam all around her.

The moment before the squall struck us, I told Mr. Farnum that she was too heavy for us, and he went forward with his glass to take another look; when the squall struck the schooner as if by magic, up with her, before we could get in our light sails.

My officers conducted themselves in way that would have done honor to a more permanent service. Mr. Farnum, 1st lieutenant, conducted himself with his usual vigor. Mr. Atcheson, sailing master, performed his part in the style of a brave and accomplished seaman. Messrs. Miller and Dodd, 2nd and 3d lieutenants, were not immediately under my eye, but the precision and promptitude with which all my orders were executed is sufficient proof that they are to be relied on. Mr. Thomas, boatswain, and Mr. Casewell, master's mate, were particularly active and deserve encouragement.

The name of one of my poor fellows who was killed ought to be registered in the book of fame, and remembered with reverence as long as bravery is considered a virtue; he was a black man by the name of John Johnson; a 24 lb. shot struck him in the hip and took away all the lower part of his body; in this state the poor brave fellow lay on the deck, and several times exclaimed to his shipmates, "fire away my boy, no haul a color down!" The other was also a black man, by the name of John Davis, and was struck in much the same way: he fell near me, and several times requested to be thrown overboard, saying, he was only in the way of others.

While America has such tars, she has little to fear from the tyrants of the ocean.

From the circumstance of her shot being 24's, which I assure you is the case, and as we have felt and weighed them, I am of opinion that it was the Laurel, a new frigate which I had information of. A gentleman which I took, told me she was in the fleet; that she was built and manned for the purpose to cope with our frigates; that if she got sight of me she would certainly take me, as she was the fastest sailer he ever saw.

Enclosed I send you a list of the killed and wounded; in every thing else we are in good order and high spirits.

Killed—John Johnson, John Davis.

Wounded—John O'Farnum, 1st lieutenant, slightly; Thomas Davis, since dead; Thomas Loveland, severely; James Doughty, John Parker, John Sunaholm, all slightly and doing well.

American Prizes.

"The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
"And not a sail, but by permission spreads!"
British Naval Register.

792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800. Nine vessels captured by the Comet, of Baltimore, divested of their valuable articles, and sunk. The Comet is stated to have a handsome amount in cash and rich goods on board. Besides the above, she captured and manned four prizes—one of which has arrived. She had a terrible battle with the ship Hibernia of 800 tons, 22 guns and a large complement of men, but was beaten off. The fight lasted about 8 hours. The great height and strength of the ship probably saved her. The privateer had 3 men killed and 16 wounded. The ship S killed and 13 wounded. The Comet put into Porto Rico to rest, and the Hibernia has arrived at St. Thomas—both much injured.

801. Brig Tuftock, of 200 tons, 10 guns, from Shields, for Martinique, with an assorted cargo of hardware, crates, tiles, &c.—valuable—sent into Gloucester by the Fox of Salem.

802. The rich ship Minerva, with a cargo of dry goods, hardware, &c. from Bristol (E.) for the West Indies, captured by the Fox of Salem, and sent into Portsmouth, N. H.

803. Ship ———, a whaler, bound to the South Sea, captured by the Governor Tompkins, divested, &c. and given up to relieve the prisoners.

804. Brig Isabella, captured by the U. S. brig Rattlesnake, and sent into Wilmington, N. C.

805. Sloop ———, captured the General Stark, and was cast away on Cape Cod.

806. Schooner Harmony, of Yarmouth, (N. S.) with a few puncheons of rum, captured by the privateer boat Terrible, of Salem, and sent into an eastern port.

807. Boat Humbird, with a quantity of crockery, rum, sugar, &c. taken by the boat Supprize, and sent into Machias.

Proceedings of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, February 17.—The loan bill was further discussed. Mr. Jackson, of Va. spoke three hours in favor of the bill, and Mr. Shepherd, of N. Y. commenced a speech against it.—Adjourned.

Friday, February 18.—Mr. Richardson, of Mass. laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be directed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of admirals in the navy of the United States?

The consideration of the loan bill was resumed. Mr. Shepherd finished his speech. He was followed by Mr. Sherwood, of N. Y. on the same side. Mr. Grundy spoke an hour in favor of the bill, and Mr. Gaston, of N. C. commenced a discussion against it. Adjourned.

[The debate, (not on the loan bill, but suffered while the bill was before a committee of the whole of the house of representatives,) has had an unlimited range. Every question of politics that has agitated the United States for fifteen or twenty years past, and every one that may be expected for twenty years to come, appears to have been embodied in the speeches of the members; some of whom, it is said, have spoken three hours, without mentioning the bill at all. It is accurately calculated, and the fact is so, that these speeches cost the good people of the United States at the rate of two hundred and fifty dollars an hour; and the question is asked "were they worth the cost?"]

Saturday, February 19.—Mr. Roberts, of Pa. presented a petition of John G. Cimow, acting in behalf of the missionary concerns of the society of the united brethren commonly called Moravians, praying compensation for depredations committed on the property of the indians who had incorporated themselves into their society by the army commanded by general Harrison at the Moravian towns in upper Canada.

Mr. Roberts moved to refer the petition to a select committee.

Mr. Desha said that to his knowledge several indians of the tribe alluded to had been killed in arms against the United States. It was true the town had been destroyed, and, as he thought, properly. They had always been hostile. Mr. Roberts observed that he knew nothing of the merits of the case. Mr. McKim, after passing a high encomium on the United Brethren, as a generally most offensive and well disposed people, said the property was within the settlements of the enemy, and destroyed according to the usages of war. He said he had not yet heard that any of the proprietors of our villages destroyed had petitioned the British parliament for remuneration. It was probable a mutual indemnity might be provided. The petition was referred to a select committee.

Mr. Taylor, of N. Y. from the committee of ways and means, reported the bill to incorporate the stockholders of the national bank.

[This bill proposes the establishment of a bank with a capital of thirty millions of dollars, in the city of Washington, and names a number of persons, to act as directors until others are appointed.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. Lowndes, of S. C. reported a bill to authorise the president to cause to be built or purchased the vessels therein described.

[The bill contemplates the employment or building of any number of vessels, not exceeding twenty, carrying not less than 16, nor more than 22 guns, if in his opinion the public service shall require it.]

This bill was also twice read and committed.

The house again in committee of the whole took up the loan bill. Mr. Gaston concluded his speech. He was followed by Mr. McLean, of Ohio. The question was then taken and the blank filled up with twenty-five millions. The same was reported to the house.

Monday, February 21.—Mr. Eppes, of Va. from the committee of ways and means, reported the following bills: A bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1814; a bill making appropriations for the support of the military establishment for the year 1814; and a bill making appropriations for the support of the navy for 1814; which bills were twice read and committed.

The house took up the report of the committee of the whole on the loan bill—which on motion was recommitted, with a view to allow further discussion. Mr. Yancey then spoke in favor of the bill and Mr. Grosvenor against it.

Tuesday, February 23.—The engrossed bill to authorise the issuing of treasury notes for the year 1814, was passed as follows:

THE CHRONICLE.

Among the captures lately made by the French privateers who have become very numerous and active in consequence of our successes at sea, a British vessel has been brought into Ajaccio, captured on the coast of Africa, with a cargo of ancient staves, &c. valued at 550,000 francs.

The senators and representatives from New Castle county, in the state of Delaware, have unanimously seceded from the legislature of that state for reasons which they promise to make public hereafter.

Tire.—One of the extensive workshops belonging to the Penitentiary, adjacent to Baltimore, was consumed by fire, on Wednesday evening last. By the prompt aid of the citizens, the other buildings were preserved. None of the criminals escaped. The fire commenced in the oakum loft. The frequency of the destruction of public buildings from that place of deposit, should teach those having charge of such institutions never to leave large quantities of the material in a body. I believe it is an accepted fact, that oakum, from grease or tallow mixed with it, is capable of self-ignition. I think I recollect to have read an account of some experiments made, several years ago, that demonstrated the truth of this principle. It would be well to republish it occasionally.

Spain and England.—Spain being cleared of the French, has yet to expel the English. The Spanish newspapers freely speak of the barbarities and outrages of their "dear allies," in a manner that shews the press much freer than we expected it was. A Cádiz gazette of the 27th September, has a long article detailing the monstrous proceedings of the British on the people of St. Sebastian's, after the fall of that place; ravishment, murder and conflagration was the order of the day. The churches were robbed, the "hosts" dashed on the ground and trod under foot, and the priests beaten. The place was destroyed, the author decidedly declares, because its former commerce had been injurious to the commerce of Great Britain; for the inhabitants had been remarkable for their adherence to "the cause of liberty." It is a tale of horror. The city was generally plundered—"neither the infant of ten years of age nor the matron of sixty was exempt from the brutal violence" of the English—"the woman who resisted paid the forfeit of her life"—"the houses were filled with dead bodies," and "numbers of the martyrs to virtue were burned to death."

British revenue.—An official account laid before the house of commons, states the amount of the net produce of the permanent taxes in Great Britain for the year ending the 25th of October, 1812, at 33,740,428*l*. 16*s*. 8*d*. 4*d*.; and for the year ending the 25th of Oct. 1813, at 37,853,366*l*. 12*s*. 1*l*. 2*d*.; being a deficiency of about 990,000*l*. The same accounts states the total amount of the net produce of the war taxes, for the year, ending the 25th January, 1812, at 24,822,532*l*. 14*s*. 10*l*. 4*d*. and for the year ending the 25th Oct. 1813, at 22,740,568*l*. 4*s*. 0*l*. 2*d*.; being an increase to about the amount of the deficiency in the permanent taxes. Thus the net produce of the public revenue of Great Britain, for the year ending the 25th Oct. 1813, is 63,573,934*l*. 16*s*. 2*d*.

FROM THE NEW-LONDON GAZETTE.

The right to challenge.—Some doubts seem to have existed, if considerable anxiety has not been excited in the public mind as to the right of commodore Decatur to challenge the Endymion and Statira to combat. Our friend, the benevolent editor of the Philadelphia Daily Advertiser, has not only indulged himself in harsh reproof of the commodore, but has lavished his commendation on sir Thomas Hardy for having declined the challenge, as deserving the applause of all good men. We have a respect for sir Thomas, that induces us to regret that he should not be deserving of this praise, for a course of conduct we feel assured cannot be approved by any gallant man. Sir Thomas Hardy, not only provoked the commodore's challenge, but on receiving it said, he should leave it to the acceptance of his captain.

We agree, however, with Mr. Poulson, that this fighting a match would be an unpleasant business; but we know there are a thousand gallant spirits in our little navy who not only like it, but are educated to believe that it is their unequivocal duty to seek such, and all other occasions to enhance the character of our flag, to increase our naval renown, and to secure to themselves the admiration and love of their countrymen. And we have no hesitation in admitting, that we believe they are in this respect properly taught.

We do not perceive much force in the objection, that men are thus brought into conflict, who if left to chance might never be opposed. We are a little cautious in admitting the operation of any such power as chance, and we can see no difference between a man's spending months in pursuit of an enemy in the hope to encounter his equal (with the probability of meeting and contending with a superior) either as it affects the exposure of his own life, or the lives of his officers and men, and his meeting an opportunity where it is certain he will be only equally exposed.

Men who have spent their lives in qualifying themselves to bear arms in their country's service, in consideration of their country having subsisted, supplied and distinguished them, obviously owe to their country a duty not to omit, but to seek every opportunity to render to her their best services in disabling or disgracing the arms of her enemies.

If it be asked what possible advantage could be hoped from the proposed contest? we answer a great national one—victory; and if inquired of, what is the advantage of such a victory? we answer, the enhancing the glory of our flag, the mortification of the overbearing and overbearing pride of our enemy, the accession of confidence to our own people, leading directly to other enterprises and success, and thus inspiring the world with a due respect for our national prowess and skill, THE GREAT PALLADIUM OF OUR COUNTRY'S INDEPENDENCE, AND THE HARBINGER OF A SERIES OF YEARS OF PEACE, PROSPERITY AND HAPPINESS.

Although challenges have taken place between hostile fleets and armies, and single ships and individuals, in all ages, ancient and modern, barbarous and civilized, we take great pleasure in assuring friend Poulson, there is not in the record of any country or age, and under no circumstances national or individual, an instance so completely justifiable as to the motive, and so honorable and fair in its terms, as this of commodore Decatur's to Sir Thomas Hardy.

With regard to the motive, we think enough may have already been said, but as to the terms, we repeat, and wish it may again and again be repeated, that the British declined a combat with our countrymen, frigates to frigates, notwithstanding they were allowed to man their ships with what numbers they pleased, and select their men from the crews of a line of battle ship and a sloop of war, and it was agreed on our part that the armaments should be precisely equal.

We hope it will forever suppress that disgraceful spirit of cavil, that sought to measure the pillar of our naval renown, by a two foot rule, and would deduct from the pyramids of glory which our commanders have erected to themselves the difference in the breadth of beam betwixt ours and the enemy's frigates.

ERRATA.—We seem unfortunate in making errors in the ADDENDA, owing perhaps to the hurry attending their publication. In page 14 of the Addenda that accompanies this No. second column, the second line from the top was left out—it should read, "by the sweet reward of riches and honor, would make many improvements in agriculture and art, which would," &c.

SUPPLEMENT TO VOLUME FIVE.

Commodore Decatur.

FROM THE ANALECTIC MAGAZINE.

Commodore Stephen Decatur is of French descent, by the male line. His grandfather was a native of La Rochelle, in France, and married a lady of Rhode Island. His father, Stephen Decatur, was born in Newport (Rhode Island,) and when a very young man removed to Philadelphia, where he married the daughter of an Irish gentleman by the name of Pine. He was bred to the sea, and commanded a merchant vessel out of the port of Philadelphia until the establishment of the navy, when he was appointed to command the Delaware sloop of war. He continued in her until the frigate Philadelphia was built, when the command of that ship was given to him, at the particular request of the merchants who had built her by subscription. In this situation he remained until peace was made with France, when he resigned his commission, and retired to his residence a few miles from Philadelphia, where he resided until his death, which happened in Nov. 1808.

His son, Stephen Decatur, the present commodore, was born on the 5th Jan. 1779, on the eastern shore of Maryland, whither his parents had retired, whilst the British were in possession of Philadelphia. They returned to that city when he was a few months old, and he was there educated and brought up.

He entered the navy in March, 1798, as midshipman, and joined the frigate United States, under the command of commodore Barry, who had obtained the warrant for him. He continued for some time with that officer, and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. The United States at that time required some repairs, and not wishing to remain in port he requested an order to join the brig Norfolk, then bound to the Spanish main. He performed one cruise in her as first lieutenant, and on his return to port resumed his station on board of the United States where he remained until peace was concluded with France.

He was then ordered to the Essex as first lieutenant, and sailed with commodore Dale's squadron to the Mediterranean. On the return of that squadron he was ordered to the New York, one of the second Mediterranean squadron, under the command of commodore Morris.

When he returned to the United States he was ordered to take command of the Argus, and proceed in her to join commodore Preble's squadron, then in the Mediterranean, and on his arrival there to resign the command of the Argus to lieutenant Hull, and take the schooner Enterprize, then commanded by that officer. After making that exchange he proceeded to Syracuse, where the squadron was to rendezvous. On his arrival at that port he was informed of the fate of the frigate Philadelphia, which had ran aground on the Barbary coast, and fallen into the hands of the Tripolitians. The idea immediately presented itself to his mind of attempting her capture or destruction. On commodore Preble's arrival, a few days afterwards, he proposed to him a plan for the purpose, and volunteered his services to execute it. The wary mind of that veteran officer at first disapproved of an enterprize so full of peril; but the risks and difficulties that surrounded it only stimulated the ardor of Decatur, and imparted to it an air of adventure, fascinating to his youthful imagination.

The consent of the commodore having been obtained, lieutenant Decatur selected for the expedition a ketch (the Intrepid) which he had captured a few weeks before from the enemy, and manned her with seventy volunteers, chiefly from his own crew. He sailed from Syracuse on the 3d Feb. 1804, accompanied by the United States' brig Syren, lieutenant Stewart, who was to aid with his boats, and to receive the crew of the ketch, in case it should be found expedient to use her as a fire-ship.

After fifteen days of very tempestuous weather, they arrived at the harbor of Tripoli a little before sunset. It had been arranged between lieutenants Decatur and Stewart, that the ketch should enter the harbor about 10 o'clock that night, attended by the boats of the Syren. On arriving off the harbor, the Syren, in consequence of a change of wind, had been thrown six or eight miles without the Intrepid. The wind at this time was fair, but fast declining, and lieutenant Decatur apprehended that, should he wait for the Syren's boats to come up, it might be too late to make the attack that night. Such delay might be fatal to the enterprize, as they could not remain longer on the coast, their provisions being nearly exhausted. For these reasons he determined to adventure into the harbor alone, which he did about eight o'clock.

An idea may be formed of the extreme hazard of this enterprize from the situation of the frigate. She was moored within half a mile of the Bashaw's castle, and of the principal battery. Two of the enemy's craizers lay within two cables' length, on the starboard quarter, and their gun-boats within half a gun-shot on the starboard bow. All the guns of the frigate were mounted and loaded. Such were the immediate perils that our hero ventured to encounter with a single ketch, beside the other dangers that abound in a strongly fortified harbor.

Although from the entrance to the place where the frigate lay was only three miles, yet in consequence of the lightness of the wind they did not get within hail of her until eleven o'clock. When they had approached within two hundred yards, they were hailed and ordered to anchor, or they would be fired into. Lieutenant Decatur ordered a Maltese pilot, who was on board the ketch, to answer that they had lost their anchors in a gale of wind on the coast, and therefore could not comply with their request. By this time it had become perfectly calm, and they were about fifty yards from the frigate. Lieutenant Decatur ordered a small boat that was alongside of the ketch, to take a rope and make it fast to the frigate's fore-chains. This being done they began to warp the ketch alongside. It was not until this moment that the enemy suspected the character of their visitor, and great confusion immediately ensued. This enabled our adventurers to get alongside of the frigate, when Decatur immediately sprang aboard, followed by Mr. Charles Morris, midshipman. These two were nearly a minute on the deck before their companions could succeed in mounting the side. Fortunately, the Turks had not sufficiently recovered from their surprize to take advantage of this delay. They were crowded together on the quarter-deck, perfectly astonished and aghast, without making any attempt to oppose the assailing party. As soon as a sufficient number of our men had gained the deck, to form a front equal to that of the enemy, they rushed in upon them. The Turks stood the assault but a short time, and were completely overpowered. About twenty were killed on the spot, many jumped overboard, and the rest fled to the main deck, whither they were pursued and driven to the hold.

After entire possession had been gained of the ship, and every thing prepared to set fire to her, a number of launches were seen rowing about the harbor. This determined lieutenant Decatur to remain in the frigate, from whence a better defence could be made than from on board the ketch. The enemy had already commenced firing upon them from their batteries and castle, and from two corsairs that were lying near. Perceiving that the launches did not attempt to approach the frigate, she was ordered that the ship should be sent to sea, which was done, at the same time, in several parts. As soon as this was completely effected, they left her, and such was the rapidity of the flames, that it was with the utmost difficulty they preserved the ketch. At this critical moment a most propitious breeze sprang up, blowing directly out of the harbor, which, in a few minutes, carried them beyond the reach of the enemy's guns, and they made good their retreat without the loss of a single man, and with but four wounded.

For this gallant and romantic achievement, lieutenant Decatur was promoted to the rank of post captain, there being at that time no intermediate grade. This promotion was particularly gratifying to him, inasmuch as it was done with the consent of the officers over whose heads he was raised.

In the ensuing spring, it being determined to make an attack upon Tripoli, commodore Preble obtained from the king of Naples the loan of six gun-boats and two bombards, which he formed into two divisions, and gave the command of one of them to captain Decatur, the other to lieutenant Somers. The squadron sailed from Syracuse, consisting of the frigate Constitution, the brig Syren, the schooners Nautilus and Vixen, and the gun-boats.

Having arrived on the coast of Barbary, they were for some days prevented from making the attack, by adverse wind and weather; at length, on the morning of the 2d of August, the weather being favorable, the signal was made from the commodore's ship to prepare for action, the light vessels towing the gun-boats to windward. At 9 o'clock the signal was made for bombarding the town and the enemy's vessels. The gun-boats were cast off, and advanced in a line ahead, led on by captain Decatur, and covered by the frigate Constitution, and the brigs and schooners. The enemy's gun-boats were moored along the mouth of the harbor under the batteries, and within musket shot. Their sails had been taken away from them, and they were ordered to sink rather than abandon their position. They were aided and covered likewise by a brig of 16 and a schooner of 10 guns.

Before entering into close action, captain Decatur went alongside each of his boats, and ordered them to unship their bowsprits and follow him, as it was his intention to board the enemy's boats. Lieut. James Decatur commanded one of the boats belonging to lieutenant Somers' division, but being further to windward than the rest of his division, he joined and took orders from his brother.

When captain Decatur, who was in the leading boat, came within range of the fire from the batteries, a heavy fire was opened upon him from them and from the gun boats. He returned their fire, and continued advancing until he came in contact with the boats. At this time commodore Preble, seeing Decatur approaching nearer than he thought prudent, ordered the signal to be made for a retreat, but it was found that in making out signals for the boats, one for a retreat had been omitted.—The enemy's boats had about forty men each; ours an equal number, twenty-seven of whom were American and thirteen Neapolitans. Decatur on boarding the enemy was instantly followed by his countrymen, but the Neapolitans remained behind. The Turks did not sustain the combat, hand to hand, with that firmness they had gained a reputation for: in ten minutes the deck was cleared; eight of them sought refuge in the hold; and of the rest, some fell on the deck, and others jumped into the sea. Only three of the Americans were wounded.

As Decatur was about to proceed out with his prize, the boat which had been commanded by his brother came under his stern, and informed him that they had engaged and captured one of the enemy; but that her commander, after surrendering, had treacherously shot lieutenant James Decatur, and pushed off with the boat, and was then making for the harbor.

The feelings of the gallant Decatur, on receiving this intelligence, may more easily be imagined than described. Every consideration of prudence and safety was lost in his eagerness to punish so dastardly an act, and to avenge the death of a brother so basely murdered. He pushed within the enemy's line with his single boat, and having succeeded in getting alongside his retreating foe, boarded her at the head of eleven men who were all the Americans he had left.

The fate of this contest was extremely doubtful for twenty minutes. All the Americans except four were now severely wounded. Decatur now singled out the commander as the peculiar object of his vengeance. The Turk was armed with an espontoon, Decatur with a cutlass; attempting to cut off the head of the weapon, his sword struck on the iron and broke close to the hilt. The Turk at this moment made a push, which slightly wounded him in the right arm and breast. He immediately seized the spear and closed with him. A fierce struggle ensued, and both fell, Decatur uppermost. By this time the Turk had drawn a dagger from his belt, and was about to plunge it in the body of his foe, when Decatur caught his arm, and shot him with a pistol, which he had taken from his pocket.—During the time they were struggling on the deck, the crews rushed to the aid of their commanders, and a most sanguinary conflict took place, insomuch that when Decatur had despatched his adversary, it was with the greatest difficulty he could extricate himself from the killed and wounded that had fallen around him.

It is with no common feeling of admiration that we record an instance of heroic courage, and loyal self devotion, on the part of a common sailor. During the early part of Decatur's struggle with the Turk, he was assailed in the rear by one of the enemy, who had just aimed a blow at his head with his sabre, that must have been fatal; at this fearful juncture, a noble hearted tar, who had been so badly wounded as to lose the use of his hands, seeing no other means of saving his commander, rushed between him and the uplifted sabre, and received the blow on his own head, which fractured his skull. We love to pause and honor great actions in humble life, because they speak well of human nature. Men of rank and station in society often do gallant deeds, in a manner from necessity. Their conspicuous situation obliges them to do so, or their eagerness for glory urges them on; but an act like this we have mentioned, so desperate, yet so disinterested; done by an obscure, unambitious individual, a poor sailor, can spring from nothing but innate nobleness of soul. We are happy to add that this generous fellow survived, and now receives a pension from government.

Decatur succeeded in getting with both of his prizes to the squadron, and the next day received the highest commendation, in a general order, from commodore Preble. When that able officer was superseded in the command of the squadron, he gave the Constitution to capt. Decatur, who had, some time before, received his commission.—From that ship he was removed to the Congress, and returned home in her when peace was concluded with Tripoli. On his return to the United States, he was employed in superintending gun boats, until the affair of the Chesapeake, when he was ordered to supersede commodore Barron in the command of that ship, since which period he has had the command of the southern squadron. When the United States was again put in commission, he was removed from the Chesapeake to that frigate.

The foregoing particulars were furnished us by a friend, as materials from which to form a biography; but we were so well pleased with the simplicity, conciseness and modesty of the narration, that we resolved to lay it before our readers with merely a few trivial alterations.

The present war with Great Britain has given commodore Decatur another opportunity of adding to the laurels he had already won. On the 25th October, 1812, in lat. 29, N. long. 29 30 W. he fell in with his Britannic Majesty's ship Macedonian, mounting 49 carriage guns. This was one of the finest fi-gates in the British navy, and commanded by captain John S. Carden, one of the ablest officers. She was in prime order, two years old, and but four months out of dock. The enemy being to windward; had the advantage of choosing his own distance; and, supposing the United States to be the Essex, (which only mounts carronades,) kept at first at long shot, and did not at any moment come within the complete effect of the musketry and grape. After the frigates had come to close action, the battle was terminated in a very short period by the enemy's surrender. The whole engagement lasted for an hour and a half, being prolonged by the distance at which the early part of it was fought, and by a heavy swell of the sea. The superior gunnery of the Americans was apparent in this, as in all our other actions. The Macedonian lost her main-mast, fore and main top-masts and main yard, and was much cut in the hull. Her loss was thirty-six killed, and sixty-eight wounded. The damage of the United States was comparatively trivial, four killed and seven wounded; and she suffered so little in her hull and rigging, that she might have continued her cruise, had not commodore Decatur thought it important to convoy his prize into port. His reception of captain Carden on board of the United States was truly characteristic. On presenting his sword, Decatur observed that he could not think of taking the sword of an officer who had defended his ship so gallantly, but he should be happy to take him by the hand.

We are sorry to observe that captain Carden has not been ingenuous in his account of this affair. He mentions that "after an hour's action the enemy backed and came to the wind, and I was then enabled to bring her to close action." Now, on the contrary, we have it from the very best authority, that the United States was close hauled to the wind, and her commander was extremely anxious to come to close quarters. There are other parts of captain Carden's official letter that are exceptionable, but we shall pass them over without comment. It is natural for a proud and gallant mind to writhe under humiliation, and to endeavor to palliate the disgrace of defeat; but a truly magnanimous spirit would seem to do it at the expense of a brave and generous foe. Capt. Carden must know that he had it in his power to close with the United States whenever he pleased, and that there was no movement on the part of commodore Decatur to prevent it. We again repeat, that it is with regret we notice any instance of disingenuousness in an officer whose general character we admire, and whose despatch at all times to our countrymen has been such as to entitle him to their highest regard will commodore Decatur's good fortune, or rather good management, that he conveyed his prize, in her shattered condition, across a vast extent of ocean, swarming with foes, and conducted her triumphantly into port; thus placing immediately before the eyes of his countrymen a noble trophy of his own skill, and of national prowess.

Such has been the brilliant career of this naval hero. In private life his fortune has been equally propitious; honored by his country, beloved by his friends, and blessed by the affections of an amiable and elegant woman. He is now in the very prime of life, pleasing in his person, of an intelligent and interesting countenance, and an eye in whose mild and brilliant lustre, spirit, enterprise and urbanity are happily blended. His deportment is manly and unassuming, and his manners peculiarly gentle and engaging; uniting the polish of the gentleman with the frank simplicity of the sailor. It is with the most perfect delight that we have noticed our naval achievements which are the universal topics of national pride and exultation, sinking at once into unostentatious and quiet citizens. No vain glorious boastings, no puerile gasconades, are ever heard from their lips; of their enemy they always speak with courtesy and respect; of their own exploits, with unaffected modesty and frankness. With the aspiring ardor of truly brave spirits, they pay but little regard to the past; their whole souls seem stretched towards the future. Into such hands we confide, without apprehension or reserve, our national interests and honor; to this handful of gallant worthies is allotted the proud destinies of founding the naval fame of the nation, and of thus having their names inseparably connected with the glory of their country.

Captain Jacob Jones.

FROM THE SAME.

Jacob Jones, Esq. of the United States navy, was born about the year 1770, near the village of Smyrna, in the county of Kent, state of Delaware. His father was an independent and respectable farmer, of excellent moral and religious character. His mother was of a good family of the name of Jones; an amiable and interesting woman—she died when the subject of this memoir was yet an infant. Between two and three years afterwards, his father married again, with Miss Holt, grand-daughter of the honorable Ryres Holt, formerly chief justice of the supreme court of Delaware; or, as it was then denominated, "the lower counties of Delaware." Shortly after the second marriage his father died, when this only child was scarcely four years of age. It was the good fortune of our hero to be left under the care of a step-mother, who had all the kind feelings of a natural parent. The affection which this excellent woman had borne towards the father, was, on his death transferred to the child. By her he was nurtured from infancy to manhood with a truly maternal care and tenderness. At an early age he was placed at school, and his proficiency in learning was equal to her most anxious wishes. After becoming well acquainted with the general branches of an English education, he was transferred to a grammar school at Lewis, in Sussex county, conducted by the learned and pious Dr. Matthew Wilson. Under his direction he read the classics with much assiduity, and became well acquainted with the Latin and Greek languages. The writer of this memoir distinctly remembers also, that in the geographical lessons he continually bore off the palm, and received beyond all others, repeated proofs of approbation from his preceptor. At the age of eighteen he left Lewis Academy and entered the study of physic and surgery under Dr. Sykes, an eminent physician and surgeon of Dover, in the county of Kent. With him he diligently prosecuted his studies for four years, after which he attended the usual courses of medical lectures of the university of Pennsylvania, and then returned to Dover to commence the exercises of his profession.

He did not, however, continue long in the practice. He found the field already engrossed by a number of able and experienced gentlemen of the faculty—among them the late lamented Dr. Miller, of New York. Discouraged by the scanty employment that is commonly the lot of the young physician, and impatient of an inactive life, he determined to abandon the profession for the present, and seek some more productive occupation. This resolution was a matter of much regret among the elder physicians. They entertained a high opinion of his medical acquirements, and considered him as promising to become a distinguished and skilful member of their body.—Governor Clayton (who was himself an eminent physician) seeing that he was fixed in his determination, conferred upon him the clerkship of the supreme court of the state of Delaware, for the county of Kent.

In this office he continued for some time but the sedentary nature of its duties was ungenial with his health and habits; he longed to mingle in more active scenes, and possessed that ardent spirit of enterprize that can never rest contented with the tranquil ease of common life. With a certain bravery of resolution therefore, or rather a noble unconcern, he turned his back upon the comforts and emoluments of office; and resolved upon a measure, as indicative of the force of his character as it was decisive of his future fortunes. This was to enter as a midshipman into the service of his country, in the year of 1799. When menaced with a war with France.

He was at this time almost twenty-nine years of age, highly respected for the solidity of his understanding and his varied acquirements; it may readily be imagined, therefore, how greatly his friends were dissatisfied at seeing him in a manner taking a retrograde step in life, entering upon that tedious probation which the naval service particularly requires and accepting a grade which is generally allotted to boys and striplings. It was in vain however to remonstrate against a resolution, which, when once formed, never vibrated. Jones had determined on embracing the profession; he had weighed all the peculiar inconveniences and sacrifices incident to his determination, and had made up his mind to encounter and surmount them all. His friends could only console themselves with the reflection, that if courage, activity and hardihood could ensure naval success, Jones was peculiarly fitted for the life he had adopted, and it is probable they felt some degree of admiration for that decision of character, which, in the pursuit, of what he conceived a laudable object, could enable him to make such large sacrifices of personal pride and convenience.

The first cruize which he made in his new capacity was under the father of our infant navy, the late Commodore Barry, from whom he derived great instruction in the theory and practice of his profession, and experienced the utmost kindness and civility. He was a midshipman on board the frigate United States, when she bore to France chief justice Ellsworth and general Davie, as envoys extraordinary to the French Republic. He was next on board the Ganges, as midshipman, and during the whole intervening period between his appointment and the war with Tripoli, he was sedulously employed in obtaining that nautical skill for which he at present is celebrated.

On the breaking out of the war with Tripoli, he was stationed on board the frigate Philadelphia, under the command of the gallant Bainbridge. The disaster which befel that ship and her crew before Tripoli, forms a solemn page in our naval history; atoned for however, by the brilliant achievements to which it gave rise.—Twenty months of severe captivity among a barbarous people, and in a noxious climate, neither broke the spirit nor impaired the constitution of our hero. Blessed by nature with vigorous health and an invincible resolution; when relieved from bondage by the bravery of his countrymen, he returned home full of life and ardor. He was soon after promoted to a lieutenantcy. This grade he had merited before his confinement in Tripoli, but older warrant officers had stood in the way of his preferment.

He was for some time employed on the Orleans station, where he conducted himself with his usual judgment and propriety, and was a favorite in the polite circles of the Orleans and Mississippi territories. He was shortly after appointed to the command of the brig Argus, stationed for the protection of our commerce on the southern and maritime frontier. In this situation he acted with vigilance and fidelity, and though there were at one time insidious suggestions to the contrary, it has appeared that he conformed to his instructions, promoted the public interest, and gave entire satisfaction to the government.

In 1811, captain Jones was transferred by the secretary of the navy, to the command of the sloop of war Wasp, mounting 18 twenty-four pound carronades, and was despatched in the spring of 1812, with communications from our government to its functionaries at the courts of St. Cloud and St. James. Before he returned from his voyage, war had been declared by the United States against Great Britain. Captain Jones refitted his ship with all possible dispatch, and repaired to sea on a cruise, in which he met with no other luck than the capture of an inconsiderable prize. He again put to sea on the 13th of October last, on the 13th of that month, after a long and heavy gale, he fell in with a number of strongly armed merchant men under convoy of his Britannic majesty's sloop of war the Frolic, captain Whynates.

As this engagement has been one of the most decidedly honorable to the American flag, from the superior force of the enemy; and as the British writers, in endeavouring to account for our successes, and to under-value our victories, have studiously passed this battle over in silence, and seemed anxious to elbow it into oblivion, we shall take this occasion to republish a full and particular account of it, which has already appeared in the Port Folio,* and which we have reason to believe is scrupulously correct.

There was a heavy swell in the sea, and the weather was boisterous. The top-gallant yards of the Wasp were taken down, her top-sails were close reefed; and she was prepared for action. About 11 o'clock the Frolic shewed Spanish colours, and the Wasp immediately displayed the American ensign and pendant. At 32 minutes past eleven, the Wasp came down to windward on her larboard side, within about sixty yards and hailed. The enemy hauled down the Spanish colours, hoisted the British ensign, and opened a fire of cannon and musketry.—This the Wasp instantly returned; and coming nearer to the enemy, the action became close and without intermission.

In four or five minutes the main-top-mast of the Wasp was shot away; and falling down with main-top-sail yard across the larboard fire and fore-top sail braces, rendered her head yards unmanageable during the rest of the action. In two or three minutes more her gaff and mizen-top-gallant sail were shot away. Still she continued a close and constant fire. The sea was so rough that the muzzles of the Wasp's guns were frequently in the water. The Americans, therefore fired as the ship's side was going down, so that their shot either went on the enemy's deck or below it, while the English fired as the vessel rose, and thus her balls chiefly touched the rigging or were thrown away. The Wasp now shot ahead of the Frolic, raked her and then resumed her station on her larboard bow. Her fire was now obviously attended with such success, and that of the Frolic so slackened, that captain Jones did not wish to board her, lest the roughness of the sea might endanger both vessels; but in the course of a few minutes more every brace of the Wasp was shot away, and her rigging so much torn to pieces, that he was afraid that his masts, being unsupported, would go by the board, and the Frolic be able to escape. He thought, therefore, the best chance of securing her was to board, and decide the contest at once. With this view he wore ship, and running down upon the enemy, the vessels struck each other, the Wasp's side rubbing along the Frolic's bow so that her jib-boom came in between the main and mizen rigging of the Wasp, directly over the heads of captain Jones, and the first lieutenant Mr. Biddle, who were at that moment standing together near the capstan. The Frolic lay so fair for raking, that they decided not to board until they had given a closing broadside. Whilst they were loading for this, so near were the two vessels, that the rammers of the Wasp were pushed against the Frolic's sides, and two of her guns went through the bow ports of the Frolic, and swept the whole length of her deck. At this moment Jack Lang,* a seaman of the Wasp, a gallant fellow, who had been impressed by a British man of war, jumped on a gun with his cutlass, and was springing on board the Frolic: captain Jones wishing to fire again before boarding called him down, but his impetuosity could not be restrained, and he was already on the bowsprit of the Frolic; when, seeing the ardor and enthusiasm of the Wasp's crew, lieutenant Biddle mounted on the hammock cloth to board. At this signal the crew followed, but lieutenant Biddle's feet got entangled in the rigging of the enemy's bowsprit, and midshipman Baker, in his ardor to get on board, laying hold of his coat, he fell back on the Wasp's deck. He sprang up, and as the next swell of the sea brought the Frolic nearer, he got on her bowsprit, were Lang and another seaman were already. He passed them on the fore-castle and was surprized at seeing not a single man alive on the Frolic's deck, except the seaman at the wheel, and three officers. The deck was slippery with blood, and strewed with the bodies of the dead. As he went forward, the captain of the Frolic, with two other officers, who were standing on the quarter deck, threw down their swords, and made an inclination of their bodies denoting that they had surrendered.

* John Lang is a native of New-Brunswick, in New-Jersey. We mention, with great pleasure, the name of this brave American seaman, as a proof that conspicuous valor is confined to no tank in the naval service.

At this moment the colors were still flying, as probably none of the seamen of the Frolic would dare to go into the rigging for fear of the musketry of the Wasp. Lieutenant Biddle, therefore, jumped into the rigging himself and hauled down the British ensign, and possession was taken of the Frolic in forty-three minutes after the first fire. She was in a shocking condition; the birth-deck particularly, was crowded with dead and wounded, and dying; there being but a small proportion of the Frolic's crew who had escaped. Captain Jones instantly sent on board his surgeon's mate, and all the blankets of the Frolic were brought from the slop-room for the comfort of the wounded. To increase this confusion, both the Frolic's masts soon fell, covering the dead and every thing on deck, and she lay a complete wreck.

It now appeared that the Frolic mounted sixteen thirty-two pound carronades, four twelve pounders on the main-deck, and two twelve pound carronades. She was, therefore, superior to the Wasp, by exactly four twelve-pounders. The number of men, on board, as stated by the officers of the Frolic, was one hundred and ten—the number of seamen on board the Wasp was one hundred and two; but it could not be ascertained, whether in this one hundred and ten, were included the marines and officers, for the Wasp had besides her one hundred and two men officers and marines, making the whole crew about one hundred and thirty-five. What is, however, decisive, as to their comparative force, is, that the officers of the Frolic acknowledged that they had as many men as they knew what to do with, and in fact the Wasp could have spared fifteen men. There was, therefore, on the most favourable view, at least an equality of men, and an inequality of four guns. The disparity of loss was much greater. The exact number of killed and wounded on board the Frolic could not be precisely determined; but from the observations of our officers, and the declarations of those of the Frolic, the number could not be less than about thirty killed, including two officers, and of the wounded between forty and fifty the captain and second lieutenant being of the number. The Wasp had five men killed; and five slightly wounded.

All hands were now employed in clearing the deck, burying the dead, and taking care of the wounded, when captain Jones sent orders to lieutenant Biddle to proceed to Charleston, or any southern port of the United States, and, as there was a suspicious sail to the windward, the Wasp would continue her cruize. The ships then parted. The suspicious sail was now coming down very fast. At first it was supposed that she was one of the convoy, who had fled during the engagement, and who now came for the purpose of attacking the prize. The guns of the Frolic were therefore loaded, and the ship cleared for action, but the enemy as she advanced proved to be a seventy-four—the Poitiers, captain Beresford. She fired a shot over the Frolic; passed her; overtook the Wasp, the disabled state of whose rigging prevented her escaping; and then returned to the Frolic, who could of course make no resistance.—The Wasp and Frolic were carried into Bermuda.

On the return of captain Jones to the United States, he was every where received with the utmost demonstrations of gratitude and admiration. Brilliant entertainments were given him in the cities through which he passed.—The legislature of his native state appointed a committee to wait on him with their thanks and to express the "pride and pleasure," they felt in recognising him as a native of their state; in the same resolution they voted him an elegant piece of plate, with appropriate engravings. The congress of the United States, on motion of Mr. J. A. Bayard of Delaware, appropriated 25,000 dollars, as a compensation to captain Jones and his crew, for the loss they sustained by the recapture of the Frolic. They also ordered a gold medal to be presented to the captain, and a silver one to each of his officers.

Various other marks of honor have been paid by the legislatures, and the citizens of the different states, which it would be superfluous to enumerate; but the most substantial testimony of approbation which he has received, is the appointment to the command of the frigate Macedonian lately captured from the British.

Captain Jones is about the middle size, of an active mind, and vigorous make, and an excellent constitution, capable of the utmost vigilance and fatigue. Naturally and habitually temperate himself, he is a great promoter of temperance among his crew; and he has been successful in reclaiming many a valuable seaman from the pernicious habits of intoxication.

He is now in what may be considered the most critical command in our service; having charge of a ship, the recovery of which will be one of the most anxious objects of the British navy, and which will call forth the most implacable contest on either side. But in the courage, judgment and skill of captain Jones, we place the most implicit confidence, and are satisfied, that whatever fortune my befall him, he will always sustain his own reputation and the honor of the American flag.

Commodore Bainbridge.

FROM THE PORT FOLIO.

If variety of incident can render the life of an individual interesting to his country, the following biographical sketch of one of our most distinguished naval officers has every claim on the public curiosity, since there is no officer in the service whose career has been marked by so strange and diversified a series of adventures and misfortunes. These have, however, terminated so gloriously for himself and the nation, that we shall indulge ourselves and gratify our readers by copious details, with regard to an officer who has contributed so largely to exalt our naval reputation.

Wm. Bainbridge, son of Dr. Absalom Bainbridge, a respectable physician of Princeton, New Jersey, was born at that place on the seventh of May, 1774. While yet a child his parents removed to New York, and he was left under the care of his grandfather, John Taylor, esquire, of Monmouth county, where he received his education, which, as he was originally destined to mercantile pursuits, was confined to the ordinary branches of English instruction, and the rudiments of the French language. At sixteen he was placed in a counting-house at New York, but was soon removed by his grandfather to Philadelphia, and placed as an apprentice to the sea-service in the employ of Messrs. Miller and Murray, merchants, whom he was to serve for a certain time without indentures and free of expense. In their employ he made many voyages and soon rose to command. At eighteen years of age, while mate of the ship Hope, on her way to Holland, the crew, taking advantage of a violent gale of wind, rose upon the officers, seized the captain, and had nearly succeeded in throwing him overboard, when young Bainbridge, hearing the alarm, ran on deck with an old pistol without a lock, and being assisted by an apprentice boy and an Irish sailor, who was attached to him from being an old shipmate, rescued the captain, seized the ringleaders, and quelled the mutiny. So satisfied were his employers with this as well as his general conduct, that before his term of service had expired, he received the command of a ship in the Dutch trade when only nineteen years of age. From this time, 1793, till the year 1798, he commanded merchant ships in the trade from Philadelphia to Europe. In one of these voyages, in the year 1796, on his way from Bourdeaux to St. Thomas, in the small ship Hope, with four small carriage guns and nine men, he had an engagement with a British schooner of eight guns and thirty-five men, commanded by a sailing master in the navy, and after a smart action compelled her to strike her colours. As, however, the two countries were at peace, and he of course was acting only on the defensive, he could not take possession of her; but sent her off contemptuously to make a report of her action. The Hope lost no men, but the enemy had many killed and wounded.

In the month of July, 1798, while preparing to sail for Spain, he received, unexpectedly and without any application on his part, an offer of the command of the United States' schooner Retaliation, of fourteen guns, to be employed against France, between which power and the United States hostilities had recently commenced. He accepted the appointment, on condition that he should have a commission as lieutenant and commander in the navy, and be placed first of that grade on the list of promotion. Having received this, he sailed in the Retaliation, and after cruising during the summer along the coast of the United States, accompanied the squadron under commodore Murray, on a cruise in the West Indies. While cruising to the windward of Guadalupe, the Retaliation was captured, in the month of November, by two French frigates and a lugger, and taken into that island, where she remained three months. On board the frigate which captured her was general Desfouneaux, on his way to Guadalupe, to supersede Victor Hughes in the command of the island. This officer desirous, as it would appear from his conduct of seeming to be the friend of the United States, and from political motives, to soothe the irritation of the American people at the outrages of the French government, proposed to lieutenant Bainbridge to resume the command of his vessel and return to the United States. This offer was accompanied by assurance of the respect and regard in which he held the American people. His conduct, however, rendered these plausible appearances but too suspicious. Whilst affecting an ostentatious generosity in giving up the Retaliation, other American ships, of far more value, were retained, and his assurances of respect were contradicted by the harsh and rigorous treatment of many Americans whom he refused to regard as prisoners, but who were confined and treated with as much severity as criminals. Perceiving the scheme which was laid for him, lieutenant Bainbridge replied, that he knew of no other light in which he could be regarded, than either as a prisoner or as entirely free—that if general Desfouneaux returned him his ship and his commission, that commission required him to cruise against the commerce of France, an injunction which he dared not disobey. On the other hand, if he were a prisoner, the proper course would be to make his ship a cartel and send her home in that way. He remonstrated at the same time with great firmness against the treatment which his countrymen were daily receiving. General Desfourneaux insisted on his resuming his command, threatened him with imprisonment if he refused, and declared, that if, on receiving the Retaliation he should cruise against the French, every American would be put to the sword. Lieutenant Bainbridge replied, that no threats should induce him to act unworthy of his character as an American officer; till at last, finding that he was not to be won over into this plan of dissembled friendship, general Desfourneaux gave him a declaration, that he had been obliged by force to resume the command of his vessel, with her crew reduced to forty men; and with this justification for his government, lieutenant Bainbridge sailed, in company with two flags of truce, for the United States.

He reached home in February, 1799, and his exchange being soon effected, he received a commission of master commandant, and sailed in the brig Norfolk, of eighteen guns, on a second cruise to the West Indies. Here he remained, convoying the trade of the United States, for some months, during which time he captured a French privateer, ran ashore another of sixteen guns, destroyed a number of barges, besides taking several of the enemy's merchant vessels. On his return to the United States in August of the same year, he found that during his absence, contrary to the assurances he had received, as well as to the tenor of his commissions (both of which were higher than that of any lieutenant) that five lieutenants had been promoted over him to the rank of captain. As his conduct had uniformly received the approbation of the government, and as none of those who were promoted had had any opportunity of distinguishing themselves particularly, he remonstrated of course against such a violation of his rights. He received, however, no other satisfaction than a promise that no such appointment should take place for the future. Were it not for this irregularity he would now have ranked as second captain in the navy. Although mortified and disappointed, his attachment to the service induced him still to remain in it; and he again sailed with a squadron of four brigs and a ship, destined to protect the trade of the United States to Cuba—a service which he performed so much to the satisfaction of all who were interested in it, that on his leaving the station in April, 1800, an address was presented to him from the American merchants and others concerned in the United States' trade, expressive of their regret at his approaching absence, and their testimony "of the vigilance, perseverance, and urbanity which had marked his conduct during his arduous command on this station." and the "essential services which he had rendered to his country."

When he returned to the United States he received a captain's commission, and was appointed to the command of the frigate George Washington, in which he shortly afterwards sailed for Algiers, with the presents which the United States were by treaty bound to make to that regency. He arrived in safety at Algiers on the seventeenth September, 1800, and proceeded to land the presents, which were well received, and every attention paid to captain Bainbridge, to whom the dey presented an elegant Turkish sword. In a few days, however, these friendly appearances vanished, and the dey made a most unexpected and extraordinary demand, that the George Washington should carry his ambassador with presents to the grand seignior at Constantinople. This demand was made under pretence of one of the stipulations in our treaty with Algiers, by which it is declared that, "should the dey want to freight any American vessel that may be in the regency or Turkey, said vessel not being engaged, in consequence of the friendship subsisting between the two nations, he expects to have the preference given him, on his paying the same freight offered by any other nation." Against this requisition captain Bainbridge and the American consul, Mr. O'Brien, remonstrated warmly and strenuously. It was evident, they said, that this stipulation could apply only to merchant ships, not to national vessels, charged by their own government with specific employments:—that captain Bainbridge had received positive instructions for his voyage, from which he dared not and would not deviate, and that there were other ships in the harbor which would answer the purpose equally well. The dey, however, persisted in his demand; and left captain Bainbridge only a choice of great difficulties and embarrassments. On the one hand, an ambassador, with a retinue of two hundred Turks as passengers, and presents to the amount of five or six hundred thousand dollars, were to be forced on board the frigate and carried to Constantinople at the entire risk of the United States. If in the new and dangerous navigation to that place accidents happened to the dey's property, the United States would be held responsible to indemnify him; if any cruizers of the Portuguese, Neapolitans, or other powers at war with Algiers, should meet the George Washington and capture her, still the United States would be bound to reimburse the loss; and the American vessels in the Mediterranean would be instantly seized by the Algerines as a security for it. Should he be more fortunate and beat off these enemies, they might consider this cover of Algerine property as a violation of neutrality, and think themselves justified in retaliating on the defenceless commerce of the United States in the Mediterranean. Besides which, he would deviate from his orders by undertaking, for six months, a voyage not sanctioned by his government. On the other hand, a refusal to comply would occasion the detention of the frigate, which was now in the power of the dey, and be followed by an immediate declaration of war against the United States for this alleged breach of the treaty, and a seizure of all American vessels in the Mediterranean. In this situation, captain Bainbridge opposed the dey as long and as vigorously as possible. The dey promised that if a Swedish frigate, which was then expected, arrived, he would take her in place of the George Washington. But she did not come. A British twenty-four gun ship arrived, and offered to carry the presents. This, however, the dey refused, because he would not be under obligations to England; and at last, exasperated by opposition, he sent for captain Bainbridge and the consul, and peremptorily demanded that the frigate should go to Constantinople, threatening, in case of refusal, to make slaves of all the Americans in Algiers, to detain the frigate, and send out his cruisers against the defenceless trade of United States. The liberty of his countrymen, and the safety of the American commerce, decided captain Bainbridge at last to smother his indignation at this unpleasant and humiliating service, and he consented to receive the Algerine ambassador.

Another difference arose about the flag; captain Bainbridge declared that the frigate should carry her own colors; but the dey insisted that the flag of Algiers should be worn during the voyage. It was vain to resist, however mortifying to obey.

They sailed from Algiers on the nineteenth of October. The winds were unfavorable, the weather bad, and the society of the Turks not calculated to console the officers for these inconveniences; but they submitted with as good a grace as possible to a humiliation which they deemed necessary for their country's service. The frigate anchored at the lower end of Constantinople in twenty-three days from her departure, and the next morning, the twelfth of November, the American flag was hoisted at the minzen, the Algerine at the main. Soon afterwards three officers, in succession, were sent on board by the grand seignior, to enquire what ship that was, and what colors she had hoisted. They were told it was an American frigate and an American flag. They said they did not know any such country. Captain Bainbridge then explained that America was the New World—by which name they had some idea of the country.—After these inquiries the frigate came into the harbor, saluted the grand seignior's palace with twenty-one guns, and proceeded to unload the Algerine cargo. The ambassador was not permitted to have his audience before the arrival of the capudan pacha, or high admiral, from Egypt, and it was necessary for the frigate to wait the result. Captain Bainbridge endeavored to employ the interval in giving to the Turkish government a favorable impression of a country, of which his ship and crew were the only specimens they had ever an opportunity of seeing. At this time an embassy to Constantinople was projected, and William L. Smith, esquire, then minister of the United States in Portugal, was designated as our ambassador. It was therefore desirable that his arrival should be preceded by as advantageous an opinion as possible of his country. How well captain Bainbridge succeeded in making these impressions, we may learn from the unsuspecting testimony of a distinguished traveller, Mr. Clarke, who was then at Constantinople, and with whom captain Bainbridge contracted a friendly intimacy.*

On the arrival of the capudan pacha, the unfortunate Algerine ambassador was denied an audience, and both his letters and presents refused, on account of the many depredations committed by Algiers on the commerce of Austria and other nations friendly to the porte, and also for having made peace with France without consulting the grand seignior. The ambassador and his suite were not suffered to leave their houses, the dey of Algiers was ordered to declare war against France,

* "The arrival of an American frigate," says Mr. Clarke "for the first time at Constantinople, caused considerable sensation, not only among the Turks, but also throughout the whole diplomatic corps stationed in Pera. This ship, commanded by captain Bainbridge, came from Algiers, with a letter and presents from the dey to the sultan and capudan pacha. The presents consisted of tigers and other animals, sent with a view to conciliate the Turkish government, whom the dey had offended. When she came to an anchor, and a message went to the porte that an American frigate was in the harbor, the Turks were altogether unable to comprehend where the country was situated whose flag they had to salute. A great deal of time was therefore lost in settling this important point, and in considering how to receive the stranger. In the meantime, we went on board to visit the captain; and were sitting with him in his cabin, when a messenger came from the Turkish government to ask whether America was not otherwise called the New World; and, being answered in the affirmative, assured the captain that he was welcome, and would be treated with the utmost cordiality and respect. The messengers from the dey were then ordered on board the capudan pacha's ship; who, receiving the letter from their sovereign with great rage, first spat, and then stamped upon it; telling them to go back to their master, and inform him that he would be served after the same manner, whenever the Turkish admiral met him. Captain Bainbridge was, however, received with every mark of attention, and rewarded with magnificent presents." The fine order of his ship, and the healthy state of her crew, became topics of general conversation in Pera; and the different ministers strove who should receive him in their palaces. We accompanied him in his long-boat to the Black Sea, as he was desirous of hoisting there, for the first time, the American flag; and, upon his return, were amused by a very singular entertainment at his table during dinner. Upon the four corners were as many deants or, containing fresh water from as many quarters of the globe. The natives of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, sat down together at the same table, and were regaled with fish, fruit, bread, and other viands; while, of every article, a sample from each quarter of the globe was presented at the same time. The means of accomplishing this are easily explained, by his having touched at Algiers, in his passage from America, and being at anchor so near the shores both of Europe and Asia."

* This is incorrectly stated. The only presents received were a shawl and a fur cloak, which together were worth about four hundred dollars.

and sixty days allowed to receive in Constantinople the account of his compliance, on pain of immediate war.

Captain Bainbridge was, however, received by the capudan pacha with distinguished politeness. He took the frigate under his immediate protection; requested captain Bainbridge to haul down the Algerine flag and carry the American, and being fond of ship-building and naval affairs, conceived, from the seaman-like conduct of the officers and the state of the frigate, a high idea of our marine character. These attentions were peculiarly grateful, as this officer was related by marriage to the grand seignior, and supposed to possess great influence in public affairs. He afterwards addressed a friendly letter to Mr Smith, the expected ambassador, and the two countries might have formed a commercial treaty under very favorable auspices; but the mission to Constantinople was afterwards discountenanced by our government. The different diplomatic characters at Constantinople paid to captain Bainbridge very marked civilities—more particularly lord Elgin, the British, and baron de Hubsch, the Danish ambassador. Every thing being at length arranged, the George Washington sailed from Constantinople in the month of December, carrying the Turkish ambassador's secretary back to Algiers, with an account of the unfortunate result of his embassy.

This voyage to Constantinople, though irksome to the officers, was ultimately the means of acquiring much honor to the United States, and might have been rendered highly serviceable. Fortunately for us, the George Washington arrived suddenly before Constantinople, which no Christian vessel was permitted to do—the laws of the porte requiring that all foreign vessels should wait one hundred and twenty miles below the city, in order to obtain leave to come up; and as the American flag and nation were then unknown, and the ministers of foreign powers would of course have been unwilling to see a young adventurous people admitted to share the advantages of a trade, which they were enjoying exclusively, the probability is, that the frigate never would have reached Constantinople. Arriving, however, as she did, a fine ship, with an excellent crew in the best discipline, she gave the Turks a high idea of the naval character of the United States—a character which they have since seen us sustain with so much glory in the war with Tripoli. After landing some Turks at Malta, as a favor to the capudan pacha, captain Bainbridge arrived off Algiers on the 21st of January. Warned by his past misfortune, he did not venture his frigate within reach of the fort, but sent the ambassador's secretary on shore in a boat, although the dey desired that he would come into port to discharge some guns belonging to Algiers, which he had taken in there as ballast for the voyage to Constantinople. The dey, however, insisted, and captain Bainbridge, fearful of the consequences to the unprotected commerce of the United States, again ventured within the dey's power, delivered the old guns, and took other ballast. The tyrant was now so effectually humbled by the orders of the grand seignior, that he instantly released four hundred prisoners, who had been taken with British and Austrian passports, and declared war against France. Finding too, that captain Bainbridge was on friendly terms with the capudan pacha, his menaces softened into great mildness. After having been thus instrumental in the release of so many prisoners, captain Bainbridge was now enabled to serve the interests of humanity in another way. On the declaration of war with France, the consul and all the French subjects, then in Algiers, were ordered to leave the country in forty-eight hours, and as their longer stay would have exposed them to captivity, they were all taken on board the George Washington.

He sailed from Algiers about the last of January, and after landing the French passengers at Alicant, arrived at Philadelphia in the month of April, 1801, and received the marked approbation of the government for his conduct during this long, unpleasant, and delicate service. Before his return, the cessation of hostilities with France had caused a reduction of the navy, and there were retained only nine captains, of whom he had the satisfaction of finding himself one. In the following June he received the command of the frigate Essex. About this time the regency of Tripoli, emboldened by the success of the Algerines, commenced hostilities against the United States; to oppose which, a squadron of frigates, among which was the Essex, was sent to the Mediterranean. Here he continued for thirteen or fourteen months, engaged in conveying American ships and other neutrals in the Mediterranean, and cruising against the Tripolitan ships of war, with none of which, however, he had the good fortune to engage. He returned to New York in July, 1802, and remained on shore for about nine months, engaged in superintending the building of the United States' brigs Syren and Vixen.

In May, 1803, he was appointed to command the Philadelphia, a frigate built by the merchants of Philadelphia and presented to the government of the United States. He sailed in her from the port of Philadelphia, in July, 1803, for the Mediterranean, to join the squadron then under commodore Preble. On reaching Gibraltar, he heard of two Tripolitan cruisers off Cape de Gatt, and immediately shaped his course after them. On the twenty-sixth of August he discovered a ship with a brig in company, both under a foresail only. As it was night, the wind blowing very fresh, and the ship's guns hoisted, it was not till the Philadelphia hailed her that she proved to be a vessel of war from the coast of Barbary. On ordering her boat on board with the ship's passports, she was found to be the Mirboha, a cruiser of twenty-two guns and one hundred and ten men, from Morocco, and by concealing from the Moorish officer who came on board the nation to which the Essex belonged, he was led to mention that the brig was an American going to Spain, whom they had boarded but not detained.—The low sail under which the brig was, however, exciting some suspicion, captain Bainbridge sent his first lieutenant to examine if the ship had any American prisoners; but he was prevented by the captain of the ship.—A boat well manned and armed was sent to enforce a compliance, and they found on board the American captain of the brig, who, with his crew, were all confined below, the brig having been captured by the Moorish cruiser nine days before. After this act of hostility, captain Bainbridge had no hesitation in making prize of the ship, which was immediately manned from the Philadelphia, and the two ships proceeded to cruise for the brig, which had made off during this examination. It was not till after a search among a fleet of vessels, all the next day, that she was discovered, pursued and taken, and both vessels carried into Gibraltar.

On board the Mirboha were found cruising orders from the governor of Tangiers, which proved the hostile disposition of the emperor of Morocco, who was about letting loose his forces against the American commerce. The capture of one of his finest ships, at the very commencement of this scheme, convinced him of the folly of it, and afforded commodore Preble, on his arrival at Gibraltar, the means of bringing the emperor to a speedy and permanent peace with the United States.

While he was detained by this negotiation, captain Bainbridge, in company with the Vixen, captain Smith, had proceeded to blockade the harbor of Tripoli. Here he soon received information that a Tripolitan cruiser had escaped from the port, and he despatched the Vixen to cruise off Cape Bon in quest of her. After her departure the Philadelphia was driven from her cruising ground for several days, by the prevalence of strong westerly gales; but the wind having changed to the eastward, she was returning to her station, when, on the thirty-first of October, not many leagues to the east of the town, at about nine o'clock in the morning, a strange ship was seen in shore, to which chase was immediately given. The chase kept as close in shore as she dared, and ran for the harbor of Tripoli. The Philadelphia continued to chase along the land, not venturing into shoaler water than seven fathoms, and keeping up a constant fire, but finding she could not cut the chase off from the harbor, gave up the pursuit and hauled her wind to the northward, which was directly off the land; when, about half after eleven o'clock, as she was going at the rate of six or seven knots, she ran upon rocks about four miles and a half from the town. These rocks are a continuation of a reef which directly opposite the town are above water, and extend a long distance to the eastward.—They were not laid down in any charts on board, nor had they been discovered by our public ships, which had before cruised on this coast; nor, although three leads were kept heaving, were they perceived till she struck. Great exertions were instantly made to float the ship. A part of the guns were thrown overboard; the anchors cut away from the bows; the water started; the foremast cut away; but all to no purpose. As soon as she had grounded the gun-boats came out to attack her. They took a position on her quarters; but her stern-chasers compelled them to change their station; and while the ship continued upright, with the few guns that could be brought to bear, she could keep the enemy at a distance; but she soon lay over so much on one side, that she could not use her guns. At length, after sustaining the enemy's fire for between five and six hours, and seeing no chance of getting the ship off, a council of war was called of all the officers, who gave a unanimous opinion, that as it was impossible to defend themselves, or to annoy the enemy, any further show of resistance would only expose the lives of the crew, and that the painful alternative of surrendering was all that remained for them. The magazine was therefore drowned; the arms and every article of value thrown overboard; the ship scuttled; the pumps choked, and the colors were then hauled down at five o'clock. One of the boats was sent to acquaint the enemy that the ship would make no further resistance. "On approaching the enemy," says one of the officers employed on this occasion, "we were hailed by almost every one, and each ordered us along-side of his boat. One, however, fired a shot, which struck near us, and presuming him to be the commodore, we rowed towards him, when one of the near-gun-boats, perceiving we were not coming to him, manned his boat and came after us. There were about fifteen men in this boat, all armed with pistols, with sabres, and a long musket suspended over their backs. They were a ferocious and savage set. They sprang into our boat, and immediately two seized lieutenant Porter, and two seized me. My coat was soon off, my vest unbuttoned, and my cravat torn from my neck. I thought, for my own part, I should not have time to count my beads; but we soon perceivthat their violence was only with the view of getting from us whatever money or valuables we might have concealed about our persons. We now proceeded towards the shore, the gun-boat men continuing in our boat. It was just dark when we approached the beach, which was covered with people, armed and shouting most heditiously, and landed amid the shouts of the populace, by whom we were pushed about rudely. We were conducted to the gate of the pacha's castle, followed by the crowd. Here we were detained some minutes, his majesty not being ready to receive us.— We were, however, at length ushered into his presence. We now felt ourselves safe.— The pacha was seated in state, with his ministers and principal officers about him, and surrounded by a numerous guard. We were desired to be seated, while the boat's crew stood at some distance back. A variety of questions were put to us: how many men were in the Philadelphia? how many guns had she? were any of the guns of brass? how much powder was there? was there any money in the ship? where was commodore Morris? where was the schooner Enterprise? &c. Three glasses of sherbert were brought, one for each of us, of which we drank."

The same scene of plunder was renewed when the Tripolitans came on board. They took from captain Bainbridge his watch, and epaulets, and the cravat from his neck; but with much struggling and difficulty he saved the miniature of his wife. When he was brought into the castle, the same set of questions was repeated by the pacha, who observed, among other things, that the fortune of war had placed captain Bainbridge in his present situation. They were then sent to another apartment, where a supper was provided for the officers; after which they were brought in a body before the pacha, who gratified himself by taking a view of them collectively. The complacency with which he surveyed them, his cheerful and animated countenance, sufficiently denoted his satisfaction at seeing them. His reception of them, however, made favorable impressions of his character. He presented them to his minister of foreign affairs, Sidi Muhammed Dghies, who was to have charge of them, and who, the bashaw observed, would take good care of them. This indeed they found to be strictly true; for they were now conducted to the house of the late American consul, and although it was by this time one o'clock in the morning, the minister sent for the Danish consul, Mr. Nissen, whom he introduced to captain Bainbridge, as his particular friend, and one who would render the officers every service in his power. This estimable man immediately brought refreshments, and all the bedding which he could collect at that hour; and about two o'clock the officers lay down to sleep as well as their new and terrible misfortune would permit them. The next day, the minister of foreign affairs requested captain Bainbridge and his officers to give their parole, in order that he might, in turn, pledge his word to the pacha for their safety. This was complied with.— The officers also presented an unanimous address to the captain, in which they stated their belief that the charts and soundings justified as near an approach to the shore as they had made; and declaring, that on this as on every other occasion, his conduct had always been correct and honorable. Soothed by this proof of confidence and attachment, captain Bainbridge endeavored to render the situation of his officers and crew as comfortable as possible. The consular house was commodious, and although not large enough for the accommodation of so many persons, was, at least airy, and the atmosphere they breathed was pure. About a fortnight after this, however, the pacha's minister acquainted captain Bainbridge that letters had been received from the Tripolitans who had been taken by captain Rodgers, in the John Adams, complaining of being ill treated by him, and captain Bainbridge was requested to sign an order upon commodore Preble to give up these Tripolitan prisoners, with a declaration, that if he refused, the ill treatment shewn to the Tripolitans should be retaliated upon the officers of the Philadelphia. Captain Bainbridge peremptorily refused to sign this order, and accordingly, by way of punishment; they were conducted by the slave-driver to the prison where the crew were confined at work. Here they remained one day, when the Tripolitan government, finding captain Bainbridge's firmness not to be shaken, they were reconducted in the evening to the consular house, and an apology received from the minister for the indignity they had suffered. Here they were continued, and were permitted occasionally to walk out to the country in small parties, accompanied by a guard.

On the sixteenth of February, 1804, the Philadelphia was burnt by Decatur. This mortified the pacha exceedingly; though he affected to consider it as the fortune of war. Some of the bodies of persons who were known to have been on board the Philadelphia, floated ashore, from which the pacha pretended to believe that Decatur, after getting clear of the harbor, had, in cold blood, killed the prisoners. This was the pretext for increasing the severity of their confinement. Accordingly they were removed to apartments in the pacha's castle, exceedingly small, and but ill adapted to accommodate so many. They were without windows, and all the light, as well as fresh air, was admitted through a small opening at the top, grated over with iron railing. The door was constantly bolted, and watched by a strong guard, as was also the top of the prison. The atmosphere they breathed, while thus closely confined, soon became unhealthy, and captain Bainbridge repeatedly represented to the minister, that they could not exist so crowded together and with such confined air. After much delay, and when the warm weather came on, and they were all getting sick, these accommodations were enlarged by the addition of other rooms. Still they were much crowded, and they could not have sustained such confinement, but that the climate of Tripoli is the mildest and most delightful in the world. While in this confinement they were sometimes, when none of the American cruisers were off, permitted to walk into the country; but there was one period of nearly eight months, that they were not allowed this indulgence, and these eight months included one whole summer, a season when the weather was warm, and consequently they most needed exercise and fresh air. They continued in this confinement until the peace of June, 1805.

The conduct of the pacha and his officers was, however, far more mild than they had been led to anticipate, and even this rigorous confinement was imposed, not so much with a view to make them suffer, as because the pacha thought it the only mode by which he could secure them. He was very apprehensive on this point. The Danish consul endeavored to explain to the Tripolitan government the nature of a parole among Europeans, and assured the government that by getting them to pledge their honor, they would make no attempt to escape, and should be more safe than by all his guards, his bolts, and his bars; but this the pacha could not understand, and he could not be made to believe that any prisoner who had the chance to escape, would be deterred from doing so merely because he had passed his word. It was once debated in the divan, whether it would not be advisable to put the officers to hard labor, under the idea that commodore Preble, as soon as he heard of it, would, on their account, be more solicitous for peace. But it was justly concluded that it would have a contrary tendency, that it would irritate and exasperate their countrymen, and induce a more vigorous prosecution of the war. The project was therefore abandoned.

When the news was received that general Eaton had taken Derne, and in conjunction with the dethroned pacha, was advancing towards Tripoli, Eaton's force was greatly exaggerated, and the pacha became alarmed.—He sent word to captain Bainbridge, that heretofore he considered the war as one of interest only; that the United States prosecuted it in order to get away their countrymen for as small a sum of money as possible, and that he continued it to get as much as possible for his prisoners; but that now the Americans had made common cause with his exiled brother, and that consequently, he must succeed against Eaton or lose his kingdom; that he had the means of injuring the feelings of the American people in a most delicate point (meaning, by putting the prisoners to death) and that in a case of extremity he should enforce these means. The pacha thought to alarm captain Bainbridge, and induce him to write to the commodore or to Eaton. Captain Bainbridge, however, replied, that he and his officers were in the power of the pacha, and that he might do with them as he pleased; that the United States had many officers and seamen, and that consequently they should be no loss to their country. This spirited reply saved him from any more such messages. It is impossible to say whether the pacha would or would not have gone to this extremity.—He is a man of strong passions, and ambitious; and had he been driven from his kingdom, he might have been urged to this violence; as it cannot be supposed that he should entertain the same sentiments of abhorrence at the atrocity of sacrificing his prisoners, as would be felt by an European. A place in the interior had certainly been fixed on as a place of security for them, in case it became necessary to remove them from the capital.

While thus confined, without exercise or change of scene, their time, it may be easily imagined, passed heavily. But their youth, and the hardy frame of mind, created by their profession, were qualified to resist for a long time the depressing effects of misfortune. After the short interval of unavailing regret had passed, they collected their spirits and resources, and endeavored to derive amusement and occupation from every quarter.

When they were taken they lost all their clothes. The officers of the Vixen, as soon as they heard of this circumstance, sent a part of their clothes, which came very seasonably. Soon after, some of their own was brought to the prison for sale, and each officer, having thus an opportunity of purchasing some of his former wardrobe, they had a sufficient supply. Some of their books were also taken to them to be sold, and were purchased from the Tripolitans, to whom they were entirely useless, at a price generally much below their value.

These furnished the means of constant employment, as their officers were enabled to pursue the studies to which they were attached, and the prison became a sort of academy, in which navigation, the French language, and other instructive studies were cultivated. Occasionally too, they found relief against ennui in theatrical performances. Among the books purchased was an odd volume of plays, containing the Castle Spectre, the Heir at Law, the Stranger and Secrets Worth Knowing.

These were successively got up and performed. This resource was husbanded very carefully. Thus they were busily occupied for some time in preparing the scenery, then the dresses, then in rehearsing, and finally, after great exertions for three or four weeks, the theatre was opened. The scenery was painted in such colors as could be procured; the gayer dresses of the ladies were formed of sheets, while black silk handkerchiefs sewed together furnished suits of wo; and leaves and paper completed the materials of the female toilet. After this, criticisms upon the performance and dresses of the several actors and actresses kept them alive, and sometimes cheerful for a fortnight; and now again they began to prepare for another play.

Another great resource was, that sometimes they received letters from their friends in America. This indeed was rare; but it always had a most lively and permanent effect upon them. Their greatest comfort, however, certainly was that they were all kept together. Had they been separated, and deprived of the support of each other's society, they could not have survived so long a captivity.

Among their comforts too, we should not omit the active and friendly humanity of Mr. Nissen, the Danish consul—a gentleman whose generous, manly, and honorable conduct should be connected with every mention of the Tripolitan war. While the other agents of foreign countries, the French, English, and Spanish consuls, kept aloof from some paltry consideration of timidity, or commercial jealousy, or wrote to the captives a cold and formal and complimentary and unmeaning offer of service, Mr. Nissen came forward at once, and from the first to the last hour of their captivity was a constant, unremitting, anxious, and affectionate friend. Money, clothes, books, every thing which could contribute to render the situation of the captives less irksome, was lavished by the friendly zeal of Mr. Nissen. When the period of their captivity was about expiring, they addressed to that estimable man a letter of thanks for his disinterested friendship; and as soon as they were released presented to him an urn, as a lasting monument of his benevolence and their gratitude.

Besides other modes of occupying their time, their minds were frequently excited by hopes and efforts to escape. An attempt was made in the latter end of April, 1804, to undermine the castle and escape under the wall. They commenced digging in the room of the warrant officers; but after working for four days, they reached, at the depth of twenty-five feet, a loose sand and water, and found that the foundation of the castle was built upon made ground of so loose a texture, that it was impracticable to undermine it horizontally the requisite distance, which was one hundred and fifty yards, without boards to prop it and prevent its falling in; and as they had none of these, they were obliged to look to some other means of escape. In the following May they adopted another scheme.—One of the inner walls of the prison communicated with a subterraneous passage, which they hoped would lead to the outward wall of the castle, and by perforating this they expected to find a passage in the town. Accordingly they began to take out one by one the stones of this wall, which were carefully replaced to avoid suspicion. For this labor they had nothing but their case knives, a dull axe, and an iron bolt; but they at last got into a long, dark, subterraneous passage, which they followed for some time, till their progress was stopped by another wall. This they perforated; but, to their surprise and mortification, found a space of made earth or terrace, on which the top of the castle rested. They were not, however, disheartened, but began to excavate a space large enough for a man to crawl in upon his hands and knees, carefully removing the earth a distance, and scattering it through the subterranean passage; but they had not made much progress, before the movements of the soldiers and the great weight on the top of the terrace made it cave in, and destroyed the whole enterprise. Fortunately the suspicions of the guard were not excited, and the plan remained undiscovered.

Another and more bold attempt had no better success. It was intended to reach, by a difficult and dangerous way, to the window at the top of the prison, through which they were to get on the terrace, and taking advantage of some moment when the guards were asleep or inattentive, cross the terrace, a distance of fifty or sixty yards, to the parapet of the wall. In one of the embrasures of this they were to make fast a rope, formed of all the sheets tied together, and descend a height of ninety feet to the beach. The first who got down were to swim to a Spanish vessel about half a mile off, cut her boat adrift and bring it ashore, and the whole party were then to embark and endeavour to gain the American squadron. This plan was confined to captain Bainbridge and a few of the original projectors of it. On the eve of its execution, captain Bainbridge wrote to the Tripolitan minister to inform him, that as no regard had been paid to their parole, he deemed himself justifiable in attempting to regain his liberty, and recommending the officers who should be left behind to his particular care and attention. To those officers themselves he addressed a note, stating that as all could not make the attempt, it was necessarily confined to its projectors; that the escape of himself and so many officers would enable them to render the greatest services to those who remained, and hasten the period of their liberation, by lessening the sum to be demanded by the Tripolitans. When these arrangements were concluded, the party reached the window, but it blew so violent a gale of wind; that they were obliged to postpone the project; and captain Bainbridge, finding that his departure excited uneasiness in the minds of some of the officers, abandoned the expedition and determined to share their fate. The attempt was then made by three lieutenants and as many midshipmen. At midnight, on the twenty-first of May, they reached the terrace, and remained there for nearly two hours, endeavouring to seek a moment to cross to the parapet; but the terrace was covered with guards, and they found no opportunity of getting off. The failure of this scheme put an end to all plans of escape, and they patiently waited their liberation from the hands of their countrymen.

During the bombardment of the town, they were the melancholy and inactive witnesses of the efforts of their countrymen. The burning of the Philadelphia, the explosion of the fire ship commanded by captain Somers, and the various attacks made on the town, all passed before their eyes. Sometimes too they were exposed from their situation to great danger. On one occasion, a twenty-four pound shot came into captain Bainbridge's bed-room and passed within six inches of his head.

While the officers were confined, the men were kept at work during the day, and locked up at night. The work, however, which was required of them was always light, and nothing more than wholesome exercise. It was scarcely as severe as the ordinary duty which is exacted from them on board ship.—The Tripolitans are, generally speaking, and excepting the people employed in the gun-boats, of a mild, humane character. The prisoners were often obstinate, uncomplying, and mischievous; yet the Tripolitans who had charge of them were rarely provoked to punish them. They used often to say, that the Americans were the most difficult to manage of any people they had ever seen. Several of the crew turned Mahometans, and thus gained their freedom; but the rest remained faithful to their country and religion.*

At last colonel Lear appeared off the harbor to negotiate a peace with Tripoli. The first overtures were embarrassed by the employment of the Spanish consul, who was at length put aside, and captain Bainbridge proposed, as the shortest mode of pacification,

* It would be unjust not to record an instance of the generosity of these seamen. Among the divers who superintended them while at work was a Neapolitan, himself a captive, who had consented to pity for them, and done them acts of kindness. Touched by this treatment, the crew, as they were about to leave Tripoli, made a subscription out of their wages, of between three and four hundred dollars, with which they purchased the liberty of the Neapolitan, who was thus restored at the same time with themselves to freedom and his country.

that he should be permitted to visit the squadron. This request was so new in Barbary, that the officers of the Philadelphia were obliged to give a written declaration, that in case he did not return they would submit to any punishment the pacha might inflict. Under this guarantee he had an interview with the American officers, and a treaty was at last concluded between the two countries; by which the American and Tripolitan prisoners were exchanged and the sum of sixty thousand dollars was given to the pacha. On the third of June, 1805, the officers were liberated after a confinement of nineteen months and three days, and on the fourth they, as well as the crew, embarked on board the squadron, and soon after sailed for America.

Captain Bainbridge reached the United States in the autumn of 1805, and the reception which he met from his country was such as to satisfy completely the feelings of a meritorious but unfortunate officer. He was received rather as a returning conqueror than as a vanquished prisoner—a most unequivocal proof of public confidence, since that merit must indeed be sterling which could stand the test of such misfortunes. Nor were the opinions of his brother officers less honorable and liberal. At his request a court of enquiry had been held on the loss of the frigate, and the judgment of the court was, that it “was decidedly of opinion that captain Bainbridge acted with fortitude and good conduct in the loss of the United States’ frigate Philadelphia; and that no degree of censure should attach itself to him from that event.”

Early in 1805 he was ordered to take the command of the naval station at New York; but soon after obtained a furlough to perform a voyage in the merchant service; which, from the reduced state of his fund, had become necessary to make some provision for his family. He returned in 1807, and was employed in various naval duties, until March, 1808, when he was appointed to the Portland station, which had become vacant by the death of commodore Preble. In December following, he was called to Washington, to superintend the repairs of the frigate President, which he was appointed to command. Having completed the ship, he sailed in July, 1809, from Washington, and cruised on our coast till the next spring, when he again obtained permission from the navy department to engage in the merchant service.

Having returned from his mercantile pursuits in February, 1812, he was appointed to the command of the navy-yard at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and the public vessels on the eastern station.

On the declaration of war against Great Britain, it was submitted by the government to his own inclination, either to retain his post at the navy yard, or to cruise against the enemy on the ocean. Accustomed to a life of active service, and preferring the hazard of warfare and the chance of victory, to the security of inaction, he did not hesitate to choose the former, and was accordingly appointed to command the frigate Constellation; but on the arrival at Boston of captain Hull, after his victory over the British frigate Guerriere, he applied for a furlough to attend to his private concerns, and commodore Bainbridge was permitted to take command of the Constitution. In a few weeks he sailed, in company with the sloop of war Hornet, captain Lawrence, on a cruise to the East-Indies. After parting company with captain Lawrence, he was running down the coast of Brazil, when, on Thursday, the 29th of December, he discovered, about nine in the morning, two sail, one of which was standing off shore towards him. He immediately made sail to meet the strange ship, and finding, as he approached her, that she did not answer his private signals, proceeded out to sea in order to separate her from her companion, and draw her off the neutral coast. About one o'clock, having reached what he considered a proper distance from the shore, he hoisted his ensign and pendant, which was answered by English colors, and perceiving that she was an English frigate (the Java, captain Lambert) he took in the royals, tacked and stood for the enemy. The Java immediately bore down, intending to rake, which the Constitution avoided by wearing. The enemy being now within half a mile to windward, and having hauled down his flag, the Constitution fired a gun ahead to make him show his colors, and immediately poured in her whole broad-side, on which English colors were hoisted, and the fire returned. On this the action became general, within grape and cannister distance. In a few minutes the wheel of the Constitution was shot away; and in about half an hour, commodore Bainbridge finding that his adversary still kept too far off, determined to close with him at the risk of being raked. He therefore luffed up so close to the Java, that in passing, her jibboom got foul of the Constitution's mizen rigging; and having now gained a nearer position, he poured in so well directed a fire, that in ten minutes he shot away the Java's jibboom and part of her bowsprit; in five minutes more her foremast went by the board—her maintopmast followed—then the gaff and spanker boom, and lastly, the mizenmast went nearly by the board.—At five minutes past four, one hour and fifty-five minutes from the commencement of the action, the Java's fire was completely silenced, and her colors being down, commodore Bainbridge supposed that she had struck: he therefore shot ahead to repair his rigging; but while hove to for that purpose, discovered that her colors were still flying, although her mainmast had just gone by the board. He therefore bore down again upon her, and having got close athwart her bows, was on the point of raking her with a broadside, when she hauled down her colors, being a completely unmanageable wreck, entirely dismantled, without a spar of any kind standing. On boarding her, it was found that captain Lambert had been mortally wounded, and that the Java was so much injured, that it would be impossible to bring her to the United States. All the prisoners and the baggage were therefore brought on board the Constitution, a service which it required two days to perform, there being but a single boat left between the two frigates. On the 31st she was blown up, and the Constitution put into St. Salvador. The Java carried forty-nine guns, and upwards of four hundred men: she was bound to the East-Indies, and had, in addition to her own crew, upwards of one hundred supernumerary officers and seamen, for different ships on the East-India station—among whom was a master and commander in the navy, and also lieutenant general Hislop, and his two aids, of the British army.

Her loss was sixty killed; and among these captain Lambert. Of the wounded, the accounts varied from one hundred and one (which were ascertained positively) to one hundred and seventy.

On board the Constitution, nine were killed, and twenty-five wounded; among whom was the commodore himself.

This victory was scarcely less honorable to commodore Bainbridge, than the generosity with which he exercised the rights of a conqueror. While on board, the prisoners were treated with the most respectful attention. Immediately on their landing at St. Salvador, they were set at liberty on parole, and received every article of their baggage: and particularly a service of plate belonging to general Hislop, was carefully preserved and restored to him. These proofs of honorable courtesy were not lost on the prisoners, who expressed their gratitude in a manner as creditable to themselves as to the victors.

The decayed state of the Constitution and other circumstances, combining to interfere with the original plan of the cruise, commodore Bainbridge now left the Hornet to blockade a superior British force at St. Salvador and returned to the United States.

On his arrival at Boston, he was received with an enthusiastic welcome by his countrymen, who felt peculiar pleasure in seeing that Fortune had at last relented, and given him an opportunity of adding success to merit. Fifty thousand dollars prize-money, as a compensation for the loss of the Java, were given by congress to the officers and crew, and a gold medal presented to the commodore himself. These were followed by votes of thanks and testimonials of respect, from several of the state legislatures, and also from various corporate bodies and meetings of the citizens generally.

Since his return, he has been appointed to command the eastern station from Portsmouth to Connecticut, within which limits he had charge of the Constitution and two brigs; and the construction of two sloops of war; but his chief employment is the building at Charlestown of a seventy-four, which he is appointed to command.

Of the private character of an individual still living, and known so extensively, it is neither necessary nor proper to speak. His domestic life is singularly fortunate. In the year 1798 he married, at St. Bartholomews, Miss Heylegir, an amiable and respectable lady of St. Eustatia, by whom he has three children.

What new adventures await him when afloat in the first American ship of the line, must be left to time and fortune. His country may, however, confidently indulge in all the anticipations which great professional skill, determined spirit, and a high sense of national and personal honor, are calculated to inspire.

Commodore Perry.

FROM THE ANALECTIC MAGAZINE.

In taking up the pen to commemorate another of our naval victories, we solicit the patience of our readers if we indulge in a few preliminary reflections not strictly arising out of the subject of this memoir, though, we trust not wholly irrelevant.

Indeed we do not pretend to the rigid precision and dispassionate coolness of historic narrative. Excited as we are by the tone and temper of the times, and the enthusiasm that prevails around us, we cannot, if we would, repress those feelings of pride and exultation that gush warm from the heart; when the triumphs of our navy are the theme. Public joy is at all times contagious; but in the present lowering days of evil, it is a sight as inspiring as it is rare, to behold a whole nation breaking forth into gladness.

There is a point, however, beyond which exultation becomes insulting, and honest pride swells into vanity. When this is exceeded, even success proves injurious, and instead of begetting a proper confidence in ourselves, produces that most disgusting of all national faults, boastful arrogance. This is the evil against the encroachments of which we would earnestly caution our countrymen; it comes with such an open and imposing front of worthy patriotism, and at such warm and mean-tious moments, that it is apt to take possession of us before we are aware. We have already noticed some symptoms of its prevalence. We have seen many of our papers filled with flaisome and extravagant paragraphs, echoing the vulgar joy and coarse tauntings of the rabble: these may be acceptable to the gross palates of the mean minded; but they must grieve the feelings of the generous and liberal; and must lessen our triumphs in the eyes of impartial nations. In this we behold the striking difference between those who fight battles, and those who merely talk about them. Our officers are content modestly to announce their victories; to give a concise statement of their particulars, and then drop the subject: but then the theme is taken up by a thousand vaunting tongues, and vaunting pens; each tries to outvie the other in extravagant applause until the very ear of admiration becomes wearied with excessive eulogium,

We do not know whether in these remarks we are not passing censure upon ourselves, and whether we do not largely indulge in the very weakness we condemn; but of this we are sure, that in our rejoicings no feelings enter insulting to the foe. We joy, indeed, in seeing the flag of our country encircled with glory, and our nation elevated to a dignified rank among the nations of the earth; but we make no boastful claims to intrinsic superiority, nor seek to throw sneer nor stigma on an enemy, whom, in spite of temporary hostility, we honor and admire.

But surely if any impartial mind will consider the circumstances of the case, he will pardon our countrymen for overstepping, in the flush of unexpected and repeated success, the modest bounds of propriety. Is it a matter of surprise that, while our cheeks are yet scarce cool from the blushes—the burning blushes—of wounded pride and insulting patriotism, with which we have heard our country ridiculed and set at naught by other nations—while our ears still ring with the galling terms in which even British statesmen have derided us, as weak, pusillanimous and contemptible—while our memories are still sore with the tales of our flag insulted in every sea, and our countrymen oppressed in every port—is it a matter of surprise that we should break forth into transports at seeing these foul aspersions all suddenly brushed away—at seeing a continual series of brilliant successes flashing around the national standard, and dazzling all eyes with their excessive brightness? “Can such things be, and overcome us, like a summer cloud,” without, not merely our “special wonder,” but our special exultation? He who will cast his eye back, and notice how, in little more than one year, we have suddenly sprung from peaceful insignificance to proud competition with a power whose laurels have been the slow growth of ages, will easily excuse temporary effervescence of our feelings.

For our parts we duly declare that we reverence the British nation. One of the dearest wishes of our hearts is to see a firm and well grounded friendship established between us. Bu friendship can never long endure, unless founded on mutual independence; and however we may deplore the present war, this double good will spring out of it; we will learn our own value and resources, and will teach our antagonist and the world at large to know and estimate us properly. There is an obsequious deference in the minds of too many of our countrymen towards Great Britain, that not only impairs the independence of the national character, but defeats the very object they would attain. They would make any sacrifices to maintain a precarious, and patched up, and humiliating, connexion with her; but they may rest assured that the good opinion of Great Britain was never gained by servile acquiescence; she never will think the better of a people for thinking despicably of themselves. We execrate that lowliness of spirit that would flatter her vanity, cower beneath her contumely, and meanly lay our honors at her feet. We wish not her friendship gratuitously; but to acquire it as a right; not to supplicate it by forbearance and long suffering, but gallantly to win and proudly to maintain it. After all, if she will not be a friend, she must become a rival; she will be obliged to substitute jealousy for contempt, and surely it is more tolerable, at any time, to be hated than despised.

Such is the kind of feeling that we avow towards Great Britain—equally removed, we trust, from rancorous hostility on the one side, and blind partiality on the other.

Whatever we may think of the expediency or in expediency of the present war, we cannot feel indifferent to its operations.—Whenever our arms come in competition with those of the enemy, jealousy of our country's honor will swallow up every other consideration. Our feelings will ever accompany the flag of our country to battle, rejoicing in its glory—lamenting over its defeat. For there is no such thing as releasing ourselves from the consequences of the contest. He who fancies he can stand aloof in interest, and by condemning the present war, can exonerate himself from the shame of its disasters, is wotally mistaken. Other nations will not trouble themselves about our internal wranglings and party questions; they will not ask who among us fought or why we fought—but how we fought. The disgrace of defeat will not be confined to the contrivers of the war, or the party in power or the conductors of the battle; but will extend to the whole nation, and come home to every individual.—If the name of American is to be rendered honorable in the fight, we shall each participate in the honor; if otherwise, we must inevitably support our share of the ignominy. For these reasons do we watch, with anxious eye, the various fortunes of this war; a war awfully decisive of the fortune, character and destinies of the nation. But much as we are gladdened by the bright gleams that occasionally break forth amid the darkness of the times, yet joyfully, most joyfully, shall we hail the period, when the "troubled night" of war shall be passed, and the "star of peace" again shed its mild radiance on our country.

We have seized this opportunity to express the foregoing sentiments, because we thought that if of any value, they might stand some chance of making an impression, when accompanied by the following memoir. And, indeed, in writing these naval biographies, it is our object not merely to render a small tribute of gratitude to these intrepid champions of our honor; but to render our feeble assistance towards promoting that national feeling which their triumphs are calculated to inspire.

Oliver Hazard Perry is the eldest son of Christopher Raymond Perry, Esq. of the United States navy. He was born at Newport, Rhode Island, in August, 1785, and being early destined for the navy, he entered the service in 1798, as midshipman, on board the sloop of war General Greene, then commanded by his father. When that ship went out of commission, he was transferred to a squadron destined to the Mediterranean, where he served during the Tripolitan war. His extreme youth prevented his having an opportunity of distinguishing himself; but the faithfulness and intelligence with which he discharged the duties of his station, recommended him greatly to the favor of his superior officers; while his private virtues, and the manly dignity of his deportment, commanded the friendship and respect of his associates.

On returning from the Mediterranean he continued sedulously attentive to his profession, and although the reduction of the navy, and the neglect into which it fell during an interval of peace, disheartened many officers, and occasioned several to resign, yet he determined to adhere to its fortunes, confident that it must at some future period rise to importance. It would be little interesting to enumerate the different vessels in which he served, to trace his advances through the regular grades. In 1810, we find he was ordered to the U. S. schooner Revenge, as lieutenant commandant. This vessel was attached to the squadron of commodore Rodgers, at New-London, and employed in cruising in the Sound, to enforce the embargo act. In the following spring he had the misfortune to lose the Revenge on Watch Hill Reef, opposite Stony Town. He had sailed from Newport, late in the evening for New London, with an easterly wind, accompanied by a fog. In the morning he found himself enveloped in a thick mist, with a considerable swell going.—In this situation, without any possibility of ascertaining where he was, or of guarding against surrounding dangers, the vessel was carried on the reef, and soon went to pieces. On this oc-occasion Perry gave proofs of that admirable coolness and presence of mind for which he is remarkable. He used every precaution to save the guns and property, and was in a great measure successful. He got off all the crew in perfect safety, and was himself the last to leave the wreck. His conduct in respect to this disaster underwent examination by a court of inquiry, at his own request, and he was not merely acquitted of all blame, but highly applauded for the judgment, intrepidity, and perseverance he had displayed. The secretary of the navy, Mr. Hamilton, also wrote him a very complimentary letter on the occasion.

Shortly after this event he returned to Newport, being peculiarly attracted thither by a tender attachment for Miss Mason, daughter of Dr. Mason, and niece of the hon. Christopher Champlin of the United States senate; a lovely and interesting young lady, whom he soon after married.

At the beginning of 1812 he was promoted to the rank of master and commander, and ordered to the command of the flotilla of gun boats stationed at the harbor of New-York. He remained on this station about a year; during which time he employed himself diligently in disciplining his crew to serve either as landsmen or mariners; and brought his flotilla into an admirable state of preparation for active operations.

The gun-boat service, however, is at best but an irksome employ. Nothing can be more dispiriting for ardent and daring minds than to be obliged to skulk about harbors and rivers, cramped up in these diminutive vessels, without the hope of exploit to atone for present inconvenience. Perry soon grew tired of this inglorious service, and applied to the secretary of the navy to be ordered to a more active station and mentioned the lakes as the one he should prefer. His request was immediately complied with, and he received orders to repair to Sackett's Harbor, lake Ontario, with a body of mariners to reinforce the squadron under commodore Chauncey. So popular was he among the honest tars under his command, that no sooner was the order known than nearly the whole of his crews volunteered to accompany him.

In a few days he was ready to depart, and tearing himself from the comforts of home, and the endearments of a young and beautiful wife and blooming child, he set off at the head of a large number of chosen seamen, on his expedition to the wilderness. The rivers being completely frozen over, they were obliged to perform the journey by land, in the depth of winter. The greatest order and good humor prevailed throughout the little band of adventurers, to whom the whole expedition seemed a kind of frolic, and who were delighted with what they termed a land cruise.

Not long after the arrival of Perry at Sack-ett's Harbor, commodore Chauncey, who entertained a proper opinion of his merits, detached him to lake Erie, to take command of the squadron on that station, and to superintend the building of additional vessels. The American force at that time on the lake consisted but of several small vessels; two of the best of which had recently been captured from the enemy in a gallant style by capt. Elliot, from under the very batteries of Fort Erie. The British force was greatly superior, and commanded by commodore Barclay, an able and well tried officer. Commodore Perry immediately applied himself to increase his armament, and having ship carpenters from the Atlantic coast, and using extraordinary exertions, two brigs of twenty guns each were soon launched at Erie, the American port on the lake.

While the vessels were constructing, the British squadron hovered off the harbor, but offered no molestation. At length, his vessels, being equipped and manned, on the fourth of August, commodore Perry succeeded in getting his squadron over the bar at the mouth of the harbor. The water on the bar was but five feet deep, and the large vessels had to be buoyed over; this was accomplished in the face of the British who fortunately did not think proper to make an attack. The next day he sailed in pursuit of the enemy, but returned on the 8th, without having encountered him. Being reinforced by the arrival of the brave Elliot, accompanied by several officers and eighty-nine sailors, he was enabled completely to man his squadron, and again set sail on the twelfth, in quest of the enemy. On the fifteenth he arrived at Sandusky Bay, where the American army under general Harrison lay encamped. From thence he cruised off Malden, where the British squadron remained at anchor, under the guns of the fort. The appearance of Perry's squadron spread great alarm on the shore; the women and children ran shrieking about the place, expecting an immediate attack. The Indians we are told, looked on with astonishment, and urged the British to go out and fight. Finding the enemy not disposed to venture a battle, commodore Perry returned to Sandusky.

Nothing of moment happened until the morning of the tenth of September. The American squadron were, at that time, lying at anchor, in Put-in-bay, and consisted of brigs Lawrence, commodore Perry, 20 guns; Niagara, captain Elliot, 20 do.; Caledonia, Purser M'Grath 3 do.; schooners Ariel, lieutenant Packet, 4 do.; Scorpion, sailing-master Champ- lin, 2 do.; Somers, sailing-master Almy, 2 do. and two swivels; Tigress, lieutenant Conklin, 1 do.; Porcupine, midshipman G. Senat, 1 do.; sloop Trippe, lieutenant Smith, 1 do.; in all 54 guns.

At sunrise they discovered the enemy, and immediately got under way and stood for him with a light wind at southwest. The British force consisted of the ship Detroit, 19 guns, 1 on pivot, and two howitzers; Queen Charlotte, 17, 1 on pivot; schooner Lady Prevost, 13, 1 do.; brig Hunter, 10; sloop Little-Belt 3; schooner Chippeway 1, and 2 swivels, in all 63 guns.

At 10 A. M. the wind hauled to the southeast and brought our squadron to windward. Commodore Perry then hoisted his Union Jack, having for a motto, the dying words of the valiant Lawrence, "Don't give up the ship!" It was received with repeated cheerings by the officers and crews. And now having formed his line he bore for the enemy; who likewise cleared for action, and hauled up his courses. It is deeply interesting to picture to ourselves the advances of these gallant and well-matched squadrons to a contest, where the strife must be obstinate and sanguinary, and the event decisive of the fate of almost an empire.

The lightness of the wind occasioned them to approach each other but slowly, and prolonged the awful interval of suspense and anxiety that precedes a battle. This is the time when the stoutest heart beats quick, "and the boldest holds his breath;" it is the still moment of direful expectation; of fearful looking out for slaughter and destruction; when even the glow of pride and ambition is chilled for a while, and nature shudders at the awful jeopardy of existence. The very order and regularity of naval discipline heightened the dreadful quiet of the moment. No bustle, no noise prevails to distract the mind, except at intervals the shrill piping of the boatswain's whistle, or a murmuring whisper among the men, who, grouped around their guns, earnestly regard the movements of the foe, now and then stealing a woeful glance at the countenances of their commanders. In this manner did the hostile squadrons approach each other, in mute watchfulness and terrible tranquility, when suddenly a bugle was sounded from on board the enemy's ship Detroit, and loud hazzas immediately burst forth from all their crews.

No sooner did the Lawrence come within reach of the enemy's long guns, than they opened a heavy fire upon her, which, from the shortness of her guns, she was unable to return. Commodore Perry, without waiting for his schooners, kept on his course in such gallant and determined style that the enemy supposed it was his intention to board. In a few minutes, having gained a nearer position, he opened his fire. The length of the enemy's guns, however, gave them vastly the advantage, and the Lawrence was excessively cut up without being able to do any great damage in return. Their shot pierced her sides in all directions, killing our men on the birth deck and in the steerage, where they had been taken down to be dressed. One shot had nearly produced a fatal explosion; passing through the light room it knocked the snuff of the candle into the magazine, fortunately the gunner happened to see it, and had the presence of mind to extinguish it immediately with his hand.

Indeed, it seemed to be the enemy's plan to destroy the commodore's ship, and thus throw the squadron into confusion. For this purpose their heaviest fire was directed at the Lawrence, and blazed incessantly upon it from their largest vessels. Finding the hazard of his situation, Perry made sail, and directed the other vessels to follow for the purpose of closing with the foe. The tremendous fire, however, to which he was exposed, soon cut away every brace and bowline, and the Lawrence became unmanageable.

Even in this disastrous plight, she sustained the action for upwards of two hours, within cannon distance, though for a great part of the time he could not get more than three of her guns to bear upon her antagonists. It was admirable to behold the perfect order and regularity that prevailed among her gallant and devoted crew, throughout this scene of horror. No trepidation, no confusion occurred, even for an instant; as fast as the men were wounded, they were carried below, and others stepped into their places; the dead remained where they fell until after the action. At this juncture the fortune of the battle trembled on a point, and the enemy believed the day their own. The Lawrence was reduced to a mere wreck; her decks were streaming with blood, and covered with the mangled limbs and bodies of the slain; nearly the whole of her crew were either killed or wounded; her guns were dismounted, and the commodore and his officers helped to work the last that was capable of service.

Amidst all this peril and disaster the youthful commander is said to have remained perfectly composed, maintaining a serene and cheerful countenance, uttering no passionate or agitated expression, giving out his orders with calmness and deliberation, and inspiring every one around him by his magnanimous demeanor.

At this crisis, finding that the Lawrence was incapable of further service, and seeing the hazardous situation of the conflict, he formed the bold resolution of shifting his flag. Giving the ship, therefore, in charge to lieutenant Yarnall, who had already distinguished himself by his bravery, he hauled down his union, being the motto of Lawrence, and taking it under his arm, ordered to be put on board of the Niagara, which was then in close engagement. In leaving the Lawrence he gave his pilot choice either to remain on board or accompany him: the faithful fellow told him "he'd stick to him to the last," and jumped into the boat. He went off from the ship, in his usual gallant manner, standing in the stern of the boat, until the crew absolutely pushed him down among them. Broad-sides were levelled at him, and small arms discharged by the enemy, two of whose vessels were within musket shot, and a third one nearer. His brave shipmates who remained behind, stood watching him, in breathless anxiety; the balls struck around him and flew over his head in every direction; but the same special Providence that seems to have watched over the youthful hero throughout this desperate battle, conducted him safely through a shower of shot, and they beheld with transport his inspiring flag hoisted at the mast head of the Niagara. No sooner was he on board than captain Elliot volunteered to put off in a boat and bring into action the schooners which had been kept astern by the lightness of the wind; the gallant offer was accepted, and Elliot left the Niagara to put it in execution.

About this time the commodore saw, with infinite regret, the flag of the Lawrence come down. The event was unavoidable; she had sustained the whole fury of the enemy, and was rendered incapable of defence; any further show of resistance would but have been uselessly and cruelly to have provoked carnage among the relics of her brave and mangled crew. The enemy, however, were not able to take possession of her, and subsequent circumstances enabled her again to hoist her flag.

Commodore Perry now made signal for close action, and the small vessels got out their sweeps and made all sail. Finding that the Niagara was but little injured, he determined, if possible, to break the enemy's line. He accordingly bore up and passed ahead of the two ships and brig, giving them a raking fire from his starboard guns, and also to a large schooner and sloop from his larboard side at half pistol shot. Having passed the whole squadron, he luffed up and laid his ship alongside the British commodore. The smaller vessels under the command of captain Elliot, having, in the mean time, got within grape and cannister distance, and keeping up a well directed fire, the whole of the enemy's fleet struck, excepting two small vessels which attempted to escape, but were taken.

The engagement lasted about three hours, and never was victory more decisive and complete. The captured squadron, as has been shewn, exceeded ours in weight of metal and number of guns. The crews were also more numerous; ours were a motley collection, where there were some good seamen, but eked out with soldiers, volunteers and boys, and many were on the sick list. More prisoners were taken than we had men to guard. The loss on both sides was severe. Scarcely any of the Lawrence's crew remained unhurt.

Among those slain was lieutenant Brooks of the marines, a gay and elegant young officer, full of spirit, of amiable manners, and remarkable for his personal beauty. Lieutenant Yarnall, though repeatedly wounded, refused to quit the deck during the whole of the action. Commodore Perry, notwithstanding that he was continually in the most exposed situations of the battle, escaped uninjured; he wore an ordinary seaman's dress, which, perhaps, prevented him from being picked off by the enemy's sharpshooters. He had a younger brother with him on board the Lawrence as midshipman, who was equally fortunate in receiving no injury, though his shipmates fell all round him. Two indian chiefs had been stationed in the tops of the Detroit to shoot down our officers, but when the action became warm, so panic struck were they with the terrors of the scene, and the strange perils that surrounded them, that they fled precipitately to the hold of the ship, where they were found after the battle in a state of consternation. The bodies of several indians are said to have been found the next day on the shores of the lake, supposed to have been slain during the engagement and thrown overboard.

It is impossible to state the number killed on board the enemy. It must, however, have been very great, as their vessels were literally cut to pieces, and the masts of their two principal ships so shattered that the first gale blew them overboard. Commodore Barclay, the British commander, certainly did himself honor by the brave and obstinate resistance which he made. He is a fine looking officer of about thirty-six years of age. He has seen much service, having been desperately wounded in the battle of Trafalgar, and afterwards losing an arm in another engagement with the French. In the present battle he was twice carried below, on account of his wounds. While below the second time, his officer came down and told him that they must strike, as their ships were cut to pieces and the men could not keep to their guns. Commodore Barclay was then carried on deck, and after taking a view of their situation, and finding all chance of success was over, reluctantly gave orders to strike.

We have thus endeavored to lay before our readers as clear an account of this important battle as could be gathered from the scanty documents which have reached us; though sketched out, we are sensible, with a hand but little skilled in naval affairs. The leading facts, however, are all that a landsman can be expected to furnish, and we trust that this glorious affair will hereafter be recorded with more elaborate care and technical precision. There is, however, a distinctness of character about a naval victory, that meets the capacity of every mind. There is such a simple unity in it; it is so well defined: so complete within itself; so rounded by space; so free from these intricacies and numerous parts that perplex us in action on land, that the meanest intellect can fully grasp and comprehend it. And then, too, the results are so apparent; a victory on land is liable to a thousand misrepresentations; retreat is often called falling back, and abandoning the field taking a new position; so that the conqueror is often defrauded of half the credit of his victory; but the capture or destruction of a ship is not to be mistaken, and a squadron towed triumphantly into port, is a notorious fact that admits of no contradiction.

In this battle, we trust, incontrovertible proof is given, if such proof were really wanted, that the success of our navy does not arise from chance, or superiority of force; but from the cool, deliberate courage, the intelligent minds and naval skill of our officers, the spirit of our seamen, and the excellent discipline of our ships; from principles, in short, which must ensure a frequency of prosperous results, and give permanency to the reputation we have acquired. We have been rapidly adding trophy to trophy, and successively driving the enemy from every excuse in which he sought to shelter himself from the humiliation of defeat; and after having perfectly established our capability of fighting and conquering in single ships, we have now gone further, and shown that it is possible for us to face the foe in squadron, and vanquish him even though superior in force.

In casting our eyes over the details of this engagement; we are struck with the prominent part which the commander takes in the contest. We realize in his dauntless exposure and individual prowess, what we have read in heroic story, of the warrior, streaming like a meteor through the fight, and working wonders with his single arm. The fate of the combat seemed to wrest upon his sword; he was the master spirit that directed the storm of battle, moving amid flames, and smoke, and death, and mingling wherever the struggle was most desperate and deadly. After sustaining in the Lawrence the whole blaze of the enemy's cannonry; after fighting until all around him was wreck and carnage; we behold him, looking forth from his shattered deck, with unruffled countenance, on the direful perils that environed him, calculating with wary eye the chances of the battle, and suddenly launching forth on the bosom of the deep to shift his flag on board another ship, then in the hottest of the action. This was one of those master strokes by which great events are achieved, and great characters stamped, as it were, at a single blow—which bespeak the rare combination of the genius to conceive, the promptness to decide, and the boldness to execute. Most commanders have such glorious chances for renown, sometime or another, within their reach; but it requires the nerve of a hero to grasp the perilous opportunity. We behold Perry following up his daring movement with sustained energy—dashing into the squadron of the enemy—breaking their line—raking their starboard and larboard—and in this brilliant style achieving a consummate victory.

But if we admire his presence of mind and dauntless valor in the hour of danger, we are no less delighted with his modesty and self-command amidst the flush of triumph. A courageous heart may carry a man stoutly through the battle, but it argues some strong qualities of head to drain unmoved the intoxicating cup of victory. The first care of Perry was to attend to the comfort of the suffering crews of both squadrons. The sick and wounded were landed as soon as possible, and every means taken to alleviate the miseries of their situation. The officers who had fallen on both sides, were buried on Sunday morning, on an island in the lake, with the honors of war. To the surviving officers he advanced a loan of one thousand dollars, out of his own limited purse—but, in short, his behaviour in this respect is best expressed in the words of Commodore Barclay, who, with generous warmth and frankness, has declared that “the conduct of Perry towards the captive officers and men was sufficient, of itself, to immortalize him!”

The letters which he wrote announcing the intelligence were remarkably simple and laconic. To the secretary of the navy he observes, “It has pleased the Almighty to give to the arms of the United States, a signal victory over their enemies on this lake. The British squadron consisting of two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop, have this moment surrendered to the force under my command, after a sharp conflict.” This has been called an imitation of Nelson's letter after the battle of the Nile; but it was choosing a noble precedent, and the important national results of the victory justified the language. Independent of the vast accession of glory to our flag, this conquest ensured the capture of Bevoit—the rout of the British armies—the subjugation of the whole peninsula of Upper Canada, and if properly followed up, the triumphant success of our northern war. Well might he say “it has pleased the Almighty,” when, by this achievement, he beheld immediate tranquillity restored to an immense extent of country.—Mothers no longer shrunk aghast, and clasped their infants to their breasts, when they heard the shaking of the forests or the howlings of the blast—the aged sire no longer dreaded the shades of night, lest ruin should burst upon him in the hour of repose, and his cottage be laid desolate by the fire-brand and the scalping knife—Michigan was rescued from the dominion of the sword, and quiet and security once more settled on the harrassed frontiers, from Huron to Niagara.

But we are particularly pleased with his subsequent letter giving the particulars of the battle. It is so chaste, so moderate and perspicuous; equally free from vaunting exultation and affected modesty; neither obtruding himself upon notice, nor pretending to keep out of sight. His own individual services may be gathered from the letter, though not expressly mentioned; indeed, where the fortune of the day depended so materially upon himself, it was impossible to give a faithful narrative without rendering himself conspicuous.

We are led to notice these letters thus particularly, because that we find the art of letter writing is an accomplishment as rare as it is important among our military gentlemen. We are tired of the valor of the pen, and the victories of the inkhorn. There is a common French proverb, "Grand parleur, mauvais combatant," which we should wish to see introduced into our country, and engraven on the swords of our officers. We wish to see them confine themselves in their letters to simple facts, neither swaggering before battle, nor vaunting afterwards. It is unwise to boast before, for the event may prove disastrous—and it is superfluous to boast afterwards, for the event speaks for itself. He who promises nothing, may with safety perform nothing, and will receive praise if he perform but little; but he who promises much will receive small credit unless he perform miracles. If a commander have done well, he may be sure the public will find it out, and their gratitude will be in proportion to his modesty. Admiration is a coin which, if left to ourselves, we lavish profusely, but we always close the hand when dunned for it.

Commodore Perry, like most of our naval officers, is yet in the prime of youth. He is of a manly and prepossessing appearance; mild and unassuming in his address, amiable in his disposition, and of great firmness and decision. Though early launched among the familiar scenes of naval life, (and no where is familiarity more apt to be licentious and encroaching,) yet the native gentility and sober dignity of his deportment always chastened, without restraining, the freedom of intimacy. It is pleasing thus to find public services accompanied by private virtues; to discover no drawbacks on our esteem; no base alloy in the man we are disposed to admire; but a character full of moral excellence, of high minded courtesy, and pure unsullied honor.

Were any thing wanting to perpetuate the fame of this victory, it would be sufficiently memorable from the scene where it was fought. This war has been distinguished by new and peculiar characteristics. Naval warfare has been carried into the interior of a continent, and navies as if by magic launched from the forest. The bosoms of peaceful lakes, which, but a short time since, were scarcely navigated by man, except to be skimmed by the light canoe of the savage, have all at once been ploughed by hostile ships. The vast silence that had reigned for ages on those mighty waters, was broken by the thunder of artillery, and the affrighted savage stared with amazement from his covert, at the sudden apparition of a sea-fight amid the solitudes of the wilderness.

The peal of war has once sounded on that lake, but probably will never sound again.—The last roar of cannonry along her shores, was the expiring note of British domination.—Those vast internal seas will, perhaps, never again be the separating space between contending nations, but will be embosomed within a mighty empire; and this victory, which decided their fate, will stand unrivalled and alone, deriving lustre and perpetuity from its singleness.

In future times, when the shores of Erie shall hum with busy population; when towns and cities shall brighten where now extend the dark and tangled forests; when ports shall spread their arms, and lofty barks shall ride where now the canoe is fastened to the stake; when the present age shall have grown into venerable antiquity, and the mists of fable begin to gather round its history; then will the inhabitants of Canada look back to this battle we record, as one of the romantic achievements of the days of yore. It will stand first on the page of their local legends, and in the marvellous tales of the borders. The fisherman, as he loiters along the beach will point to some half buried cannon, corroded with the rust of time, and will speak of ocean warriors that came from the shores of the Atlantic—while the boatman, as he trims his sail to the breeze, will chant in rude ditties the name of Perry—the early hero of lake Erie.

Captain James Lawrence.

FROM THE PORT FOLIO.

The recent annals of our navy have presented so unbroken a succession of brilliant victories, achieved with comparatively trifling loss, as to excite throughout the country a pure and almost unmingled sentiment of triumph and congratulation. But there is in human affairs no security against accident or misfortune, and we have been therefore, at last, summoned to the melancholy office of mourning the loss of one of those distinguished seamen, whose gallantry was but yesterday the boast of us all. The glory which he created for himself and for his country will, however, long survive the disaster which closed his existence; and we deem it a national duty, as well as a grateful return, for the proud satisfaction with which our hearts once swelled at his successes, to contribute our efforts to extend and perpetuate his fame.

Captain James Lawrence was born on the 1st of October, 1781, at Burlington, in New-Jersey, and was the youngest son of John Lawrence, esq. counsellor at law of that place. Soon after his birth he had the misfortune to lose his mother, and the care of his early years devolved on his two sisters, who seem to have cultivated the moral qualities of his heart with singular success. At the age of twelve, he evinced a strong partiality for the sea; but his father disapproving of that plan of life, and wishing him to pursue the profession of law, young Lawrence acquiesced, and passed with reputation through the grammar school at Burlington, when finding that the pecuniary situation of his father would not furnish him the means of completing his education at any college or university, he commenced the study of law with his brother, the late John Lawrence, esq. at Woodbury. He was now only thirteen years of age, a period of life when the grave pursuits of jurisprudence can scarcely be presumed to have many attractions for a young and ardent fancy, already inflamed with the love of wandering. He continued however, a reluctant student for about two years, when the death of his father leaving him more at liberty to pursue his favorite inclination, he prevailed on his brother to place him under the care of Mr. Griscomb, at Burlington, for the purpose of studying navigation. He here remained for three months, at the expiration of which time, on application to the navy department he received a warrant as midshipman, on the 4th of September, 1798.

His first voyage was in the ship Ganges, captain Tingey, on a cruise to the West Indies. He afterwards sailed in different vessels for upwards of two years, and was then made an acting lieutenant on board the frigate Adams, captain Robertson, where he continued till the reduction of the navy; in consequence of which his appointment was not confirmed, and he remained in the rank of midshipman.

On the commencement of the war with Tripoli, in 1801, he was promoted to a lieutenantancy, and sailed to the Mediterranean as first lieutenant of the schooner Enterprize, in 1803.

While in this situation, he bore a conspicuous part in an adventure of singular boldness, the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia. Lieutenant (now commodore) Decatur, who then commanded the Enterprize, selected, chiefly from his own crew, seventy volunteers, and taking Lawrence as his second in command, embarked on board the ketch Intrepid, and sailed from Syracuse on the 3d February, 1804, accompanied by the United States' brig Syren, lieutenant Stewart, who was to aid with his boats and to receive the crew of the ketch, in case it should be found expedient to use her as a fireship.

After fifteen days of very tempestuous weather, they arrived at the harbor of Tripoli a little before sunset. It had been arranged between lieutenants Decatur and Stewart, that the ketch should enter the harbor about ten o'clock that night attended by the boats of the Syren. On arriving off the harbor, the Syren in consequence of a change of wind, had been thrown six or eight miles without the Intrepid. The wind at this time was fair, but fast declining, and lieutenant Decatur apprehended that, should he wait for the Syren's boats to come up, it might be too late to make the attack that night. Such delay might be fatal to the enterprise, as they could not remain longer on the coast, their provisions being nearly exhausted. For these reasons he determined to adventure into the harbor alone, which he did about eight o'clock.

An idea may be formed of the extreme hazard of this enterprise from the situation of the frigate. She was moored within half gunshot of the bashaw's castle, and of the principal battery. Two of the enemy's cruisers lay within two cables' length, on the starboard quarter, and their gun-boats within half gunshot, on the starboard bow. All the guns of the frigate were mounted and loaded. Such were the immediate perils that our hero ventured to encounter with a single ketch, beside the other dangers that abound in a strongly fortified harbor.

Although it was only three miles from the entrance to the place where the frigate lay, yet, in consequence of the lightness of the wind, they did not get within hail of her until eleven o'clock. When they had approached within two hundred yards, they were hailed and ordered to anchor, or they would be fired into. Lieutenant Decatur ordered a Maltese pilot, who was on board the ketch, to answer that they had lost their anchors in a gale of wind on the coast and therefore could not comply with their request. By this time it had become perfectly calm, and they were about fifty yards from the frigate. Lieutenant Decatur ordered a small boat that was alongside of the ketch, to take a rope and make it fast to the frigate's fore chains: this being done they began to warp the ketch alongside. It was not until this moment that the enemy suspected the character of their visitor, and great confusion immediately ensued. This enabled our adventurers to get alongside of the frigate, when Decatur immediately sprang aboard, followed by Mr. Charles Morris, *midshipman. These two were nearly a minute on the deck, before their companions could succeed in mounting the side. Fortunately, the Turks had not sufficiently recovered from their surprise to take advantage of this delay: they were crowded together on the quarter-deck, perfectly astonished and aghast, without making any attempt to oppose the assailing party. As soon as a sufficient number of our men had gained the deck to form a front equal to that of the enemy, they rushed in upon them. The Turks stood the assault but a short time, and were completely overpowered. About twenty were killed on the spot, many jumped overboard, and the rest fled to the main-deck, whither they were pursued and driven to the hold.

After entire possession had been gained of the ship, and every thing prepared to set fire to her a number of launches were seen rowing about the harbor. This determined lieutenant Decatur to remain in the frigate, from whence a better defence could be made than from on board the ketch. The enemy had already commenced firing on them from their batteries and castle, and from two corsairs that were lying near. Perceiving that the launches did not attempt to approach, he ordered that the ship should be set on fire, which was done at the same time, in different parts. As soon as this was completely effected they left her; and such was the rapidity of the flames, that it was with the utmost difficulty they preserved the ketch. At this critical moment a most propitious breeze sprang up, blowing directly out of the harbor, which, in a few minutes, carried them beyond the reach of the enemy's guns, and they made good their retreat without the loss of a single man, and with but one wounded.

For this gallant achievement, lieutenant Decatur received a captaincy; and congress voted to Lawrence and the other officers and crew, two months extra pay, which he declined receiving.

During the same year, when commodore Preble bombarded the town of Tripoli, the Enterprize, with the other ships of the squadron, were employed to cover the boats during the attack. On this occasion lieutenant Lawrence had the temporary command of the Enterprize, and performed his service in so gallant and seaman like a manner, as to receive the thanks of commodore Preble.

From the Enterprize he was transferred to the frigate John Adams as first lieutenant; and after remaining in the Mediterranean about three years, he returned with commodore Preble to the United States.

Soon after he was again sent to the Mediterranean as commander of gun-boat No. 6. These vessels were originally destined to serve merely along the American coast, and however qualified for harbor or river defence, were deemed exceedingly insecure in crossing the Atlantic. Being very small, with a disproportionately large gun and necessarily laden very deeply, they labored under every disadvantage in encountering heavy gales. So decided were the opinions of the naval officers against them, that no one would, perhaps, have been willing to risk his life in them on such a voyage, for any motive of private advantage, or from any consideration, except the performance of his duty. "Lawrence has told me," writes one of his brother officers, "that when he went on board the gun-boat, he had not the faintest idea that he would ever arrive out to the Mediterranean in her, or indeed arrive any where else. He has also told me, that on the coast of Europe he met an English frigate, the captain of which would not at first believe that he had crossed the Atlantic in such a vessel." He did not, however, go with less alacrity, and he unexpectedly arrived safely in the Mediterranean, where he remained about sixteen months.

On his return from the Mediterranean, after the peace with Tripoli, he was appointed first lieutenant of the frigate Constitution, and afterwards commanded the schooner Vixen, the sloop of war Wasp, the brig Argus, and the ship Hornet, with the rank of master and commander, and was twice sent to Europe with despatches to our ministers. In the year 1808, he married a daughter of Mr. Montauveret, a respectable merchant of New York.

The declaration of war against Great Britain, in June, 1812, gave a new impulse, or rather a new existence to the navy. Lawrence was at that time in New York, in command of the Hornet, and in a few days sailed with a squadron, consisting of the United States, Congress, and Argus, under the command of commodore Rogers, in the President. Their object was to intercept the Jamaica fleet. After being detained for a day by the pursuit of the British frigate Belvidere, which ended in the escape of the latter, owing to her having the advantage of the wind, the squadron followed the fleet with the utmost alacrity, as well as the imperfect information of the vessels they met would permit, till the 13th of July, when they reached within eighteen or twenty hours sail of the English channel. Disappointed in this chase, they now ran down near the Azores, thence back by the banks of Newfoundland to Boston, where they arrived on the 31st of August. Although this cruise was marked by no bold or prominent success, and although the squadron made only seven captures and a single recapture, yet the failure is attributable to fortune only. At a moment when the British navy, with its boasted ubiquity covered the ocean, this little band of adventurers sought their enemies in every quarter, dared them on their own coast, and after carrying alarm through the mercantile classes of England, returned unmolested, and not victorious, only because the single enemy they encountered sought safety in flight.

The day before the squadron entered Boston, captain Hull arrived after the capture of the Guerriere; and soon afterwards, the government yielding too far to the universal and natural enthusiasm excited by this gallant action, promoted lieutenant Morris, the first officer of the Constitution, to the rank of captain. As this appointment, however, advanced him two grades at once, contrary to the ordinary rules of promotion, and thus placed him above all the masters and commanders in the navy, it occasioned much dissatisfaction among them. Captain Lawrence felt himself peculiarly injured by it; inasmuch as he found himself thus suddenly outranked by one so much his junior. He therefore addressed a letter to the secretary of the navy, in which, after rendering the most ample justice to the merits of lieutenant Morris, he remonstrated in mild and firm, but respectful language, against so unprecedented a promotion, by which he would be forced to leave the navy. In reply to this fair and manly letter he received from the secretary of the navy, a short and contemptuous answer, merely acknowledging the receipt of his letter, with an intimation that if he chose to leave the service without a cause, there would still remain heroes and patriots to support the honour of the flag. This sarcastic note Lawrence received as he was on the point of sailing from Boston. To have left the service instantly would have been the natural impulse of his wounded feelings, but at such a moment, with a fine ship and a gallant crew, with sails unbent to meet the enemy, he could not part with the high hopes of acquiring reputation. He therefore repressed his indignation, and in reply to the secretary, after stating his surprise and regret, that any thing which he had written should have been deemed indecorous, he apprised him that he had prepared a memorial on the subject to the senate of the United States, and should be governed by their decision. This example may be serviceable to many officers, who in a moment of disappointment, at improper or unkind treatment, are tempted to resign. It is better like Lawrence to stifle for a time the natural but hasty resentment of wounded pride, till an opportunity offers of proving, not by our complaints, but our actions, that we have been unjustly neglected. Lawrence sailed under the galling impression of having been keenly wounded by the secretary of the navy, and seeing a junior placed over him. On his return, he found that secretary no longer in office, and himself promoted in consequence of his application to the senate, to the rank of captain so as to outrank the officer whose well deserved, though irregular appointment had given him so much uneasiness.

He now sailed from Boston in the Hornet, in company with commodore Bainbridge of the frigate Constitution, on a cruise to the East Indies; but in running down the coast of the Brazils, in the month of December, they found the Bonne Citoyenne, a British ship of war, loaded with specie, lying in the port of St. Salvador. The Bonne Citoyenne, was a larger vessel, and had a greater force both in guns and men than the Hornet; but so eager was Lawrence to engage her, that he sent through the American consul at St. Salvador, a challenge to her commander, captain Greene, "I request you to state to him," said he, "that I will meet him whenever he may be pleased to come out, and pledge my honor, that neither the Constitution, nor any other American vessel shall interfere." Commodore Bainbridge at the same time declared, "if captain Greene wished to try equal force, I pledge my honor to give him an opportunity by being out of the way or not interfering." Whatever might have been the motive of captain Greene, he evaded this offer by answering, that although nothing would give him more satisfaction than to meet captain Lawrence under different circumstances, and although he was convinced that the result of such an encounter could not long remain undecided in his own favour, yet he was equally convinced that commodore Bainbridge knew too well the paramount duty he owed to his country, to remain an inactive spectator, while a ship of his own squadron fell into the hands of the enemy, and that he could not expose the Bonne Citoyenne to a risk so manifestly disadvantageous. To give captain Greene perfect security against his interference, commodore Bainbridge left St. Salvador for four days, during which captain Green might perceive that the Constitution was not within forty miles distance, and captain Lawrence lay before the port in defiance. Still the Bonne Citoyenne did not move from her anchorage. Commodore Bainbridge then went into St. Salvador, and remained three days, supposing that the English officer would apply to the governor, as he might have done, and detain the Constitution for twenty-four hours, and thus ensure a fair engagement with captain Lawrence; but he continued inflexible. Despairing at last of tempting him out, commodore Bainbridge sailed from St. Salvador, and captain Lawrence remained blockading the Bonne Citoyenne, and an armed schooner of twelve guns, till the 24th of January, 1813, when the arrival of the Montague, a seventy-four gun ship, which had sailed from Rio Janeiro for the express purpose of relieving the blockaded ships, compelled him to retreat.

The whole conduct of captain Lawrence on this occasion, reflects as much honor on the American arms as the most brilliant victory could have done. The propriety of private challenges, during war, may, generally speaking be questionable. They may convert national into personal quarrels, and blood may be sometimes uselessly sacrificed to fastidious or frivolous points of honor. But in no case could they have ever been more completely up so close and bloody a fire, that in less than justified than in the present. fifteen minutes from the commencement of the

From St. Salvador captain Lawrence now shaped his course towards Pernambuco. On the 10th of February he captured the English brig Resolution of ten guns, laden with provisions and about twenty-five thousand dollars in specie, but as she was a dull sailer, and he could not spare hands to man her, he took out the money and the crew, and burnt her. He then ran down the coast for Maranham, and after cruising near that place and Surinam, Hornet had only one man killed and two slight- till the 23d of February, he stood for Demara- ly wounded. The Hornet was immediately prepared to receive her, and by nine o'clock at night her boats were stowed, a new set of sails bent, and every thing ready for action. She, however, declined coming out. The next morning cap- tain Lawrence found that he had two hun- dred and seventy souls on board the Hornet, and as his crew had for some time been on short allowance, resolved to steer for the Uni- ted States. The officers of the Peacock re- ceived from those of the Hornet the most hu- mane and honorable treatment: so penetrated with gratitude were they for the kindness which they had experienced, that they could not restrain the expression of their feelings till they reached England, but on their arrival in the United States published a letter of thanks to captain Lawrence and his officers, in which they declared that such was the liberality displayed to them, that "they ceased to consider themselves prisoners." Nor was the rough generosity of the Hornet's crew less honorable. As the sailors of the Peacock had lost every thing except what they had on their backs, when she went down, the crew of the Hornet united to relieve them; and made every English sailor a present of two shirts and a pair of blue jacket and trowsers, a true hearted liberality, which raises them in our estimation higher than even their victory.

Captain Lawrence returned to New York in safety, and besides the applause which his country lavished upon him for his good conduct, had the satisfaction of learning, as we have already observed, that he had been promoted during his absence, and his rank settled to his perfect satisfaction. Soon after his return he was ordered to the command of the frigate Constitution, with the temporary superintendance of the navy yard at New York. — But the next day, to his great regret, he received instructions to repair to Boston and take command of the Chesapeake frigate, then nearly ready for sea. This appointment was peculiarly unpleasant, because the Chesapeake was not only considered as one of the very worst ships in the navy, but in consequence of her disgrace in the rencontre with the Leopard, labored under that dispiriting stigma among sailors, of being an unlucky ship. These circumstances, combined with the state of his family, made captain Lawrence unwilling to go to sea immediately, and he therefore requested to retain his situation in the Hornet. Disappointed in this wish, he then took command of the Chesapeake at Boston, where he had been but a short time, when the British frigate Shannon, captain Broke, appeared before the harbor for the avowed purpose of seeking a combat with the Chesapeake. Stung with the repeated disasters of the British frigates, this officer resolved to make an effort to retrieve them; and when he deemed his ship perfectly prepared for that purpose, sent a formal challenge* to captain Lawrence.

"As the Chesapeake," his letter began, "appears now ready for sea, I request you will do me the favor to meet the Shannon with her ship to ship, to try the fortune of our respective flags. To an officer of your character, it requires some apology for proceeding to further particulars. Be assured, sir, that it is not from any doubt I entertain of your wishing to close with my proposal, but merely to provide an answer to any objection that might be made and very reasonably, upon the chance of our receiving unfair support." After observing that commodore Rodgers had not accepted several verbal challenges which he had given, captain Broke then proceeds to state very minutely the force of the Shannon, and offers to send all British ships out of reach, so that they might have a fair combat, at any place within a certain range along the coast of New-England which he specified; if more agreeable, he offers to sail together, and to warn the Chesapeake, by means of private signals of the approach of British ships of war, till they reach some solitary spot—or to sail with a flag of truce to any place out of the reach of British aid, so that the flag should be hauled down when it was deemed fair to begin hostilities. "I entreat you sir," he concludes, "not to imagine that I am urged by mere personal vanity to the wish of meeting the Chesapeake, or that I depend only upon your personal ambition for your acceding to this invitation. We have both nobler motives. You will feel it as a compliment, if I say that the result of our meeting may be the most grateful service I can render to my country; and I doubt not that you, equally confident of success, will feel convinced that it is only by repeated triumphs in even combats, that your little navy can now hope to console your country for the loss of that trade it can no longer protect."

The style of this letter, with the exception of the puerile bravado about commodore Rodgers, is frank and manly; and if the force of the Shannon were correctly stated, would be such a challenge as might well be sent from a brave seaman to a gallant adversary. We, however, are but too well satisfied, that captain Broke studiously underrated the number of his guns and crew; or that, after his challenge, he must have received additions to both. That the Shannon had more guns than the number stated by her commander, we learn from the testimony of the surviving officers of the Chesapeake: who also assert, that she had three hundred and seventy-six men; that she had an officer and sixteen men from the Belle Poule; and that the hats of some of her seamen were marked "Tenedos." Such as it was, however, this letter, most unfortunately, never reached captain Lawrence. If he had received it; if he had been thus warned to prepare his ship; if he had had an opportunity of selecting his officers, and disciplining his crew; if, in short, he had been able to place the Chesapeake on any thing like equal terms with the Shannon, the combat might have been more bloody—there might have been such an engagement as has not yet been seen between single ships on the ocean; though we cannot suffer ourselves to doubt the result of it. But he knew nothing of this challenge—he saw only the Shannon riding before him in defiance; he remembered the spirit with which he himself had overawed a superior, and he could not brook for a moment, that an enemy, which seemed to be his equal, should insult his flag.

Although, therefore, the Chesapeake was comparatively an inferior ship—although his first lieutenant was sick on shore—although three of his lieutenants had recently left her; and, of the four who remained, two were only midshipmen, acting as lieutenants—although part of his crew were new hands, and all of them had lost some of their discipline by staying in port—yet, as he would have gone to sea in that situation had no enemy appeared, he felt himself bound not to delay sailing on that account, and throwing himself, therefore on his courage and his fortune, he determined at once to attack the enemy. It was on the morning of the first of June, 1813, that the Chesapeake sailed out of the harbor of Boston, to meet the Shannon. As soon as she got under weigh, captain Lawrence called the crew together, and having hoisted the white flag, with the motto of “free trade and sailors’ rights,” made a short address. His speech, however, was received with no enthusiasm—on the contrary, signs of dissatisfaction were evident; particularly from a boatswain’s mate, a Portuguese, who seemed to be at the head of the malcontents; and complaints were muttered, that they had not yet received their prize-money. Such expressions, at the eve of an action, were but ill bodings of the result of it: but captain Lawrence, ignorant as he was of the characters of his sailors, and unwilling at such a moment to damp their spirits by harshness, preserved his accustomed calmness, and had prize-checks, at once, given by the purser to those who had not received them. Whilst this scene was passing, the Shannon observing the Chesapeake coming out, bore away. The Chesapeake followed her till four o’clock, in the afternoon, when she hauled up and fired a gun, on which the Shannon hove too. They manœuvred for some time, till at about a quarter before six, they approached within pistol shot and exchanged broadsides.

These broadsides were both bloody; but the fire of the Shannon was most fortunate in the destruction of officers. The fourth lieutenant, Mr. Ballard, was mortally wounded—the sailing-master was killed, and captain Lawrence received a musket ball in his leg, which caused great pain, and profuse bleeding, but he leaned on the companion way, and continued to order and to animate his crew. A second, and a third broadside was exchanged, with evident advantage on the part of the Chesapeake; but, unfortunately, among those now wounded on board of her was the first lieutenant, Mr. Ludlow, who was carried below—three men were successively shot from the helm, in about twelve minutes from the commencement of the action; and, as the hands were shifting, a shot disabled her foresail, so that she would no longer answer her helm, and her anchor caught in one of the after ports of the Shannon, which enabled the latter to rake her upper deck. As soon as Lawrence perceived that she was falling to leeward, and that by the Shannon’s falling she would fall on board, he called his boarders, and was giving orders about the foresail, when he received a musket ball in his body. The bugleman, who should have called the boarders, did not do his duty; and, at this moment, commodore Broke, whose ship had suffered so much that he was preparing to repel boarding: perceiving, from this accident, how the deck of the Chesapeake was swept, jumped on board with about twenty men. They would have been instantly repelled; but the captain, the first lieutenant, the sailing-master, the boatswain, the lieutenant of marines, the only acting lieutenant on the spar-deck, were all killed or disabled. At the call of the boarders, lieutenant Cox ran on deck, but just in time to receive his falling commander, and bear him below. Lieutenant Budd, the second lieutenant, led up the boarders, but only fifteen or twenty would follow him, and with these he defended the ship till he was wounded and disabled. Lieut. Ludlow, wounded as he was, hurried upon deck, where he soon received a mortal cut from a sabre. The marines who were engaged fought with desperate courage; but they were few in numbers; too many of them having followed the Portuguese boatswain’s mate, who exclaimed, it is said, as he skulked below: “so much for not paying men their prize money.” Meanwhile the Shannon threw on board sixty additional men, who soon succeeded in overpowering the seamen of the Chesapeake, who had now no officers to lead or rally them, and took possession of the ship; which was not, however, surrendered by any signal of submission; but became the enemy’s only because they were able to overwhelm all who were in a condition to resist.

As captain Lawrence was carried below, he perceived the melancholy condition of the Chesapeake, but cried out, “Don’t surrender the ship.” He was taken down in the ward-room, and as he lay in excruciating pain, perceiving that the noise above had ceased, he ordered the surgeon to go on deck, and tell the officers to fight on to the last, and never strike the colours. “They shall wave,” said he, “while I live.” But it was too late to resist or to struggle longer; the enemy had already possession of the ship. As captain Lawrence’s wounds would not allow of his removal, he continued in the ward-room, surrounded by his wounded officers, and after lingering in great pain for four days, during which his sufferings were too acute to permit him to speak, or, perhaps, to think of the sad events he had just witnessed, or do more than ask for what his situation required, he died on the 5th of June. His body was wrapped in the colors of the Chesapeake, and laid on the quarter deck, until they arrived at Halifax, where he was buried with the highest military and naval honors; the British officers forgetting for a moment, in their admiration of his character, that he had been but lately their enemy. His fall was supported by the oldest captains in the navy, then at Halifax, and no demonstration of respectful attention was omitted to honor the remains of a brave, but unfortunate stranger.

Thus prematurely perished, at the age of thirty-two, this gallant and generous seaman. Lost as he was, in the full vigor of his powers, and with the imperfect measure of his fame, our hopes are forbidden to dwell on the fond anticipation of what he might have been, and we are left to rest with a melancholy pleasure on the qualities which his short life had already developed. Lawrence seems to have combined all the distinguished and endearing qualities; the openness of heart, the manliness of pride, the benevolence of feeling, the chivalrous courage, which our imagination ascribes to the perfection of the naval character. He was devoted to his profession, and to the service. During nearly sixteen years which he spent in the navy, he never had a furlough, except one for about six weeks. The perfect order of his ship bore testimony to his merits as a disciplinarian, whilst the zealous attachment of his crew, proved that his discipline had not been earned by harshness or severity. His courage was of a daring and desperate cast, but it was still regulated by a calm sobriety of judgment. Indeed, the characteristic quality of Lawrence; that which most distinguished him as an officer was coolness and perfect self-possession in the midst of danger. Of his kindness, of the warmth and generosity of his heart, which rendered him, emphatically, a favorite of the navy, his brother officers are all willing witnesses. These remembrances are however, most cherished, where they are now most consolatory—in the bosom of his family: of the two widowed sisters, whose cares, during his infancy, he repaid with the kindest protection; of his afflicted wife, who, with three children, the youngest born since his father's death, is left to lament a loss, which the sympathy of her country, may in some degree, we trust, alleviate.

In this sanguinary engagement the destruction was nearly equal on both sides. The Chesapeake lost her commander and forty-seven men killed, and ninety-seven wounded, of whom fourteen afterwards died. Among these were lieutenant Ludlow, first lieutenant of the ship, and lieutenant Ballard, the fourth lieutenant, both excellent officers.

On the part of the Shannon captain Broke was dangerously wounded, though he has since recovered; the first lieutenant, the purser, captain's clerk, and twenty-three seaman killed, and fifty-seven persons wounded, besides captain Broke.

The capture of the Chesapeake is to be ascribed wholly to the extraordinary loss of officers, (a loss without any precedent, as far as we can recollect in naval history;) and to her falling accidentally on board the Shannon. During the three broadsides, while the officers of the Chesapeake were living and she was kept clear of the enemy, the superiority was manifestly with the Americans. The Chesapeake had received scarcely any damage, while the Shannon had several shot between wind and water, and could with difficulty be kept afloat during the succeeding night. It was only when accident threw the Chesapeake on board the Shannon, when her officers were unable to lead on the boarders that captain Broke himself, contrary we believe to the regulations of the British navy, left his own ship, and was able by superior numbers to overpower the distracted crew of the Chesapeake.

We have heard many accounts which we are very reluctantly compelled to believe, of improper conduct by the British after the capture, and of brutal violence offered to the crew of the Chesapeake. As, however, some allowances are due to the exasperated passions of the moment; something too to the confusion of a bloody and doubtful struggle; and as these accounts will shortly assume an official form; we are unwilling to prolong the remembrance of imputations which may be disproved, and perhaps have been exaggerated.

But we should wrong the memory of captain Lawrence, we should be unjust to the officers of the American navy, with whose glory all the aspiring ambition of the country is so closely blended, if we omitted any opportunity of giving the last and fairest lustre to their fame, by contrasting their conduct with that of the enemy, or if we forbore, from any misplaced delicacy towards our adversaries, to report circumstances connected with the fate of the Chesapeake, which throw a broad and dazzling light on the generous magnanimity of our countrymen.

When captain Hull took the Guerriere, every chest, trunk, and box belonging to the officers, containing, it was known, the fruits of a long cruise, much of it against our own country, was delivered to them without examination. The very trifles which the crew of the Constitution saved from the Guerriere, before she was blown up, were scrupulously restored to the English sailors; no article of private property was touched.

When commodore Decatur took the Macedonian, he purchased from captain Carden upwards of a thousand dollars worth of things in the ship, and captain Carden was permitted to take the rest on shore. To such an extent was this kindness abused, that every knife and fork, every cup and saucer, every plate and dish, every chair and table, in short, every thing which captain Carden had used was taken on shore, and before the Macedonian reached New York, the prize-master was obliged to send on board the United States for the most common articles of daily use, as the prisoners had taken them all away. At the same time the ward-room officers of the United States purchased their wine and other articles from the ward-room officers of the Macedonian.

When commodore Bainbridge took the Java, all the property of all the officers and all the passengers, the plate belonging to a high military commander, were restored instantly. The American officers would have deemed it disgraceful to retain the private property of a brother officer even though he were an enemy and a prisoner.

When captain Lawrence took the Peacock, and the officers and crew of that vessel were left destitute, the officers and crew of the Hornet fed and clothed them from their own stores.

When the Chesapeake was taken by the Shannon, the key of captain Lawrence's store-room was demanded of the purser. It was given; but the purser observed at the same time that in the captures of the Guerriere, Macedonian, and Java, the most scrupulous regard was paid to the private property of the British officers; that captain Lawrence had laid in stores for a long cruise; and that the value of them would be a great object to his widow and family, for whose use he was desirous, if possible, of preserving them. This request was not merely declined; it was haughtily and superciliously refused.

Well then—the enemy have captured the Chesapeake—they enjoy the little private property of captain Lawrence: but they have not taken from him any of his individual fame, nor of his country's glory. However we may mourn the sufferings of that day; the loss of the Chesapeake has not, in our estimation, varied the relative standing of the marine of the two countries; nor does it abate in the slightest degree, any of the loftiness of our naval pretensions. The contest was wholly unequal in ships, in guns, in crews, in officers, in every thing.

The Shannon was a better ship; she had not upon her the curse of that ill-omened name, the Chesapeake. The Shannon was a stronger ship; she mounted twenty-eight eighteen pounders on the main deck, twenty-two thirty-two pound carronades, and two long brass nines or twelves, on the spar-deck, and a large carronade amidships, in all fifty-two guns, besides this last heavy carronade; while the Chesapeake mounted twenty-eight eighteen pounders on the main deck, and twenty thirty-two pound carronades, and one eighteen pounder, chase gun, on the spar-deck, in all forty-nine guns.

The Shannon had a better crew. Besides her complement she had seamen from two other ships. That crew, too, had been long at sea; long in the ship; were known; were tried; and as commodore Broke sent a challenge, were, of course, men on whom, if they were not picked for the occasion, he knew he could confide. The Chesapeake had, on the contrary, in part, a new crew, unknown to their officers, not yet knowing their places, or the ship. The ship had not been more than a few hours at sea, and the landsmen, and the landwomen had been dismissed from her on the very day of the engagement. The officers, too, although we should be the last to detract from their merits, and although the manner in which they fought their ship does them the highest honor, the officers were young and few in number, and had as yet scarcely any opportunity of disciplining or knowing their seaman; yet, under all these disadvantages, the great damage sustained by the Shannon, and the great loss of her crew, all which took place before the boarding, warrant completely the opinion, that but for the accidental loss of officers, the victory would have been with the Chesapeake.

So far, indeed from humbling our national pride, the stubbornness with which, in spite of its inequality, this combat was sustained, only confirms us in a belief, not created by the events of this war, though not likely to be much shaken by them—a belief formed on circumstances which even a series of naval losses cannot now control—a belief, too, in avowing which we are quite content to incur the charge of overweening national prejudice—that in all the qualities essential to success on the ocean, the American seaman are not equal, but superior to the British seamen. It is no merit of theirs. Nature and circumstances have made them so. But so it is—they are physically superior, they are morally superior. The warm and variable climate of the United States has, to a certain degree, melted the original English constitution of our ancestors, till, instead of the broad shouldered and ruddy form of the people of Great Britain, the Americans are a thinner race of men, with less personal strength and stamina, but with more activity, more quickness, more alertness. The lower classes of people in this country, too, derive from their popular institutions more intelligence and education, they learn more and they learn easier, while the wider field for exertion, and the perfect freedom of employing themselves in their own way, gives to the American character a certain play, and vigor and animation not found in any other nation. The Americans, moreover, are generally younger men, more in the vigor of life. It is an extraordinary fact which, perhaps, never had an example before in the history of nations; that more than half the inhabitants of the United States, are under sixteen years of age. This state of our trade also renders our seamen more adventurous. They make longer voy ages, in smaller ships, and brave more dangers than can be experienced in the regular and monopolized, and convoyed commerce of Great Britain. They besides enter into the service voluntarily, and for short periods, and their minds have more of the elasticity of freedom than the seamen entombed on board a British man of war. The effect which these circumstances might naturally be supposed to produce we have often seen. The Americans vanquished the English at sea again and again during the revolution. In the war with France the American squadrons were at least as active, as brave, and as vigilant against the enemy as those of England. While the two navies were together in the Mediterranean, the superiority in ships, crews, and officers was, in the opinion of every stranger, decidedly with the Americans. How that pre-eminence has been sustained in the present war need not be told. In short, the American seamen have always held that high rank on the ocean from which the casual loss of the Chesapeake, in an ill-matched combat, cannot degrade them, and which we are sure, with the blessing of God, and a liberal policy from their country, they will always maintain.

FROM THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCER.

Communication.—The John Bull story of the late capt. James Lawrence having been born in Bristol, in England, is 'very like a whale.'

Captain James Lawrence was the son of John Lawrence, Esq. of Burlington, in the state of New-Jersey, and if I am not very much mistaken, was born in 1776; his house was directly opposite to Powell's Academy, and at present belongs to general Bloomfield. I well recollect the day after captain Lawrence was born—an old negro servant belonging to Mr. Lawrence met me: I asked him how his mistress was? He said, "quite well—had got a fine son with an eye like a bull" I was intimate in the family of Mr. John Lawrence, who was the eldest son of Elisha Lawrence, of Chesnut Grove, in Monmouth county, (N. J.)

It is probable that capt. Lawrence's grandfather might have been born in England—of this I am not certain; he was upwards of 70 years of age when I first became acquainted with him, and I understood that Elisha Lawrence and his brother John were among the first settlers of Monmouth county, (N. J.)

This short statement of the family of the late capt. Lawrence, being founded on unquestionable authority, you will do the friends of the deceased an act of justice by giving it publicity.

HONORS TO LAWRENCE AND LUDLOW.

A private citizen of Salem, captain George Crowninshield, originated the idea of bringing the bodies of Lawrence and Ludlow to their own county. He obtained a cartel of the president of the United States, fitted out a vessel for the purpose and proceeded to Halifax, at his own expence. He was politely treated by the British, and had no difficulty to effect the object of his voyage. On his return, the following ceremonies, &c. took place at Salem.

From the Essex Register of August 25, 1813.

On Monday last, the remains of captain LAWRENCE, and lieutenant LUDLOW, of the Chesapeake, were entombed in this town. At the hour appointed, the bodies were conveyed from the cartel, with the most impressive ceremonies. The flags of the ships were displayed at half mast, and there was a continued discharge of minute guns and of artillery, while the boats were moving slowly to the shore. On the shores were thousands ready to receive the bodies of these departed heroes. The procession moved from the Crowninshield wharf in the order stated below. The band in the procession performed with full effect, and the procession was received at the church with a music pure and solemn, and the accompaniment gave a kind assistance to the voices employed in the public devotion. After the funeral service, an eulogy was delivered by judge STORY, worthy of his eloquence and taste, and powerful upon the sympathies of an assembly, more numerous than any we had ever seen. The decorations of the house united great simplicity with exquisite arrangement, and obliged the sentiments which the occasion was designed to enrich. The military duty was performed with the precision which distinguishes the infantry, who appeared as the escort, and the different associations of our marine citizens, and masons added the highest respect by their presence and reputation. The seamen who surrounded the bodies, gained particular favor from their affectionate services and just deportment. The worthy capt. GEORGE CROWNINSHIELD, who obtained the bodies and supported the expence of the funeral honors, with the companions of his voyage, were seen with the greatest approbation, and the citizens spake their blessings as they passed. The committee of arrangements exceeded every thing we have known, in their ceaseless care that every thing should do the highest honors to the departed heroes, and with a success that is not always commanded by the best dispositions. The presence of many of our naval heroes, who yet survive to bless their country, gave an extraordinary effusion of gratitude to the living as well as the dead, and thousands were made happy by the sight of the brave men who have the best honors of their country.

E

The streets were thronged in an unusual manner, and the houses filled which were upon the streets through which the procession moved. It is believed that upon no occasion has a greater number of persons ever been assembled in Salem, and surely never were ceremonies better directed. The presence of a brother-in-law of capt. LAWRENCE, awakened a sense of the bereavements which private life suffers, when fathers and friends give their lives to their country, and the relief was happy, that public bounty could not forget the proper testimony at once of gratitude, and of gracious protection. Upon the whole, it was a proud day for Salem. So much gratitude, so much sympathy, so much love of country, are never expressed in vain. The vice-president of the United States, and general Dearborn, with other distinguished citizens, honored the occasion by their presence.

COMMUNICATED.—On Monday last, the sacred remains of capt. JAMES LAWRENCE and lieutenant AUGUSTUS C. LUDLOW, who fell a sacrifice to their country's cause on board the late United States frigate Chesapeake, were committed, covered with honors, to the silent mansion of the dead. The day was unclouded, and, as if no incident should be wanting to crowd the mind with melancholy and woe, the wind blew from the same direction and the sea presented the same unruffled surface as was exhibited to our anxious view, when on the memorable first day of June, we saw the immortal LAWRENCE proudly conducting his ship to action. Early in the morning, almost every vessel in the harbor and at the wharves, and all the flag staffs in town, wore the American ensign at half mast, and many flags were displayed in the street where the procession formed. The brig Henry, containing the precious relics, clad in sable, lay at anchor in the harbor. At half past twelve o'clock, they were placed in barges and preceded by a long procession of boats filled with seamen, uniformed in blue jackets and trousers, with a blue ribband on their hats bearing the motto of "Free trade and Sailor's rights," were rowed by minute strokes to the end of India wharf, where the hearses were ready to receive them. From the time the boats left the brig until the bodies were landed, the United States brig Rattlesnake, and the brig Henry in which they were brought, alternately fired minute guns. The immense concourse of citizens which covered the wharves, stores and house tops to view the boats, the profound silence which pervaded the atmosphere, which was only broken by the sad reverberation of the minute guns, rendered this part of the solemnities peculiarly grand and impressive. On the bodies being placed upon the hearses, they were covered with the colors which they had so lately and so signally honored, and conveyed at a suitable distance for the procession to form. At 1 o'clock the procession was formed, agreeable to previous arrangements, and moved to slow and solemn music, escorted by the truly elegant company of light infantry, under that accomplished officer captain J. C. King, through the principal streets to the rev. Mr. Spaulding's meeting house. The procession was such, in point of respectability and numbers, as was never before witnessed in Salem. It was distinguished by the presence of his excellency the vice-president of the United States, escorted by the marshal of the district and his deputies, with their insignia of office; major general Dearborn, brigadier general T. H. Cushing, and other distinguished officers of high rank in the army of the United States; commodore Bainbridge, capt. Hull, and captain Stewart, and other officers of the navy of distinction; judges of the United States and other civil officers of distinction; his honor William Gray, late lieutenant governor of this commonwealth; the honorable Samuel Dexter; a great number of military officers of the state in uniform; marine societies wearing their badges of distinction; masonic societies; and an immense concourse of respectable private citizens from the adjacent towns and country. Independent of the procession, the side walks and houses to their very tops, were covered with spectators, which, together with the melancholy knell of the bells, the mournful sound of the music, the constant ringing of cannon, and the slow and solemn pace of the procession; gave to the whole an interest of which it would be vain to attempt a description. On arriving at the meeting house, the corpses were taken from the funeral cars, and placed in the centre of the church by the seamen who rowed them on shore, and who stood during the whole of the performance, leaning upon them in an attitude of mourning. The church was most tastefully hung with sable, cypress and evergreen. The names of "Lawrence" and "Ludlow" appeared in letters of gold, encircled by festoons of evergreen, immediately on the front of the desk. The rites of sepulchre were performed with great solemnity. The music was good and appropriate, and the eulogy was such an one as made veterans weep. After the performances were concluded in the meeting house, the faithful seamen conveyed the remains into the quiet tomb, and the masonic societies and military corps paid the last ritual homage to the immortal LAWRENCE and LUDLOW.

The following was the order of the procession on the interment:

The remains of the late captain JAMES LAWRENCE and lieutenant AUGUSTUS C. LUDLOW, having been obtained from the enemy, by a flag of truce commissioned for that purpose by the government, the funeral obsequies will be solemnized, and the corpses entombed in Salem, on Monday the 23d inst. The procession will be formed at the head of India wharf, precisely at 1 o'clock, P. M. under the direction of major John Saunders, maj. John Fairfield, maj. Joseph White, jr. maj. John Prince, jr. general David Putnam, maj. David Cummings, and maj. Ebenezer Bancroft, marshals for the day; and will pass through a part of Derby street, through Hardy, Essex, North, Lynde, Court, Church and Brown streets, to the rev. Mr. Spaulding's meeting house, where a funeral oration will be pronounced by the honorable Joseph Story, Esq. and the rites of sepulchre performed by the rev. Mr. Henshaw, of Marblehead. Captain Peabody's company of artillery will parade on Washington square, and fire minute guns during the moving of the procession, which will proceed, under an escort of capt. King's company of light infantry, in the following order:

The following notice of judge Story's eulogy is extracted from the Boston Yankee:

"Thus the orator brought up the biography of our hero, to the fatal and ever memorable 1st of June, when he gallantly bore down upon the enemy with dauntless bravery. Here the feelings of judge Story, (who was an eye witness at this interesting scene) overpowered him, and the tears flowed down like dew-drops from heaven—it was the sweetest of all sympathy, and it spread with the rapidity of electric fluid throughout the vast assembly, who were already pre-disposed to join their melting tears! What noble daring will such public feelings excite in the naval heroes, who witnessed this respectful sympathy of a truly moral and religious people, for the fate of their gallant brothers, Lawrence and Ludlow. Here was a free offering of the soul to the gallant men who died in defence of the rights of seamen—and a solemn manifestation to the living of the rich reward in store for every future hero who falls nobly in the cause of his country, or returns in triumph covered with the laurels of victory.

The ever memorable and emphatic words of the gallant hero struggling in the agonies of death—Don't give up the ship, let the flag wave while I live, was most happily introduced at the close of the eulogy, and will long be remembered by every feeling auditor, young and old. It will be the rallying word to rouse them to their duty, and nerve every arm against the foe. Thus will the generous humanity and courage of our hero be at once the theme of our nation's glory, and his godlike spirit fire our naval heroes in the hour of battle, to deeds of hardy valor."

These are the names of the gentlemen who so honorably volunteered their services with captain Crowninshield to perform the voyage to Halifax, in the Henry, to obtain the bodies of our deceased naval heroes, viz. captain Holton J. Breed, captain Benjamin Upton, captain Jeduthan Upton, junr. captain John Sinclair, captain Samuel Briggs, captain Joseph L. Lee, capt. Stephen Burchmore, capt. Thomas Bowditch, and Mr. Thorndike Proctor.

The bodies of the deceased (at the request of their relatives) were afterwards brought to New-York (by land, for the commander of the British squadron off New-London had hesitated to grant them a passage by water from Salem) and there finally interred, with the following ceremonies:

(From the New-York Columbian, Sept. 17, 1813.)

Yesterday were performed the last sad duties to our valiant countrymen, Lawrence and Ludlow, and their bodies were finally consigned to the peaceful tomb. The unusual number which swelled the mournful procession, and the undisssembled sorrow which marked every countenance, from the highest to the lowest order, evinced in an unparalleled degree the public sympathy, and that the honors paid to the "mighty dead" were not more conspicuous than deserved. On no similar occasion have we witnessed a testimonial of respect, so universal and sincere. It was indeed a day of mourning. The hearts of hoary patriots and youthful heroes, beat in solemn unison, and the bright eye of beauty glistened with a tributary tear. Not only the reflections arising from such a scene, but every transaction connected with the proceedings of the day, were calculated to inspire with reverence the coldest and most disinterested spectators.

At 10 o'clock in the morning the bodies were moved from the U. S. sloop of war Alert, in the following order:

Two 16 oared and one 12 oared launch, with marines, a band of music, and officers, as an escort.

A 12 oared launch, with the body of captain LAWRENCE, supported by a barge, with officers on each side.

A launch with the body of lieutenant LUDLOW, supported as above.

Twelve barges belonging to the navy, with officers and seamen.

The coffins were covered with the American flag, and the hats, swords, and pistols of the deceased, the colors half-mast, the music playing a funeral dirge, and the rowers dressed in uniform.

Minute guns were fired alternately from the Alert and the navy-yard, during the naval procession.

The bodies were landed at the west side of the battery, and taken from the boats and placed on hearses, when they were carried upon the battery, where the artillery and cavalry of the city were paraded, with a number of societies to receive them, and minute guns from a detachment of artillery near the flag-staff were commenced, and a general tolling of the bells begun.

A civil and military procession was then formed, composed of the following bodies, viz:

The cavalry dismounted.

The brigade of artillery, flying included. (Standards, and side-arms, and music in mourning and a dead march played.)

Society of Cincinnati.

United States marines

Clergy of different denominations.

The body of captain LAWRENCE, with pall-bearers, followed by 16 sailors with a bier.

The body of lieutenant LUDLOW, attended in the same manner.

Citizens

The procession moved to solemn music from the bands of the different military corps and societies, through Greenwich to Chamber-street, through the Park to Chatham-street, and down Broadway to Trinity-church; where the burial service was performed by the right reverend bishop Hobart, and the bodies consigned to the earth, under a discharge of musketry from a detachment selected for the purpose. The colors of the public and private shipping in the harbor and at the different fortifications, were set at half mast through the day, and the tolling of the bells and firing minute guns continued till the ceremonies were concluded.

The concourse of spectators who witnessed this interesting and impressive exhibition was innumerable, and is calculated to amount to twenty or thirty thousand. The streets were lined, the windows crowded, and many roofs covered with citizens, viewing the grand and solemn spectacle. The cavalcade of boats in the harbor, from its novelty in particular, attracted much attention, and was admired by thousands who repaired to the docks, the shipping and the stores, to view it on its passage.

The weather was fine, and no accident, that we have learned, occurred among the multitudes on the land and water, who were out on the occasion.

It would fill a volume to insert an account of all the civic, military and masonic honors in memory of Lawrence and Ludlow. They extended from Maine to Georgia. The foregoing may suffice to preserve an idea of what they were.

Lieutenant Burrows.

FROM THE PORT FOLIO

There are few events more peculiarly calculated to raise the mingled sensations of admiration and sorrow, than the death of a victor in the moment of his glory. When defeat is attended with death, the bereaved mourners have at least one consolation. The grave covers, with its sable pall, the fame of the unfortunate man, and protects his mouldering remains from persecuting envy. He who, while living, might have been doomed to encounter the assaults of detraction and insult, acquires a sort of sanctity from the shadows of the tomb, where even malice does not penetrate. But how interesting is the character which dies in the moment of his fame! Death, which was, in the former instance, a protection, now robs the victor of his glory; and of all mankind, the conqueror himself is the only party cold and insensible to the history of his fame. When every eye sparkles, and every cheek is flushed with delight, when we anticipate the warrior's return with kind greetings and cordial salutations; when we are preparing the laurels, and every social feeling is kindled into action, we find all the rays of his glory are gleaming on the temples of a cold and insensible corpse. Death obtrudes his obnoxious front in the midst of these gay and exhilarating images, and this union presents a chastened feeling, a temperate sobriety of joy.

WILLIAM BURROWS was born at Kenderston, near Philadelphia, on the sixth day of October, in the year 1785. His father, then in possession of a large property, did not wish to confine the genius of his son to any particular pursuit, apprehending that the paternal estate would be amply sufficient to his support in the style and character of a gentleman. Accordingly, at the age of thirteen, a season too early for any decided indications of character to present themselves, his youthful curiosity was left to its own guidance; and he dallied with books as he would with other toys, regarding them rather as matters of amusement than as objects of serious concern. In one respect only did his parent interfere with these pleasures. Knowing how essential to the character of a gentleman it was to become familiar with the living languages, he warmly exhorted his son to turn his attention to these, and in this he but partially succeeded.

To the French, for which the father was more than usually solicitous for his success, knowing how indispensable that accomplishment was, the son, at that time, betrayed an insurmountable reluctance. In the acquisition of the German, which was, with his parent, a secondary object only, Burrows was more successful; and at the age of thirteen he would converse in that language as fluently as in his native tongue.

This may be considered as the broad outlines of his early years, so far as regards those pursuits which often have an important bearing in the formation of the future character of the man. Certain traits now began to present themselves that distinguished his future life; a warm and benevolent heart was concealed behind a cold and repulsive exterior, and a cautious guardedness of reserve. On the subject of his own merits he maintained a severe and inflexible silence, while he conversed freely and fluently on the merits of his youthful comrades and associates.

In a boy so amiable, and withal so retired and reserved, little did his parents believe that the flame of ambition was burning strong and intense. He would be often found musing and solitary, as if in the act of conversing with his own thoughts; but so ignorant was his parent of his predominant passion, that he labored to arouse him from what he apprehended was lethargy. This passion, guarded by such jealous and scrupulous reserve, at length developed itself by an accident that fortune threw in his way.

He had undertaken to learn the art of drawing; but amidst all the instructions of his preceptor in that science, none seemed to arrest the attention of his pupil in that science but the delineation of a ship of war. His constitutional reserve availed him no longer; this incident afforded an outlet to those passions which had so long occupied his musing and solitary hours. With astonishment and regret his father discovered the cause of his contemplation in retirement, and of that indifference which he discovered to his allotted studies and pursuits. He labored to give his ambition another turn; but the passion of ocean chivalry was now too deeply rooted, and all his efforts were unavailing. He could now do nothing but to lend his aid to the gratification of a passion he was incapable of repressing; and he accordingly seconded his application to the secretary of the navy, for an office, and Burrows was appointed a midshipman in November, 1799.

He now eagerly embraced every opportunity to qualify himself for the service, and devoted his hours exclusively to the study of navigation. But the time was too short for him to make the requisite proficiency in such studies. He was speedily summoned to more active duty, for in January, 1800, less than three months after his appointment, he received orders to repair on board the sloop of war Portsmouth, under the command of captain MacNeil, which was then bound to France. At this time it was with great difficulty that he could be persuaded to wear the uniform of the navy. He said, that he was, as yet a raw and inexperienced hand, a mere novice in the naval service, and that he had done nothing to entitle him to such honor. His conception was, that the badges of his country's honor should be worn only by those who had signalized themselves in her service. He professed his utter contempt for those whose ambition extended to nothing more than an uniform, and was fearful if he adopted it, that his own pretensions would be measured by that standard. Nevertheless, the injunctions were too imperative to be disregarded. The anecdote may be thought incompatible with the gravity of biography; but let it be remembered, that no anecdote which portrays character can possibly be unimportant; and in this we see indications of a future hero, at a period before he himself was conscious of the fact.

The Portsmouth did not return to the United States until December, 1800. Burrows now became sensible of the necessity of becoming better acquainted with his preparatory studies. He applied for a furlough, and devoted himself, with renewed ardor, to the study of navigation. In this short interval allowed him, he was eminently successful; for he had, in his first cruise, amassed much practical skill and knowledge, which he was able to systematize when he became more familiar with the rudiments and elements of his art. This cruise was attended with another benefit: A residence in France had conquered his own antipathy, and convinced him of the necessity of the repeated injunctions of his parent, to become master of that language. He now availed himself of such opportunities as he had formerly slighted; and, in the end, he was able to converse in that tongue with fluency and grace.

From the year 1800 to 1803 he served on board different ships of war, in cruises some of a long and some of a shorter date, unimportant so far as regards the glory of the navy. This was, notwithstanding, a necessary school, which prepared him for more important services. During these periods, when no occasion was presented for the exercise of the high and heroic qualities, his habits of constitutional reserve were his predominant characteristics. It was a reserve not cold and repulsive. He mingled in all the mirth, conviviality, and good humor of his comrades, and was the delight, and charm of their society. Still his heart, in the midst of such indulgences, remained as locked and guarded as ever, and those with whom he associated could boast no more of his confidence than those who were strangers to his company. It at length became a proverb among his associates, that of a person whose character was inscrutable, as little could be known as of the character of Burrows.

In the year 1803 he was ordered to go on board the frigate Constitution, bound to the Mediterranean, commanded by commodore Preble. This gallant officer was allowed to possess an almost intuitive sagacity in the discernment of character. Under this cold and repellant exterior, his penetrating eye discerned higher qualities. He saw in that reserve a character of noble and intrepid daring, which was only waiting a proper season to break forth in all its resplendence. Under these impressions Burrows was appointed an acting lieutenant, in which character he served during the Tripoline war. This period was an important era in our naval service. In proportion to the smallness of the force we employed, the exercise of personal skill and bravery became more indispensable. We have to regret that the particular part acted by lieutenant Burrows in this warfare is not known; but even this deficiency of information forms another trait in the character of this officer. He maintained, on the subject of his personal exploits, a silence the most guarded and pertinacious. He never could condescend to become the herald of his own fame. While he was just to the merits of his brother officers, he was unjust to his own; and very rarely, indeed, could he be induced to open his lips upon this subject.

As every thing connected with the Tripoline war has now become interesting, the following anecdote may be pardoned, although not immediately pertinent to the subject of the present biography:

After the burning of the United States frigate Philadelphia, by our brave countrymen, the cannon belonging to her were afterwards weighed up by the Tripolitans, and planted on their batteries. After three or four times firing they split asunder, directly in the breach, leaving part of the pan belonging to the touch-hole, on each side, and were thus rendered perfectly useless ever after.

The following anecdotes are not destitute of amusement:

While our countrymen were prisoners at Tripoli, an American sailor who waited on the bashaw, took a peculiar fancy to a gold cup, from whence that officer drank his sherry. He watched the first favorable moment, seized the cup, secreted it in his bosom, and, as he was departing, he was detected in the theft. When he was examined in the presence of the bashaw, he coolly answered, "Your excellency must know that I have sworn in every possible manner to distress the enemies of my country."

The bashaw was so struck with his cold intrepidity, that he suffered him to depart without punishment.

Another of the American tars having done some slight service for a Jew, received a draught of wine from a large jug, by way of compensation. Honest Jack was so enamored with the wine, that he seized the first favorable moment to carry off the jug. He related the adventure to Hassan, the commander of the guard, who, for a stipend, as usual (which was nothing more than the empty jug) agreed to protect him. The Jew discovered the theft, applied to Hassan, with a description of the person on whom his suspicion alighted. The officer swore by the beard of Mahomet to punish the felon, and ordered all the American slaves to pass in review before the Jew. Jack, meanwhile, had shifted his hat and jacket with a messmate, and partly shutting one eye, turned the back part of the iris under his lid. With the greatest unconcern of physiognomy he passed the Jew, who seized him, examined him cautiously, turning him round several times, and finally dismissed him; saying that this was not the culprit, as he only had one eye: but the Jew was ready to swear, upon the Pentateuch, that the real culprit was the brother of this sailor. No such person was found notwithstanding, and the righteous judge ordered three hundred lashes to be inflicted on the Jew, for thus daring to inculpate the character of an innocent man.

One of the crew of the Philadelphia having obtained a piece of Tripolitan money, made a mould, into which copper was cast, taken from the bottom of that frigate. This was rubbed over with quicksilver, and coin to the amount of three or four hundred dollars was cast before the deception was discovered. One of the pieces was brought to the bashaw, who declared that he could do nothing with the Americans and that he verily believed them to be devils!

It is a remarkable truth that whatever was known of Burrows was known from other sources than himself: in confirmation of which remark, we will mention the striking fact, that none are more ignorant of the personal exploits of this officer than his own immediate relatives. He professed, on all occasions, his contempt of those officers who embraced every opportunity to proclaim their own merits, and fearing, lest he should be guilty himself of the vice he so severely reprobated in others, he renounced conversation on such subjects altogether.

In 1807 lieutenant Burrows returned from Tripoli to his native country; and in the following year he was attached to the Philadelphia station, and employed in the bay and river Delaware, as commander of gun boat No. 119. It became then his duty to enforce a rigid observance of the embargo law. In a service at once so delicate and invidious, he exhibited traits of character, of which we have hitherto especially avoided the notice. His wit was mingled with a species of whim that may more properly be denominated humor. With an inflexible gravity of face, he would set the table in a roar and then reprove his guests for the turbulence of their mirth. Not a single smile would enliven the mournful solemnity of his visage, while all the company were vociferous in their joy. In this action and retroaction, between mock solemnity and uncontrollable mirth, lieutenant Burrows was pre-eminent. Under the pretext of repressing the mirth of conversation, he enlivened it beyond all bounds. With this power he likewise possessed a curious versatility by which he was enabled to assume any character he thought proper. While employed in a service in which his master passion of glory could receive no gratification, he gave this singular species of whim and eccentricity full play. He would, while on shore, assume the grave and saturnine character of the severe and unbending moralist, or the light and airy fop, as occasion demanded. Whatever character was wanting to complete the conviviality of the group, when assembled, lieutenant Burrows was, as by magic, transformed into that one. By this happy versatility of talent he became a desirable guest at every table, and was the favorite of all classes of men. His approach was hailed as the infallible precursor of wit and humor, and the company, on a second interview, were sure of beholding him in a character entirely different from the first. By this happy combination of humor, and an eccentricity always sparkling, and always various, while he rigidly enforced all the provisions of the embargo law, he acquired the confidence and affection of the inhabitants. He relieved the asperities of this unthankful service by such arts; and the citizens, while suffering under these restrictions imputed no blame to the officer by whom they were enforced. On the contrary, as a testimonial of their esteem and affection, they supplied him with the best provisions, for the use of the men whom he commanded, and were incessant in their invitations for him to become a guest at their tables. When he was called off from his service, it was a subject of general regret.

By this felicitous combination of qualities, he was enabled to make a painful duty an amusement. The inhabitants found, while the laws of the union were enforced, that this was done from higher and more honorable motives than personal hostility towards them. His moments of relaxation from duty were sedulously devoted to the acquisition of their confidence and good will, and to render the obligations imposed upon him by duty, less painful, irritating and severe; alternately preventing the least infractions of the law, and then becoming, at their tables, a hospitable guest, he was enabled to conciliate their esteem, while he rigidly enforced the duties of his office.

In 1809 he was ordered to join the frigate President under captain Bainbridge. From this ship he was transferred to the sloop of war Hornet as first lieutenant, under captain Hunt. In a dangerous and heavy gale, his brother officers have reported, that by his superior skill and intrepidity, as an officer, the ship and the crew were both preserved from what they deemed inevitable destruction.

In his promotion to a lieutenantcy, he had the mortification to find himself outranked by his junior officers. This was so severely wounding to his pride, that he remonstrated to the proper department in very feeling terms. He stated that he was now commanded by lieutenants who formerly served under him in the Tripolitan war. Errors of this kind it is exceedingly difficult to redress, however just may be the subject of complaint. To withdraw a commission from an individual on whom it is conferred, to declare an officer unworthy of the honor thus bestowed, is an outrage of the same character as to wantonly place a junior over a senior officer. Whether objections of this nature weighed with the government we know not; but certain it is, the remonstrances of lieutenant Burrows for redress proved ineffectual. Finding that; there was no prospect of having his complaints listened to, with a favorable ear, he was induced to tender his resignation to Mr. Secretary Hamilton, at the time of that gentleman's going out of office.— This resignation was not accepted by government, and lieutenant Burrows had now no other resource left than to bear with fortitude what he was unable to remedy. He applied to the government in March 1812 for a furlough, for the purpose of prosecuting a voyage to India, which was granted. He found this indispensable, as his circumstances were, at this time, somewhat embarrassed; and he accordingly went on board the ship Thomas Penrose, from this port bound to Canton, under the command of captain Anslay of this city. On the return passage the ship was captured and carried into Barbadoes. Lieutenant Burrows arrived in the United States on his parole, in June, 1813, and in the succeeding month was regularly exchanged.

Shortly after this exchange, lieutenant Burrows was ordered by government to repair to Portsmouth, New-Hampshire, and to take the command of the United States' sloop of war Enterprize, then in state of readiness for sea. His mind was still sore with a sense of his undressed grievance, on the subject of his rank. But the prospect of active service gratified his master passion, the love of glory, which suspended, for a season, all other considerations. He declared, to an intimate friend, that he would serve during the war, and that he would then dash his commission in the fire. The present moment was, however, too precious, and the objects it presented too important to be sacrificed to such minor feelings and he promptly acceded to his appointment.

The Enterprize left the harbor of Portsmouth on the fifth of September last. On the next day she fell in with his Britannic majesty's brig the Boxer, mounting sixteen eighteen pound carronades and two long nine pounders. The Boxer fired a shot as a challenge, hoisted English colors and immediately bore down upon the Enterprize. The American vessel was now employed in attacking and making preparations for action. Having obtained the weather gage, she manœuvred for some time to try her sailing and ascertaining the force of her antagonist. At length she shortened sail, hoisted three ensigns, and fired three shot in answer to the challenge. The action now grew warm; the Boxer bore within half pistol shot of the Enterprize, and giving three cheers fired her starboard broadside. She was answered by three cheers and a larboard broadside from the Enterprize, and the action became general. The Enterprize having the advantage of the wind, ranged ahead of her enemy, rounded too on the larboard tack, and commenced a raking broadside. The enemy's maintopsail and top-sail-yards came down, and the Enterprize taking a position on the starboard bow of the Boxer, and opening a raking fire, compelled the enemy to cry out for quarter. Their colors were nailed to the mast and could not be hauled down. This action was continued for 15 minutes, during which time the Boxer received much damage in sails, rigging, spars, and hull. The Enterprize had but one eighteen pound shot in her hull, one in her main-mast, and one in her foremast. Her sails were much cut with grape shot, and a great number of grape were lodged in her side. The Boxer had twenty eighteen pound shot in the hull, most of them at the water edge, with several stands of eighteen pound grape shot in her side. Lieutenant Macall states our loss to have been four killed, and ten wounded. The number killed on board the Boxer is uncertain; the same officer states from the best information which he was able to procure, that there were of the enemy, between twenty and twenty-five killed and fourteen wounded.

There is a curious and singular coincidence between the two actions of the Shannon with the Chesapeake, and the Enterprize with the Boxer. In both cases the challenge was given by our enemies. In the latter case the fact we conceive to have been indisputably proved, by nailing the colors to the mast. In the former case, the three first officers on board of the American ship were disabled, from their wounds, from attending to their duty. Commodore Broke, in his account of his action, states, that the Americans fought with desperation, but with disorder. The Chesapeake had a crew on board almost in a state of mutiny; these men had not been habituated to their officers, and is it wonderful that with such a crew, and with officers thus disabled, the frigate should have been surrendered when she was boarded? In the case of the Enterprize, the crew had been previously trained to the exercise of their guns, and the superiority of their fire was firmly established, in the superior damage sustained by the Boxer. While our hearts were dejected by the loss we sustained in the Chesapeake, and her gallant commander, the American glory rises upon us from the ocean again in all its pristine splendor. We have no wish to exaggerate the bravery of our officers, or the character of our navy, but unless it is a proof of patriotism to lament at the downfall of our countrymen, and to preserve a sullen silence when they are triumphant, we conceive ourselves fully justified in the remarks we have made.

At the first fire, lieutenant Burrows was mortally wounded by a musket ball; he refused, notwithstanding to be carried below, and during the whole of the action his life-blood was streaming on the deck. With his dying lips he requested that the flag might never be struck. When the sword of his gallant enemy was presented to him, he clasped his hands together, and exclaimed, "I am sa-tified—I die contented." He was then carried below, and expired shortly after. Captain Blyth, of the Boxer, who was killed by a cannon ball, was one of the supporters of the pall at the funeral of the unfortunate Lawrence. These brave men having paid the debt which they owe to their respective countries, now slumber side by side, and await the day of resurrection together.

[Here follows the account of the burial of lieutenant Burrows and captain Blyth at Portland, at which equal respect was paid to the victor and the vanquished, for their valor.]

This pride of lofty courtesy, between nations at war, serves, in some measure, to abate the miseries with which it is attended. It produces an elevation of feeling, and every American participates in such dignity when he contemplates the spectacle.

Republics have been reproached with ingratitude. Let us fondly cherish the hope that such an imputation will not alight upon us. The following resolution has unanimously passed both houses of congress:

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That the president of the United States be requested to present to the nearest male relation of lieutenant William Burrows, and to lieutenant Edwin R. McCall, of the brig Enterprise, a gold medal, with suitable emblems and devices; and a silver medal, with like emblems and devices, to each of the commissioned officers of the aforesaid vessel: in testimony of the high sense entertained by congress, of the gallantry and good conduct of the officers and crew, in the conflict with the British sloop Boxer, on the 4th of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirteen. And the president is also requested to communicate to the nearest male relation of lieutenant Burrows, the deep regret which congress feel for the loss of that valuable officer, who died in the arms of victory, nobly contending for his country's rights and fame."

It is rare to find a character more distinctly defined. High-minded men usually betray their predominant passion by a proud and repellent dignity of deportment. They manifest, by a cold and distant reserve, that they are not, as Shakspeare says, enumerated in the roll of ordinary men. A certain jealous sense of this dignity prevents colloquial freedom, and renders their characters inaccessible to all but those who aspire to their friendship. Lieutenant Burrows, with all his habits of reserve, appears to have had nothing of this. He could accommodate himself to the circumstances in which he was placed, and suspend the exercise of his darling passion when the season would admit of its indulgence. At such times, by a happy mixture of humor and whim, he was able to extract amusement from the most painful and reluctant duty. This was manifested by his conduct while enforcing the provisions of the embargo act. His higher qualities then availed him nothing, and he laid them aside. Those who frequented his society at that time beheld in him nothing but the amiable and facetious companion, abounding with original humor and wit. As the hour of danger approximated, all these levities were thrown aside, and the hero was left in his proper colors, sparkling and luminous. His orb, emerging from the light and sportive clouds that fitted over his disk, acquired, from the surrounding shadows of death, more majesty and grandeur of lustre. His heroism maintained a long and obstinate contest with the king of terrors; and he was only cold and insensible to the charms of glory when he was invested with the coldness and insensibility of death.

It is to be lamented that no likeness of this distinguished officer now exists. Our sensibilities on such occasions have a degree of vagueness and indistinctness, when such portraits are wanting. The mind, in cases like the present, labors to supply the defect, and to form to itself a sort of sensible image; for we never read of high and illustrious actions without associating them with a body.

Life of Captain Allen.

FROM THE PORT FOLIO.

The glare of victory is always enlivening and beautiful. Whether the hero who was successful in this struggle falls or survives, he is sure of the plaudits of admiring millions. He wears the laurel on his brow, or it is wreathed by the hands of a grateful country round the urn that contains his ashes. Victory always brings with it, its own reward: and to those who have the nobleness to esteem a good name dearer than life, the loss of life itself is more than remunerated by the reverence which is paid to their memories.

But there is another class of men who have still more potent claims on the gratitude of their countrymen. The man who bravely contends to the last, and, when he finds defeat inevitable, sacrifices his life for his country, is entitled to all that reverence which the proudest victory could yield. He has no animating thoughts to sooth his dying hours: the prize for which he contends is rifled from him; and his fast receding existence admonishes him that he never will retrieve the loss which he now suffers. Glory, that capricious goddess, whom he has followed so long, and with such devotion, abandons him in his dying moments. It then becomes a grateful country, entertaining an honorable jealousy of such noble feelings, to be kind to the ashes of such men.

William Henry Allen, whom it has become our painful duty to notice, was born at Providence, Rhode-Island, on the 21st day of October, 1781. His father, William Allen, on the breaking out of the revolutionary troubles, was appointed a lieutenant in the army. He continued in the army until the restoration of peace, and commanded the Rhode-Island line of troops at the battle of Saratoga, when he was advanced to the rank of major. He was present and actively engaged in most of the battles which were fought during our revolutionary war; and, in 1786, was appointed, by congress, senior officer of the legionary corps raised in Rhode-Island. In the year 1799, he was appointed, by the legislature of that state, brigadier-general of militia.

Although it is not a subject immediately connected with the present biographic sketch, it may not be improper to state that major Allen had, for a short time, the charge of the unfortunate Andre. He sat up with him the whole night previous to his execution: Andre conversed with him on a variety of subjects, in which he uniformly spoke of the American character in terms of the strongest respect, and expressed his gratitude for the kindness and delicacy with which he was treated during his confinement. So affecting was the interview to major Allen, that, to this day, he cannot relate the circumstances without great emotion.

The mother of William Henry Allen was the sister of the present governor of Rhode-Island. It was the intention of his parents that Henry should have received a liberal education; and he went through the preparatory studies. He parted, however, for more active life; and, notwithstanding the pressing remonstrances of his parents, he entered the navy, as a midshipman, in May, 1800.

In three months after his appointment he was ordered on board the frigate George Washington, commanded by captain Bainbridge, to carry presents to the dey of Algiers. On his departure he writes to his father, "I now bid you a short adieu; but should it be the last, you shall have the satisfaction to hear of my good conduct in my station as an officer and as a gentleman." This cruise was attended with peculiarity of incident. The demand of the dey of Algiers, that the frigate should be employed in carrying his presents to the grand seignior at Constantinople, and the unavailing reluctance and remonstrances of captain Bainbridge, are circumstances generally known. It was the first time that the flag of an American frigate had waved in the harbor of Constantinople. The fine order of the ship, and the excellent discipline observed among the officers and men, tended to impress very high ideas of the American character, in a quarter of the world where before it was unknown.

Commodore Bainbridge returned to America on the nineteenth of April, 1801, when a reduction of the navy ensued. In eight days after the return of the subject of the present memoir and while he was solacing himself in the hope of once more visiting his family and friends, he was ordered on board the Philadelphia, under the command of captain Baron, to scour the Mediterranean sea again. He bade to his friends a cordial adieu, and entered on the service with that promptitude that ever distinguished him. Nothing material transpired during the cruise. The ship returned to the United States on the twenty-seventh of June, 1802. For the first time, after his entry into the service of his country, was he now enabled to enjoy the society of his friends, and to visit his paternal abode. This, however, was but a short repose allowed him from the fatigues and naval service, for in October, 1802, he sailed in the frigate John Adams, commanded by captain Rodgers to visit, for the third time, the shores of the Mediterranean. From his letters, during this period, we shall make only two extracts:

"During our stay at Malta we had an opportunity of visiting most of the public buildings; and amongst the rest, the superb church of St. John. The floor is laid in different colored marble, in Mosaic, representing tombstones of the different knights who distinguished themselves in fighting and in falling in defence of Christianity, against the infidels. On every side there is a Latin inscription, describing his death. The walls are hung with the most superbly embroidered tapestry, representing the birth, crucifixion, and ascension of our Saviour. The death of the saints is likewise represented in the same manner, and they appear like the most beautiful paintings. The wings are divided into chapels; and here they show us crosses and saints in abundance, and the rich attire of the bishops and clergy, embroidered with gold. In an inner chapel we were shown a number of relics, one of which they declared was a fragment of the cross on which our Saviour was crucified; another was the palm of the hand of St. John. The body of St. Clement was exposed, lying in state. This was a room that the French soldiers did not penetrate: it is said that they robbed this church of half a million."

During this voyage, he was informed, by his correspondent, of a report which afterwards proved to be unfounded, that a younger officer was advanced over his head. This is the manly reply of a boy of seventeen: "I am too well grounded in old principles to mind such assaults now. If the government decide thus, I can say amen, with all my heart."

Commodore Rodgers returned from his cruise in December, 1803.

Early in the year 1804 he was ordered on board the frigate Congress, lying at Washington, of which he was appointed sailing-master. This frigate sailed on the 1st of July, under the command of captain Rodgers, for the Mediterranean. On the outward bound passage, while the ship was lying too, in a violent gale, Allen was on the foreward assisting the sailors in taking in a reef. Letting fall that part of the sail on which he had hold, he was precipitated head-long into the sea, to the depth of twenty feet, passing in his fall very near the anchor on the bow. Fortunately he arose near the mizen chains, and, by taking hold of them, narrowly escaped inevitable death, as the ship was then drifting very fast. While cruising off the coast of Tripoli, captain Rodgers intended, if the command should have devolved on him, in consequence of the illness of commodore Baron, an attack on that place. He took Allen with him in the schooner to take the soundings, preparatory to the anticipated assault. They entered the harbor with muffled oars; and, after taking a sounding, and complete survey, they passed so near the Tripoline gun-boats, that they distinctly heard the men conversing below. They also heard the sentinels on the walls of the battery conversing together. As they were returning from the harbor, a heavy gale sprang up, and they had a narrow escape to the Nautilus, which vessel was then in the very act of leaving her position. During this cruise, which extended from 1804 to 1806, Allen thus writes to his correspondent:

"I was while at Lisbon, witness to a very ludicrous ceremony. My ears were saluted by the hoarse chaunting of some Portuguese sailors, and I perceived about twenty in number approaching, bearing a large topsail, bare-foot with their hats in their hands, into which the multitude would now and then drop a sixpence, to save their souls from purgatory. On enquiry, I was informed, that it was a custom amongst them, when overtaken by a violent gale at sea, instead of trusting to their own exertions, to offer up their prayers to their guardian saint, and to promise him the best sail in the ship if he would condescend to protect them from the dangers of the element. The topsail was then taken to the church in the manner described, laid at the foot of the altar, and dedicated to the saint. It was then appraised by an old friar, who, unwilling to distress the votaries of old mother Church, accepted, as an equivalent, in money, one half of its nominal value. The saint has, by this time become perfectly well acquainted with the value of sail cloth."

In the month of October, 1805, captain Rodgers removed to the frigate Constitution, and assumed the command of the squadron, in consequence of the return of captain Baron to the United States. Mr Allen also removed to the Constitution, and was promoted to a lieutenantancy. In a cruise off Capanea, lieutenant Allen in company with commodore Rodgers, visited Mount Etna. Ascending the south side of the mountain, the wind while blowing from the north, covered that side of their bodies exposed to its violence, with frost while the other remained perfectly free. Descending, they lost their way amongst fields of lava, but were found by the monks in the convents below. Lieutenant Allen likewise visited Mount Vesuvius, and the cities of Herculaneum, and Pompeia. He served as third lieutenant on board the Constitution, and returned in that frigate to the United States in the year 1806.

During these several cruises to the Mediterranean, although nothing transpired on board of the frigates where lieutenant Allen was stationed that might fairly be denominated naval glory, still a peculiarity of circumstances gave a lofty and elevated tone to the feelings of all the officers. An American squadron in the waters of the Mediterranean was itself a novelty. That squadron was small, and it was destined to pass under the review and strict scrutiny of English ships of war occasionally stationed in those seas, and passing the straits of Gibraltar. Personal courage, skill, and correctness of discipline, could more ensure them respect in a company so illustrious; and to these points all their efforts were directed. They felt the high responsibility attached to their station; and knowing how important the first impression of a national character was, they acted up to that dignity which the occasion required.

After this long and fatiguing cruise, he was permitted, for a short time, to visit his friends and relations in Providence. In February, 1807, he received orders from government to join the frigate Chesapeake, commanded by captain Baron, then fitting out at Washington, for the straits. He remained at Philadelphia while the ship was preparing for sea, during which time he was busily employed in recruiting men for the service, and then entered as third lieutenant. The circumstances preceding and succeeding the attack on the Chesapeake, by the Leopard, are thus detailed by lieutenant Allen, in a letter to his correspondent:

"On Monday, June 23d, we weighed anchor and stood to sea. The Chesapeake had, on this day, twenty-eight eighteen pounders mounted on the gun-deck, twelve thirty-two pound carronades on the quarter-deck, and had, fitted for those guns three hundred and twenty cartridges, thirteen powder horns (net sufficiently filled) and matches ready for action. All these were in the magazine, and the keys in charge of the captain, as usual, and which are never delivered to any but the gunner, by the captain, for fear of accidents. In the cable ties, and around the foremast, one thousand wads, and sponges; the guns loaded and shotted but of course not primed. Round shots in the lockers were ready on deck, with a box of cartridges for each gun. At 3, the Leopard came within hail: at half past three the boat came on board, with a demand from captain Humphries for permission to search the Chesapeake for deserters; concluding his orders by saying, "I enclose you the orders of the admiral on this subject; any comment from me would be superfluous. But I trust that your answer will be of a nature that will prevent me, in the execution of my duty, from interrupting the amity at present subsisting between the two nations." The orders of the admiral were, "You will offer to the commander of the Chesapeake a mutual search; and in any event, to take the men described, wherever they may be found." Here was a demand which our commodore knew he must absolutely and positively refuse. Why did he not order his men beat to quarters; detain the lieutenant and his boat until we were ready for action? But no! he gave a positive refusal, which, in composing, penning, and copying, detained the lieutenant half an hour. Our commodore did not order his men beat to quarters until the first gun was fired, nor until then was the key delivered to the gunner, all the officers remaining at this time in perfect ignorance of the contents of the note. I was at the galley (the cambouse) and snatched a coal from the flames, fired the only gun, which went through the wardrobe of the English ship. A shot came into us, and struck a man on the breast—he fell at my feet, covering me with blood and splinters of bones. One of my gunners suffered severely; one had his leg carried away, two an arm each, and two more were wounded severely—five out of eight. After one gun, one single gun was fired, we struck by order of the captain; who then called his officers into the cabin, and asked their opinions. My answer was, "Sir, you have disgraced us."

Lieutenant Allen drew up the letter to the secretary of the navy, demanded a court of inquiry to be called upon the captain.* This was favorably received, and a compliance promised. The secretary said that "their communication did them honor, and their request

* The following is a copy of a letter addressed by the officers of the wardrobe of the Chesapeake, to the secretary of the navy:

Late United States ship Chesapeake.

Hampton Roads, June 23, 1807.

Sir—The undersigned, officers of the late United States ship Chesapeake, deeply sensible of the disgrace which must be attached to the late (in their opinion) premature surrender of the United States ship Chesapeake, of 40 guns, to the English ship of war Leopard, of 50 guns, without their previous knowledge or consent, and desirous of proving to their country, and the world, that it was the wish of all the undersigned to have rendered themselves worthy of the flag under which they have the honor to serve, by a determined resistance to an unjust demand, to request the honorable secretary of the navy to order a court of inquiry into their conduct. At the same time they are compelled, by imperious duty, by the honor of their flag, by the honor of their countrymen, and by all that is dear to themselves, to request that an order may be issued for the arrest of commodore James Baron, on the charges heewith exhibited, which the undersigned pledge themselves to prove true."

2. For not doing his utmost to take or to destroy a vessel which he perceived it was his duty to have done.

should be properly attended to." It is difficult to conceive of the excoiated state of lieutenant Allen's mind at this time. Let this youthful officer speak from the grave, and give utterance to his feelings. In two days after the action, he writes to his correspondent, "To see so many brave men standing to their quarters, amidst the blood of their butchered and wounded countrymen, and hear their cries, without the means of avenging them! and when in 3 minutes, we could have avenged them! to have the flag of my country disgraced! Was it for this that I have continued so long in the service, contrary to the wishes of all my friends! To be so mortified, humbled, cut to the soul! Yes, to have the finger of scorn pointing at me as one of the officers of the Chesapeake! But do not think, my friend, that I feel I have not done my duty. Perish the thought! I proudly feel that I would have willingly given my trifling life an offering for the wounded honor of my country." "Oh," he exclaims in another letter, "when I act like this, may I die unjustly and forgotten, and no tear be shed to my memory. May I lie on some barren shore, and may my bones whiten in the sun, be pelted by the pitiless storm, and may the name of Allen be blasted with infamy." "If I am acquitted honorably (says he, while writing to his father, in other words, if captain Baron is condemned) you may see me again, if not, never." "We lay here, (says he, in another letter) ready, at a moment's warning, to wipe from our flag that disgrace that has been entailed upon it by our blood. When I suffer my memory to dwell on this, I feel that I can trifle with existence at pleasure." At length this question was put to rest, by the condemnation of Baron, on which lieutenant Allen makes this dry remark: "How the court can reconcile some passages of their opinion with others I know not, unless cowardice can be divided into two kinds, personal and official."

At the time of the sailing of the Chesapeake, the United States were at peace with all the world. The government, however, intended to maintain constantly in the Mediterranean a small naval force, occasionally to visit the coast of Barbary. The knowledge of such a force in their vicinity would have the effect to restrain their hostility. This measure was salutary and judicious in another point of view; it usefully and advantageously employed the young officers, who were thus acquiring a knowledge of their profession, and qualifying themselves to render service to their country thereafter. Our ships in the Mediterranean had heretofore been furnished with supplies at an expense which was deemed heavy: as we were now at peace, and had no enemy to meet or encounter, the government conceived that the Chesapeake might herself carry out such supplies of every kind, as the squadron would require during her absence from the United States; and thus she was rather a store-ship than a cruiser. She had also two ladies, with their servants, and several gentlemen, passengers; and was further burdened with luggage. Captain Baron was aware that his ship was not in fit condition to proceed to sea; but trusting to the circumstance that the country was in profound peace, and therefore could not be molested, he unfortunately sailed, unprepared as he was, calculating that he should be enabled, long before he approached the European shores, to have his ship in order. Captain Baron's conduct, on this occasion, was certainly culpable and imprudent. He ought not to have relied implicitly, on the faith of the existing peace; he should have been in complete readiness to repel aggression before he quitted our ports; he should have looked to his guns alone to protect the flag from insult. The conduct of the British, however, was base and dishonorable. The Bellona, seventy-four—Triumph, seventy-four—Leopard, fifty—and Melampus, thirty-eight—under the command of commodore Douglas, were lying in Lynnhaven bay. They were freely receiving from our country supplies of every kind of which they stood in need; they were partaking largely of the hospitality of its inhabitants; yet at this moment commodore Douglas held in his possession an order from his admiral to take, forcibly, out of the Chesapeake, a part of her crew; and he was meditating to execute this offensive order in a manner the most irritating to our country, and the most derogatory to our navy. Had the object of commodore Douglas have been simply to take the men, and to produce the least possible irritation, he would, most obviously, have followed the Chesapeake to sea, with his whole force, and there would then, perhaps, have been no reproach on the navy had she surrendered without firing a gun. Commodore Douglas dared not send the Melampus, as she was a frigate of the same class with the Chesapeake, and might therefore, have not succeeded. The Leopard was sent; she was of force to ensure to the British success, even had the Chesapeake been in complete order; and yet the force was not so overbearing but that the Chesapeake ought to have fought; and had she fought, and fought well, the navy would have been disgraced.

When commodore Baron was preparing to leave the ship, all the officers were called on deck to witness his departure, a respect always paid to the commander when entering or departing from his vessel. He now left her, passing through a line of officers; but no tear of regret was shed—every brow was contracted, every countenance was stern, and captain Baron, beholding the repulsive looks of his officers, fainted.

Intrepidity, however, exposes only part of the character of lieutenant Allen; his private affections were as warm as his public.

his mind was inflamed by a sense of indignant sensibility, he was pouring into the ear of masculine confidence the complaints of his lacerated mind, letters of the same date, to a female friend, are replete with domestic tenderness and affection. With this correspondent all is quiet and serenity; he enters into all the levities of ordinary converse, and seems as anxious to veil his heroic and indignant passions, as if this indulgence, was criminal in such intercourse. At one time his heart seems hovering round its native hearth, and in the next glowing with all the ardor of impatience to avenge his country's honor. Let it be mentioned likewise, that his conversation was peculiarly marked with his character. Of this the following fact may be related in evidence: Seven duels resulted from the action of the Chesapeake, and yet none of them affected him! He never fought a duel. Not one of the subordinate officers was more decidedly opposed to the conduct of the commodore than lieutenant Allen; yet such were the uniform correctness, propriety and delicacy of his conduct, that he commanded the esteem of that officer's most sanguine adherents. Having accustomed himself, from the first onset of his naval career, to strict subordination, while in service, and to polished society in his hours of relaxation, the characters of the gentleman and the sailor became by long habit, incorporated in one. This union became the apex of his ambition—to receive on the one hand, the thanks of his superior officers for his promptitude and skill, while in their service; and at other times, to shine the ornament of polished circles. With the officers on board the Chesapeake he was peculiarly a favorite. This kind attention he thus acknowledges in a letter to his correspondent:

"It is a gratifying reflection to know that I leave the Chesapeake Beloved by my messmates and respected by all; they have all been forward in manifesting their esteem for me in the most unequivocal manner; it has been requited with my warmest gratitude. What can induce more self-satisfaction in any man than to find that he is most beloved by those who have known him the longest? It must silence, forever, the tongue of detraction, and believe me, my dear sir, the love of my friends, who are ever dear to me, will ever be an inducement with me to deserve their love, and to aspire to superior correctness."

During the operation of the embargo, in 1808, the Chesapeake, to which he was still attached, cruized off Block Island, and captured several vessels violating that law. From motives of delicacy he desired to be excused, and was excused, from boarding any vessel belonging to his native state. In a letter, on this subject, he says, "I knew that I should be compelled to detain such vessels for the most trivial article, and this would have wounded my feelings. Even had I met those which I could have suffered to pass, I might have labored under unjust suspicions, when other officers might be equally just without such imputations." His correct conceptions of the duty imposed by this painful office, are illustrated in a letter which he addressed to his father, in answer to one received from him, interceding for his assistance in behalf of some of his old associates in their endeavor to reclaim their property thus taken. "Nothing, my dear sir," he replies, "could give me more pleasure than to have been useful or instrumental in serving those young gentlemen you speak of in your letter: it required no request of yours to induce it; but vain are our desires—impotent the will that exceeds the means of performance. This has often been my lot, and, I believe, that of many in the Chesapeake. Need I say that my feelings have ever been on the rack while cruising off the island? But, sir, had this been your vessel, her situation would have been precisely the same. It is impossible that I can be of the least service to those young gentlemen." Mr. Allen remained in the Chesapeake, in this service, until February, 1809, when he was ordered, by government, to join the frigate United States, while lying at Washington, under the command of commodore Decatur. The commodore was himself absent, and the equipping of the frigate was a duty that devolved on his first lieutenant, who was not, for the space of two months, absent a moment from the navy yard. This ship lay part of the time at Norfolk, and the remainder of the time was engaged in short cruises on the coast, until the declaration of war against Great Britain, in 1812.

Shortly after, the United States frigate sailed upon a cruise; and on the twenty-fifth of October, 1812, in lat. 29, N. longitude 29, 30, W. fell in with his Britannic majesty's ship the Macedonian, commanded by captain Carden. She was a frigate of the first class, mounting forty nine carriage guns, and reputed one of the swiftest sailers in the British navy.

When this frigate first hove in sight, and while orders were given on board the United States to prepare for action, lieutenant Allen mounted aloft; and after watching her closely for some time, at length discovered the English pendant. He descended to his comrades, who were impatiently awaiting him below, and jocosely pronounced the frigate a lawful prize. The enemy having advantage of the wind fought at his own distance, and the contest was kept up for one hour and fifty minutes. The United States poured such an incessant fire, that the shouts from the crew of the Macedonian were distinctly heard, who, from that cause, apprehended her to be in flames. Her colors were, nevertheless, hauled down shortly afterwards—in which engagement she lost her mizenmast, fore and main topmasts, and mainyard. She was likewise much damaged in her hull. Thirty-six were killed, and forty-eight were wounded. On board the United States five only were killed and seven wounded. The American frigate received so little damage in this engagement, that she would still have continued her cruise had it not been necessary for her to accompany her prize into port, on account of the crippled state of the British frigate. Any comments on this splendid action, an action so glorious to the arms of our countrymen, would surely now be needless.

In the United States frigate lieutenant Allen was most assiduous in exercising and training the crew to the use of the artillery. The accuracy with which the guns were directed, and the celerity with which they could be fired, evince the improvement of their discipline, and indeed could not be surpassed. After captain Carden had gone on board the United States, lieutenant Allen requested the other officers to go into a boat which was ready for them. The first lieutenant of the Macedonian surlily said, "You do not intend to send me away without my baggage?" "I hope," replied lieutenant Allen, "you do not suppose you have been taken by privateersmen?" "I do not know," replied the other, rudely, "by whom I am taken." Lieut. Allen sternly ordered him instantly into the boat, and he immediately went. Lieutenant Allen instantly placed a guard over the baggage of the officers, and as soon as the other duties, which demanded his attention, were concluded, he sent the same day, all the baggage on board the United States. The surgeon of the Macedonian continued on board; and he frequently, in conversation, bore testimony to the kindness of lieutenant Allen towards that part of the crew remaining in the Macedonian, particularly to the wounded. The ward room officers of the Macedonian expressed to the ward room officers of the United States, a deep sense of the civilities which they had received; and wished to give, jointly, another expression of their gratitude, in a writing which might be considered as a letter to all British officers, to secure their good treatment, in case the United States should be captured. This certificate of protection was very properly declined.

To lieutenant Allen was entrusted the honorable charge of bringing the prize into port, and she safely arrived in the harbor of New York, amidst the enthusiastic gratulations of our countrymen. His share in this glorious action cannot be better expressed than in the words of commodore Decatur himself. "It would be unjust," continues this gallant officer, "it would be unjust in me to discriminate, where all met my fondest expectations Permit me, however, to recommend to the particular notice of the secretary, my first lieutenant, William H. Allen, who has served with me upwards of five years; and to his unremitting exertions, in disciplining the crew, is to be imputed the obvious superiority, of our gunnery, exhibited in the result of this contest."

The corporation and citizens of the city of New-York honored him and his commander with a splendid and superb festival; and the legislatures of Rhode Island and Virginia presented him with a sword, as a testimonial of their sense, in commemoration of his gallant services. There was every thing in this victory which could gratify the pride of an American. The individual injury done to the enemy by the loss of a frigate, or the advantages to ourselves, by acquiring one, is nothing. It inspires a loftiness of feeling, a confidence that is communicated to other souls, and introduces a train of patriotic sensations perfectly novel. It breaks that sea-spell which seemed to surround the navy of England.

When the Macedonian struck, lieutenant Allen, in taking possession, came along side. Those on board were so uncivil as to neglect handing him a rope, for the purpose of getting on board, and he had to clamber up the side by the chains. Arriving off Nantucket shoals, the United States frigate and Macedonian, which, before, had continually kept together, parted in a gale. The wind was so high, he entertained serious apprehensions that the vessel would founder. He determined as a last resort, to anchor where she was, putting two or three cables on end. He thought he could ride out any gale in that manner, and would not believe the contrary, until it was proved by experiment. The storm, however, abated, and he arrived safe at Newport, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants of that place, on the same day of the same month that admiral Parker arrived there with his fleet during the revolutionary war.

He here received a visit from his uncle the governor of Rhode Island, whom he invited down, and saluted with a discharge of nine guns on his arrival on board. While in the sound waiting a favorable wind to proceed to New-York, he was visited by people from all parts of the adjacent country.

The Sunday previous to the battle, the ward room officers of the Macedonian toasted an American frigate. On the following Sunday they were mortified by the fulfilment of their wishes.

After this, lieutenant Allen was allowed some little respite from the naval service; he visited his native land, and received the kind congratulations of his relatives and friends, in the bosom of his paternal abode. This respite was, however, but of short duration; the strong and imperious calls of his country once more summoned him to active duty.

Shortly after the arrival of the Macedonian at New-York, the Argus returned to that port commanded by captain Sinclair. He obtained leave to visit his friends; and by order of commodore Decatur, lieutenant Allen took the command. He thoroughly repaired the vessel, and received an order from the commodore to go in quest of a British brig of war, reported to be in the sound. The whole crew of the Hornet, commanded by lieutenant Shubrick, volunteered their services. He remained in the sound for the space of a week, without meeting with the enemy, when he received the orders of the commodore to return.

On the death of Mr. Barlow, our minister at the court of France, our government deemed it expedient to renew the negotiation. Mr. Crawford was appointed as his successor; and the subject of the present memoir, now advanced to the rank of master and commander, was directed to take command of the Argus, and to conduct our minister to his place of destination. He accepted the appointment with his usual promptitude, and sailed with our new minister for France. He was so fortunate as to elude the vigilance of the blockading squadron, and arrived at the port of L'Orient in twenty-three days. He informs the secretary of the navy, in his letter bearing date June 12, 1813, that "he shall immediately proceed to put in execution his orders as to the ulterior purposes of his destination."

The business here, which, from prudential motives, is so darkly hinted at, was undoubtedly, as appears from the sequel, to sail in the Irish channel, and annoy the English commerce. This service was extremely perilous; and there seemed scarcely a possibility of escape. It was a service to a man fond of glory, peculiarly invidious. Such conquests were attended with no honor; and captain Allen in compliance with his orders, seemed peculiarly solicitous, in the discharge of this unthankful office, to make the enemy feel and confess the motives by which he was guided. The injury which he did to the British commerce is, in some of their papers, estimated to the amount of two millions. While thus employed in burning, sinking and destroying the enemy's property, captain Allen was peculiarly careful to distinguish his character from those who depredated for selfish purposes only. The property of the passengers was sacred from hostility; not an article of that kind would he suffer to be touched. The passengers were allowed to go below, and to take what they claimed as their own, and no hands belonging to the Argus were permitted to inspect them while they were employed in so doing. On one occasion, when a passenger had left his surlout behind him, it was sent after him in the boat; on another occasion captain Allen ordered one of his hands, who was detected in the act of some petty plunder of this kind, to be flogged at the gangway. The English papers, while they were writhing under the severe injuries thus inflicted, were unanimous in their testimonials of respect to the conduct of this gallant officer, for the humanity and delicacy with which he performed a service so invidious. Probably no action of his life could more plainly distinguish his character than this: he loved danger as much as he abhorred to plunder the defenceless.

It appeared very evident, that if prudence was consulted, it was his imperious duty to avoid an engagement. The damage which he might have done the enemy, by another species of warfare, was beyond all comparison greater than by risking a battle, even if fortune had decided the controversy in his favor. Even a victory ensured capture: for alone and unsupported as he was, his own ship would, in all human probability, suffer material injury, and both the captured and the captor become the prize of one of the many frigates then swarming in the English channel. These considerations, however, would have but little weight with him. He declared, previous to his setting out, that he would run from no two masted vessel. Anxious to quit himself of a business which he so much disliked, he sought an opportunity to act in a situation more congenial to his feelings. Accordingly captain Maples, of the Pelican, informs his government in his letter, dated August the fourteenth, that when cruising in the channel, in quest of the Argus, he discovered her shortening her sail, and making preparations for an obstinate resistance. He states that an action was commenced, which was kept up, on both sides, forty-three minutes, when the Argus struck as he was in the act of boarding. He states that the Argus had one hundred and seventy seven men in the action; and that the captain was wounded early, and had since suffered the amputation of his left thigh. He estimates the number of slain and wounded on board the Pelican at eight, and that on board the Argus at forty, according to the computation of her own officers. This is all that is yet officially known of this transaction. Our government have not yet received, or at least published any official account.

From the designed generality with which this statement is drawn up, no certain conclusions can be drawn. Captain Maples acknowledges that his enemy fought with great bravery—that the action continued for forty-three minutes—that the Argus shortened sail to await his coming up—that he was in the act of boarding—and, that his loss amounted to but eight, in killed and wounded; while Allen's was forty. We are to presume, from captain Maples's own representation, that the action was fought at close quarters. And yet in an action so bravely fought as he acknowledges, and where he was in the act of boarding, there is such a disparity in the killed and wounded! He does not state the number of his own men, although he gives that of the enemy; nor the force of his own guns, although he acknowledges he was specially sent on this expedition.

There is evidently, from captain Maples's own statement, something remaining to be told. He did not say that the Pelican was superior in force, as was proved on a former occasion, by her successfully resisting a French frigate of the first class. It has been said that the Pelican sailed in company with his Britannic majesty's frigate the Sea Horse, of thirty-eight guns, which fell in with them just as the action was closing. In such a case it would have been madness in the Argus to have resisted any longer. This fact was stated by a writer in one of our papers, who cited both the Cork Chronicle and the London Pilot, of the twenty-third of August, in proof of his assertion. This fact has, however, been denied; and another writer has said, with equal confidence, that either one or both of these papers does not contain the paragraph above quoted. Captain Maples was immediately promoted—a plain evidence of the estimation in which that victory was held. It is not generally known that captain Allen's first lieutenant (by a singular coincidence named likewise William Henry Allen) was badly wounded in an early part of the engagement. For information on all these points we are indebted to our enemies alone.

Captain Allen sailed in the Argus with an entire new crew. This is, of itself, a very great disadvantage in case of action. As his object required speed, he was obliged to hurry on with a press of sail, so that little or no time was left him for training his men to the exercise of their guns. From captain Maples's own account it appears they engaged at close quarters, and there is the strongest reason to suspect that he has falsely stated the number of his killed and wounded. With such a crew as captain Allen's was, men entirely new, and so little versed in the science of gunnery, it was highly honorable in them to have maintained the action so long.

But allow that this victory was as decided and as glorious as our enemy assert, no blame can be imputed to the commander. He was desperately wounded in an early part of the action; refused to be carried below, and fainted on the deck from loss of blood. When he was removed from his berth to the hospital for an putation, he cast his languid eyes on his faithful comrades, and feelingly pronounced these words: "God bless you, my lads; we shall never meet again." The following letter will speak for itself:

Copy of a letter from John Hawker, esq. vice-consul American vice consul, dated

"PLYMOUTH, 20TH AUGUST, 1813.

"SIR—The station I have had the honor to hold for many years past, of American vice consul, calls forth my poignant feelings in the communication I have to make to you of the death of your son, captain Allen, late commander of the United States' brig of war Argus, which vessel was captured on Saturday last, in the Irish channel, after a very sharp action of three quarters of an hour, by his Britannic majesty's ship Pelican.

"Early in the action he lost his left leg, but refused to be carried below, till from loss of blood, he fainted. Messrs. Edwards and Delphy, midshipmen, and four seamen, were killed; and lieutenant Watson, the carpenter, boatswain, boatswain's mate, and seven men wounded. Captain Allen submitted to amputation, above the knee, while at sea. He was yesterday morning attended by very eminent surgical gentlemen, and removed from the Argus to the hospital, where every possible attention and assistance would have been afforded him had he survived; but which was not, from the first moment, expected, from the shattered state of his thigh! At eleven, last night, he breathed his last! He was sensible at intervals until within ten minutes of his dissolution, when he sunk exhausted, and expired without a struggle! His lucid intervals were very cheerful; and he was satisfied and fully sensible that no advice or assistance would be wanting. A detached room was prepared by the commissary and chief surgeon, and female attendants engaged, that every tenderness and respect might be experienced. The master, purser, surgeon, and one midshipman, accompanied captain Allen, who was also attended by his two servants.

"I have communicated and arranged with the officers respecting the funeral, which will be in the most respectful, and at the same time economical manner. The port admiral has signified that it is the intention of his Britannic majesty's government that it be publicly attended by officers of rank, and with military honors. The time fixed for procession is on Saturday, at eleven, A. M. A lieutenant-colonel's guard of the royal marines is also appointed. A wainscot coffin has been ordered; on the breast plate of which will be inscribed as below.* Mr. Delphy, one of the midshipmen, who lost both legs, and died at sea, was buried yesterday in Saint Andrew's church yard. I have requested that captain Allen may be buried as near him, on the right (in the same vault, if practicable) as possible.

* Tablet, whereon will be recorded the name, rank, age and character of the deceased, and also of the midshipman, will be placed (it can be contrived) as I have suggested; both having lost their lives in fighting for the honor of their country.

"I remain, respectfully, sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

(Signed)

JOHN HAWKER,

Cidevant American vice consul.

"To general Allen, &c. &c. Providence, R. Island."

[Here follows the order of procession for the funeral of captain Allen at Plymouth, which has been published.]

Thus lived and thus died William Henry Allen.

By the company and conversation of the elegant and polite, the hard and severe duties of the sailor acquired a sort of polish, and his character presented that combination of gallantry, grace, and intrepidity that so irresistibly attracts. In the hour of danger, he was calm, intrepid, and persevering: in private intercourse, guarded, affable, and delicate.—Entering into the navy with large and expanded ideas of honor, the perils he encountered and the hard services he endured, consolidated his romantic and floating visions into rules and principles of action. By never lowering his lofty standard amidst the jostle of so many contending difficulties, he at length arrived at it; and new trials served only to call into exercise new and unexplored resources of fortitude. He had so long forsaken every other consideration for glory, that he finally measured his life by this standard, and felt a repulsive antipathy to whatever fell short of that measure.

I am perfectly aware that this picture will be thought to have been drawn by the partial hand of friendship. Let it be remembered, that for thirteen years he was hardly for so many weeks from the service of his country. Let his enemies speak for him; they at least have not to contend with the partial feelings of friendship. Their testimony must be free from such censure; and the peculiar respect paid to his ashes, by command of the English government, is the most honorable testimony of his worth.

There seems a sort of compact amongst our naval commanders never to quit their station on deck. Allen, in his mutilated state, refused to be carried below, and fainted on the deck from loss of blood. Lawrence showed the same determined spirit, and never left his station until he was too far exhausted by his wounds to animate his men by his example.—Burrows, although mortally wounded at his quarters, still remained at his post, survived the action, and there received the sword of his gallant and intrepid antagonist.

It is astonishing that we have yet no official account of the capture of the Argus. All that we have known is from our enemies. In the affair of the Macedonian, Commodore DeCatur speaks in the highest terms of the gallantry of Allen. In the action of the Argus, his enemies speak the same language. Thus, although oppressed by misfortune and defeat, it may be proudly said, that our naval character has lost none of its lustre: as is abundantly evident from the testimony of our enemies themselves.

The following extract from his last letter, addressed to his sister, will show the character of this intrepid officer in an amiable light:

"When you shall hear that I have ended my earthly career, that I only exist in the kind remembrance of my friends, you will forget my follies, forgive my faults, call to mind some little instances dear to reflection, to excuse your love for me, and shed one tear to the memory of HENRY."

Lieutenant Aylwin.

FROM THE ANALECTIC MAGAZINE.

John Cushing Aylwin was the son of Thomas Aylwin, esq. and nephew of the hon. William Cushing, late one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States. His father, previous to the revolution, was a merchant in Boston, and, at the time of the siege of that town, retired to Quebec with his wife, to whom he had been then recently married. It was in this city, at the close of the war, that the subject of this memoir was born. The first years of his boyhood displayed a generous spirit; a contempt of danger, and those ardent feelings which, though not uncommon at that age, add much to worth, and always characterized the subsequent stages of his life. He received there the rudiments of his education, which, however, was not further extended than to the first principles of mathematics, an elementary knowledge of the Latin, and a perfect acquaintance with the French language. His father destined him to a naval life, and while yet a child, had him borne on the books of a frigate which captain Coffin, now admiral sir Isaac Coffin Greenly, then commanded.* The intentions of his father were, however, not long after frustrated by an occurrence that young Aylwin witnessed in the streets of Quebec. The horror excited in his breast at seeing a lad whom he had known torn from the bosom of his parents by a press-gang, caused an invincible disgust to the English naval service: he could never be again brought to think of entering it. His attachment, notwithstanding, to a sea life was not lessened: and he became urgent with his parents to send him to their relatives in New-England, that he might enter the American service. While arrangements were making to carry into effect his wishes, he was suddenly left an orphan by the death of his parents within the short space of two months of each other. This loss was in some degree alleviated by the kind attentions of a paternal uncle, who, finding it impracticable to procure a suitable situation for his nephew in his favorite profession, endeavored to persuade him from a life of danger, and to turn his attention to mercantile pursuits. An effort was made to comply with the entreaties of his uncle, but it was ineffectual. He was then bound apprentice to a captain in the London trade upon most favorable terms; it being agreed that on their arrival in England, he should be permitted to remain at a naval academy for at least six months, and that he should be advanced to the grade of mate as soon as he acquired the requisite experience. As the captain had determined not to return to Quebec, he little regarded the stipulations into which he had so readily entered, and, on his arrival at London, put his vessel into the West-India trade.

Two voyages were performed by our youth, and such was the progress he made in his profession, that hardly had he passed his fifteen year when he was made a mate in the ship. This pleasing dawn (which in some degree compensated for the violation of the agreement) was soon overcast, for on the homeward voyage a dispute arose between him and his captain, which so enraged the latter, that on their coming to anchor he caused him to be kidnapped by a press-gang. He was immediately sent on board a receiving ship in the Thames; where he found himself surrounded by six or seven hundred individuals, the scourgings of a vicious metropolis. All communication with friends was denied him; letters which he wrote were suppressed; hope itself was almost excluded from his breast. From this receptacle of wretchedness he was in a few weeks transferred to a gun brig. Here he was narrowly watched, and endured all the rigor exercised in the English service toward their impressed men, to induce them to enter as voluntary seamen. The great antipathy, however, which he had conceived for their service would not permit him to subscribe to that which he considered would be his own infamy. Threats were unavailing: he had a mind that could not be subdued.

After cruising in the north sea, the brig was ordered up the Mediterranean, and at the time of the invasion of Egypt by the French, was stationed on that coast. From thence the vessel was ordered to the East Indies: two years he passed on board of her in the Red Sea; and three more in different parts of the Indian ocean. His constitution having become almost a sacrifice to the climate, he was there invalidated and permitted to return to his relations and friends, by whom even his existence was unknown. In the course of this service he was in several engagements, and distinguished himself particularly in one, by lashing to their brig the bowsprit of a French corvette, and then boarding. A warrant was offered on the oc occasion, and promises were constantly held out to him of promotion, if he would but enter. These he always withstood, and though few indeed could he find among his messmates to commune with, yet he preferred his station of captain of the foretop to any office that could be bestowed on him in that service. While in the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, almost his sole resource for amusement and instruction was his bible. In identifying the positions of places distinguished in the sacred volume, and in tracing in the manners of the modern those of the ancient inhabitants of the surrounding countries, he would often forget the loss of his liberty and the evils of his situation. Although the inmate of the forecabin for more than six years, yet he remained untainted by the surrounding contagion.

* The rating of the names of the children of some gentlemen, with that of our youth, without being actually mustered on board, was one of the charges preferred against captain Coffin, by his officers upon the breaking out of a quarrel between them; and this cost him his commission. He was a few years after restored to his rank, as it was discovered that the court-martial had not been regularly detailed.

He never could speak of the loss of so many of the most valuable years of his life without the deepest sorrow; it was with him ever after a matter of astonishment that his existence had been supported without the deadening of every honorable sentiment—without the extinguishment of every principle of virtue. The pliability of his mind to his misfortunes ever appeared to him a miracle.

A short residence with his friends in Boston re-established his health, and having become by adoption, what he almost considered himself by birth, a citizen of the United States, he immediately obtained that employment in our merchant service which thorough seamanship entitled him to anticipate.

For several years he sailed as a master of a vessel, experienced many of these vexations and losses from the respective belligerents to which the commerce of our country has been exposed.

In the winter preceding the declaration of war, he considered that event as inevitable. To continue therefore in the merchant service would be sharing the dangers without the honors of warfare; to privateering he would not willingly descend. The regular service appeared to him the only proper occupation for one who disliked inglorious ease—the field where his courage and nautical skill would find their reward. Captain Hull, learning his views on this subject, invited him to take the station of sailing master on board the Constitution, with an assurance that his exertions should not be wanting to procure him a lieutenantcy as soon as practicable. Of this invitation he willingly availed himself, repaired to Washington to join the frigate, and on the 24th April, 1812, received his warrant as sailing-master in the navy of the United States.

In the early part of July the Constitution sailed from Annapolis, and on the 18th, in the neighborhood of Cape May, ran a hair breadth escape of capture in that sixty hours' chase, which will not be ranked among the least brilliant efforts of our infant navy. Mr. Aylwin availed himself of his station to make known his seamanship, and much of the merit of the management of the Constitution that occasion was due to him. In a letter, at this time, to an intimate friend, which predicted the eventual success of our navy, he remarks, "I feel all possible conviction, and I can well judge, from having been in the British navy, that they have not a single frigate of equal force with the Constitution, but what must, if we fall in with her and go fairly at it, strike her colors. Thank God, in this chase, we had no occasion to be brought to the test; but there was not a countenance on board that displayed any thing like yielding without an heroic struggle. There seemed to be a solemn gloom in each visage, as if sensible of such a too early misfortune, yet combined with a cast of desperate resolution. It is not seldom that I have examined the human face in the hour of battle; and I never before saw a truer stamp of courage than was then to be found in every sailor's countenance."

The Constitution having arrived in safety at Boston, was there fully equipped, and departed on her first cruise which terminated in the destruction of the Guerriere.

Doubts were entertained at the commencement of the war, by many people, and it is believed, by some of our naval commanders, whether an English 38 gun frigate would not be an over-match for any of our frigates. Personal examination enabled Mr. Aylwin to form a truer estimate of the result of such a contest; and his opinion was hardly thought a serious one by his brother officers. It was therefore with much satisfaction that he found his predictions verified in the capture of the Guerriere. In another letter to his friend, he says, "On the 19th August we fortunately fell in with the Guerriere. I say fortunately, for I would not have missed the chance—no! not for the richest prize that ever floated. It has given our officers and men the only thing hitherto wanting—confidence in themselves. Fifteen minutes of close cannonading completely rendered her ours: this was a little sooner, to be sure, than my anticipation; but it astonished all."

In this engagement he received a slight wound from a musket ball; and the style in which he brought the Constitution into action, and manœuvred her throughout the battle, procured for him the applause of captain Hull and all on board. On their return to port he was appointed an acting lieutenant; this being the second instance in our navy of promotion from the grade of sailing-master.

The Constitution having been refitted, set sail from Boston, under command of commodore Bainbridge, in company with the Hornet, on the 26th of October, 1812. During this cruise Mr. Aylwin was junior lieutenant, and evinced an exemplary attention to his duty—acquired the love of the seamen and the respect of his brother officers.

In the memorable action with the Java, lieutenant Aylwin received that wound which terminated his life, and deprived the navy of the services of a valuable officer. A musket ball or grape shot struck him just under the collar bone, within an inch of his former wound, and passed through the shoulderblade. The wound was not perceived by any one, nor did he make mention of it himself until all the men had been dressed. He went below then, and observed to the surgeon that he believed he had received a slight scratch: upon examination the doctor was surprised to find that the wound had assumed a gangrenous appearance. The next day it had a more favorable aspect, and strong hopes were entertained that, with sedulous attention, and remaining quiet in his state room, he would recover. A few days however put an end to these hopes, for on a strange sail heaving in sight, and all hands being beat to quarters, he repaired to his station, unknown to the surgeon, and there remained for two hours exposed to a meridian sun. This ardor in the performance of duty unquestionably aggravated his wound; and it was not long before he was aware that his life could not be preserved. During three weeks that he lingered, he occupied his mind with a preparation for his dissolution. The surgeon, fearful that this attention to his affairs would add to these pains already become excessive, entreated him to suffer his mind to be tranquil. His reply, perfectly characteristic, was, "Doctor, I have looked death too often in the face to be afraid of him now."

As he lived without fear, so he died without reproach.

Lieutenant Aylwin was, in size, rather under the middle stature; possessed an open countenance, marked with strong features, which had the appearance of being much weatherbeaten. He was distinguished as a scientific navigator, and, in every respect, a practical seaman. His mind had been formed in the school of adversity, and possessed a deep, thoughtful cast. More skilled in the contemplation of men than books, his attainments, however, were considerable in other branches of knowledge than those belonging to his profession. Of his coolness and intrepidity it would be needless to speak farther.

"He pour'd his latest blood in manly fight,
And fell a hero in his country's right."

Having been a victim to the practice of impressment, lieutenant Aylwin had strong sensibilities on the subject; and his enlarged philanthropy was excited by the hope that the present war would lessen, if not terminate the misery occasioned by what he conceived to be a needless and most detestable subjugation of our species. In his last moments it was his frequent ejaculation, in reference to his subject, "I thank God I am dying in so glorious a cause."

A circumstance, in connection with this memoir, we cannot refrain from touching upon. It has been the practice of most of our naval commanders to avoid, in their official letters, particular commendations of their officers, through a fear of exciting jealousies. This conduct, unquestionably, has the effect intended; but its consequences to the service are injurious in the highest degree, as it damps the ardor of heroism, and deprives merit of its due reward. By some oversight, the name of lieutenant Aylwin does not appear in commodore Bainbridge's official account of the action. This may be partly excused, as the despatch was made at St. Salvador, at a time when lieutenant Aylwin was supposed to be out of danger. But it is much better atoned for by the following tribute to his memory from the pen of his commander,

"Died on board the United States frigate Constitution, at sea, the 28th of January last, of wounds received in the action with the Java, lieutenant John Cushing Aylwin, of the United States navy. He entered the service about the time war was declared, and was promoted to a lieutenancy for his gallant conduct in the action with the Guerriere. He was an officer of great merit, much esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He had seen much of the world, and improved his opportunities of observation; possessed a strong mind, with great benevolence of disposition. In his death our country has suffered a great loss—his friends a painful deprivation.

In the action with the Guerriere, he stood on an elevated situation by the side of his comrades, Morris and Bush, at the time the two vessels came in contact, and was wounded in the left shoulder with a musket ball.

In the late action he commanded the fore-castle division, and his bravery and marked coolness throughout the contest gained him the admiration of his commander, and all who had an opportunity of witnessing him.

When boarders were called to repel boarders, he mounted the quarter deck, hammock cloths, and in the act of firing his pistols at the enemy, received a ball through the same shoulder. Notwithstanding the serious nature of his wound, he continued at his post till the enemy had struck; and even then did not make known his situation until all the wounded had been dressed. His zeal and courage did not forsake him in his last moments: for, a few days after the action, although laboring under considerable debility, and the most excruciating pain, he repaired to quarters when an engagement was expected with a ship, which afterwards proved to be the Hornet. He bore his pain with great and unusual fortitude, and expired without a groan,

"A dauntless soul erect, who smiled on death."

James Broom,

First lieutenant of marines, on board the Chesapeake, about 24 years of age, was killed in the action with the Shannon, on the first of June.

He was born at Wilmington, in the state of Delaware. His father, maj. Abraham Broom, till this unfortunate bereavement, had three sons, all of whom were enrolled in the naval or military service of the country.

His brother Charles, about 18 years of age, is now a lieutenant of marines, serving with commodore Chauncey, on the lakes, and promises to be an ornament to his profession, having, to use the expression of his gallant commander in relation to him, "a veteran head upon young shoulders."

His youngest brother, Thomas, is a cadet at West Point, preparing for military service.

James, who was on board the Chesapeake as a midshipman on his first cruise when she was attacked by the Leopard, and who had his station on the quarter deck along side of the commodore, received several wounds. These he never forgot, and ardently wished for an opportunity to wipe off the stain on the national flag, which that unhappy event, however unjustly, was supposed to have occasioned. A few days before he sailed on his last cruise, he said, in a letter to the writer of this article: "I have no doubt, we shall give such an account of ourselves as will be gratifying to the friends of our little navy."

It seems to be a strange fatality, that after having been employed in many different vessels, he should, after a lapse of six years, have been turned over to the unfortunate Chesapeake, to terminate his career in the same ship in which he commenced it.

From the time he entered into the service until his death, he was constantly employed. He sailed in the Constitution with captain Hull, and the Vixen and other vessels, in all of which he conciliated the affectionate esteem of his brother officers. To good talents and a competent education, he united courage, guided by an ardent zeal for his country. Dangers and difficulties were cheerfully encountered, in the hope that he might distinguish himself in her cause, and shed a lustre on the American character.—Such youths as these the times can but ill spare. They are the brightest stars in our constellation, and have by their brilliant exploits raised the public expectation to so lofty a height that none but such as they can meet it.

His father, in a letter written after the capture of the ship, but before the particulars were known, says: "I am much afraid my poor James is no more—his situation, having the command of the boarders, was very hazardous, and knowing his intrepid spirit, I have but little hope that he lives. This consolation, however, is left me; he fell doing his duty like a soldier, and when living was a dutiful son, and was beloved by all who knew him."

His country's sympathy is all she has to give—he leaves her to return his rich example—an example which will stimulate to the noblest deeds of valor those who have to sustain the untarnished honor of the American flag. The blood which has already flowed to maintain it, has not flowed in vain—it has cemented the base of the naval column this country is destined to raise. Shall not then a grateful nation inscribe on it the names of those, in whose life's blood so glorious a foundation is laid?

Let the first of June be as memorable in our annals, as it has hitherto been in those of the enemy. It is true we did not command success—this is not for mortals; but let it be remembered that our flag was not struck by an American hand, and that the determination of the living and dying to the last moment of the conflict, when no volition was left them, seemed to be "never to give up the ship."

J. B. Sigourney.

Characteristic sketches of James B. Sigourney, who fell on board the United States' sloop Wasp, which vessel he commanded, in the river Potomac, where she was attacked by several British barges, and carried by boarding, after a desperate resistance on the 14th July, 1813—taken from a letter from one of his friends in Boston to another in Charleston.

[Freeman's Ledger.]

The premature death of our late gallant friend Sigourney, has, no doubt, ere this reached you; been known and lamented by you, and though you may have been acquainted with the particulars of his short career, a repetition from me, perhaps may not prove uninteresting.

James Butler Sigourney entered the navy as a midshipman in the month of March, 1809. Immediate as his warrant was obtained, he proceeded to Portland, and was soon stationed on board the sloop of war Wasp, then commanded by captain Robinson, in which vessel he continued during the whole time she was under the command of Lawrence, whose pupil and favorite he was. After his return from France, captain Lawrence was transferred to the Argus, to which vessel Sigourney also followed, and in the course of a short time became the acting master, in which situation he continued while commanded by captain Crare, and when that officer was transferred to the Nautilus, Sigourney was appointed by him her sailing-master. Shortly after the commencement of the war, this brig was unfortunately captured by the Shannon and sent to Halifax. Sigourney, on his return to Boston in September following, found his own master

Lawrence here with the Hornet, who offered him the birth of sailing master on board her, but his exchange not having been ratified by government, he was necessarily obliged to remain on shore. He was in Boston until late in December. I was much with him, and do assure you the man was greatly improved since you knew him. He was always an agreeable companion, and in the intercourse of social life it was his constant endeavor to promote that which would most conduce to the happiness of his friends.

Our friend had lately been acting on the southern station, and at the time of his death commanded the United States schooner Asp, which vessel was attacked in the Potomac, the 11th July last, by three of the enemy's barges, which were gallantly beaten off. In about one hour, however, a second attack was made, by five boats, with at least 80 men, who succeeded in boarding, exclaiming as they got up the schooner's side, that they would give no quarters. The whole number of her crew was only twenty-one, most of whom threw themselves overboard. Sigourney nobly kept his post, and was cut down when only three of his men remained alive on the deck, one of which it is said, asked for quarters which was refused him. This transaction, in my estimation, casts a stain on the British naval character, not easy to be obliterated.

Our friend has left behind him, in extreme age, a father and mother, besides two sisters, whose situation in life, though respectable, is far from being affluent. James was the only remaining son, and to him his parents looked for comfort and protection, nor looked in vain while he yet lived. He was particularly attentive to, and provided against their wants to the extent of his ability; but by a death both sudden and awful, though to himself glorious, this their chief hope, is taken from them, and for their loss they can receive no equivalent, but by a special interposition of the Divine favor; and may He, who is able to keep them from falling, alleviate their sorrows, and be pleased not to render too painful what small portion yet remains to be performed of their journey to the grave.

Sigourney had been in the service nearly four and a half years, and never had a furlough for a single week during that time. It had never fallen to his lot to display his skill or courage as a warrior, although as an active seaman, his fame was well established, until that fatal day that deprived his parents of a protector, his companions of a friend, and his country of a hero; and though "the sun of glory shines but on his tomb," still

"All noble spirits, judging by themselves, May yet conjecture what he might have been."

And I trust this dear youth, by every lover of his country and of virtue will long be justly lamented for his intrepidity and untimely fate.

P. S. I understand from good authority, that there was a lieutenant's commission made out for Sigourney, and is still in the navy office at Washington, he never having been on shore to receive it.

Thomas Claxton, junr.

From the Erie paper of October 15, 1813.

At the funeral of midshipman CLAXTON, on Friday last, the rev. Mr. Reed delivered the following address:

Solemn and sad are the impressions which such a scene as this make upon the mind. Death is awful. The grave is a mournful theme. But there are different degrees in our feelings, in our solemnities and in our sorrows for departed friends. When we are called to attend the funeral of the aged, of those who have passed thro' the vicissitudes of eighty or a hundred years, and then have sunk quietly to rest, the sight is indeed solemn and affecting; but it is only what the course of nature has taught us to expect, and we are all fully satisfied to see our aged relatives and friends thus carried to the grave in peace. But when the rude hand of death wrests from our embrace our youthful friends, when he snatches from the fond parents the consolation of their age, when he tears from the embrace of their country her darling hopes, her youthful and beloved sons, from whose future efforts she had much to expect; then the sorrows of deprivation are felt with deep concern; we mourn our loss, and our hearts experience the most lively sensations of grief.

Such is the case which we now contemplate. Here you behold just about to be enclosed in the tomb, the remains of one who was brave, amiable and young; the delight of his friends, and his country's hope. Of his bravery and good conduct in the hour of danger and death, when his friends and companions were falling around him, they can tell who witnessed, and who were engaged in that late arduous contest, which gloriously terminated in the destruction of the hopes of our enemy, and in our deliverance from the calamities of war on our frontiers, and perhaps in the heart of our country; a war which has been, and no doubt would still have been carried on by the ruthless hand of the barbarous savage. To him whose body we are about to commit to the earth, we are partly indebted for our preservation. When he whom we now lament, was numbered with the victims of death, with the wounded and the dying, and in severe fortune, was told that his country's flag, the flag he had so gallantly defended, was struck to her foes, the anguish of his heart for his country's loss far exceeded the pain of his wounds, he could not refrain, he burst into tears—the warrior wept. But kind Provi-gence was pleased to permit him to live to see his country's banner waving above that of the vanquished foe—to hear the sound of victory echoed from shore to shore; and, at length, covered with laurels and glory, he sunk in the arms of death.

"So sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest."

He was amiable—his intimate friends, his companions in arms, and all who had the honor of his acquaintance, declare with one voice that his character was irreproachable—that he was amiable, generous and kind—that he possessed in a high degree the fine feelings of friendship, the just sense of honor, and that disposition, which is always inseparable from true nobleness of mind, to prefer to his own interest and safety, the interest and honor of his country and his friends. That he possessed this disposition, his conduct when he fell is sufficient proof.

But he was young. He was cut down in the flower of youth. Twenty annual suns had little more than beamed upon his opening bloom, when he fell by the hand of death: when he was called to deposit his body in the grave, and to present his soul before the tribunal of God. Death is no respecter of persons. The youthful and the aged, the foolish and the wise, the coward and the brave, are all by his fatal dart consigned to the tomb sooner or later, and how soon none can tell, all of us, my friends, must fall beneath his hand. Our youthful and our aged friends who are now daily falling around us, are so many monitors censuring our carelessness and negligence, and with united voice exhorting us to prepare to meet our God. Soon, alas, perhaps too soon for many of us, the messenger of death will speak and in a voice of thunder call us to judgment. Let us therefore improve the present opportunity. While mercy is offered let us accept. And, casting ourselves upon the care of that God who has laid the plan and given us the means of salvation; trusting in that Redeemer who has given himself a sacrifice to save us from death; living in the practice of godliness, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, we shall hear without alarm the voice that calls us to the grave, and pass from this scene of death and sorrow, to the blessed regions of immortality and joy.

[Mid-shipman Claxton died in consequence of the wounds he received in the battle on Erie, on board the Lawrence.]

Captain Robert Hatch.

From a Charleston paper of Feb. 14, 1814.

Died, on the 6th inst. captain ROBERT HATCH, aged 56 years, of a wound here received on the 30th ult. on board the United States' schooner Alligator, in an engagement with six British barges, in Stono River, which the Alligator succeeded in beating off.

Captain Hatch was born in Falmouth, Massachusetts; went to sea at an early age, and was impressed on board of a British man of war just before the declaration of American independence. After three and a half years servitude (during which time he was compelled to fight against his countrymen, and in three different actions was severely wounded in the thigh and legs) he embraced the first opportunity of making his escape, and immediately took up arms in defence of American independence, which he supported with credit to himself and honor to his country.

After American independence was established, captain Hatch made Charleston his place of residence, and for several years was employed in the West-India trade. That trade soon becoming precarious, captain H. entered into the coasting trade in this state, and followed it until the present disturbance between this country and Britain took place. He then expressed his anxiety of meeting the enemy on their boasted element: for said, he, "I have a son that has been torn from me upwards of three years and a half, and although I have sent on every necessary document to prove his nativity, I cannot get his discharge; and the last accounts I had of him was, that he was on board of the Frolic when the action took place between her and the Wasp, and not having heard of him since, I fear he has fallen a victim to their accursed arbitrary mode of manning their ships." But, having a large and helpless family, an aged mother and seven children; one a girl of twelve years of age, who is severely afflicted from the effects of an apoplectic stroke when an infant, and who is now an helpless idiot; who looked up entirely to him for support, having lately lost their only house by fire, and a valuable male slave, who assisted much in the support of the family, taken by a British cruiser from the schooner Planter, captain Hussey, going from hence to Beaufort, he was compelled to be near his family, as the earnings of his hands were their entire support. He therefore volunteered his services as pilot and sail master on board the United States' schooner Alligator, on this and the Beaufort station, where he remained until the 30th ult. when, on the morning of that day, as she was coming from St. Helena to Charleston, off Stono, they discovered a ship and brig in pursuit of them. The Alligator then put into Stono.

It was suggested by her gallant commander, sailing-master Bassett, to captain Hatch, that they had better run higher up, as in all probability the enemy would send their boats in in the course of the night; for, said he, you know they have cut out frigates. Captain Hatch replied, they cannot send their boats in without they have "extraordinary good pilots;" but if they do come, "we will dose them." About seven o'clock, P. M. six boats were discovered under the marsh, about fifty yards abreast of the Alligator; they were immediately hailed, but not answering, a musket was fired over them; upon which the Alligator received a volley of musketry and grape from the barges; dividing themselves two on each side, and two ahead of her. The schooner immediately cut her cable and made sail. The action then became general, and during the time it lasted, thirty minutes, was very warm; when the enemy sheered off, being pretty "well dosed."

In the early part of the action captain H. received a wound just below his temples, which took both of his eyes out; but he could not be persuaded to go below, and remained on deck encouraging the crew, exclaiming, "take good aim, my lads, and don't waste your ammunition," until the battle was over.

The Alligator mounts ten guns, and had thirty-eight men in the action. The barges, upon a moderate calculation, must have had twenty men each. The day following, capt. Hatch was brought to town, and suffered the most excruciating pain for six days, when he resigned his soul to his Maker. Thus terminated the life of a brave man—who was also a kind and indulgent parent, a tender and affectionate husband, a generous and benevolent neighbor and friend.

Zebulon Montgomery Pike.

It is a little extraordinary that, as the biography of our naval heroes (even of those who yet live to honor their country) has become so fashionable; no one, possessing the necessary documents for the purpose, has yet attempted a sketch of the life and services of the ever to be lamented brigadier general PIKE; a name that will be dear to his country and revered by its army, while private worth and public virtue, courage, prudence, fortitude and justice are esteemed among men. The editor of the WEEKLY REGISTER, however incompetent he might be to the task, would have been happy to have linked the remembrance of this work to the immortality of Pike, if he possessed, or knew how to obtain, the materials for a biographical memoir of the illustrious dead—but these being wanting, he can only insert the following notice of his death extracted from a letter to the editor of the Aurora, and record an account of the honors paid to his memory, by those who knew his value the best.

THE CAPTURE OF YORK, IN CANADA.

The following account of the enterprise against the capital of Upper Canada, has been communicated to one of those whom the hero who fell before that place had selected from the "crowd of the world," as worthy of his friendship while living, and of his remembrance even in the moment of victory and death. That remembrance is too precious not to excite, with the sorrow for the loss which his country has sustained, emotions too lively to be expressed in any form of words. The account, as it will appear, was written on the special injunction of general Pike, by one of his companions in arms, and who fell by his side, and are communicated from the original for this paper. The following is the unaffected and interesting narrative of the officer to whom the general gave the injunction:

"Without the honor of a personal acquaintance, I address you at the particular order of the late general Pike, after he had been mortally wounded—his words were exactly these:—"..... I am mortally wounded—my ribs and back are stove in—write my friend D..... and tell him what you know of the battle—and to comfort my....." Some things else he said, on which I shall again write you; and many things he said for your ear, have escaped me through the severity of my own bruises. As an order from general Pike while living, was an obligation of duty on me to obey, I shall hardly disregard his injunctions, even though we have parted for ever.

We embarked the 22d and 23d of April, but the weather being stormy we returned into port, and sailed again on the 25th, and arrived at York, in Upper Canada, the 27th, about 7 o'clock, A. M. and immediately prepared to land opposite the old site of fort Toronto. A body of British grenadiers were paraded on the shore, and the Glengary fencibles, a corps which has been disciplined with great pains for six months past, appeared at another point. Bodies of Indians were perceived in large groups in different directions; and a considerable number in some woods and underwoods on our leeward flank.

About the site of the old French fort of Toronto, of which scarcely any vestiges at present remain, we could discern a few horsemen, who we perceived afterwards moving into the town, where strong field works had been thrown up to oppose our landing.

As soon as the horsemen had entered the town we saw the Indians moving in gangs along the skirts of the woods; under the direction of British officers taking post at stations pointed out to them; apparently calculated with some skill as to the point which the water and the weather must compel us to land.

After these Indians, acting as traillleurs, were thus disposed, we perceived very distinctly the regulars moving out of their works, in open columns of platoons, and marching along the bank in that order; when they reached the plain, of the old fort Toronto, they were wheeled off by heads of platoons into the woods, and soon appeared in the same order below the plain just at the position at which our troops were under the necessity of landing.

Major Forsythe, and his excellent and gallant rifle corps, who had been placed in two large batteaux, pulled undauntedly towards the clear ground where he had been ordered to land; but he was forced by the strength of the wind, a considerable distance below his destined point.

The fire of musketry and rifles here commenced from the shore; the enemy being within a few feet of the water and in a considerable degree masked by the wood and copse.

Here major Forsythe ordered his men to rest for a few moments upon their oars and soon opened a galling fire upon the enemy. In the moment when Forsythe's corps were lying upon their oars and pulling, gen. Pike was standing on the deck, and impatient at the apparent pause of an instant, and seeing that the rifle corps had been driven by the wind beyond the point at which they were to have embarked; exclaimed—"By—I can't stay here any longer!" and addressed himself to his staff, "come jump into the boat," which we immediately did; the commodore having reserved a boat specially for him and his suite; the little coxswain was ordered immediately to steer for the middle of the fray, and the balls whistled gloriously around; probably their number was owing to seeing so many officers in the same boat; but we laughed at their clumsy efforts as we pressed forward with well pulled oars.

The infantry had, according to orders, embarked at the same time, and formed in platoons as fast as they reached the shore. The general took command of the first platoon he reached and formed it below and ordered the whole to prepare for a charge as soon as we reached the top of the bank; we proceeded in high spirits and mounted the bank under a volley of their musketry and rifle shot; but we had not time to form our platoon completely when the British grenadiers shewed us their backs—at the very moment of their turning tail upon us the sound of Forsythe's bugles was heard, with peculiar delight, as it was the indication of his success; the effect of the bugle upon the nerves of the British Indian allies was electric; for they no sooner heard it than they gave a most diabolical yell, and fled in all directions.

The Glengary corps skirmished with Forsythe's while the infantry were landing; and brigade major Hunter formed the troops for action as they landed and reached the plain.

The volunteer corps commanded by colonel Maclure flanked the reserve, and the light or tillery commanded by major Potts, acting as infantry, covered the left

It is proper to state in this place the gallant and masterly co-operation of commodore Chauncey, and the naval squadron under his command; he sent his schooners mounting heavy metal to cover the landing, and kept up so well directed and incessant a fire of grape on the woods, as to effectually cover our right flank, and afforded us great facility in forming our platoons: besides producing the utmost consternation among the Indians. A shot from one of the schooners killed a horse under the aid of the British general; but owing to the shallowness of the water, neither the ship nor brig could be brought in to participate in the action; but the commodore himself was through the whole of the action, in his boat, encouraging and giving orders to the different schooners. The navy lost two gallant young midshipmen, and about twenty seamen were killed and wounded in the service of landing us.

The troops ordered to land by general Pike when he went on shore, where the three companies of captain Hoppock, (who was mortally wounded in the boat) captain Scott, and captain Young, of the 15th regiment United States infantry, all under the command of major King of the same regiment, (the same who gallantly distinguished himself at Queens-town.) their orders were to reinforce major Forsythe, and effect a landing—and they were forbidden to load or use powder; the riflemen of Forsythe, as the infantry came up, opened a heavy and effective fire upon the enemy; and the three companies landed in the most complete style; the enemy gave way before our troops could come to the bayonet's point, and were pursued up the bank by our troops; at the top of the bank a fresh body of British grenadiers (said to be the 8th or king's grenadiers) made a formidable charge upon this column of ours, and compelled us for an instant to retire; but our troops instantly rallied and returned to the charge, and with the most complete success, not a man of the grenadiers escaped our fire or charge, and our troops just reinforced by the remainder of the 15th, remained undisputed masters of the bank. This reinforcement brought the colors of the 15th, which accompanied the platoon of captain Steele.* The enemy presenting a fresh front, the troops were instantly formed for the charge by major King, who gave them Yankee Doodle; but the enemy did not like our music, nor our pikes; any better than our rifles: they gave way and fled in the utmost disorder.

As soon as our force were all landed and collected, we were formed into platoons and marched in that order towards the enemy's works, flanked by the rifle corps.

Our march was by the lake road in sections, but the route was so much intersected by streams and rivulets, the bridges over which had been destroyed by the enemy as they retreated, that we were considerably retarded in our progress; we collected logs and by severe efforts at length contrived to pass over one field piece and a howitzer, which were placed at the head of our column; in charge of captain Fanning of the 3d artillery; and thus we proceeded through a spacious wood, as soon as we emerged from which we were saluted by a battery of 24 pounders, but excepting some pikes broken and some bayonets bent, these guns gave us no annoyance.

The general then ordered one of his aids (Frazer) and a serjeant to proceed to the right of the battery in order to discover how many men were in the works; we did so, and reported to him the number, and that they were sinking their own guns towards the shipping.

The general immediately ordered captain Walworth of the 16th with his company of grenadiers to make the assault. Walworth's company ordered his men to trail arms, and advance at the accelerated pace, but at the moment when they were ordered to recoiled and charge the enemy, the enemy broke in the most confusion, leaving several men wounded on the ground which they abandoned.

We then proceeded in admirable order on a gradual ascent, when a fire was opened upon us of round and canister from the quarters of the British governor; the general here ordered the troops to lie close, while the artillery battery under major Hustis was brought to the front; and silenced the enemy's battery. The firing very soon ceased altogether, and we were expecting a flag of surrender, at the very moment when a terrible explosion of the British magazine took place. The explosion was tremendous and awful, and at the instant the common supposition was, that it was a simultaneous mine. The general had just undertaken moving a wounded man with his own hands, and he fell sideways on a stump with a British serjeant who had taken prisoner, whom the general, with captain Nicholson and myself, were examining, when the explosion took place. The general, captain Nicholson and the British serjeant, were all mortally wounded, and I was so much bruised in the general crash that it is so surprising how I survived; probably I owe my escape to the competency of the British serjeant, whose body was thrown upon a mine by the concussion.

Brigade major Hunter, assisted by lieutenant colonel Mitchell of the 3d artillery, who acted as a volunteer on the expedition, formed the troops, and we were ready to give or receive a charge in five minutes after this explosion.

The wounds of general Pike, were of such a nature as to disable him from all further service, and the command devolved on colonel Pearce, of the 16th infantry, as the senior officer, who sent a flag, demanding an immediate surrender at discretion—they made only one stipulation, which was granted without hesitation, that is, that private property should be respected.

The British general made his escape and a body of the regular troops with him, in what direction I have not heard.

When the surgeons were carrying their wounded general and his aids from the field, our troops, which had just formed, gave a tremendous hurra! The general turned his head anxiously to enquire what that was for; a serjeant who accompanied him said:—“The British union jack is coming down general—the stars are going up!”—he heaved a sigh of exultation and smiled even amidst the anguish which must have been inseparable from the state of his wounds. He was carried on board the Port schooner, together with his aid-de-camp Frazer and from thence on board the commodore's ship accompanied by the commodore who came to attend him. On board the commodore's ship his gallant spirit fled, another Montgomery in fate; not indeed perishing by the valor of a gallant foe in noble combat, but falling, even in the arms of victory, by the barbarian revenge of a brutal and defeated enemy.

General Dearborn, commodore Chauncey, and indeed every officer and soldier, sees in the loss of our friend, the loss of one of our country's proudest ornaments, and the military profession its brightest example and model.

EXTRACT—DATED

“Sacket's Harbor, 14th May, 1812.”

“The remains of brigadier general Zachariah M. Pike, who fell on the 27th ultimo, at the attack upon York, the capital of Upper Canada, were yesterday interred at this place in the magazine of fort Tompkins. His funeral was attended with appropriate military honors. He fell gloriously at the head of his troops, in the very moment of victory. All regret his loss—but what brave man would not die, as he did. His country will honor his memory—history will consummate his fame; and in the heart of every American the departed hero will find a tomb.

FROM THE BUFFALO GAZETTE.

Tribute of respect to the memory of general

Z. M. Pike.

Fort George, August 30th, 1813.

At a meeting of the officers of the 15th regiment, convened at the colonel's quarters, for the purpose of forming an association to endeavor to do honor to the memory of its late commander, Z. M. Pike, and for other purposes, it was agreed, that lieutenants George M-Glassin, Richard L. Howell and ensign William Coffie, be a committee to draft suitable rules and articles for that purpose: who at the next meeting, convened at colonel Beardsley's quarters, on the evening of the 31st ultimo, presenting the following, which, after being read, was unanimously agreed to, and adopted as a constitution on the 2d September inst. viz.

We, the undersigned officers of the 15th, or late general Pike's regiment, influenced by a sense of respect for our deceased commander, and a wish to perpetuate that fame which, with the regiment, descended to our charge, as well as for other honorable purposes, associate ourselves under the name and title of

of the 15th, or late

GENERAL PIKE'S REGIMENT.

And do adopt the following articles for our government, subject to such additional ones as from time to time may be deemed proper by said board:

Article 1. The 2d of September, 1812, being the day on which the standard was presented to us by our late gallant chief, we agreed that each succeeding anniversary of the same be held in festivity, as commemorative of the honor thus conferred; and on the morning of each anniversary the standard will be displayed on the parade, and the following order read and the oath administered to such members as may not have taken the same.

"Circulated, Sept. 2d, 1812

"Regimental orders—Our country has at length conferred to our valor and patriotism the standard of the nation—That flag, soldiers, which under our charge we hope to see wave in triumph over all our enemies, and which I have now called you together to give a solemn pledge, that you will support with your sacred lives, as we expect for honor and happiness in this life and fame after death.

"The standard of the 15th I hope will point out the road to glory, and I feel full confidence that no enemies will ever pollute it with their sacrilegious hands, until they have walked over the dead bodies of its brave defenders.

"We solemnly swear, that we will defend this standard against all the enemies of our country, and that we will never desert it in the field of battle or hour of danger, so help us God.

(Signed)

Z. M. PIKE

Art. 2. Each succeeding 27th April, the day on which the immortal Pike fell, the standard will be dressed in mourning, each officer to wear crape and all unnecessary duties dispensed with during the day, as a token of respect for the memory of our departed friend and commander.

Art. 3. To preserve the honor and harmony of the association thus instituted, it shall at all times be deemed, a tribunal of honor; before whom all local disputes may be discussed and decided, upon the application of either party (being a member) who has a right to claim a meeting of said board. Two-thirds of the members present will constitute a quorum for business, a majority of which shall be binding on its members.

Art. 4. The officers who now hold commissions in said regiment, or those who have or may retire from the army with honor, may be considered members. Officers who hereafter may be appointed in this regiment, are entitled to the rights of becoming original members.

Art. 5. Any officer of the army who may have signalized himself in the service of his country may be admitted as an honorary member by a unanimous vote of all the original members present at the time of such application, who, when thus admitted, shall constitute a part of the Board of Honor with equal rights except in the admission of members.

Art. 6. At each annual meeting, a president and secretary shall be elected for the ensuing year, and in case of the death or absence of either, the board or a quorum thereof can elect said officers, pro tempore.

Art. 7. In all cases wherein the board may be engaged in settling the disputes of its members the secretary shall administer the following declaration:

"Having taken into our charge the honor of A B and C D, we pledge ourselves to do justice to the said parties and the beard to which we have the honor to belong."

According to the above, the officers met on the 2d inst. and chose colonel D. Brearly, president, and captain Youngs, secretary, for the ensuing year, and after going through the ceremonies at troop beat, they retired to make arrangements that they might be enabled to mess together on that day; which was accordingly done, and they sat down to a sumptuous camp dinner about 2 P. M. colonel Brearly presiding assisted by captain Youngs, honored by the company of colonels Miller and Pierce, the adjutant and inspector generals, with other distinguished officers, after which a number of toasts [among which were the following] were drank with harmony and friendship.

The day we celebrate—The shores of York and fort George, witness how sacred we have held the charge it gave us—may we, at each succeeding anniversary, have equal cause to look back with exultation and pride.

The memory of the ever to be regretted general Montgomery Pike, whose soul is wafted to the realms of bliss—we cherish his precepts, and will endeavor to imitate his examples.

A nation's tears will consecrate his name,
 And raise his virtues on the wings of Fame.

The memory of captain Hoppock and lieutenant Bloomfield, of the 15th regiment, and captain Lyons and Nicholson, and their brave associates—who are immortalized by a glorious death at the battle of York.

A speedy peace, ratified under the American standard triumphant, within the walls of Quebec.

An opinion of general Pike's: "There are men in the army, who have courage enough to act without any other interest than that of a love of country"—may we cherish and foster such sentiments

The citizens of the United States—May those who wish to maintain that title, learn to appreciate the services of their own army, and despise the cruelties of their enemies.

VOLUNTEERS.

By the president, col. Brearly. The friends of the army, the strongest advocates for peace

By adjutant Miller, of the 15th infantry. May the 3d and 15th regiments vie with each other in cherishing those invaluable precepts left them by their late gallant commander, general Pike.

General Covington.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE WASHINGTON REPUBLICAN, MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Agreeably to your request, gentlemen, an intimate friend and life-time companion of general LEONARD COVINGTON, begs leave to furnish you with the following imperfect compendium of his character, a small, but heart yielding tribute to his memory and worth. The official correspondence from gen. Wilkinson to the secretary of war, and a private letter from lieut. Joseph Kean, brigade-major to general Covington, conveyed the first sad tidings to his family and friends, that LEONARD COVINGTON was no more!

"It is due," says general Wilkinson, "to his worth and his services, that I should make particular mention of brigadier general Covington, who received a mortal wound through the body, while animating his men, and leading them to the charge. He fell where he fought, at the head of his men, and survived but two days."

Says lieut. Kean, in a private letter, "he received the fatal shot after having driven that part of the enemy's line which was opposed to his brigade, from their position, and whilst in the act of charging their second line. That he fell lamented by the whole army, from the commanding general to the private."

At the age of forty five years and seventeen days, Leonard Covington descended to the grave without fear and without reproach, loaded with glory and the love of all who knew him intimately. If he had any enemies, they were amongst those who were distinguished in their censures.

It seems that he coveted the perilous occasion—that he "voluntarily took part in the action," thinking it more virtuous and honorable to hazard his life in the battles of his country, than to preserve it by withholding from peril until urged by the imperative word of command. Though he was slain, yet he was not overcome. He had repulsed the enemy opposed to his front, and in advancing to the aid of his co-partners in valor and in danger—the fatal ball, charged with the errand of death, met him in the van, leading his gal-ant corps to the chastisement of his country's foes. Thus it may be truly said, he died as he lived, demonstrating a higher regard for a glorious and honorable life, than for a safe one.

General Covington, the elder of two sons of Levin Covington, was born, raised and educated in the state of Maryland. He possessed an elegant English, mathematical, and slight latin education, and was designed by an affectionate mother, to whose care he had fallen by the early death of his father, for the plain but honorable occupation of husbandry; on a valuable landed estate descending to him through a long line of ancestors.

Although he was raised in retirement from the busy world, his genius led to the science of war. Immediately ensuing the defeat of general St. Clair by the northern Indians, when the mixtures of grief and consternation pressed heavily upon the public feelings of his country, calculated to dampen, if not to appal, the minds of many: the youth, Covington, prompted by the general glow of patriotism, made more vivid by an enterprising courage, contrary to the tender anxiety of an aged mother and numerous friends, voluntarily hastened to revenge the offended dignity of his country: and, by Washington, was made the officer to bear the standard of a troop.

At fort Recovery he gathered his full share of fame. It was there his horse was shot from under him.

In the severe action on the Miami by the most punctilious honor and formal gallantry—nay by actual personal prowess in battle he won the praise of his general, the admiration of the soldiers and the gratitude of his country.

After the Indians had become humbled in to prayers for peace, our friend returned to the arms of his family; converted the sword into a ploughshare, and resumed the profession of a planter. As a citizen he filled the character with as much reputation as he had done that of a soldier. He knew well the distinction betwixt the civil and military walks of life. After his return to the shades of private life, having formed endearments, the amiable pledges of which now demand the homage of our neighborhood; perhaps no man was ever more withdrawn from the public, and more entirely devoted to his family, neighbors and friends. With his mind thus inviolably appropriated to domestic virtues, he passed his time thoughtless of public affairs, until the conflict between the aristocracy and democracy of our beloved country began to develope, and finally arrayed the people of the nation to pass upon the contest. This great occasion could not escape the patriotic sensibility of our departed friend. It seized upon his manly sense and republican pride; and with perfect truth let it be said, never did human power more for a cause of principle, than he exhibited for the cause of republicanism, in his neighborhood and country. He never contested for men, but for primordial substance—original principles. As a proof of this, he always abandoned at his poll, by his suffrage, the dearest friend of his blood, who to the integrity of his judgment was opposed to the defined republican prosperity of his country. To this there will be a repercussion of sentiment from his native state, where the tributes of respect will pour forth in currents of sorrow from the hearts of all who knew him.

After the convulsions of political party had called the amiable Covington from retirement, the affections of the citizens designated his worth and fidelity by the most honorable civil appointments.

In the archives of his state and of the nation, his name stands enrolled with those of the most worthy of our countrymen. He was a member of the senate of Maryland—a member of the legislature of the United States. He was one of the first electors who changed the political complexion of the senate of his native state, and thereby made the political principles which had recently triumphed over the nation, triumph likewise over the state of Maryland, at least for a while.

In the year 1809, when the troubled waves began to roll from the European to the American shore, and the clouds of the present war to appear above the horizon—Mr. Jefferson, then president of the United States, selected him whose absence we now deplore, from the councils of his state, and transferred unto him the commission of lieutenant colonel of the only regiment of dragoons in the service of the United States. This appointment was characteristic of the signal respect of being unsought and unexpected.

Where next are we to look for our friend! We find him relinquishing the best comforts of life to encounter a southern climate, in obedience to the calls of his country. Before his wearied limbs had gotten to rest, and his feeble system accommodated to sudden transition from clime to clime, behold the awful dirge invites him to the north to meet his country's foe, and to meet his grave! He has done both. On the 13th of November, 1813, he met his unhappy fate with a fortitude highly worthy of imitation. Yes! he died as a man of honor at his post, and in the discharge of his duty. "He fell where he fought, at the head of his men, leading them to the charge."

Since it is God's will, let his family, his friends, his countrymen, not only obey but assent to it! he has bequeathed to his family and friends, great room for piety and respect for his memory.

The writer did not design to touch the private character of general Covington; he meant to leave it for a better painter. But as he has left a widow and a little progeny of six dear little children—three sons and three daughters—the eldest about 12 years old, and the youngest 9 months; to mourn his loss in a strange land, where he was known only to a few by a short and transient visit, it may not be amiss to reb his private reputation.

General Comberton possessed qualities so peculiar as strongly to mark his character in private life. He possessed a sound and masculine understanding. His heart was equally consecrated to friendship and the rigid obligations of eternal justice. In judging his opinion of men, he was cautious; but when he had made an estimate of worth, he was ardent and sincere in respecting it. To him friendship was not an empty name, where he did not approve, he never left a doubt. In all his dealings he was punctual, true and just. In his deportment and manners, he was generally open, unassuming, affable and engaging; but as he possessed by nature the most acute sensibility, he was at times irritable and impatient; yet, from some peculiar distribution of the mind, with which we are unacquainted as we are with the original cause of our being, this irregularity of disposition never occurred when his mind was amply engaged. Momentous subjects always appeared to embrace the whole faculty of the man; when nothing was to be seen but the solid integrity of the judgment, combined with the most elevated respect for honor, "that spark of celestial fire, the richest treasure of a generous breast." To such refinements as led to artifice and deception, he was the unrelenting foe; with the dissembler in morality, in religion, in friendship, he could have no companionship.

In conversation he was zealous, skill and explicit; in his application to business, he gave the whole force of his mind, undiverted by pleasure or amusement. He was accustomed to ponder and to consult; was cautious and considerate in his schemes; but when he resolved, it was with discretion and firmness, and was always zealous and rapid in execution.

Colonel Chrystie.

FROM THE (N. Y.) COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.

To the attention of a correspondent, we are indebted for the following brief biographical sketch of that promising young officer, the late colonel John Chrystie, who died at Fort George, in Canada, after an illness of three days.

Col. Chrystie was the third son of the late major James Chrystie, of this city, who formerly belonged to the Pennsylvania line in the continental army, and acquired a high military reputation during our revolutionary struggle.

Colonel C. was born in the city of New York, received his academic and part of his collegiate education at Princeton, in New Jersey. From the college in that place, he removed to Columbia college, in his native city, where he graduated with reputation in 1805, or 6. He then commenced the study of the law, and continued it until about 1807, when the prospect of a foreign war induced him to gratify the strongest inclination of his mind, by taking a commission in the additional army which was then raised. He was appointed a lieutenant of artillery in Colonel Simmonds' regiment, and stationed at Oswego, where he remained during our winter. In the spring he was promoted to New Orleans, where his military talents soon attracted the attention of general Wilkinson, who took him into his family as his aid. Shortly after he was promoted to a captaincy. In this situation he continued some time, and acquired the esteem and respect of the principal officers of the army, and particularly of his general, in whose confidence he stood very high, and of the late general, general Pike, then a colonel in the standard army, between whom and captain Chrystie there existed the strongest attachment. When the prospect of an enemy to war disappeared, he resigned his commission in 1811, and returned to this city, where he recommenced his legal studies with the greatest alacrity and assiduity. But his studies were soon interrupted. The prospect of war again thickened upon the horizon, and his passion for military glory again resumed its seat in his breast. His well known merits as an officer, while formerly in the service of the United States government, by which he was distinguished as a brave and able colonel in the British army, and as a lieutenant of infantry, belonging to the army of 1810, recommended him to a high grade.

To this office, and even to a higher grade, he was strongly recommended by his former general; but his extreme youth induced the government not to promote him with the much rapidity. With part of the 13th regiment, which was one of the largest and best in the army, and to the high state of discipline of which his exertions essentially contributed, he accompanied colonel Van Rensselaer in his descent upon Canada during the last summer. He commanded the regular troops at the battle of Queenstown, the superior regular officers having been wounded in crossing the Niagara. Here he acquitted himself with honor, and after sustaining the conflict with the British and Indians through the principal part of the day, during which he was wounded in the word hand, and received seven balls through his clothes, he was compelled, for want of reinforcements, to surrender his gallant regulars to an overwhelming force under general Sheaffe, whom, with their small party, the Americans had for a long time kept in check. He was detained, a prisoner, at Montreal and Quebec for some time, from whence he was discharged on his parole of honour, during the winter, and returned through this state. On being exchanged, and he again, with renewed zeal, returned to the service on the frontiers of the state, where he received the melancholy intelligence of the death of his old friend general Pike. While there, he was appointed inspector general in the army, and colonel of the 23d regiment. He went into Canada with the army under Dearborn and Lewis, where he was taken sick of a bilious cholera at fort George, after the retreat of the army to that place, and finished the short career of a life, which, had it been spared, would doubtless have done honour to his country.

He was of a frank and amiable disposition, possessed of a respectable and cultivated mind; full of spirits, life and animation, brave, passionately addicted to the military life, and glowing with ardent distinction himself in his country's cause. To his country his loss is no ordinary one, and he has left many friends, who knew him well and loved him much, to deplore his early death.

A bill authorising the president of the United States to take possession of a tract of country lying south of Mississippi territory, and of the state of Georgia, and for other purposes.

BE it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the president be, and he is hereby authorised to occupy and hold all that tract of country called West Florida, which lies west of the river Perdido, not now in possession of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the president be, and he is hereby authorised to hold all that part of West Florida, east of the Perdido, and the whole or any part of East Florida, including Amelia Island.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of occupying and holding the country aforesaid, and of affording protection to the inhabitants thereof, under the authority of the United States, the president may employ such parts of the military and naval force of the United States, as he may deem necessary.

be directed to collect the standards and colors taken from the enemy, by the army of the United States, since the commencement of the war." Had this order been strictly observed, and somewhat extended, the present proceedings would be unnecessary. Far from any regulations having been adopted, in pursuance of the recited resolution, your committee lament the peculiar negligence which ensued. The secretary of war now tells us, that of the standards and colors which were taken by the army of the United States, during the war of the revolution, only six remain in his office. He cannot give any information concerning others; even their place of deposit is unknown to the department! The navy department possesses no knowledge of any flags which were taken anterior to the declaration of the present war." Such as have been captured with the public armed ships of the enemy, subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812, "have been carefully preserved." Thirteen of them have been already received, as will more fully appear by the annexed statement: of these, three belonged to the heavy frigates of the enemy, viz: the Guerriere, Macedonian and Java. The navy department is also in possession of a royal standard of Great Britain, which was taken at York, and a union jack and flag, which were captured at fort George. The flags of five small vessels which were captured, have not been received. Your committee regret that the journals of congress do not exhibit statements of all the standards and colors which were taken during our revolution by the army and navy of United States. The early attention of the legislature to this subject, inclines them to believe that they were very numerous. The capture of earl Cornwallis alone furnished twenty-four of them! In all probability as many were taken with general Burgoyne.

By some the exhibitions which are contemplated may be considered as too trivial for legislative provision. Your committee would coincide with them in this opinion, did the practice only afford a momentary gratification to the curious. Experience must have taught European governments, that national benefits were derived from the course which they have adopted, or it would long since have been discontinued. It is presumed that essential consequences proceed from the practice, more especially when a nation shall be engaged in a war. Such trophies excite the spirit of the nation; the result is national character. The arrival of an enemy's flag is sufficient to rouse the population of London or Paris! on such occasions the finest national feelings are developed; and to the honor of our citizens be it said, that they have not been found to want this species of national sensibility when the flags of the Guerriere, Macedonian and Java, &c. were exhibited to them. It was indifferent whether they consider themselves of the war or of the peace party, each was ambitious to rank the victor with himself. The national taste and propensity is strongly marked by the eagerness with which all view representations of our late unparalleled naval victories! If then the art and genius of the painter can thus excite our natures, may we not look for much more when we have the physical facts placed before us instead of fancy? These flags, the trophies won by our gallant tars, demonstrates to us and the world, that the invincibility of the British naval power has been very much exaggerated. In battle will the recollection of them sustain our sailors and soldiers and impart an additional skill and valor in support of the cause of our country! The value of standards does not depend upon the gaudy colors which they exhibit no more than upon the nature of the stuff of which they may be fabricated. They have been at all times regarded as the insignia of fame and power.— Their surrender is the act of submission. The last wish of the proud bearer, is the preservation of his eagle; too often is the loss of it sealed with the loss of life. In Europe where military operations are on a large scale, though the result of a battle should prove destructive to thousands of those who were engaged, the capture of a single standard constitutes a prominent feature in the details of the action, and adds much to the brilliancy of the achievement. Colors taken from the enemy were considered a present worthy the nation to general Washington for his signal services in the capture of earl Cornwallis. The records of the proceedings of congress during the whole of the revolution, mention but two instances where this highly honorable and distinguished mark of approbation was voted! In fine we have declared the flag shall guarantee the safety of our citizens. Can a higher value be set upon it? Can we attach more honor to it?

It may be asked, what will be the effects of a public display of the flags which have been taken from our enemies? This view is considered to be important. No one can doubt that the government and the people of England would rather we should have taken millions of their merchandise, than that we should have it in our power to exhibit the flag of a single sloop of war, which was gained by equal force. If the enemy will expose to the view of the British nation and every traveller who may visit them, the one or two which they have captured from us, shall we conceal the many we have taken from them, and thus lead others to doubt our possessing any? Shall we permit the numerous trophies of our revolution to moulder into dust, by a voluntary concealment, without an effort for their preservation? If this shall have happened to the proud monuments of our independence, shall the fate of those which are now perfect, and which have been so lately won on our own coast, on that of South America, off the Azores, on the lakes, in short in all latitudes where our tars have come in contact with the enemy, be the same? Is not the preservation of these flags a duty which we owe to the people of the United States? Are the achievements of that little navy, which a few months ago was the object of derision with the statesmen and the people of England, but now the cause of their fears, to be buried in oblivion? Shall we put at rest the enquiry which the glorious deeds of our sailors have excited in the parliament of Great Britain? Shall we, at our expense, approve the labored calculation of the enemy; with her confound reason and common sense, and attribute simple truths to fallacious causes? or shall we give into a practice so generally cherished by other nations? Our successes on the ocean constitute the pride of our country; they have secured to us the respect of foreign nations. In Europe we again hold that rank which our ancestors had obtained by their many hard fought conflicts, which we had nearly forfeited. Have we not accomplished more than Spain with her "Invincible Armadas," than did Holland with her De Witts, Van Tromps, and De Ruyters; than France could achieve when she was in the zenith of her naval power; than did Great Britain with her Nelsons, Rodneys, Howes and St. Vincents? The naval annals of England furnish no instance in which every vessel belonging to a hostile fleet was captured.

Some may doubt our possessing a number of standards sufficient to warrant their public exhibition. Had we but few of them, we should not deny our sanction to the principle. Your committee regret special order had not been taken by congress immediately after the receipt of the first present of this kind, we allude to the colors which were taken by general Montgomery from the 7th British regiment, at Chamblee, on the 16th of October, 1775. The French pride themselves on their ability to exhibit the two which they have taken from our present enemy; for so lately as the year 1800 they had only two of the naval flags of Great Britain! Though the war and navy departments can immediately furnish but twenty or twenty-five of these flags, it is probable the place of deposit will be ascertained, so as to put within our power many of those which were gained during our revolution. Where are those which were won during our dispute with France in 1798? The same may be asked of others which the defeats of Derne and Tripoli should furnish? The only object which remains for consideration is the place most proper for the exhibition.

This should be public and easy of access, at the same time that it should be perfectly secure from villainous attempts. These flags should be placed so as to be seen by every ci-itizen who might wish to observe them. It will be of an advantage that they should be noticed by every foreigner who may visit the United States. Can any objection be made to the spacious national apartments which are devoted to the legislative purposes? What ornaments can be more suitable? Go abroad and you may see the walls of the British house of lords decorated with representations of some of the celebrated battles which were fought by the troops of Great Britain.

At home, we find the principle already established by one branch of the legislature of the United States: in the senate chamber we observe engravings of some of the battles of our revolution; and had time allowed the execution of the original design of the architect, the precedent would have had existence in the chamber of the representatives of the United States.—It was contemplated that the frieze, over the capitals of the Corinthian columns which sustain the dome, should present, in relievo, a regular series of the battles which secured our independence. Such decorations might gratify the artist, and afford an opportunity to display his talents; but in a national view, little or no effect would be produced. It must be conceded that much more will be communicated to the spectator by the display of the captured standards. No one can pretend that any difference exists between the representations which we have noticed and the standards which have been taken from the enemy, as will warrant the public exhibition of the one and preclude that of the other: these subjects are most immediately connected, and their tendency must be the same.—The public exhibition of these trophies is a tribute due to the very superior skill and valor which achieved them; the sight of them will bring to recollection every circumstance of cause and effect; they will constitute valuable records of illustrious portions of our history; they will form a collection of the proudest monuments to commemorate the brilliant deeds of a rising generation.

The Merchants Bonds.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, December 3d, 1812.

Debate on the report of the committee of Ways and Means on the petition of sundry merchants, praying a remission of the bonds given on the recent importation of British goods.

Mr. Johnson, after some preliminary remarks, said the committee of Ways and Means had examined the subject of the late importations of British manufactures with considerable attention; and after much deliberation and difficulty had reported a resolution to the house recommending a reference of the whole subject to the secretary of the treasury, who had ample power over it. The president had in his very able and lucid communication to congress at the commencement of the session, represented to them that a considerable number of American vessels had arrived in the United States laden with British manufactures under an erroneous impression that the non-importation act would cease to operate upon a revocation of the British orders in council by the order of the 23d of June last, and upon a subject of such magnitude the secretary of the treasury had not exercised the power of mitigating the forfeitures incurred, that congress might have previously an opportunity of making such provision as they might deem expedient, and recommending this body to consult equally what is due to equitable considerations on the part of the merchant, and what is due to the public interest.

It has not been recommended to congress to interpose, but an opportunity has been given, that congress might, if the views of the secretary of the treasury did not correspond with their own. The secretary of the treasury has expressed himself in the same character. Considering the magnitude of the subject and the unforeseen nature of the case, it was thought proper, not to exercise the authority vested in the treasury department, until congress had taken the subject into consideration and prescribed, if it was thought proper, the course to be pursued. There is no reluctance expressed either in the president's communication or in Mr. Gallatin's report to act upon the subject, and independent of this evidence several members of the committee know personally that the secretary of the treasury feels no embarrassment in acting, provided the matter should be left for his disposition.

Why did the secretary of the treasury suspend his decision in this case until the will of congress should be known? The reason is obvious. The consideration was weighty. By the infraction of an existing statute, the non-importation act, British manufactures to the value of twenty millions of dollars had become forfeited to the government of the United States. The vessels and cargoes had been seized and suits in every case commenced in compliance with statutory regulations.

This twenty millions of dollars belonged to the United States by forfeiture. The secretary of the treasury, consulting equally in his decision equitable considerations and the public interest, formed his opinion as expressed in writing that there ought not to be an unqualified remission of the penalties and forfeitures in favor of the importer, nor a total exaction for the public benefit. But that the one half of the forfeitures which would otherwise fall to the share of collectors ought to be remitted; that with respect to one half belonging to the United States, justice to the community requires, that when remitted, at least an equivalent may be secured to the public for extra profit beyond that on common importations which arises from the continuance of the non-importation act. This opinion, formed and expressed, was not executed, although the power was without limit. It was wisely delayed, that an opportunity might be given to the representatives of the people to object to such a mitigation. The power of remission or mitigation once exercised would effectually destroy the right of the government. And as a favourite act, a measure of redress against a foreign enemy, had been violated, by which these forfeitures had accrued; it was due to congress, that an opportunity should be afforded to object to such dispensing power, and to make any provision that they might deem expedient. It must have been this view of the subject which delayed the secretary of the treasury in the exercise of his mitigating powers, and not any unwillingness on his part on this, as it never has been on other occasions, to do his duty, without a desire to shrink from responsibility. Why object to this reference? Why interpose in this case? No new power is given. It was given under the administration of general Washington. It has been continued until the present moment, consecrated by the necessity of the provision. Take the power away in this instance—you do not propose to take it away in any other—it will remain as it has remained from the foundation of this government, a permanent and indispensable provision. No individual wishes to change the statute nor shift the power—why interpose then in this event? The opposition comes from those who contend for an unconditional remission of the bonds; of course the objection does not arise from the extent of the power, or the nature of the power, but because the power is not exercised in its greatest extent. Indeed no objection can be made to the power of the secretary of the treasury; the statute does not give him the power of committing violence—it does not legalize any outrages. No, sir; it gives him the power of remitting or mitigating forfeitures and penalties in whole or in part, incurred by a violation of the laws of the land. If the power should be exercised and the bonds of the importers cancelled; then sir, the rights of the United States are gone forever. But if too much should be exacted; if the conditions of remission should be oppressive, we have lost none of our power to interpose: the friends of unqualified remission cannot, therefore, object to the power, because they have the advantage ground of those who are not willing wholly to sacrifice the public interest. If this proposition wanted support from any farther considerations, they might be added. As it respected the United States, it was important that the exercise of the power of the secretary should be delayed; but on account of the petitioners it was not,

The argument for a reference might be closed here; but the objection arising principally from the extent of relief, and not from the nature of the power, the view of the secretary of the treasury is naturally involved in the discussion.

To consult what is due to equitable considerations, the manner in which the non-importation act has been violated must be a matter of examination. The committee of Ways and Means was furnished with papers by those who represented the merchants in this case, which is a clear manifestation that they were not ignorant of the provisions of that law by which 20,000,000 of property had been forfeited to the United States. In contains verbatim, that clause in the act of March 1st 1811, which sanctioned the president's proclamation of November 2, 1810, by reviving the non-importation part of the non-intercourse against Great Britain.

"Sec. 2 And be it further enacted, That in case G. Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the U. States, the president of the U. S. shall declare the fact by proclamation: and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit, &c. And the restrictions imposed, which may be imposed by virtue of the said

It was a desire to come with their wares into an exhausted market—to enrich themselves—to out-run other merchants who waited for the administration of the law by the proper organ. The infraction of the law was not innocent. I will not say it was fraudulent. It was a violation with their eyes open to their own personal benefit. If the revocation of the British orders in council had been such as to have admitted of no doubt of the suspension of the non-importation act, the merchants were advised by their shewing that it was illegal to make shipments until the emanation of the president's proclamation. It was not only prohibited to our citizens to make shipments; but to load their vessels with intent to ship before such proclamation, was a forfeiture of the goods. This gave notice to all, under what circumstances trade could be resumed, and placed the community upon an equality. In risking a voluntary infraction of law, the importers of British merchandize should have chosen a case less embarrassed than the British order of revocation. The conditions of the revocation are incompatible with the vital principles of our sovereignty and independence. 1. British armed vessels are to be admitted to the hospitalities of our waters and ports, without atonement or repentance for the insults and injuries received by our citizens in the vexations of the commerce, in the impressment of our seamen, and in the slaughter of our people. 2. The suspension of the non-importation act. 3. The right is positively claimed of resorting to the orders in council, as a measure of retaliation against France, whenever the British ministry shall deem it expedient. Admit that they had a right from our promises to expect a compliance with the two first conditions, the third was surely an insult to our injured feelings, and declaring in so many words that the arbitrary principle of plundering our property on the high seas was a right which they had only relaxed until it was deemed expedient in the sight of our enemy to fix it upon us. It is unnecessary to hazard an opinion, as to the course which would have been pursued by the President under this insidious and disguised relaxation of the British orders in council—it is however evident that it was not a case favorable for the importing merchants to anticipate the views of the president in violation of law. This is not the only view which will enable us to consult equally equitable considerations and the public interest. The measure of non-importation must be examined. Without an enquiry into the merit of this act, the reasons are obvious why there should not be a voluntary and total violation of a positive statute with impunity, and more care should be taken not to give premiums to one part of the community to do that which in our legislative characters we refused to do. It is well known that congress at the last session refused to repeal this non-importation act in whole or in part—and I am unwilling that the act should be repealed by force. I do not speak of hard cases. I speak of the ordinary trade from G. Britain. There is one class of importers entitled to consideration above all others—those who purchased their goods in the fall, 1810, before the non-importation act was revived by the president's proclamation of 2d November, or who had purchased their goods previous to the 2d of February, 1811, which closed the departure of vessels from British ports by the act of March, 1811. This may be considered innocent bona fide American being trade, American property, purchased before the restrictions were in operation, and the merchants being compelled to warehouse such goods at their own risque, until the late revocation of the British orders in council. The dilemma of this property was not produced by a voluntary act on the part of the purchaser. He obeyed the impulse of duty in storing away his goods, making a sacrifice rather than violate the laws of the country; and in addition to this reason for a distinction, and not less powerful, is, that congress did by law admit to entry all property shipped from British ports prior to the 2d February, 1811, although by the previous existing provision forfeitures were incurred unless the vessel arrived within our ports before that period. To make a discrimination in those cases where it can be done is assuming the ground of equality. I was not unwilling at the last session to admit a partial suspension of the non-importation act for the double purpose of relieving the bona fide American merchant who had his funds in Great Britain, and to prevent at that time internal taxation. This suspension was to be limited as to time, and restricted as to articles which would have relieved us from impositions which have been lately exacted in the sale of certain articles, and the British manufactures would not have been relieved from their great distress, nor would our own manufactures have suffered by the competition. Upon this subject I have not changed my opinion. I was at that time against a repeal of the non-importation act; at this time I am against any relaxation—nor did the partial relaxation which was attempted at the last session contemplate a direct trade with Great Britain. It was prohibited expressly. A total repeal was then attempted and failed, and no wonder those who have at all times advocated the abandonment of the non-importation act as a ruinous measure should advocate its repeal by actual violation—by force. So much has been suggested without regard to the merits of this measure of non-importation. The non-importation act is a measure of redress against British aggression, and rigidly enforced it is a powerful weapon. It is not a system of the moment, nor was it adopted without due deliberation; nor has it been persevered in without absolute certainty of its efficacy and beneficial results. It might be traced to the revolution; it might be called the offspring of that epoch, originating with the wisdom to which we are indebted for our high destiny as a free people. The journals of the old congress need not be consulted. Let the period of 1805 be called to recollection; that was an enviable period for the American patriot, when the importing and exporting merchants united in writing one hundred and forty pages in various memorials to congress against the piratical conduct of British cruizers acting under British orders. It was an application of the rule of '56 to the commerce of the United States; a rule fundamentally wrong and the conduct under it the most atrocious. Plunder and piracy was the order of the day. Trade consecrated by public law subject to fluctuating decisions; rules of evidence disregarded; vessels and cargoes subject to the arbitrary discretion of English tribunals. The rule of '56 never was executed until 1801—then it was alternately enforced and abandoned—until the merchants rallied in the fall of 1805. In "56" it was the case of the Dutch carrying colonial produce the property of an enemy. It was not a question of security in cases of bona fide neutral property. This colonial trade had become lucrative; the wealth of our merchants was employed in purchasing colonial productions; brought to the United States, the direct trade being prohibited, the surplus was exported under the sanction of the most sacred and long established principles of the laws of nations, as well as the British admiralty courts. Under these sanctions, without notice, and with a motive to plunder, our rich cargoes spread over the face of every sea are swept from the ocean by British armed vessels.

Not satisfied with the regular trade of the American merchant, it has been periodically a prey to feed the hungry appetite of the British navy and her cruizers. She destroys the commerce of her enemies—she plunders the commerce also of neutrals—and as our neutral and maritime rights have been important to our citizens by their enterprize and industry, and as they have promised us prosperity and wealth, in the same degree have they been subjects of British jealousy and outrage. The merchants were united in their complaints—Congress is urged to resistance—the government was called upon to outstretch the right of its power—while the merchants were swearing upon the altar of eternal justice, that they would avenge the bleeding wounds of their common country. In New York the merchants in their memorial recommend permission to be given to the seamen to resist with force of arms in our own waters British press-gangs. The disgrace of submitting to plunder and outrage was felt. Ready to support the cause of the merchants, congress obeyed their impressive call. Mr. Munroe reiterated the same complaint from Europe. Something must be done. The 18th of April the partial non-importation act was adopted, to take effect the 15th of November following. Congress was not long deceived. Dismay seemed to succeed this display of zeal. Commercial sensibilities were blunted. Aggressions were more common—prospects were darkened—those who urged the nation to resistance were the first to condemn it. Commercial restriction with Great Britain was opposed—and when war was declared, that war was opposed with fourfold violence—the alternative was submission. No cessation on the part of Great Britain of her hostile acts—they increased, no concession of rights, no atonement made; 22d December, 1807, an embargo was laid—continued 14 months—and repealed by act of congress 1st March, 1809. The non-intercourse continued about 14 months, and expired with the end of the session in May, 1810. The 1st of May, 1810, before the close of the session, the act passed which authorized the president to revive the non-importation part of the non-intercourse, which was about to expire upon certain contingencies. Accordingly, the 2d November, 1810, the non-importation was revived against Great Britain by proclamation, which continues in force. This is the history of our commercial restrictions.

While the people are fighting for commerce and a free trade, I am unwilling to see any class of citizens carry on a trade with the enemy and under licence. It would be gross injustice to the other classes of the community and it would induce the merchant to look to a foreign government and an enemy for protection. The calamity of war is acknowledged. It has been resorted to as the least evil, and all must bear the calamity as it comes upon them, as our fathers did before us. The time has arrived when we must act with energy. The partial non-importation law was too weak—the embargo was too weak—the non-intercourse was too weak—these measures were weak because the mercantile class of the people was strong, our weakness has originated from their strength. The partial non-importation was suspended—the embargo was repealed in a moment of alarm—and the non-intercourse expired of itself. The strength of the non-importation is about to be tested—we are now to see whether we shall be driven from this ground. But the non-importation is a strong measure of redress. It has had this character with the British ministry. When Mr. Fox was advised of the passage of the partial non-importation, he seemed to be alarmed. After his death, his successors, lords Holland and Auckland, made it the first act of their official duty with our ministers in London to remonstrate against it. See the last letter written by Mr. Monroe before Mr. Pinkney united with him, and see the first letter received by them jointly. The same anxiety prevailed in the subsequent communications upon our subsequent restrictive measures.

The examination before the house of commons in England, of upwards of one hundred individuals of respectability, from more than three of the great manufacturing districts, and the remarks of Mr. Brougham; place the subject in a most interesting point of view. The principal manufactures, the proprietors, are represented as without capital; with stock on hand and no market, their funds exhausted, and ruin threatened; the laboring class of the people reduced to the most afflicting distress. Thousands are represented to be without employ—thousands upon half pay, half allowance thousands reduced to the brink of starvation, the home market glutted, the price of manufactures reduced. South America, Canada, and other places, had been substituted for the markets in the United States and nothing but loss and disappointment had ensued—and as the continent of Europe was closed against British manufactures, the United States alone could relieve the distress of this valuable class of people in Great Britain.

The common and ordinary consumption of British manufactures in the United States of America is estimated at 50 million of dollars. The pay for these goods certain, and the market not liable to fluctuation. So great has been the importations of British manufactures from the first organization of this government, that the proceeds of our export trade to every other part of the world has principally returned home through British channels. Great Britain has been the exchange for our commerce, and if not checked, our merchants will continue during war to augment their funds in Great Britain. The case under consideration furnishes another strong evidence of the effect of this measure. The 23d June the orders in council were revoked; the third of July information was received in Great Britain, that a declaration of war had passed the house of representatives: on the 30th of July the war was officially known. Notwithstanding this short period, upwards of twenty millions worth of British manufactures have been shipped to the United States, which falls far short of usual importations: For upwards of eighteen months the exchange between the United States and Great Britain has been about twenty per cent. discount. Since the shipments of the late imported British goods, the exchange has sunk to 14 per cent. discount. This is evidence of the relief occasioned by the late importations. Nor will we omit the statement of Mr. Russel, our charge des affaires, a gentleman who has so distinguished himself in his correspondence with the British government.

He informs you that the orders in council were revoked to relieve the wants and distresses of the manufacturers of England and not as an act of justice towards the U. States.

Thus sir, the operation of this measure upon the enemy has been considered. No doubt its operation at home will be examined. I am not afraid of this examination. We have been told, and we shall be told again, that this is a self destroying system, that we injure ourselves more than we injure the enemy. We no doubt cloud the prospects of the exporting and importing merchants, and it has an indirect influence upon the prospects of others.

But we do not expect to be without clothes to wear or bread to eat, although this non-importation act may continue as to Great Britain. We hear complaints that the per centage of the merchant is curtailed. We do not however hear of thousands reduced to want and beggary. So far from it as a general measure, the non-importation act is not injurious to the United States—industry is augmented, extravagance is curtailed, independence is secured and manufactures are completely protected. The documents which have been furnished to this house, and other correct sources of information have given us a most flattering prospect of domestic manufactures.

The annual value of domestic manufactured articles is estimated at an hundred and twenty million of dollars—

Twenty million of cabinet ware, household furniture and ship-building—leather and manufactures of leather, saddles, harness, shoes, boots, &c. twenty millions annually. Or woollen, cotton and flaxen goods, forty millions. Two-thirds of the people of the United States clothed with domestic manufactures. Two-thirds of the slavery, house, and table linen used, made in the United States. Importation of cards prevented by Whitmore's machine.

Manufactures in the United States, equal to the consumption.—1st, Of wood, and of which wood is the chief material. 2d. Leather and manufactures of leather. Soap and candles. Flaxseed-oil. Refined sugar. Coarse earthenware, snuff, chocolate, mustard, &c.

Manufactures firmly established, some furnishing the greater, and all a considerable part of the consumption of the United States—1st. Iron and manufactures of iron. 2d. Of cotton wool and flax. 3rd. Hats paper, printing types, printed books, spirituous and malt liquors, manufactures of hemp, gunpowder, window glass, jewelry and clocks, leads, straw bonnets and hats, wax candles, paints and colors, salt, copper, plated ware, calico printing, queens, earthen and glass ware, medical drugs and several chemical preparations. This calculation was made principally from materials collected by the secretary of the treasury in 1810. Since which time there has been a great augmentation of our manufacturing establishments. The want of capital is no longer felt. The United States abound in the raw materials of these various manufactures, and as to the necessaries of life no country can boast of equal abundance. From this view of the subject it might be urged that the U. States has been injured in these late British importations, save a benefit arising from a revenue of five millions of dollars. Here a foundation is laid to destroy our dependence upon Great Britain. When that is destroyed we shall not have so much to fear from her jealousy. When the two nations are convinced that they can do without each other they will be better friends, and our distance will prevent future wars. Our exporters sell their cargoes of flour to the peninsula of Spain and purchase a bill of exchange upon Great Britain. The importer purchases this bill from the exporter, and ships to this country British manufactures. Here is dependence on our part. On the part of Great Britain she depends upon the markets of the United States to sell her manufactures and get a supply of the raw material to supply her work shops. This powerful class of British subjects, the manufacturers prefer the markets of the United States to the markets of any other part of the globe, and the reason is obvious.

In every conflict therefore between the two states founded on British aggressions this country may calculate perhaps too much upon their markets for British fabrics as an inducement on the part of Great Britain to abstain from further violence; and Great Britain make still stronger calculations upon the opposition in this country to measures of hostility. If the non-importation act should fail as a means of redress, this view gives some consolation, in the hope that if this state of things must continue, it will convince the two powers that they can live without each other. I flatter myself, that the United States would only feel a temporary evil, if from any necessity it was cut off from an intercourse with Great Britain never to be resumed—our resources are great, our wants can be supplied. I come lastly to consider the facts and the testimony in this case, and although I shall be bound to consider the statement of the merchants as interested parties and the examination will prove it, still I shall say nothing to derogate the high character, the great respectability and the extensive information of those committees of merchants who have appeared before the committee of ways and means. The testimony reported has only made out one side of the question. It would astonish those who are unacquainted with judicial proceedings, particularly in chancery, where individuals of the first and equal respectability contend for their rights, and each party though equally zealous in his own behalf make out very different and opposite cases. Here the judge leaves the statement of the parties and resorts to other testimony, either verbal or written. Indeed, some times the parties make statements contrary to the records of the courts which is the highest species of evidence.

A chancellor who had never adorned the bench of equity, would be still more astonished in cases brought for his adjudication. He would take up the bill of the complainant and read it—he would look at the party making the statement—he would acknowledge his respectability, his high standing, his unsuspected veracity—and without further investigation he would suppose no doubt could exist as to the justice of the claim, and would feel a disposition forthwith to enter a decree against the defendant. But when his duty compelled him to travel over the statement of the defendant, equally respectable, equally creditable, equally honorable, he would immediately discover that he had only viewed one side of the question. His mind would immediately be balanced, and he would call for other testimony to make out the case—and what is still more wonderful, neither party in their statement would so contradict each other as to injure the reputation of the other. So powerful is self-interest—so blind to the rights of others—the mind seems to possess magical powers to deceive itself without being conscious of it. With these remarks, I turn to the report, 19th, page, where the committee of merchants state that the average of the import duties, as calculated at the custom-house, amount to 33 1-3 per cent. on the prime cost of goods—on crockery and glass-ware, hard-ware, plated-ware, silks, millinery, &c. 50 per cent. Here we have the record as a guide as to duties—and it was my duty to descend to that record and consult its pages.

The duties are divided in denomination into specific and ad valorem duties. Few articles pay specific duties—the great fund of revenue arises from ad valorem duties. These duties may be classed according to these rates. Previous to a declaration of war, the peace duties were 1st. 12 1-2, 15, and 20 per cent.; to these were added 2 1 2 per cent. the Mediterranean fund. Doubled since war they stand, 1st. class, 25 per cent.; add Mediterranean duty, 2 1-2, 27 1-2. 2d class, 30 per cent.; add the Mediterranean duty, 2 1-2, 32 1-2. 3d class, 40 per cent.; add the Mediterranean duty, 2 1-2, 42 1-2.

The rates of ad valorem duties are fixed by law. The calculation is made by adding 20 per cent. upon the prime cost of all goods imported from the Cape of Good Hope or beyond. 10 per cent. upon the actual cost from any other place, including all charges which precede the shipment, commissions, outside packages, and insurance excepted. The prime cost, we will take the round sum of £100 and make the calculated export duties from Great Britain and inland charges, (to be added to prime cost.) 6

To this sum add 10 per cent.	10 12

The amount upon which duty 116 12 is calculated for every one hundred pounds prime cost.

This calculation is not an arbitrary one. It is consistent with the law and the practice of the treasury; only in most cases the treasury does not add as much as 6 per cent. to the prime cost, as I have done in this case. Indeed I have now two original invoices and a bill of lading, to prove that the ordinary charges which are added to the prime cost, and upon which the duty is calculated, does not amount to 6 per cent. Upon every 100£ prime cost therefore, the charges and the 10 per cent. will make it 116£.

1st. The duty of 27 1-2 per cent. on 116£ would be 32 per cent. on 100£.

2d. The duty of 32 1-2 per cent. on 116£ would be 38 per cent. on 100£.

3d. The duty of 42 1-2 per cent. on 116£ would be 49 1-2 per cent. on 100£.

It is necessary to examine and find out the proportions of the importations on articles which pay these three rates of duty, of 27 1-2, 33 1-2, and 42 1-2 per cent. upon prime cost, and the addition of 5*l.* to each 100*l.* according to the calculation at the custom-house; or in other words, the articles paying upon the prime cost 32 per cent. 38 per cent. and 49 1-2 per cent. Hollow glass ware, carriages, and parts of carriages, alone pay 49 1-2 per cent. Hard ware, millinery, leather, and manufactures of leather, china, crockery, &c. pay 38 per cent. All other goods, principally wool, silk, cotton, flax, hemp, &c. pay only 32 per cent. Although the bulk of these articles paying the last estimated rate of duties, are enumerated by the committee of merchants from New York as paying 59 per cent. making an average difference of about 17 per cent. which taken from the gross amount of the charges, which they stated amounted to 60 per cent. and upwards, will give them a profit of 17 per cent. more than was calculated. But I proceed with my calculation to find out the average of the duty upon importations to the United States. This can be done only by resorting to the annual report made by the secretary of the treasury, which will give the amount of articles paying the three rates of ad valorem duty. But little time has been given, and I have commenced with the year 1804 up to the year 1810, both years inclusive.

rage duty upon the whole importations would be less than 33 1-3 per cent. Therefore the great bulk of the articles, and in fact all of the articles enumerated by the committee of New York, as paying 59 per cent. upon the prime cost, pay only 38 and 32, except hollow glass-ware, and the average duty as calculated at the custom-house upon annual importations does not amount to 33 1-3 per cent. So much for the first fact, which is proven variant from the understanding of the New York committee by the laws of the land, the custom-house calculations, and mathematical demonstration. We will now pass to another allegation in the reported statement. It seems as if one of the New-York committee stated that the greater part of the late importations of British manufactures were purchased in the fall of 1810, and previous to 2d of February 1811, the period when the non-importation commenced its operation. This statement was not made upon positive facts. It was a belief, an opinion expressed, and as will appear unnecessarily and too strongly expressed. These were the cases most entitled to consideration—and the want of evidence to discriminate, is a reason additional why we should refer this subject to some tribunal for examination, and you must give it to the secretary of the treasury, or you must create a new tribunal. The statement under consideration does not admit of arithmetical demonstration. We must resort to circumstantial and such positive evidence as we have on this point, and although it may not be sufficient to say what amount of goods lately imported were purchased and on American account and risque prior to the 2d of February 1811, there is violent presumptive evidence to overthrow the opinion of the member of the New-York committee, that the greater part was so purchased.

The late importations admit of classification as to the time of purchase, as to the time of shipment, and as to the ownership of the property. As to the time of purchase. That which was purchased previous to 2d Feb. 1811, that which was purchased after 2d February, and previous to the revocation of the British orders in council of 23d of June, 1812, and purchases made after a revocation of the British orders in council. As to shipments, vessels which left British ports for the United States before a knowledge of the declaration of war, and vessels which sailed after that knowledge. As to the ownership, first that which was purchased either on credit or with prompt payment by American citizens, and shipped on American account. 2d. Goods shipped by British merchants to order and on British risque and British account, until delivered to the American merchant in this country. I have already produced papers shewing such a case, where the invoices, the bill of lading, and the mercantile letter

The result of 7 years gives us 264 millions, worth of importations, by adding a fraction of a million in each case for sake of round numbers.

Of that vast amount of 264 millions three millions has paid 49 1-2 per cent. duty; 48 millions has paid 38 per cent. and 113 millions has paid the lowest per cent. upon the prime cost, 32 per cent. To get hold of the average duty we must not take the duties alone, add them together and then divide by three; we must also take into the calculation the amount of articles paying the different rates of duty. The experiment has been made of the two last years, and of the three last years. The ave-enclosed to a friend, who was directed to deliver over the goods to a third person, upon the contingency of his being in solvent circumstances. 3d. British property. There is no evidence to determine precisely the quantity of goods purchased at those different periods—but there are circumstances to establish the fact, that a very small portion indeed was purchased prior to the 2d of Feb. 1811.

From an examination of custom house returns it will appear that from ten to fifteen million of dollars worth of British merchandise was shipped into the United States previous to the 2d of February, 1811, and which was admitted to entry and exempted from forfeiture in consequence of the provisions of the act of March, 1811, which was intended to embrace those very cases. Independent of this, it was well known that application would be made to congress for such a relaxation of the non-importation act.

There were other weighty inducements to the merchant to get home his property. He had paid the usual prices. The non importation was to commence its operation on the 2d February, 1811; there was no prospect of a speedy termination of our differences with G. Britain; the exhausted markets of the United States offered a certain pledge of profit. Under these circumstances is it likely that ten million of dollars worth of the late importations were purchased, paid for, put into warehouses, and there remained until 23d June, 1812? The enterprising and bold character of the merchant forbids such a supposition. Their conduct in general, I do not speak in particular, has not been timid, more especially when they have only come into contract with the commercial restrictions of the United States. This is not the only circumstance. We have it from the statement of Mr. Russell, that the revocation of the British orders in council was not an act of justice towards the United States, but as a relief to her numerous suffering and ruined manufacturers, who had stated that they had conditional orders from American merchants for vast quantities of goods as soon as the orders in council were revoked. Mr. Russell also states, that after the revocation of the orders in council, the agents of American merchants were extremely active in making investments in British manufactures. It is a fact acknowledged that the state of exchange was affected by it. It fell from upwards of 20 to 11 or 15 per cent. and that there was also a rise in the price of manufactures. Mr. Russell concludes with stating it as his opinion, that a very small portion of the late importations was purchased prior to February 2d, 1811. I have examined this fact, not as a judge or as an advocate, but with a view to convince the committee of the necessity of a reference of this subject. The next fact I shall take up relates to the rate of profit, and here again we must have recourse to the best evidence in our power, and not the best the nature of the case will admit. The petitioners admit that they will make a handsome profit if their bonds should not be forfeited. If they should escape by a total remission of the forfeitures incurred, this handsome profit they allege will be from five to ten per cent. above the ordinary profit and not including the discount in the rate of exchange between the United States and Great Britain. It is alleged that the rate of exchange ought not to be calculated as an extra profit, because within ten years it will balance itself. It is true that in ordinary times, the exchange will sometimes be above par, and sometimes below par, so as not to make a material profit or loss within ten or any given number of years. But previous to the year 1811, for 20 years the discount has never been greater than ten per cent.—during the year 1811 it was 20 per cent. and upwards. The petitioners say from 10 to 23. Taking all the information I have read on this subject, the discount in some cases has been 28 per cent. If the petitioners will not call this discount a profit, I cannot help it, nor is it less true that the discount puts into their pockets so much money. I am not compelled to disbelieve my own senses; and if I see a bill of exchange purchased at a discount of 20 per cent. which is equal in value to its nominal amount, in vain may the purchaser say he makes no calculation of profit from such a speculation. He makes his 20 per cent. discount. The same advantage accrues to the exporter of produce to the Peninsula. The bills on England are invested in British manufactures to prevent a loss of 20 per cent. I have had reference to the reports annually made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to ascertain the fluctuations of exchange.

A recurrence to this annual report, where the government has made great annual purchases of bills on England with a view of paying the public debt in Europe, confirms the fact stated by the petitioners, that exchange was never known before to be more than 10 per cent. discount, and that within ten years the balance is equal in ordinary times.

In 1804	exchange was from par to 2 1-2 per cent. advance, average	1 1-2
1805	exchange was from par to 4 per cent. discount, do.	2
1806	at par
1807	from 1 per cent. to 3 discount	2
1808	from 3 to 6 1-2 advance	4 3-4
1809	from 1 to 4 advance	2 1-4
1810	from 2 to 5 discount	3 1-2

The opportunity of the seven years enumerated, has alone been afforded for the want of time, which leaves a balance of 1 1-2 per cent. in favor of the advance.

In 1811 from 15 to 25 per cent. average 20 per cent. from the best information, leaving on the side of discount 18 1-2 per cent. In 1812 from 10 to 20, average 15 per cent. add to 18 1-2 makes 33 1-2 per cent. add to this the depression of British manufactures from 5 to 10 per cent. on an average since 2d February, 1811. I have made these remarks and calculations, because the subject of profit was involved, not to make out a case against the merchants, but with a view of shewing the necessity of referring them to the Secretary of the Treasury where ample justice will be done them. If I am permitted to wander from the record, and I do not feel myself confined to any particular source of information, I would give a calculation which would establish the extra profit of the importer at 20 per cent. above the usual profit. I would take the sales in Baltimore, for 100*l.* sterling, in ordinary times say 240*l.* currency, this year 300*l.*—the difference will be 60, converted into sterling it is 36*l.* sterling on the 100*l.* deduct the double duty 16*l.* leaves 20*l.* per cent. above ordinary profit. I will not venture to say what extra profit has been and will be made: it is not necessary to hazard the amount, I have established the point of a very considerable extra profit. The importers will not agree that they have made a great extra profit, they do not however deny the fact that the people have been compelled to pay the enormous high prices complained of. They say the jobbers, in other words the speculators and the retail merchants, have made these profits, but principally the jobbers. There would be no difficulty in procuring the testimony of retailers as to enormous prices paid to importers, and I presume the jobbers would not agree that they alone had imposed upon the people.

A variety of letters have been received by members and read as evidence and ex parte affidavits, making out a better case for the merchants than they made for themselves. To read these letters and affidavits we might conclude that so far from any profit being derived from the late importations that it had been really a losing business. I have seen several letters on the other side of the question; I could procure one from my friend from Pennsylvania now on my right, another from a gentleman from Maryland, and I have in my hand one from the collector of Norfolk, all of which letters go to prove the great and exorbitant prices of goods obtained by importers sufficient to cover their bonds. [Here the collector's letter was read.] But, sir, I have not sought testimony to make out a case as if judgment was to be pronounced, or volumes might have been procured. What I have obtained has been a voluntary offering from respectable sources. As to letters in favor of the merchants, as many might be obtained against the declaration of war, if it was supposed they would be read in this body to govern their decision. It has given me no pleasure to have been compelled to present this subject as duty has required me. The situation in which I am placed is an invidious one, but called upon by duty and obeying that solemn call upon a subject of so much magnitude, while I derive consolation in not having wantonly injured the feelings of the parties concerned, or those who differ from me in sentiment, I feel indifferent as to the opinion others may entertain of this policy, nor do I court the good opinion of any man farther than it may be bottomed upon conscientious principles and correctness of conduct. Were I to have consulted my own feelings I might have remained silent. It may be thought by some that no part of the merchants bonds should be exacted, that this great community should give up what is really due to them to those who have violated the law. The body politic, this great personage, has no identity but in its operation. It is not tangible, has no form to present itself to your view, to address your passions, to cloud your judgment, to weave itself into your tender mercies. But it is not less my duty as a representative of this great community not to abandon what I consider its most essential rights. I have nothing to disguise on this subject—this community which has been taxed by these importers of British merchandise is involved in difficulty, in a war which must continue until the present ministry of England shall lose their power, or until the republican party in the United States shall be turned out of their places. While this is the case, I am unwilling to fix upon them internal taxation until it becomes indispensable, or to permit any portion of themselves to monopolize advantages without an equivalent. If the trading part of the community would not be satisfied with the measures of the government, I would withdraw their capital from a disgraceful traffic with a foreign power at war with their country; the war would be of short duration, and the people would pay any tax you would fix upon them without a murmur. But when the agricultural and manufacturing part of our community have taken up the sword for commerce, and those immediately engaged in commerce opposing the war, they will not be willing to be taxed by that class of this people and then taxed to carry on the war. In speaking of the opposition to the war, I do not intend to include many illustrious exceptions in the mercantile class of the community; but they will acknowledge that such is the fact generally—no matter what the cause, such is the unfortunate situation of the country; nor will one of them deny, that if we were now obliged to give up the conflict with Great Britain, our humiliation would be complete, and our independence at the mercy of the British monarchy. Such has been the advances of the president towards a termination of the war, that if the federalists were in power to-morrow, they would not dare to give up the principle of impressment to Great Britain, unless they thought the people were ripe for monarchy. I have not said this because I think cases of individual justice or liberality should go by favor and according to political tenets: no, sir, I have given testimony in this body, that party considerations do not govern me in cases of individual justice, nor in cases of liberality. I adduce it for the purpose of saying, the petitioners are not entitled to a total remission of the bonds, nor are they especially entitled to the mercy of this government.—Notwithstanding this, I am as unwilling to ruin the merchants as I am to abandon totally the just rights of this community.—I am induced to vote for this reference, because the secretary has said that he will not exact the whole of the bonds, nor will he remit them without condition. He will remit one half; before the other is remitted, he will demand an equivalent for the extra profits which the importers have made. Why demand it? Because it is due to the non-importation act. Because the petitioners have enjoyed exclusive privileges, and these exclusive privileges have levied a tax upon the people. Who is, then, prepared to abandon this right of the community? Who is ready to tax them doubly, not account of the war, but because we did not keep from them that money which was their due? I know, sir, upon questions of this kind we are called the friends and the enemies of commerce; and I have no doubt I am one of the latter denomination in the opinion of some. If, sir, to contend for the rights of the community even against great importing merchants is anti-commercial, I am that man. If, sir, to refuse to give up the non-importation act, and even to refuse to let merchants violate existing laws with impunity be anti-commercial, I am that man. If refusing to favor the merchants at the expence of the agricultural, and manufacturing, and laboring portion of the community be inimical to commerce, I am the man. But, sir, if a willingness to expend the last cent of our treasure and the last drop of our blood for the neutral rights of the United States, will entitle me to be styled the friend of commerce, then am I entitled to this honorable appellation. If a determination never to give up the war rather than permit our seamen to be impressed and made slaves in the service of Great Britain, entitles any man to be considered the friend of commerce, then I am among the favored few. If, in fine, an anxious desire to place farmers, mechanics and manufacturers on an equality will shield any man from the odium of being unfriendly to commerce, then am I shielded. But determined to discharge my duty at every hazard, I am not anxious where I shall be assigned by those who call themselves the exclusive friends of commerce.

Friday, December 4, 1812.—The house having resumed the order of the day, it being the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means on the petitions of sundry merchants, praying a remission of bonds given for certain goods imported from Great Britain—

Mr. CHEVES rose. He said he never rose to address the house with so much embarrassment as at this time. I feel anxious, said he, on the subject now before you: for the interests of those who present themselves as petitioners at your bar; for the principles of free government which I considered involved in the question to be decided; for the fate of that party connection with which I am associated: and for the honor of government which I would preserve inviolate. I believe, sir, that no question has ever been presented to our consideration more extraordinary in its nature and more important in its consequences. It has none of those marked characteristics which have heretofore distinguished legislation. It is at once legislation and avoiding legislation; at once declining to express the opinion of the legislature, and in effect delegating legislative power to decide on a question involving property to the amount of not less than forty millions, as I understand, said he, it will be contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is not an ordinary act of legislation: it is an experiment, new and before unheard of. It is an experiment on free government—on the forbearance and attachment of a large class of the people. It is a question of legislation and yet it is only a reference to the secretary of the treasury. The gentleman from Kentucky says, with his usual fairness and candor, it is to allow the secretary of the treasury to exercise functions on this important case, which he admits were invested in him for minor purposes. But is this power to be exercised by the secretary according to his own judgment? No, sir, the gentleman tells you without disguise, he has secured his opinion: he knows the course he will pursue, and is therefore in favor of a reference of the subject to him. It is then an act of legislation we are called on to perform, and yet does not present to the country the grounds on which we act. Is it not a new and extraordinary proposition, to delegate to an individual a great portion of legislative power—to put into his hands the fate of a great portion of the capital of our merchants? Has such an act of legislation ever before characterised a free government? I tremble for the consequences which will follow its adoption. It will shake the party with which I am connected, from either extreme of the continent to its centre. It will alienate a part of them; it will shew that a policy exists adverse to their interests, which first made its appearance in exclusive double duties, now in an exaction of a part of the proceeds of honorable enterprize, and I fear will be followed by other acts of a similar kind. Sir, I repeat, I tremble for the consequences. Gentlemen must pardon me when I say we are prone to acts which "make the angels weep." How otherwise can we account for the course of policy which now prevails. Is it possible, sir, that I, who represent persons deeply interested in the commerce of this country, can consent to unite in a decision of this nature? I wish to expostulate with gentlemen—to throw myself into their confidence—to induce them to believe I am in earnest. I am, sir. If I hope for honor or reputation in public life, I must acquire it with those who compose the majority in this house. Rise with them I may; fall with them I must. I am privileged then to expostulate with them, and to say that this is one of the most extraordinary acts ever presented to a legislative body for its sanction.

What is the state of the law in relation to the subject before us? It is alleged that the secretary of the treasury has full power over the subject, and that the legislature has not, and therefore it ought to be referred to his consideration. It is admitted that our powers extend to one moiety of the penalty; but it is suggested as doubtful whether they extend to the other. But, sir, I have no doubt on the subject. I have examined it; and from the little knowledge I possess of the rules of construction, I say there is a power in the legislature to remit the whole. I submit to those learned in the law if this be not the true construction. It is distinguished from those cases in which it is said the king has not the power to remit. It is to be recovered for the United States in the names of their officers, and it is only in the event of absolute recovery that the property becomes subject to the provisions of the act. What doubt can there be on the subject? If then we possess the power to remit, as I believe we do, why shall we transfer it? But, if the power be not complete, what excuse can be found for delegating the portion of it which we do possess? If it be an act of justice to remit these penalties, why put it in the power of any individual, however high his standing, to pursue a different course? It is our duty not to commit the rights of our constituents to any individual. I admit the character of the officer, to whom it is proposed to delegate this power, to be as high and unexceptionable as that of any officer in the government. But, admitting this, I say it is a prostration of the rights of our constituents to submit them to his arbitration. I saw one of the petitioners when the report was first stated to him. His exclamation was not, "am I to be subjected to these penalties?"—but, "am I to supplicate any individual in the community for my just rights?" These feelings did him honor, sir; they are such as the citizen should feel; but they are all prostrate, all forgotten in the proposition before you.

But it is said, there are a variety of cases, and it is impossible the legislature should decide on them correctly; and they must therefore be referred to this gentleman, the secretary of the treasury, who has the means and capacity to decide on them. I deny that he has. It is a subject on which an act of grace ought to be passed by the legislature. No human tribunal could do justice by minute and particular discrimination to all concerned.—How is the secretary of the treasury more capable than this house? There are hundreds of cases. Is he to make a separate decision on each? to determine on the fraudulent and and other cases, and their relative merits? Is he, in making such decisions, to receive evidence ex parte or as a court of justice? Incumbered as he is by the other functions of his office, he must at last do what you must do, if he attempt to discriminate, adopt general principles of discrimination—and will you declare yourselves less capable than him thus to decide? A discrimination, such as is contemplated by the report, cannot be carried into effect but by the most humiliating compromise of justice on the part of the government, of right on the part of the citizen. It must be a matter of conjecture. It cannot be a decision founded on investigation and the dictates of reason. You gain nothing, therefore, by the proposed reference. But it is still said, as the cases of these petitioners present several classes, it is impossible for the legislature to discriminate. I say it is quite possible, sir, to discriminate as far as it is important to do so. It is possible to leave all the cases to the decision of a judicial tribunal of the country, and for the legislature to do what the legislature of a free people ought to do—to grant your suffering citizens an act of grace. It is in your power to take such a course as shall distinguish between cases of your own citizens and your enemies, and this will be done by the resolution I shall propose if I have an opportunity of submitting it, which is as follows:

"Resolved, On viewing all the facts which have been presented, and considering them in connexion with the proper policy of a just, free, enlightened, and consequently lenient government, under the circumstances of his country at this crisis, that, in all fair cases of bona fide American property, the penalties and forfeitures incurred by the late importers of British manufactures be unconditionally remitted."

Do you wish, sir, that those citizens who fairly hold this property should be mulcted for accidental violations of your law? No man desires it. In the resolution, which I propose to offer, bona fide American property will be exempted, and enemies properties shipped as such, will be liable to forfeiture according to the law of the land and the policy of the government; and this is surely the course which ought to be pursued.

The difficulties, then, which have been made to cover this question disappear; the advantages with which the course recommended by the committee has been clothed appear not to exist; and the real question before us is, whether we will sacrifice so much of the property of our fellow-citizens as is involved in this decision, or whether we will, by an act of grace and liberality, discharge them from their bonds.

In the examination of this question gentlemen have assailed the testimony connected with this report. They have said it is the testimony of interested persons; that all interested persons are casuists in their own cases; and that the witnesses have been so in the present case. The moral honor or integrity of the witnesses has not been impeached. The gentleman from Kentucky, with his characteristic liberality, has spared them such imputations, and though it was not more than justice to them, I thank him for it. But is not this testimony such as is always received by a legislative body? The gentleman with an air of triumph alluded to the testimony taken before the house of commons in relation to the orders in council. Was that testimony taken on oath? I believe not, sir; it was, too, the testimony of persons, as the gentleman himself says, who saw ruin staring them in the face, praying relief. This is not I hope the case of the petitioners. The legislature if it take any thing from them, it is proposed shall only take the extra profits! They therefore speak less under the influence of interest than persons interested generally do. No legislative examination has heretofore presented itself to you so fully entitled to belief. You have not merely the declarations of the petitioners but also the testimony of persons not interested, on oath and not on oath. Every material fact is confirmed by the testimony on oath of disinterested persons. You have seen on your tables statements on oath of disinterested persons confirming in every particular the statement of the committee from New-York; others have been read to you by your clerk. You have seen from Baltimore and from Boston statements of disinterested persons, affidavits and letters which carry on their face the evidence of indubitable truth, all confirming the statements of the committees. I ask you, sir, what legislative testimony can be stronger than this? I ask if the mere absence of the form of cross examination is a sufficient ground for rejecting this testimony? I ask you, whether that testimony which would consign a man to the gallows, deprive him of life, liberty, property and character, in a judicial decision, shall not here be received in evidence? No member of the committee, who looked at the gentlemen when they were testifying could have doubted the general correctness of the testimony. The persevering and ingenious examination of a member of that committee put them to the test. If they had been incorrect in their statements, the incorrectness must have been detected. But, gentlemen say, there is some inconsistency in their statements. Sir, no instance has ever come within my observation, where a number of persons were examined, but some diversity appeared in their statements. It is not given to human nature to be perfect. Let gentlemen examine the testimony and they will find no material variance. They may find, or suppose they find, in some unimportant particular a difference in the statements of one and a half per cent.—they may find some enumeration of particulars which are not properly applicable to the cases before us, which is erroneous. But take the whole mass of testimony together, and I pledge myself it is substantially without contradiction. Let those who doubt on this subject examine for themselves, and I have no doubt of their entire satisfaction at the result.

I say then, sir, that the mass of the testimony proves that the great bulk of these goods belonged to bona fide American citizens, and were ordered or purchased long before the revocation of the orders in council; that they were also either paid for before that time, or with money deposited in England before the revocation, and were shipped in pursuance of orders to ship when it should be legal to do so, or were shipped by persons on the spot who had no reason to doubt the legality of such shipments. It has been proved, also, that the average sales were not more than 75 per cent. in advance of the prime cost. Let the members of this house examine the facts. I pledge myself for the substantial accuracy of that statement, that the average advance on these importations has not exceeded 75 per cent. It will be found that the charges and duty frequently amount to from 60 to 65 per cent. and excluding some charges which are not invariably incurred, are from 50 to 55 per cent. giving a profit, excluding charges not invariably incurred, of from 20 to 25 per cent. and leaving a profit, over peace times, of from 5 to 10 per cent. Gentlemen may find particular instances of greater profit, but they are counterpoised by sales at cost charges, and the result I do aver to be as I have stated. And if this be the case, I contend that so many of the petitioners as are American citizens and bona fide proprietors of the goods are men entitled to the humane interposition of the legislature, and that it will be worthy of this house to interpose in their behalf.

I will not further discuss the question of proof, except merely to advert to one or two particulars respecting which some observations fell from the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday. He said it was impossible for gentlemen unacquainted with mercantile concerns to detect the errors or casuistry of gentlemen who were; but, that if he could discover one error, it was fair to infer there were others. If, sir, one material error in these statements could be discovered, it would be sufficient indeed to excite the suspicions of the house, but not to condemn the statements which have been made, because all general statements must contain some inaccuracies. The gentleman's rule therefore will not hold. But if on the face of the testimony in which the gentleman thinks he discovers errors, there is a refutation of his supposed discoveries; what shall we say? or if it will be found that the gentleman is as much wrong in one statement as he supposes they are in another, will not the one error counterpoise the other and cancel the objection derived from it, even if proved? I think it will.

The committee state the average of the lowest duties at 33 1-3, the highest duties at 50 per cent. Now, sir, I state that the several classes of permanent peace duties ad valorem are 12 1-2, 15 and 20 per cent. A duty imposed as a war duty by an act of last session doubles these, and makes them therefore 25, 30 and 40 per cent. Add to these the Mediterranean duty of 2 1-2 per cent. and they stand at 27 1-2, 32 1-2 and 42 1-2 per cent.

In calculating these duties, according to the usage of the custom-house, the gentleman says, those at 12 1-2 give a result of 32, those of 15 give a result of 38, and those of 20 give a result of 49 1-2 on the prime cost of the goods imported. I acknowledge that the gentleman is correct in all these statements. He says the statements of the merchants are inaccurate, inasmuch as they say that the lowest duty is 33 1-3 per cent. What difference then does he think he proves? A difference of 1 1-3 per cent. If there be an error of this small amount, can it be so material as to discredit the whole mass of testimony received? Admit that all the testimony discovers no greater inaccuracy, would not the mind of every man in the house be satisfied of the justice of the relief they claim? If there be no greater difference in the testimony from the fact, than that supposed by the gentleman between 33 1-3 and 32, then is the testimony substantially accurate. But the gentleman is mistaken. If he will look at the report again, he will find it stated that the average of the lowest duties as calculated by the custom-house is 33 1-3 per cent. What, sir, is meant by the average of the lowest duties? It is not an average of one, but the average of the low duties, as distinguished from the highest duty. It is not therefore the lowest duty that is spoken of, but the average of the 12 1-2 and 15 per cent. duties. The average is therefore higher than the lowest duty. And my honorable friend, with his excellent understanding, the acuteness he has acquired at the bar, and the wisdom with which his experience in the senate has graced the whole, is entirely mistaken.—My honorable friend is wrong in his first proposition. Is it not fair then to presume he is in others—and to excuse the petitioners for slight variations, when even he has fallen into error? The object of the committee of merchants was to state, that there were two great classes of duties; that the highest duty was 50, and the average of the lowest duties 33 1-3 per cent. It is admitted that they erred in an unimportant specification of articles. It is not true, for instance, that ironmongery pays a duty of 50 per cent. It is true, as the gentleman has stated, that it pays 37 or 38. But it is true that there is a class of duties at 50 per cent. and that the lowest duties do average 33 1-3. The result of the average of equal quantities is greater, but the result of the average of actual importations will place it precisely on the footing which the committee have stated. Take for instance a particular year. I speak, like my honorable friend, from the documents of the treasury.—In the year 1807 there were imported goods to the amount of 36,260,000 dollars, liable to a duty of 12 1-2 per cent.; in the same year 9,480,000, leaving a duty of 15 per cent. The average of equal quantities at these duties, as now increased, is 35; but in the year stated, about four-fifths were imported, paying a peace duty of 12 1-2, and one fifth paying a like duty of 15 per cent. which gives an average result, as the duties now stand, of 33 1-3 per cent. as stated by the committee. If gentlemen will minutely examine the facts, they must be satisfied, as I am, that every material part of the statements of the merchants is practically correct. The only error which the gentleman from Kentucky has proved, namely, that certain articles enumerated by the committee, from New York, do not bear a duty, as calculated at the custom-house, of 50 per cent. on the prime cost has no real or practical effect on the question before you, to a material extent, because the goods imported consist almost altogether of different articles. There was no interest and therefore could have been no intention to deceive—there was practically no deception, because the erroneous statement did not effect the question.

In relation to the extra profits, which are made to form so important a part of this discussion, the gentleman says, that, according to a rule of law, the largest sum should be taken in exclusion of the average of the sums given—that the extraordinary profits are admitted to be from 5 to 10 per cent, and that according to the rule alluded to, 10 per cent, is to be assumed as the extra profit. Now, sir, I cannot recollect any rule of law by which the gentleman is authorised to assume the largest sum instead of the average result—the last I take to be the rule of law and the rule of reason, likewise applicable to the question—the extra profit would then be 7 1/2 per cent.—this will be the extent of the claim of the government if it insist on this partnership in the profits. But while the highest sum stated by the merchants is assumed instead of the average result, it is denied that even this reaches the truth, and it is alleged that these extra profits are much greater. But is this anything but vague suggestion? If I were to enter into a minute examination of the evidence on which we are acting, I could prove that all the statements of the merchants give this result and confirm each other—For example, they have stated their former profits to have been from 10 to 15 per cent, and their profits on the late importations to be from 15 to 20 per cent, giving a result of from 5 to 10 per cent, or an average of 7 1/2 per cent, as their extra profit. But you are told that the merchants have derived an extraordinary profit from the depression of bills of exchange on England. They tell you that this is never brought into a calculation of profits on importation, and that in a given number of years it really yields no profit—that there are instances of exchange being as high as 10 per cent, above par, and that then no additions were made to the usual advance. But, sir, the profit on exchange, if a profit has been enjoyed, has resulted from a distinct operation, has been attended with the risques of a distinct operation, and ought not to be amalgamated with the profits of importations, no otherwise than accidentally connected with the act of depositing money in England through the means of a profitable process of exchange. But the gentleman says, they get this profit in fact, and could not have realized it, but through these importations, and therefore it must be brought into calculation. Without admitting the correctness of this conclusion, let us see what this advantage amounts to. Now the proposition is, that we should take the extra profits. But it appears that exchange had been as low under common circumstances as 10 per cent, and as the claim is only to the extra profits, in other words the profits not enjoyed in common times, our enquiry must be, how much do the late profits of exchange exceed 10 per cent. The evidence before the house shews that exchange has varied during the period of restriction from 5 to 22 1/2 per cent, discount, and gives an average 13 3/4; and in corroboration of this result, a very sensible and candid letter among the printed documents, states this advantage to be about 1 1/2 per cent. The advantage then, beyond that of ordinary times is but 3 3/4 or 4 per cent, and combine this with the extraordinary advance obtained upon the sales of the goods imported, and together they make but 11 per cent! And is it this for which the government is contending?

I now am enabled to quit this fatiguing detail, and come to examine the subject in a general point of view.

It is said to be a violation of the restrictive system. My honorable friend from Kentucky says, this is one of the strongest arms this country has. That this assertion is proved by the examinations had before the house of commons; and that this measure ought not to be relaxed or abandoned, which would be done, he says, by a remission. How is the value of this system proved? By distress said to have been, and which no doubt was, experienced by the manufacturers in England. But although particular manufacturers ascribe their sufferings to our measures, yet it ought not to be concluded that the general distress results from this cause. It is disproved by circumstances.—Some years ago, when we imported more largely than we would do now if no restriction existed, we took but one fourth of the gross exports of British manufactures, and we exported again, to markets now supplied by themselves, one-third of that fourth, leaving but one-sixth for our own consumption. I time not be misunderstood. I do not deny that we are immensely valuable customers, and that our restrictive system has caused her considerable distress, but I deny that it has caused that overwhelming distress, if such distress exists, which the gentleman has intimated. If it does exist, it proceeds from other causes. I contend that we suffer from this measure a greater degree of distress than they do.—Our suffering is greater and more sensibly felt in the loss of the revenue and in the loss of the affections of our people, a loss infinitely more to be deprecated than the loss of trade or money. Who, sir, are the distressed in England, who are said to have become such from this measure? Some manufacturers, an inconsiderable portion of the people. Who in this country? All persons engaged in or connected with commerce, a portion comparatively infinitely more numerous. It has broken the spirit of the country—it has rendered those most warmly attached to the government almost disaffected. There is one third of the people of this country interested in commerce or closely and intimately connected with it, who are totally opposed to this policy. If we alienate from the government of England, in her manufacturers, one twentieth of the people of that country, we at the same time alienate from our own government one third of our own people. It is a policy, if it were generally correct, peculiarly inapplicable to our people and government. The questions under it is, who can suffer most? and here thank God they have the advantage of us. They are accustomed to suffering, we are not—that government has the power to inflict more from its natural vigor—we have neither the power nor the disposition, I hope, to try our strength in this way. There is no doubt, if we confine our views to the effects of this measure on England alone, that we will be convinced of its power and efficacy—there is nothing, of which so partial a view would not give a favorable impression. But if there are advantages in the non-importation system on the one hand, there are on the other greater disadvantages. It puts out one eye of your enemy, it is true, but it puts out both your own. It exhausts the purse; it exhausts the spirit and paralyzes the sword of the nation. But how did my honorable friends treat this system at the last session of congress? Did they not themselves agree to let in fifteen millions of value of British manufactures to obtain five millions of revenue? Where then, sir, was the policy of your restrictive system, when these same gentlemen would have suspended it to gain so much revenue? Gentlemen then themselves gave up the system and yet they now talk of the sacred character of this policy. It was given up on the first day of the session. It was given up yesterday. It is given up whenever you refuse to prohibit exportations. It is idle to talk of free exportation and a prohibition of importation. How else are your returns to be effected? The whole annual produce of the mines of Mexico and Peru, the whole specie circulation of Great Britain, would not furnish returns for the exportations of this country for a single year of prosperity; and yet you talk of unrestricted exportations and a prohibition of importations. Yes, sir, adhering to the latter policy, you have already twice or thrice in this session said there shall be no more exportation law, and you were right, because it was a system of self torture—it produces indeed an infliction of pain upon your enemy, which comparatively can scarcely be called considerable, whilst it throws yourselves upon the rack of excruciating torment. But, I ask again, how can the policy of the restrictive system be spoken of in such terms of approbation and admiration, when gentlemen were not only willing to give it up, but have actually given it up more than once? I am astonished at this incessant cry of the policy of the restrictive system, and an inviolable adherence to it, when it has been relaxed every year since its institution. It must be a most extraordinary system. Gentlemen treat it as some nations do their idols. Sometimes they worship and sometimes they flog them. So it is with my honorable friends who alternately venerate and despoil this great system of policy. They were willing to abandon it to raise a given revenue, and now that the revenue has been obtained by an unintentional infraction of it, they say it is too sacred to be touched with impunity. I never heard the word restriction named in the hall of congress without being alarmed. It is greatly to be lamented, for the sake of the country, that this subject is so frequently agitated. Now the farmer is threatened, then the merchant. The country had not yet recovered from the alarm which was caused by the resolution of the hon. gentleman of New Hampshire (Mr. Harper,) to prohibit the exportation of the great productions of the soil; a resolution which, like the comet that lately visited our region, affrighted and dismayed the wondering people, but which, like it, had passed away, we hoped, not again to appear in our time, when the resolutions of my hon. friend from Virginia (Mr. Newton) Nos. 1, 2, 3, I forget how many, followed in rapid succession, and, like the tail of that great meteor, hung over us, giving signs of dire and ominous portent. These to your farmers are as pernicious as the plagues of Egypt. To your cities the proposition on your table is more terrible than the pestilence with which they were not long since smitten by the judgment of God, inflicted in his wrath but by his justice; which made the dwelling where health, and joy, and gladness and general prosperity, had blest the inhabitants, a charnel house, and sent forth "the frequent corpse" through the deserted streets, accompanied by no living creature, save the patient drudging animal which bore it, and the lone sexton who committed the dust of the body to the repose of the tomb. Yes, sir, even this was a more tolerable calamity to your cities, than would be that plague upon your table!

What ought to be the policy of a government like ours, at a crisis like the present, when we should have but one heart and one hand? Surely this is not the way to unite us. When, sir, you wish me coming from the sea coast to salute my fellow-citizen from the west as a brother, do not present him to me in the character of one exacting from me harsh and unmerited penalties. In spite of my perfect conviction of the benevolence and justice of my honorable friend from Kentucky, I must consider them as harsh and unmerited penalties, though even by him inflicted.

It is said, however, in support of the proposition on your table, that it is not unjust, that the merchants having gained this extraordinary profit without the sanction of law, should be compelled to refund it. I have shewn you, sir, in the course of this examination what that profit was; that from a fair and liberal construction of the testimony it was but 7 1-2 per cent. and that to this might be added 3 3-4 per cent. for the extraordinary gain upon bills of exchange. Now, sir, the policy which these and at the same time so destructive of the pre-operations of commerce, as doubly so dissent operations of commerce, as doubly so dis-advise as far as it was possible to obtain it.

 measure of his time, to set himself up in opposition to the confidential and well informed minister of the government? The important fact that the merchants shipped under the impression of the legality of such shipments is further proved to you. The language of the letter of Mr. Monroe to Mr. Russell made the continuance of the non-importation act entirely dependant on the duration of the orders in council, and states that it will be immediately suspended on the revocation or necessary modification of the orders in council. But that is not all, sir. Who are the memorialists?
 Persons who reside in this country, who gave orders not to have the goods shipped till it should be legal to do so. But their agents in England have been mistaken. Those who supplicate you for a remission of those forfei-tures never contemplated a violation of law.
 They are entirely free from every kind of imputation of intention to violate either the letter or the spirit of the non-importation act. Those who are to suffer did not direct and could not control the act for which they are to suffer.

But it is said, that though government should take this, the consumer pays it and it will come from the pockets of the country. My honorable friend from Kentucky stated a fact, I believe from a document of the treasury, of which I have no doubt, that two thirds of the people of this country are clothed in home-span. And where are those two-thirds to be found? On the margin of the sea shore or in the cities. No, sir, the other third, who consume foreign manufactures live in cities, on the margin of the sea-shore, and pay the whole. They pay the double duties and the extra profit, and not those out of whose pocket the gentleman would have you believe it comes. The consumer prays you not to inflict these penalties. Those who have paid it, intreat you not to take this profit from the merchants—they say, let them keep it—they deserve it. And will the government under such circumstances object?

But, sir, does not justice require the remission of these bonds? These merchants have done what your policy failed to do. They have given you three great advantages; they have given you twenty millions of capital, which will probably be loaned to the government if applied for in a proper way; they have given you five millions of revenue which is already secured to the government and they have given you clothing for your army in spite of yourselves. Shall they then, after having incurred great risks in doing all these things which are so advantageous to the country, have fines inflicted on them for the good they have done? The proposition is unreasonable. Would gentlemen wish that the treasury should not have been filled—that the capital should not have been brought your army home? That the army should not have been clothed? Surely not. And under what cir-

But it is said there are several classes of petitioners, and that, though some may be innocent, all are not equally free from imputation; that some of them shipped after the declaration of war was known. Well, sir, if we take the testimony of Mr. Russell, they are equally excusable with others. He did also advise shipments at that time. It would have been ruinous to the proprietors to have detained them; it would have deprived the nation of twenty millions of capital; it would have deprived you of five millions of revenue; it would have deprived you of supplies of clothing for your army. Was not the advice of Mr. Russell correct? Would you not to-morrow grant permission to bring home so much property so situated, if it would yield equal advantages? You would indeed practise a most extraordinary policy if you did not. You would to-morrow authorize the act—and yet you would inflict a penalty for an act which you could not refuse to sanction. What would have been the case with this property had it been suffered to remain in England till the termination of the war? Do gentlemen expect the war to terminate to-morrow? No, sir, it will continue for years, if it continue till the principles for which it was commenced be obtained. The most conciliatory propositions have been rejected; we have nothing to hope on the ground of a speedy peace. Then, sir, why will you make a distinction between the different classes of shippers? The one shipped believing the act not forbidden by the laws or policy of the government in a fair and honorable pursuit of gain; the other under the belief that it was the duty and disposition of the government not to inflict on them the penalties of a law which certainly in its origin did not contemplate such a case, with a view to save their property from inevitable destruction, and themselves from probable ruin. It is also attempted to discriminate by the periods of purchase, between those purchases which were made before and those made after the revocation of the British orders, and the first are considered as the favored class: but why should they be so considered? The first purchased at a time when the shipment was forbidden, and known to them to be forbidden, with the hope of a change, from a change of policy or an accommodation of the differences between the nations; the last under a belief that the laws of their country did not forbid them to ship them immediately. They have equally violated the letter of the law, and are equally innocent of an intentional violation of its spirit.

But those who purchased after the revocation believed that in the purchase as well as the shipment there was no law of their country which denied them the full advantage of the speculation in which they were about to engage. If then you discriminate at all, it must be in favor of those whom gentlemen, from their arguments seem least disposed to relieve. But they are all in effect on a footing because all stand on a footing of perfect equity, and an attempt to discriminate would be repugnant to that equity.

But it is contended, that this is a case in which it is right to aid the revenue of the country by taking a portion of the profit of the merchants. I say, sir, if it were just, it would be impolitic, because you would not thereby in fact increase the financial means of the country. It is a dangerous experiment in finance, as well as in legislation. You open a source of revenue, indeed, but it is one which only drips and is drained in a moment, and you close the great fountains of resource and stop the free streams of perennial supply. Shew to the commercial part of your people that they are not regarded in a less favorable view than the rest of the nation, and they will supply the revenues you want by lending you their wealth; but if you exact from them their little gains, will they assist you? No, sir, they will not.

What is the real advantage we are to promise ourselves from this new operation of finance? The government, it is proposed, should get perhaps 11 per cent. on the amount of bona fide American property imported—say that the whole amount of property of this character is 18 millions as some have supposed, and it will give you only two millions of dollars. Take the arguments of gentlemen who endeavor to prove that not the half of this amount is American property, and these are the arguments of those who propose this financial expedient, and it will put but one million into your treasury, whilst it will withdraw from you the confidence of the only class of people to whom you can look for money to carry on the war. Can there be any equivalent in one or two millions of dollars to counterbalance this loss? And here let me say while using this language of the treasury, that, I trust in God, no man who may be thus consigned by this house to the secretary of the treasury to await his decision and to supplicate his clemency, will so far forget what he owes to his own true interests and to his character as a free citizen, as to give any equivalent for that sum of money which may be demanded as the government's share of the profits! I would rather see the objects of the war fail—I would rather see the seamen of the country impressed on the ocean and our commerce swept from its bosom, than see the long arm of the treasury indirectly thrust into the pocket of the citizen through the medium of a penal law. We might suffer all these disasters and our civil liberties would yet be safe. That principle of our government would still be preserved, which subjects the purse of the citizen to no authority but a law so plain that he who runs may read. How are the exigencies of the government for the next year to be supplied? That portion of them which is provided is rather the result of accident than forecast. Is the deficiency to be derived from taxes? No, I will tell gentlemen who are opposed to them, for their comfort, that there will be no taxes imposed for the next year! It was said last session, that you would have time to lay them at this session, but I then said it was a mistake. You now find this to be the fact. By your indecision then, when the country was convinced they were necessary, you have set the minds of the people against taxes. But were it otherwise, you have not time now to lay them for the next year. What ought to be our course under these circumstances? Accident, having thrown five millions of dollars into the treasury, supplied the place and precluded the necessity of taxes for the ensuing year. It has furnished a basis of credit and the balance must be supplied by loans. We should now, by an act of grace, conciliate those who have money to lend. But it is said we cannot conciliate them. I do not mean by conciliation an endeavor to induce those who are opposed to the party in power to abandon their political opposition. I mean only to conciliate them so far as to make them see and feel that the government feels tenderly for their interests—that they are equally favored and protected. So much is recommended by our best policy, while it is the just claim of political opponents as well as political friends in a free government. The treasury may be supplied by acquiring their confidence without their political support and co-operation. I only say we must not disgust the monied interest of the country. No government like ours can support a war by direct impositions or any other revenue raised within the year. It must rely on its credit for a great portion of the ways and means of carrying on a war. This is the theory on which it was proposed to act the last year. This is the theory on which the war was commenced. The great source from which you must draw is the commercial wealth of the country. And yet you are called upon to shut up and choke the channels through which alone it can flow into your hands. This would be, as it were to bank in the periodical floods of the Nile, and would to God it were as little practicable, and prevent them from spreading their fertilizing qualities and making their precious deposits on the adjacent lands. Commerce and agriculture may be aptly compared, said Mr. C. to this noble river and its floods. The last, like commerce, would not indeed exist, without the mighty stream, the symbol of agriculture, which flows silently and majestically within its banks. But this great river which in song and story has, in the nakedness of truth, exhibited more splendor than fable and fancy could have lent, without these attendants, would have descended to the ocean unboared and unsung. Memphis and Thebes would not have been, and even the starry heavens, beaming only on the corporeal, would long have given no light and afforded no charm to the mental eye. So no cause has contributed so much to the civilization of man and the improvement of every art and every science, as commerce. Without commerce we should be simple shepherds or barbarian hordes. I deny not, said Mr. C. the virtues of the agriculturists; they are generally perhaps greater than those of any other class of society. But the mercantile people of this, our own country, are inferior to no set of people on earth—they are not inferior to any set of people on earth—

ing its occasional violations by some unprincipled men, with more vigor and strictness than all the douaniers of France or all the navy of Great Britain could have done in any other country. Such is the character of your merchants; but if you inflict penalties on these men who have refused to violate your laws and become smugglers, you will put them out of the commerce of the country, and those profligate men who are ready to violate every law you may enact and who disregard every obligation of morality or religion, will supersede them. The general policy of every free government as well as the particular policy and circumstances of our own forbids the course proposed to be pursued. The general practice and experience of free governments discountenance it. Can gentlemen point to any thing like it in the history of free governments—I know there are examples, but I find them in the history of tyrants and of arbitrary governments. I find them in the history of Henry VII, and in that of his celebrated agents Empson and Dudley—yet in an arbitrary government they were given up to the indignation of an injured people, and history has execrated the acts as peculiarly abominable even in the conduct of a tyrant. Let gentlemen discriminate between the cases if they can. In either case the law has an operation which the legislature never intended—in either case the treasury is to be filled. But say, if you please that this is a doubtful case—that it is not assuredly clear that these penalties ought to be inflicted, what ought to be our course? To demand or exact any thing in a doubtful case? No, sir, because the legislature of a free government has no right to act on doubtful principles. Few men will have confidence enough to deny that this is at least a very doubtful question on the part of those who would inflict the penalties—it would be so from its novelty alone. Sound policy then would recommend an act of grace.

I will add one word more, on the subject of commerce, rather out of place. One of the most distinguished kings of England, whose reign exhibits the greatest exploits in the history of that nation, among which are numbered the achievements of Cressy and Poitiers, Edward the third, was believed by the good people of his realms to have discovered the art of making gold; for it was to them otherwise inconceivable, how he supplied his treasury. He raised armies, equipped fleets, gained mighty victories, conquered kingdoms and spent vast sums on internal improvements—such demands it was thought the art of making gold alone could supply. The historian says, no—he cherished commerce!

Mr. Clay (speaker) said, that he had participated with the committee in the pleasure which they must have derived from the splendid exhibition of eloquence made by the gentleman from S. Caroline, Mr. Cheves. He and sent into effect your embargo, notwithstanding wished it had been unmingled with regret.— But when he saw the honorable gentleman as sailing, with his powerful talents, what he deemed an essential system of policy, he felt constrained, however incompetent to the task, to attempt its vindication. The gentleman appeared, indeed, to arraign the whole of the measures pursued by this government for several years past, in reference to foreign powers, though he knew his private sentiments to be in favor of the embargo. [Here Mr. Cheves stated that, in speaking of the restrictive system, he did not mean to include the embargo, which he always thought a wise measure.]— Mr. C. thought a concession in its favor admitted the propriety of the law of non importation.

What is the principle of these restrictive measures? It is to create such a pressure on the foreign nation as would compel it to revoke its anti-neutral edicts. The embargo aimed to accomplish this purpose, by not only withholding supplies of the first necessity, but at the same time, shutting up our market against the manufactures of the aggressors. The act of non-importation was, upon certain contingencies, substituted for it, and it left the export trade free, whilst it pressed upon the foreign nation, by an exclusion of her manufactures. In this respect, he thought it a measure fraught with more wisdom than the embargo, which however, he had no doubt would have produced its effect, if it had been persisted in.— Neither was designed to impair commercial enterprise. Far from it. The friends of both contemplated the emancipation of commerce from its unjust shackles. Commerce was suspended for the moment, that it might revive with more freedom and energy. The bow was unstrung that it might acquire fresh vigor and new elasticity. And he considered that the proudest triumph which the friends of the restrictive system could enjoy, was the recent revocation of the orders in council—a revocation which neither a regard for the laws of nations, nor a desire to preserve the peace and harmony of the two countries, could effect, but what that very pressure produced by the law of non-importation had achieved. Yes, the distresses, the cries of the manufacturers—their haggard looks, produced by the operation of that law, had at length ascended to a corrupt ministry, and occasioned a reluctant abandonment of those orders. Every deposition given in the house of commons, on the late examination before that body, on this subject, was a panegyric on our interdiction of British manufactures. He would trouble the committee with one which he had just laid his hands upon [Here Mr. C. read the deposition of W. Thompson.] And yet we are now called upon to abandon this system! We wanted firmness. We are deficient in the virtues of patience and perseverance. The embargo would have attained its object. It was, in a moment of panic, prematurely abandoned. And now, that the non-importation law has been demonstrated, by unerring experience, as capable of effecting its original design, we are asked to relinquish that also.— He feared we should, in the same manner, get tired of the war. He viewed the restrictive system as a powerful auxiliary of the war.— You may be defeated by sea and land.— Your north western army may be ingloriously surrendered (it did not become him here to say from what causes.) In another quarter of the union your army, by fraud and chicanery, may be robbed of its recruits. The physical force of the country may be withheld, upon novel and dangerous constructions of the constitution, menacing the total subversion of government. Opposition, transcending all legitimate bounds, may be carried to the very confines, themselves, of treason. That base degenerated spirit may exist, which incapable of patriotic struggles itself, questions and derides the motives of those who nobly step forth in their country's cause—a flagitious spirit which has been seen to assail the standing of two of his honorable colleagues, because they exhibited the more than Roman example in shouldering their muskets and flying to the protection of the frontiers, against a most savage alliance. But if you cling to the restrictive system, it is incessantly working in your favor.

But his friend from South Carolina had contended, that we had thrice this session decided against this system, by refusing to entertain the proposition for an embargo. Mr. C. could not agree with him. He admitted, that a trade, in exportation only, could not subsist without a corresponding import trade, either in specie or commodities. But he denied that it must, necessarily, be in the forbidden fruit—English manufactures. He was free to declare, that the exact limit to which he wished to see the export trade carried (until our rights are acknowledged) was the specie and commutables, other than British, into which its proceeds could be converted. What that limit was, congress must determine. It must be left to regulate itself. He was opposed, therefore, to the embargo recently proposed. He was desirous that the merchants, acquiescing in the policy of their government should not continue heedlessly taking in payment for their cargoes to the Peninsula, bills on London—thus placing their capital in the power of the enemy. If they persisted in it, he was for their doing it at their peril. Taking nothing but specie or merchandize other than of British production, the restrictive system would distress the enemy not only by closing an important market for his manufactures, but by exhausting his specie. For whilst he keeps up his large armies upon the conti-ment, subsistence must be obtained for them, at any sacrifice, and if bills will not procure it, specie must be employed. A stream of specie, equal to twenty millions of dollars, the estimated amount of our exports to the Peninsula, continually flowing from any country would soon exhaust it of the precious metals: Much less than this would endanger the stability of the paper systems in Great Britain.

The gentleman from South Carolina says, that the manufacturing class in that country is inconsiderable—that the American consumption is not more than one-sixth of the exports of British manufactures. My friend's error consists in separating that class from, and carrying it against the whole mass of British population. It is unfair, in estimating its consequence, to look only to the divided effect of which it is capable. It ought to be viewed as a co-operating portion or opposition. In that country there will always exist an opposition. And the question is, what quantum of weight will be thrown, by the discontents of the manufacturers, into the scale of that opposition, which is made up of the friends of Irish emancipation—the friends of parliamentary reform—those who are opposed to the continental war, and that system of corruption and burthen of taxes existing in that country. He believed, if persisted in, the restrictive system, aiding the war, would break down the present ministry, and lead to a consequent honorable peace.

The gentleman deploras the gloom and distress which hover over our cities, and which he attributes to the restrictive system. Indeed had a stranger, unacquainted with their actual condition, heard his lamentations, he would have concluded that the melancholy state of ruins, which they present, is but little short of that of the famed Balbec and Palmyra. But what is the fact? Their growth and prosperity are without example. Where are to be found your magnificent palaces—your splendid equipages—your sumptuous villas—all the luxury of wealth? In these same pining, desolated cities, and their vicinities. It was, however due to candor to say, that perhaps next to New Orleans, the city of Charleston (of which his friend was the representative) has suffered more than any other by the shackles upon commerce. But he denied that it resulted from the measures of our government. No, the gentleman has mistaken the cause of the disease. It flowed from the anti-neutral edicts. It proceeded from cutting off the market for the staple commodity of South Carolina. If it be true, as he had already admitted it was, that an export trade, could not exist without an import trade, the converse of the proposition was no less undeniable. Suppose then the non-importation law not to have existed, how would Charleston or South Carolina have been able to sustain a trade in importation only? Cut off as she has been from a market for her cotton, where would she have found the means to pay for foreign articles? The immutable laws of trade would have created for that state a natural non-importation, if the legislature had not prescribed it. If it be urged that she has enjoyed in her rice and indigo (though the culture of this latter article has almost ceased) some export trade, it is no less true that she has had the benefit of a corresponding, and probably an equivalent trade in importation from other countries than Great Britain.

It was remarkable to observe the inconsistency of the opponents of the restrictive system. Sometimes it was said to operate exclusively on the mercantile class. Then it was the agricultural class that bore its whole burthen. He admitted that if the export trade were limited in the manner he had suggested, this system would ultimately re-act upon agriculture. It was, however, but a temporary sacrifice, which that class was prepared to make for the permanent freedom of trade.—We had heard of no complaints—received no petitions from that quarter. The great agricultural state of Pennsylvania, and other similar sections, were patient and patriotic. The time when it was proposed to relinquish this system, was not less impolitic than the proposition itself. If the benefits expected from it were even doubtful, this certainly was the period best calculated to test its value. Perhaps at this moment the fate of the north of Europe is decided, and the French emperor may be dictating the law from Moscow. The British trade shut out from the Baltic—excluded from the continent of Europe—possibly expelled the Black Sea—perishing in South America—its illicit avenue to the United States, through Canada, closed; was this the period for throwing open our market, by abandoning our restrictive system?

He would next proceed to examine the claim of the petitioners to relief. And here he felt himself constrained to acknowledge that he had never been more embarrassed in the consideration of any subject whatever. He was impelled on the one hand, by an almost irresistible disposition to grant the relief asked for; and, on the other, he had the strongest conviction of the utility of the restrictive system, and the necessity of clinging to it. The difficulty lay in reconciling an act of liberality to individuals with the public interest. Their case undoubtedly presented powerful pretensions to the generosity of government. What was it? The repeal of our non-importation law had been made to depend upon the revocation of the orders in council. If they were so revoked or so modified as that they ceased to violate our neutral rights, the president was required to declare the fact, by his proclamation, and then our law ceased. It was immo-serial whether Great Britain repealed or modified her orders. It was immaterial what was the manner of repealing or modifying them. All that our law demanded was, whether the one or the other, in whatever form the repeal or modification was ordained, that the repealing or modifying instrument should produce a given effect. It was not to be denied that the order of the prince regent of the 23d of June last would have produced this effect. It satisfied our law. It was quite a different question, whether independent of the law, it was such an abandonment of their system as he would require. He entertained no doubt that it would have been the bounden duty of the chief magistrate, if the two countries had remained at peace, to have issued the proclamation enjoined by our law. He would have had no discretion upon the subject. He had only to look at the operation of the prince regent's order, and it was such as our law had required. Mr. C. did not doubt that the British government intended, by the condition with which it was coupled, to urge hereafter our implied consent to those orders in council, whenever it might determine to revive them. But the president would not have been restrained, by any such sinister design, from the performance of a positive duty. In the case of the arrangement first with Mr. Erskine, and afterwards with the French government, the manner in which the aggressive edicts of the respective countries were discontinued, was far from being unexceptionable. The president, however, looking to the substance of things, issued on both those occasions his proclamation, and he was right in doing so. Whether, therefore, the American merchant or his agent in England, prior to a knowledge there of the declaration of war, adverted to the terms of the law, the practice of our government on similar occasions, or the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster, he would have been equally brought to the conclusion that the revocation of the orders in council in England, would have been followed by the repeal here of our non-importation law. Under these circumstances shipments were made—And what puts the question beyond dispute is, that the president, in the message delivered at the opening of the present session, has said that the order of revocation was susceptible of explanations satisfying this government.

Mr. C. thought, that in all cases where the departure of the vessels from British ports, was prior to a knowledge there of the war, relief ought to be afforded. Official information of that event, it appears, was received on the 1st August. The shipments made prior to that time, were made when the repeal of our law might have been fairly anticipated, and under ignorance of its continued existence. A still stronger class of cases is that which consist of purchasers prior to the 2d February, 1811. They bought when the trade was unrestricted, and of course violated neither the prohibitory provisions of the law, nor the policy of the government. When, by the president's proclamation of the 2d of November, 1810, it became unlawful to introduce their goods subsequent to the 2d of February, they abstained from their introduction.—Whilst they ordered their goods not to be shipped from Great Britain, and thus abided by and conformed to the law, as good citizens, others violated the law and introduced their goods after the 2d of February, 1811. These were relieved from the forfeitures and penalties which they incurred by the law of the ensuing month, prescribing as the rule, the time of departure from the British ports and not the arrival in America of the vessel. Shall we then thus suffer the violators of the law to escape, and punish its observers?

With regard to all who shipped after the 1st of August, the plea of ignorance of the continuance of the non importation cannot be urged. They knew they were acting contrary to law. They were fully apprized of the fact too, that this house had refused, before the declaration of war, to suspend the operations of the law. They were probably also informed, that after that event, propositions to repeal and modify it were rejected. The state of war itself rendered the trade unlawful. It was in vain to say that they did not intend to violate the law. It was a palpable, wilful, undisguised violation. Remit the forfeitures in their case, and your law is virtually repealed. What is the present course of the trade, said Mr. C. to the peninsula? It is to place American capital in Great Britain, which is constantly accumulating there. Its return can only be effected in British commodities.—Having said to one class of shippers, after the war that they shall be exonerated, how will you hereafter refuse another when they shall present themselves before you? Precedents are dangerous. The human mind, in a state of difficulty and embarrassment, was prone to take refuge under them. Remit in all cases as had been contended for, and you let in a flood, deluging the empire of the law, against which your utmost wisdom and sagacity will be unable to provide a competent embankment.

As to the terms on which relief was to be afforded or withheld, he was decidedly of opinion, that there ought to be no conditions—The law ought to be enforced or not. He thought a compromise in the case dangerous and undignified. Indeed he felt shocked at the idea of an equivalent. Already are our laws too openly violated or fraudulently eluded. Shall we degrade them still farther, by carrying them into the market, and fixing a price upon their violation? Extend the principle of an equivalent from cases of prohibition merely, to instances of moral turpitude—to felony and homicide: and every gentleman will see and feel its enormity.—No, Sir, let us not pollute our hands with this guilt.

The proposed equivalent contemplates taking from the merchant his extraordinary profit; leaving him the ordinary profit;—fixing, therefore a rule for future violations. Now the ordinary profit is exactly that with which the merchant, in a regular course of trade will be contented. He will trade with alacrity under the firm of the United States and Co. if you will leave him his customary profits, taking only the excess. But he would ask, if the firm gets into complete operation, what would become of the extra profit? Holding the opinion that he did, in favor of the law of non-importation, he felt himself under the necessity of defending it no less against the open assaults of its avowed enemies, than the effects of the principle contended for by its professed friends. He was alone the solitary, (he feared feeble) advocate of the law. The consequence of a general remission of the forfeiture, was its virtual repeal. The consequence also of the equivalent contended for, by fixing as a standard the extraordinary profit, was its virtual repeal. He was for a remission in the specified cases, where remission appeared to him to be due—He was for an enforcement of the law in all other cases—He was opposed to the establishment, of a principle, which if practised upon and he did not see how it was not to be, if once adopted, under the delusive idea of taking the extraordinary profit, most completely prostrated the law.

But this principle of an equivalent was unjust or impracticable in operation. One merchant has imported a gainful cargo, another a losing one. The same merchant has imported one parcel of merchandize on which he has made profit, and another on which he has sustained a loss—will you estimate the profit only, or take into view both profit and loss?—How can you adapt any general rule to this variety of cases. Again—The extraordinary profits made upon the late importations result from the demand being greater than the supply. They will be divided between the importer, the jobber and the retailer. Will each be compelled to relinquish his portion? And if not, upon what principle of equality can you take from the one and not the other? If it be urged, that the importers only have violated the law, it must be allowed, that the others are in the condition of accessories after the fact.

He would touch an incidental question which had been started, and cease with, he feared, his unprofitable discourse. It had been questioned, whether congress had the power to remit the moiety of forfeitures claimed by the officer making the seizure. The law, which creates the forfeiture, reserves the unqualified power of remitting the whole or any part. It is true, that it has vested that power, for convenience sake, in the secretary of the treasury. Congress may, however, abolish that office entirely, and place all its functions in some new institution, or without abolishing the office, it may transfer the remitting power, or resume it themselves. In all these instances, it would be a mere change of tribunal. The principles which would guide in a decision of the question of remission, it is to be presumed, would be those of justice, and that is all the parties affected have a right to expect. If there be cases in England, where the crown is supposed not to be authorized to remit the informer's part of a penalty, be apprehended, on investigation, it would be found to proceed from the power of remission not being reserved to the government in the law denouncing the penalty, as it is in our laws.

Mr. C concluded by submitting the following resolution.

Resolved, That as far as respected the cases of citizens of the United States, who purchased goods, wares and merchandize, the growth, production or manufacture of Great Britain, prior to the 2d of February, 1811—and of citizens of the United States who shipped similar goods between the 23d day of June, and 1st of Aug. 18 2, the petitioners ought to be relieved by a remission of the forfeitures and penalties which they have incurred, upon payment of legal costs; and that on all other cases of the petitioners, a recovery of the forfeitures and penalties incurred ought to be enforced."

Debate on the Loan Bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 17.

Mr. Gaston, (S. C.) Mr. Chairman, I fear I am about to engage in a very injudicious attempt—I fear that the patience of the committee is exhausted, and that it would be idle to hope for their attention. It was originally my wish to claim their notice at an early stage of the debate: but I found this wish was not to be effected but by a competition for the floor, and I thought such a competition not justified by the nature of the remarks which I had to submit. Under these impressions I had made up my mind to wait until some favorable unoccupied interval should be presented; and I should not now have presumed to anticipate other gentlemen who seem disposed to address you, but for some extraordinary observations which have just been uttered, and which in my opinion demand immediate animadversion.

The gentleman from Tennessee, who has this moment resumed his seat, (Mr. Grundy) seems a little sore that his doctrine of moral treason, which he promulgated at the last session, should have been so vehemently oppugned by the persons for whose benefit he had compiled it. I am not of the number of those;

Mr. Chairman, who have deemed this doctrine worthy of examination. As originally understood, it was so preposterous and so repugnant to the principles of our constitution, that every intelligent freeman found its refutation in the consciousness of his own liberty.—By subsequent explanations and definitions it has been so attenuated and subtilized, that what was never distinct now almost eludes perception. According to the last attempt at exposition, if it have any meaning, it would seem to embrace systematic efforts to persuade capitalists not to lend money, and the unthinking youth not to enlist as soldiers to carry on the war against Canada. His denunciations of such a system—of the existence of which I know nothing; and which, if it exist, is innocent or criminal according to the motives from which it springs—pass by one altogether unheeded. But his unfounded imputations upon some of the best men and truest patriots of the country; and his attempt to support his doctrine by their example ought to be repelled, and a very short notice will suffice for that purpose.

The gentleman has referred to the act of 14th July, 1798, the much misrepresented and abused sedition law. It is difficult for me to express my astonishment at the construction which he affixes to the first section of this act. Need we wonder at any error, however gross, at any prejudice, however irrational, prevailing in respect to party measures and party opinions, when we find a professional gentleman assigning to a law a meaning which, but for what we have heard, would have been pronounced impossible on the part of any man of ordinary good sense? The first section of this law declares, that if any persons shall conspire together with intent to oppose any measures of the government of the United States; and in pursuance of such intent shall counsel, or attempt to procure insurrections, riots &c. they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. Can it be necessary to ask what was meant in this law by the expression “with intent to oppose any measures of the government?” To oppose, in its plain original sense, necessarily implies physical resistance—the exercise of force. It is metaphorically used indeed, to signify disputation, as the word to combat is applied to denote a controversy in argument; and a law prohibiting single combats might as well be interpreted to forbid controversies in discourse, as a law prohibiting opposition to the measures of government construed to interdict the expression of honest opinions that may retard their operations. But the act is still more explicit. To constitute crime it requires not only that the persons should combine “with intent to oppose the measures of government,” but that in pursuance of such intent they should proceed to “counsel or attempt to procure insurrections, riots,” &c. The design of the act is unequivocal—it is to check and punish incipient treason before it has manifested itself in actual war against the nation. It was altogether unnecessary, if there had been any common law applicable in the courts of the United States; for in every government under heaven the acts which it describes are made punishable. A doubt whether the common law had a federal existence alone occasioned the passing of the law. Yet we are gravely asked, if in the year 1798, men had combined together to dissuade persons from lending money to the government, or from enlisting in the army; whether they could not have been punished under this law? No, sir—No, sir. There was not a prosecuting officer in the United States so ignorant of his duty as to dare to bring forward an indictment upon such a pretext.

To the next section of this abused act the gentleman has given an interpretation as destitute of plausibility even as his exposition of the first section. To find a warrant for his doctrine of moral treason, or to lessen its odium by casting reproach on others, the gentleman has charged that this section subjected to indictment and punishment the publication of scandalous and malicious writings against the government, although they might be true—and that had it not been for the third section of the act, which his predecessor moved in the House of Representatives after the bill had passed the Senate, the truth would have afforded no defence on an indictment for a libel against the government. Sir, this position is utterly untenable—No part of it is true. The gentleman must be presumed to know, and ought to recollect, that when an offence is created by statute, every word of the description of the offence is material and essential. What are the words describing the offence? “If any person shall write, print or publish any false, scandalous and malicious writing against the government, &c.” It is a necessary part of the offence that the writing should be false. If it be not false, then the crime has not been committed, the law has not been broken, and punishment cannot be inflicted. Why, then, I may be asked, was the third section, moved by the gentleman’s predecessor, inserted in the law? The answer is, to avoid all cavil, all real or pretended doubt, all foundation for the charge that would have been made had it been rejected. It might have been pretended that on an indictment for libel at common law the truth or falshood of the charge was not a matter of enquiry before the jury, so on an indictment for libel under this act, notwithstanding its plain words, the falshood of the publication was not material to constitute the offence; and had the proposed amendment been rejected, from the specimen we have this day had of the course of legal thinging of one of the bar of Tennessee, there is a moral certainty that the law would have been there stigmatized as designed to prohibit the publication of truth. To adopt the amendment removed all pretext for such a misrepresentation. It was accordingly incorporated into the law; and to shew that it was not introductory of any new principle, it was expressed as a declaratory of the preceding section. And be it enacted and declared, that it shall be lawful for the defendant, on trial, to give in evidence, in his defence, the truth of the matter charged is a libel. No, sir, the idea of punishing truth when published against the officers of the government was reserved until more recent times—until the abused sedition law had expired, and the champions of a free press were safely fixed in power. Surely the gentleman has not been so inattentive to the course of public proceedings as never to have heard of the case of Harry Crosswell. He for an alleged libel on Mr. Jefferson, was indicted at common law, not under the horrible sedition act; he was permitted to prove the truth of his publication, and was thus convicted!

I have done, sir, with the gentleman from Tennessee, his moral treason, and his exposition of the sedition law—and will endeavor to call your attention to subjects not altogether so foreign from the bill upon the table. The object of the bill is to authorize a loan to the government of the United States. The precise proposition before you is to declare what sum shall be borrowed; 'twenty-five millions of dollars.' Enormous as is the addition which is thus proposed to be made to our debts, could it be shown to be necessary to accomplish any purposes demanded by the honor and welfare of the country, it assuredly would meet with no opposition from me. Is a loan wanted, or revenue required to enable the government to pay off its just engagements? to give security and protection to any part of our territory or any portion of our citizens? to afford to our gallant navy (that precious relic of better days) such encouragement and extension as may enable it more effectually to vindicate our rights on the element where they have been assailed? My voice and assistance shall be cheerfully rendered to obtain them. Let the present proposition be withdrawn, and let it be moved to fill the blank with such sum as shall be adequate to supply any deficiency of revenue wanted for these purposes, and I will second the motion. Nay, sir, should the present proposition be rejected, (for while it is pending a smaller sum cannot be moved) and among those who are most conversant with the state of our finances should come forward with a further proposition, I will myself undertake to move the sum which shall appear competent to effect all these objects. But, sir, it is avowedly not necessary except to carry on the scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas. To this scheme I have never been a friend; but to its prosecution now, I have invincible objections, founded on considerations of justice, humanity and national policy. These objections I wish to explain and enforce, and thus avail myself of an opportunity of discussing some of the most interesting topics which grow out of the alarming state of the nation. I fear that all I can do will avail nothing; but, sir, representing a respectable portion of the American people who are suffering with peculiar severity from the pressure of this unfortunate and mismanaged war; who, with me, believe no good is to grow out of it, and who apprehend, from its continuance, evils, compared with which all they have yet suffered are but trifles light as air—I should be unfaithful to them and myself if I did not interpose my best efforts to arrest the downhill career of ruin. In performing this duty, I shall certainly say the things I do think. Endeavoring to use such language only as is consistent with self-respect and decency towards those who differ from me in opinion, I mean freely to exercise the right which belongs to my station.

Right! did I say, sir? The expression is inaccurate; once indeed there did exist in this house the right of free discussion. It was once deemed a constitutional privilege for every member to bring forward any proposition he deemed beneficial to the country, and support it by whatever arguments he could adduce; to offer amendments to the propositions of others, so as to render them, in his judgment, more unexceptionable; and to state the reasons of his dissent from any measure on which he was called to vote, and endeavor to impress his opinion on others. No doubt a vast portion of the good people of this republic yet believe that such is the course of proceedings here. Little do they dream of the complicated machinery, by means of which every privilege except that of thinking, is made to depend on the pleasure of the country, the whim of the majority. By certain interpolations in our practice, but which no where shew their hideous front in our written code, the system of suppressing the liberty of speech is brought to a degree of perfection that almost astonishes its authors. A gentleman wishes to bring forward an original proposition—he must first state it, and obtain permission from a majority of the house, to let it be considered, before he can shew the propriety of adopting it, or ask even for a decision upon it. Thus is annihilated the right of originating a proposition. But a proposition is originated by others, it is passed through the ordeal of consideration, and he is desirous of amending its defects, or of exposing its impropriety. This is, perhaps, deemed inconvenient by the majority. It may give them trouble, or bring forward a discussion which they do not wish the people to hear, or detain them too long from their dinners—a new species of legerdemain is resorted to.—The previous question, utterly perverted from its original and legitimate use, is demanded: the demand is supported by a majority. In an instant all the proposed amendments disappear; every tongue is so fettered, that it can utter but aye or no, and the proposition becomes a law without deliberation, without correction, and without debate. And this process is called legislation! And the hall in which these goodly things are transacted is sometimes termed the temple of liberty! Sir, this procedure must be corrected, or freedom is rejected from her citadel, and wounded in her very vitals. Inconveniences also result to the majority from this tyrannical exercise of power, sufficient, perhaps, to counterbalance all the benefits which can be derived from it. Gentle men often complain that the minority do not pursue the practice which is adopted elsewhere. In England, say they, the opposition address the house and the nation only on great fundamental questions involving disputed principles, and do not hang on the skirts of every bill, fighting the ministry, through all the details of their measures. Why is not the same course pursued here? The answer is obvious. Here the minority are not allowed to bring forward these great fundamental questions—they have no opportunity of shewing their views, except such as may be casually afforded by some measure of the majority, on which they are good natured enough to allow debate. Unless they avail themselves of such a bill in every stage of it, as a peg on which to hang their observations, they must be utterly mute. Thus it happens, too, that there is frequently not any discernable connection between the topics discussed, and the subject supposed to be under debate. Perhaps the very course I am pursuing is an apt illustration of these facts. Some weeks since I submitted to the house a resolution which I thought eminently deserving of attention—a resolution “that pending our negotiation with Great Britain, it is inexpedient to prosecute a war of invasion and conquest of the Canadas.” This resolution could not be discussed, for the House would not vouchsafe to it a consideration. But, as on the proposition now before you, debate is indulged, and has assumed a latitude that seems to permit every thing connected with the war, I am willing to embrace the occasion to support my favorite proposition to which a regular hearing has been refused. Grateful even for this opportunity, I acknowledge the courtesy which has been shewn me by the majority; sorely as I feel the degradation of indirectly using as a favor what, as a freeman and the representative of freemen, I ought openly to enjoy as a right.

It is very far from my design to enter into a particular inquiry as to the origin of this war or as to its causes whether technical or real. Such an enquiry would present a then too important and too extensive to be taken up as collateral or subsidiary to some other investigation. At the present moment, too, it is not so essential to know how this war has been produced, as it is to ascertain how it may be speedily and fairly brought to a close—So far only as a knowledge of the origin and causes of this war may be useful in producing this result, is it my purpose now to consider them.

An honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) claims for this war the character of defensive. He has properly remarked that a war defensive in its origin may be offensive in its operations, and of consequence that its character is not defined by the nature of these operations. But, sir, he is incorrect in supposing that its character is to be tested by the motive which occasioned its institution. War is offensive or defensive, simply as it is instituted by or against a nation.—It is an appeal to force to decide controversies between sovereigns who admit of no other tribunal to determine their rights. There is a perfect analogy in this respect between nations at war, and individuals litigating in a court of justice. He who commences the process is the actor. He who is summoned to the controversy has the defensive part, and it is in this view immediately immaterial whether the motive to litigation be found in the honest desire to claim what is due or in the malignant wish to oppress and defraud. For the correctness of these ideas, I rely not on my own judgment. This ought not without hesitation to be opposed to that of the honorable gentleman who independently of his personal claims to attention as chairman of the committee of foreign relations, must be presumed to be particularly conversant with all the questions connected with national law. Any person who has a curiosity to test these sentiments by the authority of jurists will find them explicitly recognized by Burlamaqui, vol. 2, part 4, chapt. 3, §. 5, and by Vattel—b 3, chapt. 3 § 25 and 37.

Nor let it be deemed, sir, of no importance whether this war be called defensive or offensive. It is always of moment that things should be called by their right names. Many of the vices and most of the errors of men arise from the misapplication of terms. The reasoner, who uses words to convey a meaning variant from their received signification, will probably occasion error, however precise his definitions. In spite of definitions, the hearer appropriates to his expressions the sense which usage has associated, and a confusion of ideas fatal to truth is the unavoidable consequence. Many phrases too, besides their primary meaning, convey a secondary sense of commendation.

tion or blame. By an artful use of those, the sophist is enabled to convert the honest prejudices of man, the guards of his security, into the instruments of his deception. The sagacious Mirabeau, than whom none better understood the arts which render the human understanding and passions subservient to the tyranny of fraud, he who so long 'rode in the whirlwind, and directed the storm' of the most furious of revolutions, compressed the elements of his science into one sententious maxim, 'words are things.' But the distinction between offensive and defensive war has peculiar claims upon our collection. So fatal is war to the best interests of the human family that a tremendous responsibility always rests upon the nation that commences it. This responsibility attaches through all its stages, and is awfully increased into certain guilt by the neglect of any fair opportunity to restore the relations of peace. Besides, the consideration that the war was offensive in its origin—that consideration which emphatically creates the obligation to terminate its horrors as speedily as justice will permit—will frequently be found to present the greatest obstacles to efforts at reconciliation.

The advocates for this war; vying with each other in zeal for its justification and continuance, do not precisely agree in opinion, as to its causes, or as to the objects for which it is to be prosecuted. The gentleman from Penn. who presides over your judiciary committee (Mr. Ingersoll) in an elaborate argument seems desirous to prove (I am not certain which) either that the war is a consequence of the violation on the part of Great Britain, of his favorite principle, "free ships make free goods," or is to result in the establishment of this principle. This comprehensive dogma the gentleman contends to be a part of the original unadulterated code of national law, consecrated by the treaty of Utrecht, strenuously asserted by Britain herself in her dispute with Spain, in the year 1737, recognised in her commercial treaty with France in 1786, and vitally essential to our maritime interests. The gentleman from Virginia, whom I yesterday heard with much pleasure (Mr. Jackson) dissent from his political friend and declares that this maxim has never been asserted by our government under any administration as founded on the common law of nations. Although the gentleman from Virginia is in this respect unquestionably correct, yet it is not certain that the chairman of the judiciary committee is altogether erroneous in attributing to the administration an expectation of establishing by this war some such theory. That the neutral flag shall protect all from capture is a very convenient doctrine for a nation frequently at war with an adversary of decidedly superior maritime strength. France for centuries at war with England, has very naturally wished to incorporate this doctrine into the law of nations. Her imperial master has adopted it as one of the elementary principles of his new maritime code, which he solemnly promulgated in his decree of Berlin, of November 1806, and in support of which he has used every violence and stratagem to array the nations of the world into one great maritime confederacy. At least, as early as the infamous Turreau's letter of June, 1809, the executive of this country was perfectly apprised of the existence of such a confederacy; of the purposes which it was to uphold, and of the determination of France to bribe or compel our accession to it. The decree of the great protector of the confederacy, of the date of April, 1811, though probably not issued till May, 1812, announced in language sufficiently distinct that this claim had been so far complied with on our part as to exempt us from the further application of the penalties of disobedience. And our declaration of war against the sole recusant of this imperial theory was proclaimed by Napoleon to his senate as a spirited and generous exertion to vindicate the new religion of the flag, which, like the superstition of the sanctuary, was to protect every fraud and shelter every crime. Extravagant, therefore, as the positions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be thought by the far greater part of this committee, they may have more countenance from the administration than is generally suspected, and on this account may deserve a rapid and transient examination. The assertion that by the general law of nations the character of the vessel gives a character to the goods is unequivocally denied. The actual reverse of the assertion is maintained by jurists generally, with a harmony that forbids doubt.

Instead of detailing these opinions separately permit me to give the language of one who wished well to the gentleman's doctrine, who had often carefully explored the musty volumes of national law, and who was never apt to carry his admissions beyond the line which candor prescribed. Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Genet, of 21th July, 1793, expresses himself thus. "I believe it cannot be doubted but that by the general law of nations, the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are free, and the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are lawful prize. It is true that sundry nations, desirous of avoiding the inconveniences of having their vessels stopped at sea, ransacked, carried into port, and detained under pretence of having enemy's goods on board, have in many instances, introduced another principle between them, that enemy bottoms shall make enemy goods, and that friendly bottoms shall make friendly goods; a principle much less embarrassing to commerce, and equal to all parties in point of gain or loss —but this is altogether the effect of particular treaty controlling in special cases the general principles of the law of nations, and therefore taking effect between such nations only as have agreed to control it." If the gentleman will examine the treaties to which he has adverted, the commercial treaty of Utrecht, between England and France (which by the bye the house of commons refused to sanction) and the subsequent commercial treaty of Mr. Pitt, in 1786, he will find the language on this head unequivocal. The arrangement is declared to be made with a view to prevent the embarrassments and dissensions that would arise without such an arrangement—or, in other words, from the application of the principles of the common law of nations. Nor is it at all strange that Britain in a commercial treaty, from which she expected to derive immense advantages, should acquiesce in such an arrangement as between her and France. For it is obvious that no practical effect could result from it, except when one was at peace and the other at war. And such a state of things has so rarely happened that its occurrence might be numbered among political impossibilities.

The "no search" clamor in England of 1737, which the gentlemen have produced the parliamentary debates to prove, had about as much to do with the belligerent right to capture enemy's property conveyed in neutral ships, as the "no search" cry made about 30 years afterwards in the case of John Wilkes and general warrants. The dispute of 1737 with Spain grew out of a municipal claim asserted by that government and of the rigorous practice of their Guarda Costas to search British vessels hovering on the coast of the Spanish colonies for prohibited articles designed to be smuggled into them. A claim said to be repugnant to the treaty of Seville, and certainly very inconvenient to the illicit trade between Jamaica and the Spanish main—and a practice enforced with all that barbarity which usually characterises the minions of custom-house and revenue tyrants. How far the establishment of the gentleman's project would be beneficial to this country is perhaps not so clear. At a time when we had no capital to afford employment to our navigation, it certainly would have been advantageous. But since that period has passed away the most enlightened commercial men will tell you they wish for no such innovation. Its effect would be, to give us, when neutrals, the benefit of being among the carriers of the commodities of the weaker maritime belligerent for freight. But the effect of the old principle is to give us the profit which results, not merely from the carriage, but the purchase and re-sales of these commodities, with almost a monopoly in either market. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has as- signed another cause for the war, in which he has obtained the concurrence of several of his friends—the instigation by the British government of Indian wars. Although, sir, this theme of popular declamation has almost become trite, although the tomahawk and the scalping knife have been so often brandished with rhetorical ambi-dexterity, that their exhibition almost ceases to excite interest; yet far be it from me to think or speak lightly of the cruelties of savage warfare, or to conceal my utter abhorrence and detestation of them. But it is a different, very different question, whether the Canadians have armed the Indians to join in defence against a common invader, or had, previously to war, instigated them to hostilities against us. This last charge I do not believe—no evidence has been given to warrant it, that I have yet heard. Over the affair of Tippecanoe, the commencement of Indian war, there hovers a mystery which ought to be dissipated, but which the government will not dispel. I have sought, honestly sought for information. Of official there is little or none. From private sources not likely, in this respect to mislead, (for they are friendly to this war, and connected with the western interest and feeling) I learn that the great cause of Indian hostilities is to be found, where experience and history would prompt us to look for it—is to be found in our cupidity for their lands, and their jealousy and distrust of our superior intelligence and force. Indian wars have been, until a few years back, almost uninterrupted in this country, both before and since the revolution. They need no other investigations than are to be found in the inconsistent views, interests, claims, passions and habits of neighboring yet distinct races of people. Sir, general Harrison's treaty of November, 1809, was the mine of the great Indian explosion. The Indians complained, I know not how justly, that in that treaty they were cheated of lands which the parties to it had no right to convey, and never meant to convey. There are gentlemen in this legislature who know that Tecumseh immediately afterwards avowed his fixed purpose to vindicate by force and by an union of the red men the rights of his tribe and the menaced independence of the whole race. And we all know (the fact is on record) that shortly after this treaty the British governor general of Canada caused it to be officially communicated to the government of the United States that the Indians were meditating hostile designs. Sir, the holy command "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor" applies even to an enemy. I will not sanction this charge without evidence, nor against evidence, lest I violate this high injunction. I am not a disciple of that new moral school which would construe this divine prohibition, as the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) has expounded the commandment, "thou shalt not kill," as a mere municipal regulation applying solely to the Jews!

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has as-

But this war, say its advocates, nearly one and all, was declared to protect our seamen against impressment—in fashionable phrase, for "sailors' rights." There is no doubt, sir, that the conflicting claims of the two countries, on the subject of seamen, and the occasional abuse of the practice of search for British seamen on board American merchantmen, had excited serious dissatisfaction in America—yet I hazard nothing by the assertion, that the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. I remember full well the characteristic special pleading of the gentleman from Tennessee on this subject, at the last session, "that he really could not tell whether, if the orders in council had been repealed, we should have gone to war about seamen or not"—but, sir, I consider this as little more or less than adherence to a cautious form, as a protestando by way of excluding a conclusion, or in the nature of the commencement of an answer to a bill in chancery, in which the defendant takes care to save to himself, now and at all times hereafter, all and all manner of benefit of exception to the errors that may be discovered in complainant's allegations. I am aware too, of the very conspicuous blazon which is given to our sailors' wrongs in the president's war-message, and in the manifesto of the committee of foreign relations. But this proves no more than that when war was determined on, it was deemed advisable to make out as strong a case as possible, either to excite the sympathy of the world, or to rouse the indignation of our own citizens. The impressment of our seamen was grouped in the picture with the dearly bought Henryplot, the at least dubious excitement of Indian hostilities, and the adjusted controversy about constructive blockades.

No, sir, the question of seamen was not a cause of this war. More than five years had passed over since an arrangement on this question perfectly satisfactory to our ministers had been made with Great Britain, but it pleased not the president and was rejected. Yet during the whole period that afterwards elapsed until the declaration of war, no second effort was made to adjust this cause of controversy. From December, 1807, with very short intervals, we waged against Britain a commercial war to coerce her into an observance of the rights we claimed at her hands. In every step of this system, whether embargo, non-intercourse or non-importation, we avowed the grounds of this contest, and the condition on which it should terminate—the orders in council and their repeal. In April, 1809, the famous arrangement with Erskine was made, hailed by the well meaning as a second treaty of amity between the two countries; yet it contained nothing upon the question of seamen. In the president's communication to congress at the commencement of the war-session, November, 1811, enumerating in no light tone our controversies with Britain, and recommending preparations for war, the impressment of seamen was not remembered. The secretary of state was earnestly engaged in a correspondence with the British minister, Foster, at the seat of government, until the declaration of war; nay, until after it had passed the house of representatives. The object of the correspondence avowedly was, to bring our differences to an amicable close. But in this correspondence, the question of impressment finds no place, except incidentally, not as a substantive topic of discussion. And in the official communication from our government to our minister in Russia, stating the fact of a war declared against Britain, and alleging its justification with a view to be communicated to the Russian government—[Mr. Monroe's letter to J. Q. Adams, of July, 1812.]—this justification is vested solely on the British orders in council. These, then, were emphatically and exclusively the cause of war. And had it not been for very many weighty considerations to be found in the state of the world, in the nature of the war in Europe, out of which preceded this violation of neutral rights; in the conduct of the other mighty belligerent, her injuries, her menaces and intrigues, and in the peculiar condition of this country, actually growing into unexampled prosperity, under the very state of things of which we complained—had it not been for these, and considerations like these, that, trumpet-tongued, warned us from the gulph into which we were about to plunge, the orders in council would have justified the resort to war.—At all events, they formed what might be termed a sufficient technical cause of hostilities, much better than often figures, with conspicuous effect, in the manifestos of princes, under the specious names of justice, independence and violated rights.—But, sir, scarcely had the fatal step been taken, and the destinies of our nation risked on the fortune of the sword, when the obnoxious orders were revoked, the causes of war removed, and an honorable opportunity afforded of returning to the happy state of peace, commerce and successful enterprise. How grateful must not the executive of a country, whose policy was fundamentally pacific—how grateful must it not have been for this happy rescue from the horrors of war! How rejoiced, that all had been effected without a struggle, which it was the object to obtain by a bloody and precarious contest! Exulting to shew, that when it unsheathed the sword, not passion but duty urged the reluctant deed, surely it hastened to return the unstained weapon to the scabbard, and extend the blessed olive-branch of peace. Was it so?—Sir, I never can think of the conduct of the executive upon this occasion, without mingled feelings of surprise, regret, and anger. It cannot be accounted for but by an infatuation the most profound—an infatuation which is not yet dissipated, and which should fill every breast with apprehensions of that dreadful result, which in the wisdom of Providence, is preceded by the “darkened counsels” of rulers.

But it is entirely a mistake, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The orders in council never were revoked; they were indeed withdrawn, but under a declaration, asserting the right to re-enact them, should the violence of France, acquiesced in by America, renew the necessity for them. Will the administration, sir, bring forward this excuse? Will they take this ground? No, sir, they cannot, they dare not. The President has told the nation, that the revocation of the orders was substantially satisfactory—in his peculiar phraseology, “The repeal of the orders in council was susceptible of explanations meeting the just views of this government.” How could he do otherwise after his proclamation of the 2d November 1810, declaring the French edicts so revoked as to cease to be injurious to our rights; a proclamation founded solely on the letter of the duke de Cadore, of the 5th August, promising a revocation. Does the gentleman recollect the celebrated “Bien entendu,” or proviso annexed to this letter: “Provided, that in consequence of this declaration the British government shall revoke their orders in council, and renounce their new principles of blockade, or America shall cause her rights to be respected, conformably to the act which you have communicated? Does the gentleman remember the tortuous and labored efforts of Mr. secretary Monroe to explain this proviso into a condition subsequent? To prove that it was designed only to exert the right of France to re-enact these decrees if Britain should persist in her orders, and we forbear from resisting them? Such a condition subsequently annexed to a promised revocation of the French decrees, had no effect to impair its force—but the same annexed in terms to the actual revocation of the British orders renders it entirely null! No, sir, the executive cannot take this ground—his direct friends will not take it for him. In the emphatic language of the eloquent Junius, this would indeed “resemble the tergitant chastity of a prude, who prosecutes one lover for a rape, while she solicits the lewd embraces of another.”

But can it be urged say, the gentlemen, that the revocation of the orders in council removed all our causes of complaint, and left us nothing more to demand of the enemy? No, sir, this is not urged.—But it is contended, that as the revocation of the orders in council removed the cause of war, hostilities should instantly have been suspended, and a fair manly effort made to settle by negotiation all unadjusted differences which had not caused the war. A question of much importance and delicacy remained to be settled in relation to the search for British seamen on board our merchant vessels, and the occasional impressment of Americans. Under every administration of our country this question had excited great interest and been attended with much difficulty. Of late, indeed, it had in some degree lost its interest, and partly because of the comparative rare occurrence of the practice. The restrictive anti-commercial system had expelled native and foreign seamen in vast numbers from our country and almost removed the temptations to an exercise of what the British claimed as a maritime right.—For five years before the war, the dispute had in fact slept. Subjects more important pressed themselves on our notice, and while these pressed, that was postponed as a matter of future arrangement. But out of these new subjects a controversy arose which issued in war. It had scarcely been declared before the matter in controversy was arranged to our satisfaction by the voluntary act of the enemy. What was our plain obvious course—the course of duty and of policy? Sheath the sword until it is ascertained whether the dispute which had been laid aside for future arrangement, and which, in consequence of the adjustment of more pressing concerns, is now properly presented to notice, can or cannot be amicably settled. Even tyrants pronounce war the “ultima ratio regum” the last resort of princes. Nothing can justify the exercise of force but the inability to obtain right by other means. You had not supposed your just claims on the subject of seamen unattainable by negotiation, or you would not have reserved them for years as a subject for negotiation—and if they be thus attainable, how will ye answer to God and the country for the blood and treasure uselessly, criminally expended? This mode of thinking, sir, seems to me very straight, and quite in accordance with the good old notions of practical morality.—Besides it is the incumbent duty of him who seeks justice, first to render it. Whatever our claims on Great Britain might have been in relation to seamen, she was not without her claims on us. At a time when her floating bulwarks were her sole safeguard against slavery, she could not view without alarm and resentment the warriors who should have manned those bulwarks pursuing a more gainful occupation in American vessels. Our merchant ships were crowded with British seamen; most of them deserters from their ships of war, and all furnished with fraudulent protections to prove them American. To us they were not necessary—they ate the bread and bid down the wages of native seamen whom it was our first duty to foster and encourage. To their own country they were necessary, essentially necessary. They were wanted for her defence in a moment of unprecedented peril. Ought we not then, while seeking to protect our own seamen from forced British service, to have removed from her seamen the temptation to desert their country and to supplant ours at home? Why need I ask the question? Your seamen's bill, as it is called, enacted into a law since the war, is an acknowledgment that this ought to have been done—however deceptive some of its provisions may appear, its very principle is to restore to Britain her seamen, and save our own from her service. Unless you believed this principle right it was the meanest of degradations at such a time to pass such a law—and if it was right, then you had justice to render, as well as to seek. Had you pursued this plain path of right, had you suspended hostilities, you would have consulted also the true policy of your country. An unconditional proposition for an armistice upon the revocation of the orders, or an unconditional acceptance of the offer for an armistice would have passed for magnanimity. The disgraces which have since foully distained our military character were not then anticipated. The world would have believed, your enemy would have believed that you suspended your career of conquest because the war had owed its origin not to ambition, but to duty—because you sought not territory, but justice—because you preferred an honest peace to the most splendid victory. With the reputation of having commanded, by your attitude of armor, a repeal of the offensive orders, you would have evinced a moderation which must have secured the most beneficial arrangements on the question of seamen.

But, sir, this was not done. No armistice could obtain the approbation of the executive, unless it was preceded by an abandonment, formal or informal, of the British claim to search for their seamen on board our merchant vessels. As an evidence of this abandonment, the exercise of the claim must, by stipulation, be suspended during the armistice, and this suspension was to be the price of its purchase. Even without an armistice, no "arrangement" was to be deemed a fit subject for negotiation which should not be predicated on "the basis" of an excession from our vessels, by our laws, of their seamen, and an absolute prohibition of search by their officers. This, sir, was taking very lofty ground; but at that moment the Canada fever raged high, and the delirium of foreign conquest was at its acme. In a few weeks the American flag was to wave triumphant on the ramparts of Quebec—The proposition for an armistice from the governor of Canada was utterly inadmissible. In the language of our secretary of state, it wanted reciprocity—"The proposition is not reciprocal, because it restrains the United States from acting where their power is greatest, and leaves Great Britain at liberty, and gives her time to augment her forces in our neighborhood."

Mr. Russell did condescend to offer an armistice to the enemy, upon the condition of yielding as preliminary, even a suspension of arms, all that could be extorted by the most triumphant war. But even he, in his pacific proposition, could not refrain from exulting at the glorious conquests that would inevitably be made if submission was refused or delayed.

"Your lordship is aware of the difficulties with which a prosecution of the war, even for a short period, must necessarily embarrass all future attempts at a commodation. Passions exasperated by injuries; alliances, or conquests on terms which forbid their abandonment, will inevitably hereafter embitter and protract a contest which might now be so easily and happily terminated."

I cannot forbear, sir, from one remark at the "awful squinting" in this letter at an alliance with France. Gentlemen are sensitive when the possibility of such a connection is intimated. The very suspicion of such a design in the cabinet is viewed as a calumny. Here the accredited agent of the American executive proclaims such a connection, such an alliance as inevitable—proclaims it in an official communication to the public enemy. The declaration is laid before congress and the people by the president, unaccompanied by any disavowal—the minister is not censured—for his very conduct in this employment he is raised to the highest grade of foreign ministers; and, in spite of the reluctance of the senate to confirm his nomination, he is pressed upon them by the president until their assent to his appointment is extorted. I dwell not upon this topic, for I confess to you the honest fears which once congealed my heart are now dissipated. The sun of national freedom has burst forth from behind the portentous eclipse that "with fear of change" had perplexed the darkened world. Napoleon, no longer invincible, stripped of the false glare which splendid crime threw around his character, is no longer eulogised as "super-eminent" but denounced by the champions of administration as an "usurper." No one courts the friendship of a fallen tyrant!

It is not for me to say in what manner the dispute about seamen is to be settled. On this subject I have no hesitation, however, in giving my general sentiments. It is the duty of this government to protect its seamen (I mean its native seamen) from the forced service of any and every power on earth, so far as the strength of the country can obtain for them protection. True it is, that in my opinion the number of impressed Americans bears no reasonable proportion to the number alledged. I live in a state which, though it carries on not an extensive foreign commerce, has many native seamen. At the moment of the declaration of war, the enquiry was made whether a single native seaman of North Carolina was then detained by British impressment. I could near of none. I know that during our restrictive system many of our sailors entered voluntarily into the British service, and, when tired of it, complained that they had been impressed—instances have actually occurred at Plymouth and at London, of men surrendered as impressed Americans, who afterwards boasted that they had cheated their king. In the battle, I think of the President and the Little Belt, a neighbor of mine now an industrious farmer noticed in the number of the slain one of his own name. He exclaimed, there goes one of my protections. On being asked for an explanation he remarked, that in his wild days, when he followed the sea, it was an ordinary mode of procuring a little spending money to get a protection from a notary for a dollar, and sell it to the first foreigner whom it at all fitted for fifteen or twenty. The protected alien assumed, of course, the American name, and, if impressed, claimed to be liberated under it. The examinations which have been had before the committee of the Massachusetts legislature, and especially that of William Gray, confirm the belief that the number of impressed Americans has been exaggerated infinitely beyond the truth. But their number has been large enough to render the grievance a serious one—and be they more or less, the right to the protection of their country is sacred and must be regarded. The government would forfeit its claims to the respect and affection of its citizens if it omitted any rational means to secure the rights of American seamen from actual violation. Seek to obtain this security by practical means. If you cannot by substitute obtain an abandonment of the right or practice to search our vessels, regulate it so as to prevent its abuse—waiving for the present, not relinquishing your objections to the right. Do all that can be fairly asked of you to supersede the necessity of the practice. When this is done, and you should nevertheless fail—when war is rendered necessary to obtain a practical and reasonable security for American seamen against the abuses of impressment, then, sir, that war is just. Whoever may question its expediency, none who admit that wars may ever be justly waged can feel any conscientious scruples in yielding it support. This, sir, is no late opinion of mine. It has been long and publicly avowed—not indeed as a pledge to my constituents, as my friend and colleague (Mr. Murphy) has remarked—we do not deal in pledges—but because it is my habit to be frank when no duty commands concealment—Nor is it strange that I should feel attached to the rights of American sailors. I am a native of the sea-board. Many of the playmates of my infancy have become the adventurous ploughmen of the deep. Seafaring men are among my strongest personal and political friends. And for their true interests—their fair rights, I claim to feel a concern as sincere, and a zeal as fervent as can be boasted by any gentleman from the interior, or from beyond the mountains, who has heard of them but knows them not.

Has the prosecution of your scheme of invasion and conquest against the Canadas a tendency to secure these rights and advance these interests? This, sir, is a momentous question, on which it is the duty of every man in authority to reflect dispassionately, and with a fixed purpose to attain the truth. Unless this tendency be manifest, and morally certain, every motive which can be addressed to an honest heart and intelligent mind forbids its prosecution at the present moment. Make a fair comparison of its certain or probable ills with its possible gains, and then pronounce the sentence which justice, humanity and policy demand; and a suffering nation will bless your decision.

It is not my design to consider the immense expenditure which this scheme has cost, and which a continuance of it will cost to this country.* Well worthy is this topic of consideration, especially at a moment when industry is without encouragement, and external revenue is utterly destroyed. But it has been examined with great ability by gentlemen who have preceded me, especially by the gentlemen from Connecticut and Virginia, (Mr. Pitkin and Mr. Sheffield) and contenting myself with an earnest request, that their remarks be not forgotten, and that in your zeal for conquest you do not beggar your people, I hasten to present other views which have not been so fully unfolded.

There is something in the character of a war made upon the people of a country, to force them to abandon a government which they cherish, and to become the subjects or associates of their invaders, which necessarily involves calamities beyond those incident to ordinary wars. Among us some remain who remember the horrors of the invasion of the revolution—'and others of us have hung with reverence on the lips of narrative old age, as it related the interesting tale.' Such a war is not a contest between those only who seek for renown in military achievements, or the more humble mercenaries whose business 'tis to die.' It breaks in upon all the charities of domestic life, and interrupts all the pursuits of industry. The peasant quits his plough, and the mechanic is hurried from his shop to commence without apprenticeship the exercise of the trade of death. The irregularity of the resistance which is opposed to the invader, its occasional obstinacy and occasional intermission, provoking every bad passion of his soldiery, is the excuse for plunder, lust and cruelty. These atrocities exasperate the sufferers to revenge—and every weapon which anger can supply, and every device which ingenious hatred can conceive is used to inflict vengeance on the detested foe. There is yet a more horrible war than this. As there is no anger so deadly as the anger of a friend, there is no war so ferocious as that which is waged between men of the same blood, and formerly connected by the closest ties of affection. The pen of the historian confesses its inability to describe, the fervid fancy of the poet cannot realize, the horrors of a civil war. This invasion of Canada involves the miseries of both these species of war. You carry fire and sword amongst a people who are "united against you (say your generals) to a man"—amongst a people who are happy in themselves, and satisfied with their condition, view you not as coming to emancipate them from thralldom, but to reduce them to a foreign yoke. A people long and intimately connected with the bordering inhabitants of your country by commercial intercourse, by the ties of hospitality, by the bonds of affinity and of blood—a people, as to every social and individual purpose, long identified with your own. It must be that such a war will rouse a spirit of sanguinary ferocity, that will overleap every holy barrier of nature and venerable usage of civilization.—Where will you find an authenticated instance of this ferocity, that more instantaneously compels the shuddering abhorrence of the heart, than the fact asserted by my eloquent friend from New-Hampshire, (Mr. Webster)—"The bayonet of the brother has been actually opposed to the breast of the brother."—Merciful Heaven! That those who have been rocked in the same cradle by the same maternal hand—who have imbibed the first genial nourishment of infant existence from the same blessed source, should be forced to contend in impious strife for the destruction of that being derived from their common parents!—It should not be so!—Every feeling of our nature cries aloud against it!

*It was well remarked by Mr. Penman, that the constitutional rule of ascertaining the contribution of each individual to the satisfaction of the public debt, was to be collected from the system of direct taxes. Supposing the debt which will have been created by the Canada war by the close of the next campaign to be ninety millions, every man may ascertain how much of his property is mortgaged for its payment, by dividing it by his portion of the direct tax. The whole amount of this direct tax is three millions—multiplying, therefore, each man's direct tax by thirty, will give the share of the whole debt, for which he may be considered as liable.

One subject is intimately connected with this Canadian war, which demands the most thorough and deliberate examination. I tremble to approach it thus incidentally, lest I injure the cause of humanity and truth, by a cursory vindication. And yet I dare not altogether omit it, because I fear an opportunity of full consideration will not be presented, and it is of an urgency and a magnitude that forbid it to be overlooked. I mean, sir, the falsely called system of retaliation, which threatens to impart to the war a character of barbarity which is not its parallel in the modern annals of Christendom. Twenty three persons of our invading army, who were taken prisoners by the enemy at the battle of Queenstown, in Canada, have been sent to England as British subjects, to be tried for treason. To deter the enemy from executing the law upon these unhappy men, our executive has ordered into close custody, an equal number—not of American citizens invading our country—(this would, indeed be retaliation)—but of British prisoners who have committed no crime: It is avowed that these shall be put to instantaneous death, if the men sent to England should be convicted and executed. The British government has proceeded, in return, to confine a corresponding number of Americans, as hostages for the safety of these British prisoners, under the same determination and avowal. This has been again retaliated on our side, and the retaliation retorted by the enemy, so that an indiscriminate and universal destruction of the prisoners on each side is the menaced consequence of the execution of one of the presumed Englishmen ordered home for trial.

Before we enter upon this career of cold-blooded massacre, it behoves us, by every obligation which we owe to God, to our fellow men, and to ourselves, to be certain that the right is with us, and that the duty is imperative. If in a moment of excited feeling we should heedlessly enact the fatal deed which consigns thousands of the gallant, the brave Americans and Britons to an ignominious death, and should afterwards discover that the deed was criminal; that the blood of the innocent is upon us, and the cries of their fatherless infants have ascended against us to the throne of the Most High; how shall we silence the reproaches of conscience; how atone for the wide spread and irreparable mischief; or how efface from the American name the infamous stain that will be stamped upon it? With motives thus awfully obligatory to a correct decision, we are in imminent danger of error, from causes of which we are not aware. A portion of our population, inconsiderable in number as compared with the whole mass, but influential, because of their activity, violence, boldness, and their control of the popular presses—I mean, sir, that part of our naturalised citizens, who, not content with pursuing the private occupations of industry, undertake to manage the affairs of state, or teach us how they should be managed, have systematically and zealously labored to disseminate false principles, and excite prejudices and passions calculated to mislead the public mind. Divesting ourselves as far as possible from all hasty impressions, let us examine upon what foundation rests the right to put our prisoners to death in revenge for the execution of the men who are to be tried in England for treason. If it shall be that these men are native subjects of Great Britain who have never pretended to shake off their allegiance by naturalization here, their crime in making war against their acknowledged country, and actually invading its territories, is so manifestly treason; and the right of their country to punish such treason, is so complete, that I will not presume it necessary to argue upon either of these topics.— If the enemy has a perfect right to regard them as traitors, we cannot have the inconsistent right to avenge, with innocent blood, their just doom. But it may be that some of them are British subjects naturalized in America. I believe this is not the fact. We have no official information; but from the most respectable unofficial sources I learn it is not the fact. If it should be, however, a very interesting inquiry presents itself. What is the effect of naturalization in severing the ties which bind a man to his native country, and in requiring, as against its claims, the protection, of his adopted country? It is my conviction, that erroneous opinions prevail upon this point. It is a point on which this country surrounded by foreign territories, into which our citizens are migrating in vast numbers, has a very deep interest to form correct opinions.

Every political association must be considered as originally founded on a contract between each of its members and the whole body. Each stipulates to yield obedience to the laws, and to refrain from acts destructive of the existence of the state—while the community as such stipulates to secure to each individual the enjoyment of his rights. The duration of such an association, if not defined by the original compact, is necessarily unlimited. When any of its members is desirous to free himself from his engagements, it is manifest that he cannot do it by his own act, at his own pleasure; for such a power would be utterly inconsistent with the notion of an obligation. He can be released from his contract only upon the occurrence of some event which by the terms of the association, it is stipulated, shall have such effect, or by the consent of the community to which he was bound. As is the state of the original parties to the association, such is that of their descendants. Children in every political community must be viewed as succeeding to the rights and with them to the consequent obligations for their parents—but for this principle the great inducement to the social state, the desire of providing for the security and happiness of a family, would be annihilated, and the trammels of government never would be submitted to. But for this, that perpetual succession which keeps up the identity of the nation, although its individuals are all in a state of decay and renovation, which gives it a corporate being essential to its action, is at once destroyed. From these principles, or principles like these, it is that all inrists agree that when a political society is formed the fundamental laws of that society may prescribe when and upon what terms only any individual of it shall be freed from his engagement to defend it. That such society possesses this right is a principle of universal law—no dictum can be found to contradict it. How such right shall be exercised must of course depend on the wisdom and virtue of the society itself, or of those who enact its laws. It must be perfectly obvious that in any case where the fundamental laws of the society do not permit the individual to release himself from his engagement the intervention of a third party cannot effect this release. A promise of A to B cannot be discharged by an act of C.— The effect therefore which the naturalization in any country of the subject of another has upon the original obligations of that subject to his native country must depend upon its laws, prescribing to what extent and under what circumstances these original obligations may be lessened or destroyed. The institutions of different countries vary from each other in this respect—some are more rigid and others more indulgent. But I know of but one state on earth, the state of Virginia, which allows the native subject or citizen so completely to divest himself of his original character as to raise against her with impunity the hand of parricide. Virginia by a statute does permit a citizen by a formal deed executed before witnesses, acknowledged in court and recorded to quit claim and renounce his birth right, and thenceforth to be deemed as though he never had been of the state. All other states in the civilized world impose this restraint, that their original subject shall never wage war against his country.

With the fundamental laws of England in relation to this subject, we have a perfect acquaintance. In general every man is there at liberty to quit the kingdom, to pursue abroad such occupations and enter into such engagements as he may find beneficial; but on the express condition that he shall not violate his faith to his sovereign, the first great duty of which is not to invade his territories and war against his subjects. I was surprised to hear a gentleman from Kentucky, whose good sense and independence I much respect, (Mr. Montgomery) argue that the permission to a British subject to leave his country, was an implied consent that he might throw off all allegiance to it. Such an implication is done away by the very terms of the permission. The law is as old as Magna Charta, and has been uniform down to this day. Licet unicuique de cetero exire de regno nostro et redire salvo et secure per terram et aquam SALVA TIDE NOSTRA. 23d. Article Abbott's edition of Magna Charta. "It may be lawful for every one hereafter to go out of our kingdom and return safely and securely by land and by sea, saving his faith to us." In the reign of Elizabeth occurred the case of Dr. Story, which gentlemen will find accurately reported, 2d Dyer 298 b. 301. b.—A native of England, he had long quitted that country, had become a subject of Philip of Spain, and had actually been received as ambassador from Philip at the English court. He was indicted for treason—he pleaded the fact of his having become a Spanish subject—the plea was overruled—he was convicted and executed. The case of colonel Townly occurred in 1745. He was indicted for treason in aiding in the rebellion of 1745, was convicted and executed; notwithstanding the fact of his having become a French subject, and bearing a French commission. The case of Eneas McDonald in the same year was more remarkable. He had left Scotland, his native land, a mere infant, and ever afterwards resided in France. As a subject of the king of France, and an officer in his army, he accompanied the pretender in 1745—was taken prisoner, indicted for treason and convicted. He was, indeed, not executed. The hardship of his fate excited commiseration, and upon the recommendation of his jury to mercy his sentence was commuted into perpetual banishment. It is vain to multiply proofs. Nothing can be more certain than the English law in relation to its subjects naturalized abroad waging war against their country. The law of France is more strict and equally precise. The edict of Trianon, of 22d August, 1813, with great decision declares, "no Frenchman can be naturalized abroad without our consent," (that is of the emperor)—and that "Frenchmen naturalized abroad even with our permission, can at no time carry arms against France, under pain of being indicted in our courts and condemned to the punishment enacted in the penal code—Book 3, c. 75." During the French revolution in 1795, a corps of emigrants whom oppression and brutal violence had compelled to quit their country, formed themselves into an army in the pay and employment of Britain, and as such engaged in the ill-fated expedition to Quiberon. They were made prisoners and executed as traitors. What is our own law? In every state of the union, except Virginia, it is precisely the law which obtains in Great Britain—no man shall exempt himself from the obligation not to war against his country—and in Virginia even, he can only get rid of this obligation by observing the stipulated forms which its law prescribes. Naturalization granted in another country has no effect whatever to destroy his original primary allegiance. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Epes) informed us that under a British statute, two years voluntary service in their navy, ipso facto, naturalize a foreigner. Be it so, sir. Let us suppose that during our restrictions on commerce, an American citizen, a Virginian, for instance, who had gone through the stipulated formalities of expatriation, had entered on board the British navy, and after serving there two years, and thus becoming a naturalized subject of George the 3d, had infamously joined in the invasion of his native land. Suppose this miscreant taken prisoner heading a hostile band at the burning of Havre, or at the atrocious outrages of Hampton, and arraigned for treason in levying war against the United States—what defence could be made for him? Is there a gentleman in the house with any pretensions to legal science, who will so far hazard his reputation as to alledge that a defence could be made for him? Is there a judge in our land, from those who adorn the bench of our supreme court, down to the humblest in capacity and office, who could be even amused by the miserable sophistry, that naturalization in Britain repealed our law of treason? No sir—The traitor would be condemned—inevitably condemned; and if the president were frightened from executing the sentence by an insolent threat from Britain to put innocent Americans to death in revenge for the just doom of the convict, he would encounter the contempt and execration of his country. How is it, then, that we undertake by such menaces to deter the enemy from executing a like law, under like circumstances, against her unnatural children?

This law against the alienation of allegiance is no relic of tyranny; it is founded in the analogy of nature, and essential to the harmony of the world. There is a striking similitude between the duties of a citizen to his country, and those of a son to his father. Indeed, sir, what is the word country but a comprehensive phrase, embracing all those charities which grow out of the domestic relations of parents, children, kindred and friends? When the boy has attained manhood, and the father's care is no longer necessary to guard him from daily harms, he is at liberty to quit the parental roof, to become the inmate of another family, there form connexions essential to his happiness, and take upon himself obligations of respect and tenderness as the adopted son of other parents. But is nature's first great bond utterly severed? Can he return at the bidding of his new friends to ravage and destroy the home of his childhood, and pollute it with the life-blood of those from whom he received life? Would this be but an ordinary trespass, a common homicide, which provocation might extenuate, excuse, or even justify? An association, sir, formed by a resurrection of the wretches who have died on the gibbet, would disdain such a principle in their code. What is the jargon of modern expatriation but the same principle interpolated into the code of nations?

The peace and independence of every state, and of none more than ours, demand that the citizen should not be released from the just claims of his country by the interference of foreign powers. Give to such interference this effect, and every nation is made dependent upon the arbitrary exercise of a foreign right to control and regulate its vital concerns. The Spanish dominions to the south, and the British territories to the north, have tempted from us many of our boldest spirits. Let them go—let them there enjoy every privilege, if they can find it, which in our happy country is given to the fugitive European; every privilege which is essential to their comfort. Let them pursue in tranquility their industrious occupations—realise the profits of enterprise, and be protected from every invasion of individual right. In return for these advantages, let them, like the Europeans whom we naturalize, render a cheerful obedience to the laws, perform every social duty which is assigned to them, and contribute to the support of the government a fair proportion of their gains. But permit them not to forget the country which gave them birth and protected their infancy. Suffer them not with impunity to be converted into hostile tribes, whose numbers may be swelled from day to day by the factious, the restless, and the criminal, who have but to pass an ideal line, and the duty of obedience is converted into the right to destroy.

Unless I am greatly deceived, the law of England must be suffered to have its course with the individuals, if natives of England, and migrating to us since the revolution, who are sent thither for trial—whether they ought to be executed, if convicted, is a very different question. Considering the intimate connection which common origin, language and manners, and a long and intimate commerce has heretofore induced between the countries, and the consequent interchange of their inhabitants; remembering too that general laws are often cruel in their application to particular cases, the executive authority in that country is bound by the strongest motives to consult the dictates of humanity, and forbear the too rigorous exercise of right. But if these considerations should not there prevail, and the severe penalty of the law of treason is exacted, as of right it may be, shall we, without right, without the semblance of law, coldly murder those who are in our power, who have committed no treason against us, and against whom crime is not pretended? Is this called retaliation? Britain executes British traitors serving in the American army, regularly tried and convicted of treason, and we, in return, execute—whom? American traitors, serving in the British army, and convicted of treason? No, but faithful, loyal men, bearing arms in the cause of their native country! tried by no law! offenders against no law! Sir, the pretension is monstrous. I have met with no instance of such a pretension being ever asserted in a civilized country. Did Philip of Spain retaliate in this way for the execution of Dr. Story? Did France retaliate for the execution of colonel Townly? Did Britain thus retaliate for the execution of the French emigrants taken at Quiberon? I have heard it said that Napper Tandy, an Irishman, naturalized in France, was surrendered upon a threat of retaliation from France. I doubt the fact—the only evidence of it is in a note to an evidently partial and one-sided account of his trial in a collection of Curran's speeches. In no authentic register have I been able to find it. But if it were true, the note itself states, that the ground on which he was demanded, was not that he had been naturalized by France, and therefore not liable to be executed for treason; but because he had been unjustly seized at Hamburg, in neutral territory, and ought to be returned. Theobald Wolfe Tone, Tandy's associate, and like him, an officer of France, but not like him arrested in a violated neutral territory, was neither demanded or delivered. Condemned to death, he changed the mode of its execution by committing suicide. And shall my country, claiming to excel in humanity, as it excels in freedom, the nations of Europe, shall it be the first to avow a monstrous, unfounded pretension, and vindicate it by innocent blood? Shall it teach a lesson of barbarity to the hardened chieftains of slaughter, of which they were before ignorant? Shall it seek to protect foreigners from the vengeance of their sovereigns, at the cost of immolating its own native citizens? Shall it doom a revolutionary Winchester, or a gallant Winder, to a shameful death, because it cannot save alien traitors from their legal fate?

Think for a moment, sir, on the consequences, and deem it not unworthy of you to regard them. True courage shuts not its eyes upon danger or its result. It views them steadily, and calmly resolves whether they ought to be encountered. Already has this Canadian war a character sufficiently cruel, as Newark, Buffalo and Niagara can testify. But when the spirit of ferocity shall have been maddened by the vapor steaming from the innocent blood that shall stagnate around every depot of prisoners, then will it become a war, not of savage, but of demoniac character. Your part of it may, perhaps, be ably sustained—your way through the Canadas may be traced afar off by the smoke of their burning villages—your path may be marked by the blood of their furious peasantry—you may render your course audible by the frantic shrieks of their women and children. But your own sacred soil will also be the scene of this drama of fiends. Your exposed and defenceless sea-board, the sea-board of the south will invite a terrible vengeance. That sea-board which has been shamefully neglected; and is at this moment without protection, has been already invaded. But an invasion, after the war shall have assumed its unmitigated form of carnage, and woe, and wickedness, must be followed with horrors which imagination can but faintly conceive. I will not trust myself to tell you all I feel, all my constituents feel, upon this subject—but I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when he alludes to the probability that an intestine foe may be roused to assassination and brutality, he touches a chord that vibrates to the very heart. Yes, sir, I live in a state whose misfortune it is to contain the materials out of which may be made such a foe—A foe that will be found every where; in our fields, our kitchens and our chambers; a foe, ignorant, degraded by habits of servitude, uncurbed by moral restraints; whom no recollections of former kindness will soften, and whom the remembrance of severity will goad to phrenzy—from whom nor age, nor infancy, nor beauty, will find reverence or pity—and whose subjugation will be but another word for extermination—such a foe, sir, may be added to fill up the measure of our calamities. Let me not be misunderstood—let no gentleman misconceive my meaning. Do I state these consequences to intimidate or deter you? I think better of my countrymen. I hope and believe, in the language of Wilkinson to Prevost, the Americans will not be deterred from pursuing what is right by any dread of consequences. No, sir, I state them to rouse your attention and waken your scrutiny into the correctness of the course you are pursuing. If, on mature deliberation, you are sure that you are right, proceed, regardless of what may happen.

From orbs convuls'd should all the planets fly,

And still maintain the purpose of his soul.

But reflect well, I conjure you, before reflection is too late; let not passion or prejudice dictate the decision; if erroneous, its reversal may be decreed by a nation's miseries, and by the world's abhorrence.

Mr. Chairman—Turning from the gloomy view of the effects of the Canada war, my attention is arrested by another consequence likely to follow from it, on which I will not long detain you, but which is not less interesting nor less alarming. In proportion as gentlemen become heated in their pursuit of conquest, and are baffled in their efforts to overtake it, the object becomes more valuable in their estimation, and success is more identified with their pride. The conquest of Canada contemplated, as an easy sport, without a fixed design either to keep it to secure, or surrender it to purchase rights, has from its difficulty swelled into an importance which causes it to be valued above all rights. Patriotism was relied on to fill the ranks of the invading army; but it did not sufficiently answer the call. These ranks, however, must be filled—Avarice is next resorted to—The most enormous price is bid for soldiers, that was ever offered in any age or country. Should this fail, what is the next scheme?—There is no reserve or concealment. It has been avowed that the next scheme is a conscription. It is known that this scheme was recommended even at this session by the war department—and that it was postponed only to try first the effect of enormous bounty. The freemen of this country are to be drafted from the ranks of the militia, and forced abroad as military machines, to wage a war of conquest! Sir—I have been accustomed to consider the little share which I have in the constitution of these United States, as the most valuable patrimony I have to leave to those beings in whom I hope my name and remembrance to be perpetuated.—But I solemnly declare, that if such a doctrine be engrafted into this constitution, I shall regard it as without value, and care not for its preservation. Even in France, where man, inured to despotism, has become so passive and subservient as almost to lose the faculty of feeling oppression, and the capacity to perceive it, even there, sir, the tyranny of conscription rouses him to the assertion of his innate freedom, to struggle against slavery in its most malignant form. No, sir, not the dread of all the severe punishments* ordained for refractory conscripts, not the "peine du boulet," the "travaux publiques," nor death itself, can stupify him into seeming submission. He yields only to absolute force, and is marched to the field of glory manacled and hand-cuffed. And is such a principle to be introduced into our benign, our free institutions? Believe me, the attempt will be fatal—It cannot succeed but by military terror—It will be the signal for drawing the sword at home.—Americans are not fitted to be the slaves of a system of French conscription, the most detestable of the inventions of tyranny. Sir, I hear it whispered near me, this is not worse than the impressment of seamen. It is worse, infinitely worse. Impressment forces seamen to serve in the public ships of their country, instead of pursuing their occupation in the merchant service. It changes their employment to one more rigorous, of longer continuance, of greater danger. But it is yet employment of the same kind—It is yet employment for which they are fitted by usage and education. But conscription is indiscriminate in the victims of its tyranny. The age, not the pursuit of the conscript, is, the sole criterion of his fitness. Whatever be his habits, whatever his immediate views, whatever his designed occupation in life, a stern mandate tears him from the roof of his father, from the desk, the office, the plough, or the workshop, and he is carried far from home to fight in foreign climes the battles of ambition. But, sir, if conscription were not worse than impressment I should not lose my objection to it—I am not prepared to assent to the introduction of either conscription or impressment into my country. For all the British territories in the western world, I would not. Fight for sailors' rights—yet rivet on our citizens a French conscription? Fight for rights on the ocean, and annihilate the most precious of all rights at home—the right of a freeman never to be forced out of his own country! How alarming is the infatuation of that zeal, which, in its ardor for attaining its object, tramples in the dust objections of infinitely higher price!

* The system of conscription is upheld in France, by the most rigorous punishments upon all who are instrumental in evading its operation. The most ruinous fines are imposed upon the parents of refractory conscripts, and where they are necessary to his escape the severest corporal punishment, such as branding with hot iron, public exposure and imprisonment. The "peine du boulet," is an iron ball of eight pounds weight, fastened to the leg by an iron chain seven feet long. It is accompanied with hard labor ten hours daily, and in the intervals of rest, solitary confinement. It lasts ten years, and the poor wretch wears a disgraceful dress, the emblem of his ignominy—the "travaux publics" are employment in such public works as the government may direct.

What is the probability of success in this scheme of conquest, is a topic on which I mean not to enlarge. It is not necessary that I should, for others have ably discussed it. That you may take upper Canada, that you may overrun the lower province I believe; but that you will take Quebec, while the mouth of the St. Lawrence is commanded by a hostile fleet, I cannot believe; if an opposite thought sometimes gets possession of my imagination, I find it springing from that impulse of the heart which makes me fancy victory perched on the standard of my country, and not the result of an exertion of the understanding.—But, sir, if you should conquer the Canadas, subdue Nova Scotia and possess yourself of all the British territories in America—If, after impoverishing your country by ruinous loans and grinding down your people by oppressive taxes, you should wade at last through the horrors of invasion, massacre of prisoners, a servile war, and a military conscription to the now darling object of your wishes—I pray you, sir, what is then to be done? What do you design to do with the conquered territory?—We will keep it, say the gentlemen from Vermont and Pennsylvania (Mr Bradley and Mr. Ingersoll.) We will keep it, because it is an object with our people; because it will keep off Indian wars, and retribute us for the wrongs we have sustained. I believe, indeed, that, if conquered, there will be a powerful party to the north and west that will not consent to part with it with whom it is an object. But how shall it be kept? As a conquered province? To retain it as such against the efforts of an exasperated, though conquered people within, and the exertions of a powerful, proud and irritated enemy without, that enemy master of the sea, always able to invade and to succour the invaders, will require a military strength and a pecuniary expenditure not less continued or less in amount than were demanded to take it. Such a conquest is never finished—when nominally effected, it is to be begun. But we will incorporate it into the union—Aye, this would be indeed a pleasant result. Let my southern friends—let gentlemen who represent slave holding states attend to this. How would this project take at home? What would their constituents give to have half a dozen new states made out of the Canadas? It is, besides, so notable an expedient for strengthening the nation, and so perfectly in accordance with the principles of our form of government. We are to force men into an association the very life of which is freedom, and the breath of that life unrestrained choice! And to give vigor to the nation, we are to admit into its councils, and into a free participation of its power, men whose dislike of its government has been strengthened into abhorrence by the exasperations of war, and all whose affections are fixed upon its enemy! But at all events you are to keep the Canadas. What, then, will you do about sailors' rights? You will not be a jot nearer to them than you are now—How will you procure them or seek to procure them? Will you then begin in good earnest to protect or obtain them by naval means?—Would it not be advisable to attend to this declared object of the war now rather than wait until after the Canadian scheme is effected? Perhaps you mean to keep Canada and abandon sailors' rights. If so why not avow to the people that it is conquest you fight for and not right? But perhaps, it is designed when the conquest is effected to give it back to Britain as an equivalent for the cessation, on her part of some maritime right—for the privilege that our ships shall not be searched for British sailors. On this question you may make an arrangement practically securing all we ought now to contend for. You will, I hope, make it in the pending negotiation. But that by a surrender of Canada after it is conquered you may purchase from her a disavowal or relinquishment of the right, no man can believe who understands either the views or the prejudices of that people. They believe the right essential to their naval existence, to deter their seamen from general desertion. All classes in that country so regard it—we know there is not a difference of opinion among any description of politicians to the kingdom upon this subject. If they have any jealousy of you, (and I believe some of them have) it is not a jealousy of your territorial extent—but of your fitness to become their commercial and naval rival. Can it be believed then that they would compromise in a surrender of a claim, which surrendered in their judgment, weakens them and invigorates you where alone they are apprehensive of a competition, for the sake of preventing an accession to your territory which extends your limits, while it takes away from your strength? Indulge no such delusion. Were Canada a thousand times more important to Britain than it is, & were yet of less value than her naval power. For the sake of it she would never yield a principle on which that naval power depends. No, sir, the return of conquered Canada, even with the hoped for agency in our favor of the Russian emperor, would not weigh a feather in the scale against what she deems her first great national interest. As it regards too these fancied exertions of Russia in our favor, gentlemen surely deceive themselves. However attached Russia may be to the most liberal principles of commercial intercourse, she never will array herself against the right of the sovereign to compel the services of his sea-faring subjects. On this head her policy is not less rigorous (to say the least) than that of England. I will not be more particular. A short time will probably shew the grounds of my belief.

But, sir, among the reasons for prosecuting the invasion of Canada one has been gravely stated of a very peculiar kind. Canada, says a gentleman from South-Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun) should be invaded to protect our frontiers and sea-board from invasion—it is the most economical and effectual method of defence. Although this consideration presents nothing very splendid to our view, yet it would be worth all other reasons for the invasion if it were founded on fact. But ask the people on your frontier and on your board, and what will they say? They will tell you it is the invasion of Canada alone which endangers them. The most effectual defence to them would be an abandonment of your scheme, or an invasion of the U. States, but for the purpose of diverting your forces from Canada or retorting on you the distresses of war, cannot enter into the scheme of British or Canadian policy. It is not to be prosecuted, but at vast inconvenience and expense, with great loss of useful soldiers, under a certainty of ultimate failure, and without hope of glory or gain. The Canadian yeomanry freed from the terror of invasion, will cheerfully resume their peaceful occupations—and such of the British regulars as are not required for ordinary garrison duty, instead of being employed in a miserable, predatory, yet destructive border warfare, will be sent to mingle in the European strife, where renown and empire are the mighty stake. Surely this is emphatically the age and the government of paradox. A war for "free trade," is waged by embargo and prohibition of all commercial intercourse—sailors' rights are secured by imprisoning them at home, and not permitting them to move from place to place within their prison but by a license from a collector like a negro's pass, and obtained on the security of a bondsman—and our frontiers and sea-board are to be defended by an invasion of Canada, which can alone endanger an attack!

But the real efficient argument for perseverance in the scheme of Canadian conquest has been given by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy). He made the war on Britain, says the gentleman, and shall we restrict our lives to defensive measures? For what purpose was war declared if we do nothing against the possessions of the enemy? Yes, sir, it is the consideration that this war was originally offensive on our side, that creates the I fear, insuperable obstacle to our discontinuance of it. It were vain to lament that gentlemen are under the influence of feelings that belong to human nature. It would be idleness to declaim against the selfishness or folly of false pride. All must admit that it is one of the greatest efforts of magnanimity to retract a course publicly taken, and on the correctness of which reputation is staked. If honorable gentlemen could but perceive that this difficulty is one of pride only, and of pride opposing their country's best interests, I know that they could, and believe many of them would, make the retreat—Painful as may be the acknowledgement of political error, yet, if they clearly saw that either this humiliation must be endured, or the nation ruined, they could not hesitate in their choice between such alternatives. But, sir, I wish not to present such alternatives to their factions—So difficult is it to produce a conviction against which the pride of the heart rebels, that I will not attempt it. Gentlemen are not called on to retract. They may now suspend the execution of the scheme of invasion without a acknowledgement of its error. They may now, without humiliation restrict themselves to defence, although the war was in its original offensive. A second favorable opportunity is presented of restoring tranquility to our once happy Country—The first, the revocation of the orders in council, was suffered to pass unimproved. Let not this be lost—a third may not shortly occur. Your enemy has invited a direct negotiation for the restoration of peace, and your executive has accepted the offer, and ministers have been appointed to meet the commissioners of the opposite party. This circumstance ought to produce an entire and essential change in your policy. If the executive be sincere in the acceptance of this proposition he must have acted on the hope that an amicable adjustment of difficulties might be made. And while there is such a hope, such a prospect, on what principle can you justify invasion and conquest? Force is the substitute, not the legitimate conductor of negotiation—Factions fight because they cannot treat. Every benevolent feeling and correct principle are opposed to an effusion of blood, an extension of misery, which are hoped to be unnecessary. "Its necessity alone which furnishes their excuse"—do not then, at the moment when you avow a belief, a hope at least, that such necessity exists not, pursue a conduct which, but for its existence, is inhuman and detestable.

Besides, sir, if you are earnest in the wish to obtain peace from the Gottenburg mission, suspend in the mean time offensive operations, which cannot facilitate, and may prevent the accomplishment of your object. Think you that Britain is to be intimidated by your menaced invasion of her territories? If she had not learned by experience, how harmless are your threats, she would nevertheless see but little cause for fear. She knows that the conquest cannot be completed in one, nor in two campaigns. And when she finds that every soldier whom you collect is to cost you, in bounty alone upwards of 100 guineas, she will perceive that the war is more destructive to your finances, the great source of military strength, than to her territories. The blow aimed at her recoils upon yourselves. But the exasperations which must result from the wrongs mutually inflicted in the course of the campaign, may have yet a very injurious effect upon the disposition to pursue pacific efforts. They will be apt to create a temper on each side, unfavorable to an amicable arrangement. In truth too, sir, you are not prepared for such a campaign, as in honor and humanity you can alone permit yourselves to carry on. Suppose by the month of May or June you raise your men—What are they? Soldiers, fitted to take care of themselves in camp, and support the reputation of your armies in the field? No—they are a mere rabble of war recruits—draw them to Canada, and pestilence will sweep them off by regiments and brigades—while the want of discipline will mult those, whom pestilence spares, for an honorable contest with an experienced foe—instead therefore of the hurry and bustle of filling your ranks with recruits and rushing with them into Canada, attend rather to the training and improvement of those now in service. Make soldiers of them; by gradual enlistments you may regularly add to their number, and insensibly incorporate the new levies with the disciplined troops. If it should hereafter become necessary to march into the field, you will then have an army under your command, not a multitude without subordination. Suspend, therefore, hostilities while you negotiate. Make an armistice until the result of the negotiation is ascertained. You can lose nothing; you can gain every thing by such a course; then negotiate fairly, with a view to obtain for our native seamen a practicable and reasonable security against impressment, and with a disposition to aid Britain in commanding the services of her own. Such an arrangement might have been made on the revocation of the orders in council, could you have been then satisfied with any thing short of an abandonment of the British claim to search. I doubt not but that it may now be made; reiterate you probably cannot obtain. The time may come when, with greater effect, you can press, if necessary, higher claims. All is hazarded by precipitately urging more than your relative strength enables you to enforce. Permit your country to grow; let no just right be abandoned; if any be postponed, it may be advanced at a more opportune season, with better prospect of success. If you will quit this crusade against Canada, and seek peace in the spirit of accommodation; and permit me to add if you will forego your empire schemes of embargo and commercial restrictions, you will restore harmony at home, and allay that wide spread, and in some places alarming spirit of discontent that prevails in our land. And if your pacific efforts fail, if an obstinate and implacable foe will not agree to such a peace as the country can with credit accept, then appeal to the candor and spirit of your people for a constitutional support, with a full assurance, that such an appeal under such circumstances cannot be made in vain.

It is time, Mr. chairman, that I should release you from the fatigue of hearing me. There is but one more topic to which I solicit your attention. Many admonitions have been addressed to the minority, by gentlemen on the ministerial side of this house, not without merit, and I hope not without edification, on the evils of violent opposition and intemperate party spirit. It is not to be denied that opposition may exceed all reasonable bounds and a minority become factions. But when I hear it seriously urged, that the nature of our government forbids that firm, manly, active opposition, which in countries less free is salutary and necessary; and when I perceive all the dangers of faction apprehended only on the side of a minority; I witness but new instances of that wonderful ductility of the human mind, which, in its zeal to effect a favorite purpose, begins with the work of self-deception. Why, sir, will not our form of government tolerate or require the same ardor of constitutional opposition, which is desirable in one where in the chief magistracy is hereditary? "Because," says the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) "in a monarchy, the of the executive and his ministers requires a criminal neglect, lest it obtain too great a preponderance—but here the executive springs from the people, and do nothing without their support, and cannot therefore overrule and control the public sentiment. See, let us not stop at the surface of things. The influence of the executive in this country, while he retains his popularity, is infinitely greater than that of a limited monarch. It is as much stronger as the space of government is more violent than the necessary tension of a muscle. The war-like feeling excited during the election of an election, and the natural zeal to uphold him whom they have chosen, create between the executive and his adherents a connection of passion—while the distribution of office and patronage adds a connection of interest—which combined, produce an union almost indissoluble. "Support the administration" becomes a watch-word, which passes from each individual of the dominant party to his adherents, and thence to their followers in the ranks. All the great men's opinion becomes the criterion of the majority, and his means to obtain a dominion over the public sentiment, which facilitates the most dangerous encroachments, and demands the most jealous supervision. In proportion as a government is free, the spirit of bold inquiry—and animated interest in its measures—and of firm opposition where they are not approved—becomes essential to its purity and continuance. And he, who, in a democracy, or republic attempts to control the will of the popular idol of the day, may envy the luxurious ease with which ministerial oppositions are opposed and thwarted in governments which are less free. Intemperance of party, wherever found, never will meet with an advocate in me. It is a most cautious severance to our country—the bane of social enjoyment, of individual justice, and of public virtue—unfriendly to the best pursuits of man, his interest and his duty—it renders useless or ineffectual the highest employments of intellect, and the noblest dispositions of the soul. But, sir, whatever may be the evils necessarily inherent in its nature, its ravages are then most enormous and desolating when it is seated on the throne of power and vested with all the attributes of rule. I mean not to follow the gentleman from South Carolina, over the classic ground of Greece, Carthage, and Rome, to refute his theory, and show that not to submit to opposition, but to the abuse of factions and intolerant power their dominion to be attributed.—Nor will I examine some more and in instances of republics whose destruction has the same origin.—The thing is no longer matter of discussion—it has passed into a settled truth in the science of political philosophy. One who on a question of historical deduction, of political theory, is entitled to high respect, has given us an admirable summary of the experience of republics on this interesting subject. In the 16th of No. of the Federalist written by Mr. Madison, we find the following apt and judicious observations—"By a faction I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community."

"The bounty to each soldier is one hundred and twenty-four dollars each, and one hundred and sixty acres of land, which at two dollars per acre, is three hundred and twenty dollars—in all, four hundred and forty-four dollars, besides the eight dollars per man to the recruiting agent.

The inference to which we are brought is, that the cause of faction can not be removed, and that relief is only to be sought in the means of controlling its effects. If a faction consists of less than a majority, relief is supplied by the republican principle, which enables the majority to defeat its sinister views by regular vote. It may elude the administration, it may convulse the society; but it will be unable to execute and mask its violence under the forms of the constitution. When a majority is included in a faction the form of popular government on the other hand enables it to sacrifice to its ruling passion or interest, both the public good, and the rights of other citizens. To secure the public good and private rights against the dangers of such a faction, and at the same time to preserve the spirit and the form of popular government, is then the great object to which our enquiries are directed. Let me add that it is the great desideratum by which alone this form of government can be rescued from the opprobrium under which it has so long laboured, and be recommended to the esteem and adoption of mankind."

If this doctrine were then to be collected from the history of the world, can it now be doubted since the experience of the last twenty-five years? Go to France, once revolutionary, now imperial France—and ask her whether factions power—or, intemperate opposition, be the more fatal to freedom and happiness? Perhaps at some moment when the eagle eye of her master is turned away, she may whisper to you, to behold the demolition of Lyons, or the devastation of La Vendee. Perhaps she will give you a written answer. Draw near to the once fatal lamp-post, and by its flickering light, read its traced in characters of blood, that flowed from the guillotine, "Faction is a demon! Faction out of power is a demon enchained—Faction, vested with the attributes of rule, is a monster of destruction!"

Sir—If the denunciations which gentlemen have pronounced against factions violence, are not merely the image of rhetorical pomp—if they are, indeed, solicitous to mitigate the ravages of party feuds—in the sincerity of my soul I wish them success. It is not worthy to behold the miserable jealousies and malignant suspicions which so extensively prevail, to the destruction of social comfort, and the eminent peril of the republic. On this subject I have felt too much—not merely in the intervals stolen from the bustle of business—or the moments of amusement; but in the moments of "depression and solitude," the most favorable to the correction of error. For one I am willing to bring a portion of party feeling and party prejudice, as an oblation at the shrine of my country. But no offering can avail any thing if not made on the part of those who are the political favorites of the day. On them it is incumbent to come forward and set the magnanimous example—Approaches or concessions on the side of the minority would be misconstrued into indications of timidity or of a hankering for favor. But a spirit conciliatory arising from those ranks would be hailed as the harbinger of our day's redemption.

to liberality, and of a generous contention for the public good. This spirit requires not any departure from deliberate opinion, unless it is shown to be erroneous—such a concession would be a dereliction of duty. Its injunctions would be but few, and it is to be hoped not difficult of observance—seek to uphold your measures by the force of argument, not of denunciations—signify not opposition to your notions with offensive epithets—these prove nothing but your anger or your weakness, and are sure to generate a spirit of "moral resistance" not easily to be checked or curbed. Give to your political views constitutional respect, but suffer them not to supersede the exercise of independent inquiry—encourage instead of suppressing fair discussion, so that those who approve not may at least have a respectful hearing—thus, without deprecating a particle from the energy of your measures, you would impart a tone to political discussions which would deprive them of their acrimony, and render them harmless to the nation.

The national party distinctions, now become more egotistic errors. It is no longer a question whether according to the theory of our constitution, there is more danger of the federal encroachment on the state governments, or the democracy of the state governments into the sphere of federal power—federalism and democracy have lost their meaning. It is now a question of commerce, peace, and union of the states. On this question, unless the honesty and intelligence of the nation shall confer rate into one great American party, dishonoring petty office-keeping and office-hunting views, defying alike the insolence of the popular prints, the prejudice of faction, and the dominion of executive influence—I fear a decision will be pronounced fatal to the hopes, to the existence of the nation. In this question I assuredly have a very deep interest—but it is the interest of a citizen only—My public career I hope will not continue long—Should it please the Disposer of events to permit me to see the great interest of this nation confided to men who will secure its rights by firmness, moderation and impartiality abroad, and at home cultivate the arts of peace, encourage honest industry in all its branches, dispense equal justice to all classes of the community, and thus administer the government in the true spirit of the constitution, as a trust for the people, not as the property of a party, it will be to me utterly unimportant by what political epithet they may be characterized—As a private citizen, grateful for the blessings I may enjoy, and yielding a prompt obedience to every legitimate demand that can be made upon me, I shall rejoice, as far as my little sphere may extend, to foster the same dispositions among those who surround me.

Mr. Cheves' Speech.

ON THE SAME.

Mr. Chairman, I shall follow the example which other gentlemen have established—I shall not confine myself to the question which is immediately presented by the bill, but look briefly into the prominent subjects which the discussion has presented. I shall say very little of the loan, or the general finance of the government. On the subject of our finances I have for the last two years occupied much of the attention of the house, and am very well disposed to leave the subject to the better abilities of the gentlemen to whom the house has particularly confided the management of that part of its business. It is, indeed, true, that the system of finance on which the government is acting, is different from that which I deemed proper, and which I made some endeavors to accomplish; which I supposed it would have been expedient to have adopted in a state of war to put beyond peril the public credit, and to supply with abundance the ways and means to prosecute the war with vigor and effect: But I have no disposition on this or any other occasion to speak my private griefs; and I will only add, that I wish the measure all possible success; that I know the resources of the country are great; that I believe the ultimate security of the creditor to be unquestionable, and that the enormous interest given by government (for such I consider the terms of the last loans to be) ought to attract every cent of disengaged capital in the country—because in no other way can the holder invest his money which will give him so little trouble, so great security and so much profit.

I shall not neither examine the causes in which the war originated; because on this subject, when last I had the honor of addressing the house upon it, in the close of the 12th congress. I spoke at great length, and, as I believe, I could add very little to what I then said, and cannot consent to repeat what I have said before: I shall barely advert to the causes of the war, for the purpose of examining that cause on which principally its continuance is, in my opinion, justifiable and necessary.

On the declaration and continuance of the war, I have the pleasure to concur heartily with my friends—and it gives me no small pleasure to do so; for although I have sometimes had the pain to believe that they were not disposed to allow me equally to rejoice with them in the honors and triumphs of the war, I do not therefore indulge a diminished willingness to bear a full share of the responsibility which attaches to those who declared and who have continued it to the present day. If for this cause they fall, I wish no exemption from a common fate. It is true, as an honorable gentleman from New-York (Mr. Grosvenor) sometime ago remarked on another subject, I have been decidedly opposed to the government and the majority in their commercial policy. I have been opposed to what is usually called the restrictive system; but I think the gentleman did not correctly characterize my conduct when he said that I trampled on these laws. [Mr. G. said he did not mean to charge the gentleman from South Carolina with treating with any disrespect the laws of his country—but to say, that he had been actively and zealously opposed to their policy.] I know perfectly well, said Mr. C. the honorable gentleman had no wish to misrepresent my conduct; I have had frequent manifestations of his good dispositions towards me, which forbid me to suppose he intended to place my conduct in a point of view the least censurable or equivocal. But it may be necessary, and I take the occasion, to explain my conduct to the world. I shall always venerate the laws of my country, were it merely because they are the laws of my country, however zealously I may have contested their policy or may earnestly deprecate their effects. I have no wish to conceal my opposition to the restrictive system; and if I could at any time have believed that greater activity on my part would have been useful, it should have been cheerfully yielded. I particularly rejoice, sir, at the resistance I made to one measure connected with this system, which was supported by a majority of my friends, I mean that which related to the fair and unfortunate traders who were supposed to have incurred the penalties of this system by the importation of their property from the enemy's country; and, if I could believe, as those who have been disposed to revile me have said, that my conduct had a decided influence on the ultimate issue of that measure, I should think my fate infinitely more fortunate than the general lot of men so humble as I am. I should know that I had lived for a great and important purpose; and rejoicing in the justice and usefulness of it, I should be careless of the odium which might have attached to the act. I thank God I have never found any difficulty in deciding between a just and a popular course. I have always been able to surrender the high blandishments of popularity (though on this subject I affect no peculiar insensibility) without a pang, and to embrace with cheerfulness the homely comforts of conscience and of duty.

The principal causes in which I believe the war originated, were the operation of the British orders in council on our commerce and the impressment of our seamen. These were distinguishable from the other causes of dispute between the two countries by this striking circumstance, that they were always present, active and progressive. If our causes of complaint had been confined to past injuries and insults—If we had only had to suffer the loss of the many millions of money of which G. Britain had robbed our citizens by her depredations on our lawful commerce, we might and probably would have continued to remonstrate and negotiate and still have avoided war, to which our government had an aversion so strong as to wear the semblance of pusillanimity—But it was the daily continuance of the injuries, the incessant infliction and the absence of all hope that these injuries were to end, that drove the nation necessarily and unavoidably to resistance; unable to carry the productions of our own soil on the high way of nations—the great ocean, of which, like the light and air, it was intended by nature none should have dominion, to ports not blockaded, without exposing them to almost inevitable capture, and this often in the mouths of our own harbors, was a situation which affected vitally not merely the interests but the independence of the nation. To have endured it would have sunk us to a rank so degraded among nations, as could not have failed to draw upon us the everlasting contempt of the world. I have, however, no hesitation in admitting, for I shall speak with the utmost candor on the subject, that, had I known of the revocation of the orders in council at the moment of the declaration of war, I would not have voted for it—I speak only for myself, though I believe I am not singular in this view of the subject—I am even willing to admit, though on this point I know I differ from some of my friends, that the revocation of which we were afterwards informed, as it was explained by the ministry in parliament, would have been to me satisfactory. But whatever the effect of this revocation might have been in preventing war, had a knowledge of it in this country preceded war, yet the subject presents a very different aspect after war has been declared. It is impossible not to see and to feel that, were we to make peace without any security against that abuse of our rights which formed the other great cause of war, it would be an obvious and unequivocal submission to the claim of right which the enemy sets up and to the injurious and abusive exercise of this claim which we have so long suffered. This idea is strongly presented by the reflections with which I commenced in speaking of the nature of the principal causes of the war; namely, that it is not an injury, no matter how great in extent, which has ceased to be active and which has therefore lost in a great degree its offensive character, but one which is daily and hourly repeated, intermitted only by the existence of actual war, under circumstances too intolerable to be borne by a nation not dead to all the feelings of honor and of shame. Exemplify the result of a peace without any arrangement on this subject—If it would not leave the government the ordinary means of remonstrance, it would leave nothing but a disgraceful submission to the insulting injury. Now I aver that the ordinary means of remonstrance would not be left to the government. These means enable it to state not only the injustice of the cause of complaint, but that, if persisted in, it will lead to national resistance—to war. But were we to conclude a peace with Great Britain without any arrangement on this subject, should we be able to say to her afterwards, desist or war will be the consequence! No, she will reply—it is not cause for war, for you have yourselves when it continued a subsisting injury when our pretensions were unabated and our practice unrestrained, except by the existence of war, actually abandoned a war in which you were engaged with us for this very injury. It would therefore be absurd to suppose, that you would make war for a cause which did not forbid you to make peace. On this principle I justify the conduct of government in rejecting the armistice proposed by admiral Warren. That proposition denied even a temporary suspension of the abuse, and therefore left us no hope of a permanent security against it, the expectation of which alone could have recommended either an armistice or negotiation. On this subject let me say, that it is not contended by this government that Great Britain shall renounce the claim of right, as the only condition on which it will put an end to the war. When I say this, I deem it necessary to declare, that although I speak with great confidence, I do not found my opinion on any knowledge of the counsels of the executive branch of the government. On these I have no knowledge, but I speak from its public acts, from the public declarations of those who have its confidence, and from the evidence of circumstances which surround us. From all these I have no difficulty in saying, that all this government demands is a reasonable and practicable security against the abuse of the practice; and I venture to say, that were the minority in power to-morrow, they would not conclude a peace on terms less favorable—they will not, as the minority of this body, declare that peace ought to be made without this security. They will not venture to meet the people of the United States with such a declaration. If they do, the majority need not fear the consequences.

I pass from the causes, to the conduct of the war. The past conduct of the war. This I think cannot be defended, and as I have not been an indiscriminate supporter of the measures and policy of the government, so I will not be an indiscriminate apologist of the conduct of the war. But although it cannot be entirely defended it may admit of some excuse. When it is recollected that this nation was roused by the declaration of war from the slumbers of thirty years of tranquility and peace—that it was without officers of experience, without military science or military establishments—when we recollect the comfortable mediocrity of fortune which our citizens enjoy, which gives them heroes and families from which they reluctantly part—when we recollect the high spirit of liberty which is breathed by every man in our free and happy country, where the poorest man sees in the most exalted only his political equal, which, however great the political beast, is yet a circumstance the most incongruous with the spirit of subordination and the habits of discipline and obedience, which are necessary to form soldiers—when with such means and of such materials our army was to be formed, we ought to have been prepared for many of the disasters and disappointments we have suffered. But just in proportion as we should have expected disastrous results we confidently relied upon success, and the public mind was consequently prepared to magnify our misfortunes and to look at the future with despondency. From this cause we have been able to see but one side of the picture. Could we penetrate the councils of the enemy and enter into his sensibilities we might discover that our misfortunes have been magnified and our successes diminished by the optics which have heretofore presented them to our view. Let us compare our own situation with that of the enemy. Let us enter into his sensibilities and disappointments and compare them with our own. There are but two signal instances of disaster of which we complain. The first in the surrender of Detroit, and the second in the failure of the expedition against Montreal.—These are our principal misfortunes. On the other hand, we can boast the destruction of Proctor's army and the successful attack and capture of York. Let us take the enemy's view of these events. Neither of the officers of the enemy who commanded on these occasions has been since employed. Proctor has suffered the severest censure, in the general orders of the commander in chief, that language can express, and Sheaffe it is understood, has been sent to England, perhaps for trial for his misconduct. The enemy then, supposes our successes on these occasions, however we may regard them, as heavy misfortunes to his arms. The victory of Harrison was such as would have secured to a Roman general, in the best days of the republic, the honors of a triumph! He put an end to the war in the uppermost Canada! The attack on York was highly spirited, and the success was brilliant and complete—and this, too, under the disadvantage of having lost the commanding officer, the gallant Pike, at the moment when the harvest of victory was to be reaped. The war on the land has not, then, been so disastrous or so dishonorable as we have sometimes supposed.

But on what principle, in estimating the character and effects of this war, are gentlemen authorized to separate the operations on land from those on the ocean and the lakes. I claim not exclusively for my own political friends the honors of our naval triumphs—I was among the first to accuse them of their neglect of this service, and to urge them to cherish and support the naval establishment. But I cannot either allow to the gentlemen in the opposition the claim which they affect of being the exclusive friends of the navy—They have discarded the man (the late president Adams) who was its greatest patron, and rejected from the times which they love to call their own; the period in which it received its greatest and its happiest impetus. But let its patrons and its friends be whom they may, I have a right to claim its merits for the country; and when we connect our naval deeds with the other events of the war, who will venture to say this has been an inglorious war. An inglorious war! Insult not the gallant men who have fought and bled in your battles and yet live with high claims to your applause. Tread not so rudely on the ashes of the heroic dead. Could the soul of Lawrence speak from the cerements which confine his moldering body, in what appalling language would he rebuke the man who should assert that the contest in which he so nobly conquered and so nobly died, was an inglorious war! Will you tell that worthy man* who fills with so much fidelity and usefulness a station in your service on this floor, that this is an inglorious war. He has beheld one son† triumph over his country's foe and live to hear and to receive the applause and gratitude of his country.—He has seen another* fall in the arms of victory, heroically aiding in an achievement, which if it be not unparalleled is certainly not exceeded in the annals of history. Happy father! yet I would call him miserable and hopeless man were this an inglorious war.—But I must call him a most happy father, for God and nature have implanted in our bosoms a principle which elevates us above the love of life and friends and makes us think their loss, a blessing when they are yielded up in the cause of a beloved country, on the altar and in the spirit of patriotism. It is this principle which makes that excellent father reflect not merely with composure but with pleasure on the child of his love giving up his life in battle—his blood mingling with the wave and his body entombed in the bosom of Erie. Yes, he would rather feel the consciousness that his gallant boy fought with Perry and died in the glorious battle of the 10th of September, than now embrace him in his arms, again animated with the strong pulse of life—again pouring in to the parental bosom his filial duty and lighting up a father's pride and joy.

We are naturally led to speak next of the future conduct of the war. It is said that the negotiations which are pending should make us relax in the prosecution of the war and confine our operations to the single object of our own defence. It would be sufficient to oppose this advice by the practice of every country and every age, by one of the best known maxims of national policy—that your preparations should be greatest at the moment that you most anxiously desire and most earnestly seek peace; and by one of the most frequent results of national experience that exactly in proportion to your ability to do your enemy injury do you negotiate to advantage. Let us suppose the negotiation to fail and that in the meantime we neglect the establishment of an efficient army, what disgrace and what calamity might not be the result? We are told that our past misfortunes should admonish us of our inability to wage the war upon the land and we are particularly advised not to attempt the invasion and conquest of Canada. Our misfortunes, it is admitted, should lead us to the practice of caution, but should not deter us from the exercise of our faculties—they should rather animate us, as we may hope to remove their causes, to more vigorous efforts. I should consider the prevalence of the opinion that the nation was unable to wage this war as one of the heaviest calamities it could suffer—as the very greatest calamity it could be doomed to suffer. But I am sure there is no foundation for the opinion if the power and resources of the nation be properly called forth and employed. The invasion of Canada is supposed ed by gentlemen in the opposition to be the most exceptionable way in which the war can be waged. It is said Great Britain will not surrender Canada and that it is therefore useless to take it, as the war will be rendered interminable should we attempt to retain it.—But as it is seen that the retention of Canada is not a necessary consequence of its conquest or the only way of making it useful in the attainment of the end of war—a removal of the principal causes of war—it is found necessary to give another basis to the argument and it is said that Canada is of so little consequence to Great Britain, that she will sacrifice it rather than give up any important commercial right or privilege. I shall not stop to notice what appears to be an inconsistency in these arguments—But say, it is denied that this government claims of the enemy the surrender of any important right or privilege. It claims not even a surrender of the pretended right of searching our ships for her seamen. We only ask an arrangement which shall prevent an abuse of the practice, as the eloquent gentleman from Georgia (Mr Forsythe) has demonstrated from the correspondence with admiral Warren. We demanded only a security against the abuse of her power which shall exempt our own seamen, our own citizens from the intolerable outrage of impressment, and this I say Great Britain will grant us rather than surrender Canada, or continue the war unless we suffer it to languish.

I agree with gentlemen who say that Great Britain will not surrender Canada. Its value for its trade and supplies is not the favorite view in which that possession is considered by the British nation. It is connected with the most brilliant era of their history—that of the wars of Chatham. They would part with twenty sugar islands rather than give up the barren rock of Cape Diamond. They consider it as one of the most brilliant ornaments of the British crown. It is inseparable from events which emblazon the pages of their history—which animate the eloquence of their orators—which give confidence to their statesmen, and inspire with valor their soldiers and with patriotism their people. The peasant who has not learnt his alphabet, can read in that possession his country's glory, and in a rapid and intuitive glance see the price and power of France and Spain humbled by the British arms. In imagination he stands upon the cliffs of Quebec, and, looking down from the fearful height on the flood beneath, admires the daring valor which ventured to assail its lofty battlements. In imagination he treads the plains of Abraham and talks (as he had heard his fathers talk) of Wolfe and of Montcalm, and how they beat the French, and how the manly, mighty counsels of Chatham elevated the character of his country and spread her glory through the world. Now, sir, it appears to me, that this state of things presents the happiest means of carrying on the war with a reasonable hope of attaining its just object—an honorable peace. We have at our doors, within the reach of our most effectual blows, a possession highly vulnerable, which our enemy greatly prizes and will most reluctantly suffer to be wrested from him. Consider these circumstances and connect them with the many other inducements which Great Britain has to make peace with us, and it would seem, if we are true to ourselves, if we exhibit an honorable spirit and make a manly effort, we will effect an honorable peace at no distant day.

Sir, Great Britain needs and ought to desire a peace with this country. What inducement has she to continue the war? All we demand she can grant without affecting her interests, her honor, or her pride. We only want a security against the abuse of her power. By the continuance of the war she cannot add to her power, or her glory, or her gains.—How can she add to her power? No one imagines, if she could conquer, that she could retain a foot on our territory. Her glory? On this point she has every thing to lose and nothing to gain. Could she capture every vessel of war we have, when the superior force with which she would do it, is considered, it could add nothing to her national renown. It is a war which can yield her no laurels. Nor can it yield her any pecuniary advantage—This is to be sought with us in the paths of peace. What on the other hand are her inducements to put an end to the war? The expense of the war is alone sufficient. It is a war on her part whose effects can bear no proportion to its expense. It is in its nature vastly expensive and burthensome to her—Recollect the vast expense she incurred in our revolutionary struggle which heaped up so immensely her national debt, and we will be able to form some opinion of the probable magnitude of her expenditures in this war—It will be a moderate estimate to say that it costs her double the sum we expend, and that will make this war, in which she cannot boast a trophy or risque a hope, cost her fifteen millions of pounds sterling per annum. More, probably, than the war she has lately carried on, with so much glory, in Spain and Portugal. More, certainly, than she expends to animate and sustain all the allied powers of the continent in the great contest in which they are engaged. But what renders this expense more burthensome and embarrassing is, this is a war in which the expenditure is made abroad. Were three times the sum expended in the kingdom it would less distress the nation. It would then only change hands—it now passes entirely away. At the same time, too, that she makes this great and useless expenditure, she is obliged to support the war from Spain and Portugal and to subsidize the northern allies. These expenditures also are made abroad and all these together must produce inconceivable embarrassments in their trade and finance. I have no allusion whatever to the old and the wild notion that Great Britain cannot support her credit and that she must sink under the immense burthens of her debt and her expenditures. I acknowledge the vastness of her ability and that, were it necessary to preserve great and important rights, she could make yet greater expenditures.—But the exertion would not be natural; it would be distressing and would not prove that her best and most urgent policy is not to lessen rather than increase her expenditures.—Let it not be supposed, that from the successes of her own arms and the arms of the allies, she is relieved from the pecuniary demands she has hitherto borne—on the contrary, her allies are exhausted in their finance and look to her alone for pecuniary support, while the moment of fruition, that of the consummation of hope long indulged, presented in near prospect, urges them to every exertion they can possibly make to secure the object for which they have so long sighed and for the attainment of which they have expended so much blood and treasure. It is a moment when they must grant every thing—it is a moment in which they may be called upon to make yet greater exertions and greater expenditures than any they have hitherto made—it is a moment in which the most obvious policy would direct Great Britain to meet us amicably and treat us justly; and nothing more is necessary to put an end to this war.

There is another very powerful reason why Great Britain should desire peace with us—this is founded in the advantages of our trade. I know we have overrated the influence of our trade as a measure of coercion, but it is, notwithstanding, unquestionably highly valuable to her. The loss of it would not induce her to make a great sacrifice of interest or feeling; but at any moment when she should suffer no motive but her real interests to govern her, it would be a very powerful pacificator. We were, when a good understanding subsisted between the two nations, her best customer.—We took from her two-fifths of all the exports of her woolen manufactures, which she has always considered her great staple and a vast, if not an equal amount of her cotton goods, besides other articles: and when peace shall be again restored, we shall again be her best customer; for, whatever may be thought to the contrary, there will be no changes wrought by the war, unless it be very long continued, which can materially alter the commercial relations of the two countries: and she may justly hope, on the restoration of peace, for a restoration of our valuable custom as a purchaser of her manufactures. Our trade is rendered even more necessary to her by the great demand which is said to exist for her manufactures for the markets of other countries, because we furnish the raw materials of many of them of better quality and on better terms than any other country can. They cannot, for example, from all the colonies of the world, completely substitute our cottons—their endeavors to establish the affirmative of this proposition, to my mind very satisfactorily shew a material dependence upon us for this article. Does it not then seem that the terms which we demand of the enemy are reasonable and attainable?

I come now to speak of that subject which was my principal inducement to claim your attention in this debate—I allude to the question of retaliation. The conduct of the government is not only condemned in this particular, but it is also said we ought not to prosecute the war against Canada least it should provoke the enemy to give occasion for the exercise of the retaliation which we have threatened.—Let us see what foundation there is for this humiliating doctrine. This question is one of the gravest and most solemn character; affecting deeply the honor of the country, the duty of the government and the lives of our citizens. I wish, for the last reason, it had been the pleasure of the gentlemen of the minority to have passed it over in silence.—I think it would have been safest and wisest. I pretend not, however, to dictate the conduct of other gentlemen, but I must be permitted to enter my protest against the doctrines which have been maintained on the other side of the house on this subject. I think, but I wish to be understood as speaking with a proper deference for the opinions of other gentlemen, this subject has been very erroneously considered. It has been made by the combatants on either side to depend altogether on the question of expatriation, when it has very little and very remote relation to that question. But as the enquiry is one of very great importance, I hope I may be pardoned for discussing it first in the way in which it has been heretofore generally treated, in order that I may draw the subject from thence without any violence to the common mode of thinking, into that point of light in which I suppose it ought to be viewed.

To speak, then, of expatriation. The right of expatriation, which is broadly and generally affirmed on the one hand, is on the other, rebutted in equal extent, by the claim of perpetual allegiance. These may be assumed to be equivalent questions. The affirmation of the one, is the negation of the other.—This it may be material to remember, because it will be necessary in the course of the argument, to shew that naturalization, which is generally considered as destructive of perpetual allegiance and synonymous with expatriation, is really not so. Perpetual allegiance is alleged to be founded on natural law, the positive law of nations, or the municipal law of each state.—We will examine each; and first, the law of nature. To determine what is the law of nature, the simplest way may be, not to embarrass ourselves with equivocal definitions, but to look at things through our best judgments, with a view to discover their just fitness and connection. We may call in the aid and authority of writers of character and reputation and with these lights seek our conclusion. In this view we are able to discover but two principles or pretences on which the duty of perpetual allegiance is affirmed, or the right of expatriation denied—These are, the necessities of the state and the gratitude of the subject.—These are the only grounds stated by Vattel, to whom alone I shall refer as my authority for positions of natural and national law, because I can refer to no better authority, the more especially as on the points for which I shall use him, I believe he agrees with all other writers. (a.)

The obligation resulting from the necessity of the state, can apply to none but extreme cases—such, for example, as the instance of invasion, or the case of war, when great numbers should suddenly abandon the state—a necessity that neither does nor can exist in relation to the few scattered instances of expatriation which the practice and experience of nations have hitherto exhibited to our view and which form the whole of the instances about which we reason; nor can it form any foundation for perpetual allegiance in the extent in which it is claimed; which is not confined to cases of extraordinary character, such as I have mentioned but embraces every subject born in the country, and is neither limited by time nor circumstances.

The extent of that obligation, which is found-

(a) "Many distinctions will be necessary in order to give a complete solution to the celebrated question, whether a man may quit his country or the society of which he is a member? 1. The children have a natural attachment to the society in which they are born; being obliged to acknowledge the protection they are granted to their fathers, they are obliged to it in a great measure for their birth and education. They ought then to love it, as we have already shown, express a just gratitude to it and as much as possible return benefit for benefit. We have just observed that they have a right to enter into the society of which their fathers were members. But every man born free, the son of a citizen, arrives at years of discretion, may examine whether it is convenient for him to join in the society for which he was destined by his birth. If he finds that it will be of no advantage to him to remain in it, he is at liberty to leave it, making a return for what has been done in his favor, and preserving as much as his new engagements will allow him the sentiments of love and gratitude he owes it. Moreover a man's obligations to his natural country may change, lessen, or entirely vanish, accordingly as he shall have quitted it lawfully and with good reason, in order to chase another, or has been driven from it by force. 2. As soon as the child of a citizen arrives at manhood and acts as a citizen, he tacitly assumes that character; his obligations are like those of others who enter expressly and in due form into engagements with society, becomes stronger and more extensive; but the case is very different with respect to him of whom we have been speaking. When a society has not been contracted for a determinate time, it is allowable to quit it when that separation can be of no detriment to the society. A citizen may then quit the state of which he is a member, provided he be in such a conjuncture when he cannot abandon it without doing it a remarkable injustice."

—Vat. B. 1 ch. 17 sec. 220.

ed on the gratitude of the subject, must bear some proportion to the benefit that he has received and the favor that the government has conferred. Now what benefit has the subject received? When in a state of infancy, he has been protected and permitted to live up to adult years in security and peace—But has this benefit imposed an obligation which has no limits, which is commensurate with every faculty mental and physical which the subject possesses, and coextensive with the duration of his life? Those who form a state at given time repay by the services of the time the protection of the government for the same period. The services of the ancestor are a full equivalent to the sovereign for the protection which is enjoyed by his offspring as well as himself, and the son when he arrives at adult age and is able himself to serve the state, is nothing in arrear to the government. Put the case of any actual society or population. Is not the protection of the government fully repaid by the gross population, including the young and the old, at any given period? The adult it may be admitted owes a debt of gratitude to some one for the care and assistance by which he has been reared, to his parent if you please, but certainly not to the sovereign who, it is seen, has received a full equivalent for the protection which the subject has enjoyed. There appears, then, to be no foundation for the claim of perpetual allegiance in the necessities of the state, or the gratitude of the subject for the benefits he has received. I will illustrate the argument in relation to the last of these pretenses by the case of parent and child. The gratitude due by the citizen to the sovereign cannot be greater in the opinion of those who most revere the obligation, than that of the child to the parent—yet there is no man who would not be shocked at the injustice of the parent who would claim from his child perpetual servitude, as a debt of gratitude for his nurture.

Is there any thing in the general nature of government which will authorize the doctrine of perpetual allegiance? I do not mean any particular government, but government in its essential form. The very argument in which we are engaged seems to furnish the evidence on which we must come to a negative conclusion. It proves, to say the least, that the claim of perpetual allegiance is a question of great doubt—but the natural right of man as he existed when independent of government, in a state of nature (and though we are not reasoning of men who have ever been in this state, it is fair and necessary, in order to ascertain his actual situation, to advert to this possible state) to go where he pleased and to serve whom he pleased, was clear and indubitable. The state of the fact, then, is this: His original right is clear, but his subsequent obligation is doubtful, and therefore, unless the less shall more than countervail the stronger proof, the conclusion ought to be that he is not bound to perpetual allegiance.

But let us continue the enquiry—is there anything in the general nature of government which will authorize perpetual allegiance? What is the foundation of the power of government? Is it not clearly and obviously territorial jurisdiction? How else can we suppose it to exist? Government must be located. It must exist within territorial limits or with reference to territorial limits. Its basis then is territorial jurisdiction and its authority is co-extensive with its territorial limits and the extension of its territorial powers if we seek for examples, we shall find that its authority ceases where these cease and extends where these extend. In relation to territorial limits, the idea is easily and perfectly conceived; but of the extension of territorial power, it will be necessary to speak and to state the instances, which will at once illustrate the argument and establish the rule. There is the instance of the territorial jurisdiction of government beyond its limits to the distance of a certain number of leagues from the shore; there is also the instance of ships whether vessels of war or merchant ships. The idea that has been expressed by the phrase, “a ship is a floating colony,” I know has been lately derided; but it was once an approved and accepted doctrine with those who now so contemptuously reject it. It was no other than this principle on which the celebrated case of Jonathan Robins was decided. This formed the basis, if my memory do not much deceive me, of the argument on that subject of the distinguished man who now presides with so much advantage to the country and honor to himself over the highest judicial establishment in the United States (chief justice Marshall) and it is a principle perfectly well established in the law of nations. Nor is there a ny distinction, in the principle itself, between ships of war and merchantmen; the one has prevailed in practice—a distinction which has grown up lately, and which originated in the prudence of nations. This has established the exemption of ships of war from search; but this exemption is evidently founded on a desire to avoid the frequent hostilities which would result, and not from the mere consideration of the power which distinguishes a vessel of war from a merchant ship. The relative power of a vessel of war carrying a few guns, and a merchantman, to that of a ship of the line, is not materially different. It is not the mere warlike efficiency of a vessel which extends the power of the government, but the ensign of its sovereignty which represents its territorial strength. This extension of territorial power embraces also the armies of a nation—is far as its ships can sail, or its armies march, the territorial power of a nation is extended. This doctrine is neither new nor controversial. Vattel agrees with all other writers on the subject, and he clearly establishes all the positions I have laid down (b)

But the authority of government is circumscribed by its territorial limits and the extension of its territorial power. It seems to result, then, that the law of nature, as it grows out of the moral duties of the subject to the state, or out of the essential nature of government, does not establish the claim of perpetual allegiance.

The positive law of nations which is the next ground on which this claims to be sustained, is formed of the treaties and usages of nations. These are almost silent. There are, perhaps, no subsisting treaties or reciprocal usages on the subject; but as far as the past history of nations affords any examples, they appear to be opposed to the claim of perpetual allegiance.

It remains for us to consider how far the municipal laws of nations respectively establish this right. And here I readily admit that the municipal laws of England do establish the doctrine. I think too, that the municipal laws of other nations generally accord with those of England on this subject. I then, at once, concede to the gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) all that he so zealously endeavored to prove by the learned and able argument which he submitted to you the other day, that the municipal laws of England and of nations generally enjoin upon the subject the duty of perpetual allegiance. And I admit, farther, that it is of no practical consequence to say that it is neither supported by the moral duties of the subject, nor warranted by the essential nature of government. It is enough to say that it is enforced by the sanctions which secure obedience to all municipal laws: though it be not just, it does not cease to be obligatory wherever municipal laws can operate. But the gentleman from New York, and those who reason with him, having established the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, at once assume in substance, though not in express terms, a distinct proposition equally necessary to their conclusion, which they have not proved or even attempted to prove—namely, universal allegiance. I doubt whether my meaning in the use of this term may be clearly understood, and therefore I will define it. It is intended to say, that the allegiance claimed is not only co-extensive with the territorial limits and the extension of the territorial power of the natural sovereign; but also goes with the subject

(b) “It is natural to consider the vessels of a nation as part of its territory, especially when they sail upon a free sea, since the state preserves its jurisdiction in these vessels. And as according to the commonly received custom, this jurisdiction is preserved over the vessels even in parts of the sea subject to a foreign dominion, all the children born in the vessels of a nation, are considered as born in its territory. By the same reason those born in a foreign vessel are reputed to be born in a foreign country.”—Vat. B. 1. ch. 19, sec. 216.

“It is from the same reasons that the children born out of the country, in the armies of a state, or in the house of its minister, at a foreign court, are reputed to be born in the country; for a citizen, taken from his family on the service of the state, and who lives under its dependence and jurisdiction, cannot be considered as being gone out of its territory.”—Vat. B. 1. ch. 19, sec. 217.

into the territories and under the territorial power of every other sovereign under whose jurisdiction he may reside. The argument of the gentleman, it is admitted, establishes perpetual allegiance; but it assumes that this perpetual allegiance is also universal. Now, the latter is denied, and clearly does not exist: he has offered no proof to establish it—and if we recur to the principles which we have already proved, it will appear satisfactorily that it cannot exist. It has been proved that the power of a government is only co-extensive with its territorial limits and the extension of its territorial power. Beyond these it can neither enforce duties nor extend protection. Now, the basis of allegiance is protection; and all legal duties must suppose, at least in theory and in the nature of things, an ability to enforce them; but beyond the territorial limits and the extension of the territorial power of a government, neither of these exist, or can, in the nature of things, exist; and, of course, beyond these allegiance must cease. It will be no reply to this argument to say that on the return of the subject to the dominions of his native sovereign, his allegiance is restored. It is admitted that allegiance is not limited by time, but it yet remains to be established that it is not limited by space. That when out of these dominions the citizen is subject to a power which in its nature only can exist within them. Nor will it be more material to prove that on the return of a subject to his native country, he may be punished for any offences, denominated such by the internal laws of the state, which have been committed without its limits, for that will only prove that the sovereign authority is uncontrollable within the territorial limits of the state; that it may enforce unjust laws, and inflict unjust punishments. But it is sufficient for the present argument to say, as will be proved hereafter, that when taken in arms he is protected from the operation of municipal laws by the laws of arms.

It has even been contended that we have not the right to naturalize the subjects of another power, in such a manner as to impose the obligation of bearing arms against that power, even within our own territory, and that if our constitution and laws speak a different language they are nugatory. All nations, speaking generally, have, indeed, claimed the duty of perpetual allegiance, but the same nations, at the same time, have exercised the power of naturalization—the British nation particularly, without any formality of process, naturalizes the subjects of other powers in the most extensive sense of the word. Our constitution on this subject is as explicit as language can make it; and it is hardly fair for gentlemen to take for granted that all the great men who formed and signed that instrument, with Washington at their head, were so grossly ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations as this argument necessarily supposes—let me say to these gentlemen, that I have understood and believe this provision of the constitution was introduced into the instrument by a gentleman (Alexander Hamilton) who, I acknowledge, was a very great man, and to whose memory they are not unwilling to pay the highest honors. Will the gentlemen say he was thus ignorant of the relative rights and duties of nations?

After these views of the subject, we are prepared to reconcile with the laws and practice of nations, the apparent paradoxes with the absurdity of which the disputants on either side of this question have charged each other. It is said that perpetual allegiance is incompatible with naturalization, and therefore that all governments which naturalize, to be consistent, must abandon the claim of perpetual allegiance. On the other hand it is said allegiance is perpetual, and therefore you cannot naturalize. But these are mistakes, for allegiance being only co-extensive with the territorial limits or the extension of the territorial power of a government, each operates within a sphere which is exclusive of the sphere of the other. Thus the claim of perpetual allegiance and the right of naturalization are compatible, and the practice of nations ceases to be paradoxical and absurd. Again it is said that naturalization is practised by all governments, and that all governments, to be consistent, should concede the right of expatriation, but this is also a mistake, for expatriation implies a total release of the subject from his allegiance, as well when without as on his return to the territory of his original sovereign, while naturalization is in its operation only co-extensive with the territory and the extension of the territorial power of the adopted sovereign. It is then not paradoxical to say, that governments deny the right of expatriation and exercise the power of naturalization—accordingly we find that governments generally have denied the right of expatriation and have exercised, at the same time, the power of naturalization.

But I repeat, and I will now endeavor to prove, that the question of retaliation has been very improperly connected with those of perpetual allegiance, naturalization and expatriation. Perpetual allegiance is indeed so far connected with retaliation as to be the pretence under which, sometimes, that act of an enemy is committed which renders retaliation necessary, and naturalization is so far connected with it, as to increase the obligation of the adopted sovereign to retaliate for the injury done to the naturalized citizen as the ties which bind them together are more close and numerous, and more solemn than those who connect a sovereign and the stranger, who merely bears arms in his service. The foundation, however, of the right of retaliation is not at all formed by these ties, but by the laws and usages of civilized nations in war. The proper mode of discussing this question was well indicated by the example of the venerable gentleman (Mr. Findley) from Penn. and has been pursued with great success, by the gentleman (Mr. Roberson) from Louisiana, the latter part of whose speech, that which was delivered during the last ten minutes he addressed you, was in my opinion, worth all (I deny not the abstract talent displayed by others) that has been said within as well as without these walls on the subject, because he proved by the best examples what is the usage of nations on this point; which at once presented the proper mode and the true object of inquiry. Before the mitigated practice of modern times had softened and civilized the character of war, it would have been considered absurd in the victor to talk of his right to punish the vanquished, as a traitor under the municipal laws of his native country, when he had been taken in arms against it. The rights of war gave him the readier means of his sword and his will. Amidst arms municipal laws are correctly said to be silent—the original right of the victor was to put his prisoner to death—This is still his extreme right and still exists in such degree as to merge and in effect to annihilate all other rights over the captive, but it is a right controlled by the mitigated usages of modern times, and these usages have become the established laws and rights of civilized war. Examples of these mitigated usages are numerous. The property of the subjects of an enemy is on land generally held inviolable. Persons not belligerent, though enemies, are not even treated as prisoners of war. On the ocean they are suffered to pass unmolested, and are often, within the territory of an enemy, permitted to reside in peace, protected by the laws of the state. But, above all, the life of the prisoner of war is to be held sacred, and he is to be treated with humanity and kindness. Engrafted on these usages, to secure them from violation, arose the practice of retaliation, which, far from being, even where it extends to the deprivation of human life, an act of cruelty, is when soberly and correctly, though sternly and inexorably applied, sacred to humanity. Were it not for this sanction, we should probably soon bid adieu to the civilized and mitigated character of modern war, which would assume its ancient ferocity. Acts of retaliation are like judicial sacrifices on the altar of justice, in which, though humanity may weep, the offended laws must be satisfied. If it be replied that the instance is dissimilar, because the subject of retaliation is innocent, it is answered that the victims of war are generally innocent. It must be ever a subject of lamentation when we are obliged to take the life of man. It is still more a subject of lamentation when the blood of the innocent is shed, but the condition of humanity sometimes requires and justice sometimes commands us to do both. It is however said, that though retaliation be admitted to be a general right of war, yet when the natural sovereign finds his subject in arms against him, he has a right to punish him as a traitor, and that the sovereign in whose ranks and under whose colors he fought has no right to retaliate. But has not this argument been already refuted? Has it not been proved that all the rights of the victor over the captive are merged in those of war? There is no collision between the municipal laws and the laws of war. The captive is a prisoner of war and in this character never becomes subject to any other than the laws of war.

But it is attempted to be proved by legal and historical instances, that Great Britain has punished her subjects who have been taken in arms against her, and thence it is inferred that this is the law of nations generally and of war. Were the premises admitted the conclusion would not follow. But these examples only prove exceptions to the general rule. They are cases in which power and violence have trampled on law and principle, because no national or other arm of sufficient vigor was interposed to protect and save the victims. The instances which have been mentioned are generally those which grew out of civil wars and occurred at times when all resistance to the government had been put down and there remained no ability in the vanquished to execute retaliation. Such were the cases of Aeneas McDonald, Colonel Townley, and others. In that of doctor Story, which was most relied upon by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Gaston,) though he had become a Spanish subject and resided in the dominions of Spain for some years, yet he had returned to England and there had committed treason. On such a case there could be no question. [Mr. Gaston said this case was generally misunderstood, and was taken to be such as had been just stated by the gentleman from South Carolina—but in Dyer's Reports, where the case was best reported, it would appear that the treason was committed in Flanders.] I am glad said Mr. C. that the gentleman has corrected me. I should be very sorry to misrepresent the argument of any gentleman, and especially that of one whose conduct in debate is so fair and honorable as that of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have not examined the case particularly, because the principle of my argument admits these cases. My object was merely to class and characterize them. Let it not however be understood, when I say that most of the instances relied upon occurred in civil wars, that therefore I admit them to have been authorised by the laws of the war. On the contrary I will demonstrate, that even in civil wars, the law of nations protects the life of the captive who has resisted his natural sovereign, and secures him the rights of a prisoner of war according to the usages of modern times. That when these rights have been violated, retaliation is authorised and that history records the instances in which it has been successfully exercised. I hear it suggested, (by Mr. Grosvenor) that in civil wars this may be the law and usage of nations, but that it is otherwise when the subjects of one sovereign join the arms of another sovereign with whom he is at war. 'This does indeed seem to be a very extraordinary distinction—it does appear to me that if this inviolability of the captive can be established to be the law and usage of war in civil contests, it is a fortiori proved to be the law and usage of national contests. A single authority will put the first of these positions beyond doubt—Vattel says "a civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least it suspends their force and effect; produces in the nation two independent parties considering each other as enemies and acknowledging no common judge; therefore of necessity these two parties must, at least for a time, be considered as forming two separate bodies, two distinct people, though one of them may be in the wrong in breaking the continuity of the state, to raise up against lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact; besides, who shall judge them? Who shall pronounce on which side the right or the wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. Thus they are in the case of two nations, who having a dispute which they cannot adjust, are compelled to decide it by force of arms

"Things being thus situated it is very evident that the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity, moderation and probity, which we have before enumerated and recommended, are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons on which the obligation between state and state is founded, render them even more necessary in the unhappy circumstances when two incensed parties are destroying their common country. Should the sovereign conceive he has a right to hang up his prisoners as rebels, the opposite party will make reprisals. If he does not religiously observe the capitulations, and all the conventions made with his enemies, they will no longer rely on his word; should he burn and destroy they will follow his example; the war will become cruel and horrid; its calamities will increase on the nation. The duke de Mompensier's infamous and barbarous excesses against the reformed in France, are too well known. The men were delivered up to the executioner, and the women to the brutality of the soldiers. What was the consequence? The reformed became exasperated, they took vengeance of such inhuman practices; and the war before sufficiently cruel, as a civil and religious war, became more bloody and destructive. Who could without horror read the savage cruelties committed by the baron des Adrets? By turns a catholic and a protestant he distinguished himself by his barbarity to both sides. At length there was a necessity for departing from such affectations of judicial superiority against persons who could support their cause sacred and hard and of treating them not as criminals, but as enemies. Even troops have often refused to serve in a war wherein the prince exposed them to cruel reprisals. Officers who had the highest sense of honor, though ready to shed their blood in the field of battle for his service, have not thought it any part of their duty to run the hazard of an ignominious death. Therefore whenever a numerous party thinks it has a right to resist the sovereign and finds itself able to declare that opinion sword in hand the war is to be carried on between them in the same manner as between two different nations; and they are to leave open the same means of preventing enormous violences and restoring peace."

Here then, we see, the reason on which the rights and usages of nations are applied to civil wars is, that those who resist have swords in their hands and become assimilated to independent nations.

In short the basis of retaliation is humanity. As no nation or body of men will suffer their enemies to put those to death who fight under their banners under any pretence whatever—interest and fear restrain an enemy from putting his prisoners to death when he knows the act will be retaliated. But retaliation is always a question of expediency. If we were at war with a nation dead to all the sensibilities of our nature, a nation that would suffer, without remorse or feeling, its innocent subjects to become victims to a sanguinary violation on its own part, of the usages of civilized war, we might be obliged to forbear as we would know the object of retaliation would not be gained. But, for myself, I deem more highly of the British nation and government—I do not believe the government of that nation to be so wicked as to provoke the consequences which must inevitably follow the execution of the barbarous threat they have uttered—that they would treat as criminals the natives of Great Britain who have been taken prisoners in our ranks. Deserters alone have been permitted to form an exception to the general rule, that the life of a prisoner shall be sacred; and the humanity of modern times has even contrived the means of saving the lives of deserters. Hence the practice of permitting the garrisons of captured places to march out with a certain number of covered waggons which are not to be searched. (Vattel b. 3. ch. 8. sec. 144.) The reason given is, that they become numerous and that humanity forbids their destruction, undoubtedly a very sufficient reason; but exactly the reverse of that which is sometimes urged in justification of the threat of the British government. It is said that, in consequence of the sameness of language, similarity of personal appearance, connexions in trade and ease and frequency of intercourse, those who join us are numerous and therefore it is necessary to punish them when found in arms.

I must again bring to your notice the authority which was yesterday presented to you by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Robertson) because it bears so directly on the question before you, and affords the views and opinions of the legislators and statesmen of Great Britain herself, confirming entirely the doctrine on which the government of the United States acts at this time.

[Here Mr. C. read several extracts from a debate in the house of commons, on a bill to raise a corps of French emigrants, in which Mr. Burke was the principal speaker.] (c)

(c) Lord Malgrave said "he rose chiefly to answer one part of the speech of the honorable gentleman who spoke last, which related to retaliation. A contrary doctrine, he said, would lead to the most frightful situations; for if the enemy should pursue this method of assassination, and should find that we do not do every thing in our power to deter them, they would bully us from day to day with the threat of it for the purpose of inspiring terror. He knew it was not the custom of civilized nations or of modern times to put prisoners of war to death, but if our enemies decreed that civilized practice, we must in justice to ourselves retaliate. He was perhaps going to involve himself in what he was going to say, but could not resist it and he said so plain-ly. The ground on which he intended to proceed at Toulon was this—he should have sent out a dog of war, instead of a man, to the enemy, that if any such man were taken to the law of nations and the feelings of humanity were affected by this, he should mean for man retaliation and however cruel the right son in law, and however repugnant to the feelings of humanity nature, he was ready to declare he believed it to be necessary in such a situation, for if we did not proceed on equal terms we should not carry on the war at all."

In another part of the debate he said, "While he had the command of the British troops there (Toulon) and the French who were actually there, he stood, under the authority and invitation of his own king's proclamation, he had always considered the latter entitled to the same protection, in every respect, from him as the British troops."

Mr. Daines said, "From this topic he would refrain, not because he would advise to every calamitous consequence of retaliation but because he considered every thing that ought or could be said upon the subject, under the present circumstances, to be injudicious and impudent. One, who for humanity and wisdom have been inferior to none who have yet lived, have found it necessary, in the field of battle, to stop cruelty by retaliation." "Every thing on this subject, he said, depends upon circumstances, such as the conduct and character of an enemy, whether he be polished or savage, to which he is unincapable."

Mr. Burke said, "As a general principle founded on policy and the laws of nations, I am ready to repeat and maintain, that retaliation of any severity which an enemy may practice, is right and proper. The law of nations is a part of the law of nations, as founded on that of nature. These corps must be considered purely as a part of the army, and those who command them are the authors of number should not find it need on their own heads. Such is my opinion relative to the justice and policy of retaliation. I would suffer no one act of severity to pass unretaliated." "To the honor of practical humanity only four instances of war and unnecessary murder occurred through the whole course of the American war, a forbearance which reflects equal credit on both parties. In the history of princes some instances of unnecessary severity may be found but their general practice is just and merciful. For instance, think that Cameron and Balfour, in the late wars of our own history, should not have been executed. In 1683 the Irish brigades were taken into the service of France and remained their own uniform, yet England, though often courageously opposed by these troops, has not in any instance treated them as rebels, when the fortune of war cast them into their power. In the rebellion of 1745, a whole regiment of them were taken, but no severity was practised by France, under Louis 14th, conducted hers to the same way. Many of her regiments, after the cruel and inhuman revocation of the edict of Nantz, were taken into the pay of Prussia, Holland and Britain; yet she never forfeited these troops when they became soldiers. The battle of Fontenoy was gained principally from the Irish brigades; and though they fought in open rebellion, these extremities were not thought of. Lord Ligonier, an officer of great note in the English service, a Frenchman by birth, when taken prisoner fighting against France, was exchanged in the usual course for a captain of the same rank. Fact is the moral

Mr. C. continued: No human authority can be of more value than that of this great man (Mr. Burke) who at once teaches the doctrine and gives the examples which establish that doctrine in all the extent in which this government claims the right to exercise it. It is true that in this debate, Mr. Sheridan attempts to destroy the value and impeach the accuracy of some of the instances which Mr. Burke had mentioned, but, as was to have been expected, he has not succeeded. Mr. Sheridan says, in each of the examples Mr. Burke had mentioned "except with regard to America he had entirely failed. The first is the conduct of the English with regard to the Irish regiments in the French service in the year 1745; a space of near 60 years had elapsed when they took some of them prisoners but it was not very probable that many of those who left Ireland in 1688 returned to invade England in 1745" "The next, he says, was the conduct of the French to lord Ligonier who was one of the French refugees banished from France by the edict of Nantz (which was in itself one of the most cruel and barbarous actions that ever disgraced history) in the year 1682, and he was taken prisoner in the year 1747; a period of 65 years; so that the probability is, that it was the father of his lordship who was a refugee; or at least that his lordship must have been a child in arms at the time."

It seems to be a work of supererogation to attempt to support the authority of Edmund Burke, yet it may be proper to say a few words in reply to these objections of Mr. Sheridan. Though it be true, as he states, that few of the Irish brigades who entered the French service in 1688 remained to invade England in 1745, yet it is a fact, well attested by history, that these corps were afterwards kept up by the enlistment of the natives of Ireland, a fact which leaves the example at least equally strong. Admit, too, lord Ligonier to have been a child in arms but a native of France, is not the example one which is diametrically opposed to the doctrine of those who in this argument deny the right of retaliation. They allow neither age nor circumstances to form an exception to the general rule.

I intended to have particularized many more examples but the time I have already consumed admonishes me to forbear. The recent case of Napper Tandy is a strong one: But I mention it rather that it may be understood and that its facts may be correctly stated, than to multiply examples. I think the gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) stated that the ground on which he was pardoned was the circumstances of his arrest in a neutral territory, that of Hamburgh—and enemy of declamation, as analysis is of rhetoric; and, perhaps from some degree of imagination likewise I feel much inclined to avail myself of the advantages on this occasion. The same instances of mercy and forbearance may be collected from the conduct of Germany, Sweden, and every other power in Europe."

that his pardon was granted in consequence of the interposition of the authorities of that city. But this cannot be—that Sapper Tandy was in the service of France when he was arrested and that his release was demanded by France, are facts which I take to be unquestionable. Retaliation was threatened, and I believe (I will not speak with confidence) the subjects of that retaliation were designated. To this interposition of France, Great Britain no doubt yielded. We know the great pains the latter took to obtain the person of this man. She not only violated the independence of a neutral state, but she intreated Russia in the endeavor to get his person into her power; and it is not easy to believe that after all this had been done, she would have been moved to release him from clemency to the individual or respect to a weak state whose feebleness had provoked so gross a violation of its independence.

But there is another instance, in every respect, more distinguished than any which have been yet mentioned, which may be adduced to support the doctrine that prisoners of war are not to be treated as criminals though taken in arms against their native country—It is afforded by the conduct of the king of Prussia in the seven years war. He recruited his army from the neighboring states of Germany with whom he was at war, and at one time enlisted seventeen thousand Saxons who were not only the subjects of his enemy but his prisoners, and yet we hear of no executions for treason and consequently no instances of retaliation. It is from the general submission of the states of Europe to the rule of civilized war for which we contend, that we find the subject of retaliation occurs rather in treaties on the laws of nations than in the examples of history. The instances are numberless in which subjects have borne arms against the sovereign of their native country, have been taken in arms and have been treated as prisoners, while we have not had one single instance stated where the adopted sovereign has interposed his protection in which it has not been effectual.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) has said this is a foreign cause. If I did not consider it to be an American cause I would abjure and abandon it. I am not unaware that by the protection given to naturalized citizens, some men of the worthless and flagitious character, which was so strongly depicted by the gentleman from New York, will be embraced: but the bounties of a government acting necessarily by general rules, like some of those which Providence dispenses in this life, must fall without discrimination on the good and on the bad. The cause, however, is not therefore a bad or a foreign cause. It is the cause of the justice, the honor, the sworn faith of the government and the people—of the native people of the soil, who are bound to redeem the pledge they have given to their naturalized brethren to protect them; and if some unworthy men take refuge under the sanctuary of its protecting shade, they will seek it and enjoy it, as the felon was used to do who fled to the foot of the altar of that religion which he had trampled on and abused, but which did not therefore reject him from its holy asylum!

And now, sir, from all that I have said, I think I am authorized to conclude, that, while I admit perpetual allegiance to be a principle of the municipal law of England and of civilized states generally; the power of naturalization is exercised, at the same time, by all those states; and that they are compatible with each other. That the right of retaliation does not depend on questions of allegiance, naturalization or expatriation, but on the laws and usage of civilized war. That these concede to belligerent sovereigns the right of protecting by retaliation, if necessary, not only their naturalized subjects, but all those who fight under their banners. That all persons taken in arms, without regard to their allegiance, are to be treated as prisoners of war, deserters only excepted—and that the fate of these also is generally mitigated.

I will add one word on the duty of the executive. It is the general duty of the executive to protect by retaliation, if necessary, all those who fight the battles of the country.—But this is a duty which is to be governed by circumstances, and to be executed with great caution and sobriety, but with equal decision and firmness. If government has been pledged to protect those who have borne arms, whether naturalized or not, it ought to extend that protection at every hazard and by every sacrifice which may result from a judicious exercise of the right of retaliation. It ought certainly to embrace all naturalized citizens. In relation to British subjects, who have not been naturalized, who may be in the army, they ought to be permitted immediately to retire from the service, if government has the least hesitation in extending to them an equal protection with its naturalized or native citizens. Indeed it appears to me it would be its best policy at once to permit every British subject in the service to retire—I believe it would not diminish our forces a battalion—and then steadily and firmly defend the lives of those who have been naturalized. Thus to circumscribe our duties and strengthen our resolution to perform them.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. Grosvenor) has said, I believe, that if the chief magistrate execute this threat of retaliation, and one drop of American blood be shed in consequence, his soul will be crimsoned with it. I will, on the other hand, say, if he shall fail to retaliate, if circumstances shall unfortunately require and authorize such a conduct, whatever may be the sentence of our day, posterity, judging more justly, will lament the degradation of the country, and will pity, if it do not more severely censure, the weakness of the magistrate who failed to do his duty and support the character of the nation.

Commodores Decatur & Hardy.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.—The following copies of the correspondence between commodores Decatur and Hardy, and captain Stackpoole, in relation to the proposed meeting of the United States and Macedonian, with the Endymion and Statura, were some time since obtained by an American prisoner lately on board the British squadron off New-London.

*United States' ship United States,
New-London, 17th Jan. 1814.*

Sir—Having been informed by Nicholas Moran, the master of a sloop recently captured by his Britannic majesty's ship Endymion, now lying before this port, that whilst he was on board the Ramilies, and in your hearing, captain Hope of the Endymion did ask him whether the frigate the United States would not avoid an action; he further states that he heard you declare it to be your wish that the United States ship Macedonian should have a meeting with his Britannic majesty's ship Statura, that you would furnish men and give room for such meeting, but that you would not permit the challenge to come from your side.

The Endymion, I am informed, carries twenty-four pounders and mounts fifty guns in all; this ship also carries twenty-four pounders and mounts forty-eight guns, besides a twelve pound carronade, a boat gun.

The Statura mounts fifty, the Macedonian forty-seven, metal the same, so that the force on both sides is as nearly equal as we could expect to find.

If Mr. Moran's statement be correct, it is evident captains Hope and Stackpoole have the laudable desire of engaging with their ships, the United States and Macedonian. We, sir, are ready and equally desirous for such meeting forthwith.

The only difficulty that appears to be in the way, is from whom the formal invitation is to come. If, sir, you admit Moran's statement to be correct, the difficulty will be removed, and you will be pleased to consider this as an invitation; at the same time we beg you will assure captains Hope and Stackpoole, that no personal feelings towards them induce me to make this communication, they are solicitous to add to the renown of their country—we honor their motives.

Captain Biddle, who will have the honor to deliver you this, is authorised, on our part, to make any arrangements which may be thought necessary.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) STEPHEN DECATUR.

To com. sir Thomas Masterman Hardy, Br. &c. &c. &c.

His majesty's ship Statura, off New-London, 17th Jan. 1814.

Sir—Captain sir Thomas Masterman Hardy, baronet, and commodore off New-London, has this afternoon handed me a letter from you, expressing a desire that the United States ship Macedonian, commanded by captain Jones, should meet his majesty's ship Statura under my command; and that the United States' ship United States, bearing your broad pennant would embrace the same opportunity of meeting the Endymion, commanded by captain Hope. In the event of sir Thomas Hardy's permitting our joint acceptance of this rendezvous, I of course must be the senior officer; but in the interim I shall confine my reply to your obliging letter as to the future acts of his majesty's ship I have the honor to command.

It will afford her captain, officers and crew, the greatest pleasure to meet captain Jones in the Macedonian to-morrow, next day, or whenever such a meeting may better suit his purpose, let him only be pleased to appoint the day and place; say six or ten leagues south of Montaug Point, or further if he pleases. My only object for selecting this distance from the shore, is to avoid any interruption; little I think can be apprehended, as all the captains commanding frigates, excepting one, in these seas, are junior to me, and in the event of chance, or accident, meeting him, I will hoist a flag of truce, pledging the word and honor of a British officer (further I cannot offer) to keep the truce flying until the Macedonian is out of sight, and in the event of a junior officer appearing, the same guarantee of safety shall be kept flying until I can detach him.

In accepting this invitation, sir, it is not to vaunt, or, in the most trifling degree, to enhance my own professional character, or take from what is so justly due to captain Jones; although I have been twice mortified in being obliged to retreat on the 26th and 28th of August, 1813, by six American men of war, and for twelve weeks together cruising alone, it has never fallen to the Statura's lot to meet one singly.

The honor of my king, the defence of my country, engaged in a just and unprovoked war, added to the glory of the British flag, is all I have in view.*

I perceive a statement in your letter of the comparative force of the two ships, and as I fear you have been led into error, I shall take this opportunity to say, the Statura carries only forty-six guns, instead of fifty, with two little boat guns of more utility in exercising the men, than any effect they might have in the hour of battle; without any external finery to recommend her, she is simply a British man of war of her class; nevertheless a more fair and equal match in ship and guns may not soon occur; in numbers of men I am aware of having a superiority to oppose; all I request is that both ships may quickly meet.

Having received your communication by the hand of Sir Thomas M. Hardy, I shall convey my reply through the same channel, requesting you will be so good as to hand it to the captain of the Macedonian.

I remain, sir, with every consideration, your obedient humble servt. (Signed) H. S.

To commodore Decatur, &c. &c. &c. New-London.

* We know not how sufficiently to express our ideas of the impudence of this man. That he, barbarian wretch, who holds in fetters a free American; who compels an undoubted freeman to fight the battles of the miserable thing that enlightened Englishmen call their king, and the knot of knaves that guided the natural fool—who threatened that CHAYER (see Weekly Register, Vol. VI. page 68) should be "tied to the mast and shot at like a dog," if he would not fight against his country, his father and his friends, should say the war in which we are engaged is "unprovoked," is really the "cap sheaf" of effrontery, and sufficient to qualify him for the editorship of some of our newspapers. And, we would advise him, to lay by the sword for the pen. He would cut a much better figure with a feather than with iron. Decatur, however, gives him a "rap over the knuckles," that, perhaps, he may feel.

Wm. Bze.

Ramifies, of New-London, 18th January, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date by captain Biddle, signifying a desire on your part, and that of captain Jones, as commanders of the United States's ships United States and Macedonian, to meet his Britannic majesty's ships Endymion and Statura, in consequence of a conversation reported to you by Mr. Moran, master of a sloop recently captured; and in reply I beg to inform you I have no hesitation whatever in permitting captain Stackpoole in the Statura to meet the Macedonian, as they are sister ships carrying the same number of guns and weight of metal. But as it is my opinion the Endymion is not equal to the United States, being 200 tons less, and carrying 25 guns on her main deck, and only 32 lb. carronades on her quarter-deck and fore-castle, when I am informed the United States has 39 guns on her main deck and 42 lb. carronades on her quarter-deck and fore-castle, I must consider it my duty (though very contrary to the wishes of captain Hope) to decline the invitation on his part.†

The captains of his Britannic majesty's ships under my orders, as well as myself, cannot too highly appreciate the gallant spirit that has led to the communication from you, sir, and are equally convinced that no personal feeling towards each other can ever influence a laudable ambition to add to the naval renown of our respective countries.

I have the honor to enclose a letter from captain Stackpoole bearing your address and I pledge my honor to facilitate by every means in my power the meeting on the rendezvous pointed out by him, and that none of the captains of his majesty's ships junior to me shall interfere. Captain Stackpoole's proposal amply provides against that of a senior officer.

Should success attend the Macedonian I guaranty her proceeding unmolested to any port to the eastward of this anchorage, and I propose the same from you, sir, for the Statura to proceed to Bermuda.

Captain Coote will have the honor to deliver this letter, and to make any further arrangements that may be necessary.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

THOMAS MASTERMAN HARDY.

United States ship United States, New-London,
19th January, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of yesterday, with the enclosure from capt. Stackpoole, by the hands of capt. Coote.

The proposition for a contest between his Britannic majesty's frigate Endymion and Statura and this ship and the Macedonian, was made by me in the full belief that their force was equal; but it has been declined in consequence of your entertaining a different opinion on this subject from my own.

I do not think myself authorized to comply with the wishes of captains Jones and Stackpoole for a meeting in the ships Statura and Macedonian.

This squadron is now under sailing orders from government, and I feel myself bound to put to sea, the first favorable opportunity that may occur.

†The Endymion throws as great a weight of shot as the United States, within 48 lbs. and commodore Decatur offered to captain Coote to dismount of his guns until the force was precisely equal. See the former correspondence, &c.

In my proposal for a meeting of the four ships, I consented and I fear incautiously, that you should make up the complements of the Endymion and Statura from the crews of the Ramifies and Borer.

I was induced to accord this indulgence from a supposition that their crews might have been reduced by manning prizes, and a hope that the selected men, being divided between the two ships, the advantage would not be overwhelming.

But, sir, if the Statura is to avail herself alone of this concession, it must be obvious to you and every one, that I should be yielding to you an advantage I could not excuse to my government; and in making the crew of the Macedonian in any degree equal to such a conflict, I should be compelled to break up the crews of this ship and the Hornet, and thus render a compliance with my orders to proceed to sea utterly impracticable.

I beg leave also to state that the guaranty against recapture in case the Macedonian should prove successful, is very far from satisfactory.

You will have the goodness, sir, to inform capt. Stackpoole that his letter was shewn to capt. Jones according to his request, that capt. Jones is extremely desirous that a meeting should take place between the Statura and the Macedonian, but is controlled by me for the reasons I have stated.

Whether the war we are engaged in be just or unprovoked on the part of Great Britain, as capt. Stackpoole has been pleased to suggest, is considered by us as a question exclusively with the Civilians, and I am perfectly ready to admit both my incompetence and unwillingness to confront captain Stackpoole in its discussion.

I am, sir, with the highest consideration and respect,

Ramifies, of New-London, 20th, Jan. 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acquaint you, that I will communicate to captain Stackpoole your letter of the 19th instant. I this morning had the honor of receiving by captain Biddle, and I have nothing further to offer in addition to my former letter on the subject of the meeting between the ships of the United States and those of his Britannic majesty, but that I will give every guaranty in my power, in case of the Macedonian's success, should the meeting ever take place.

I beg to assure you, sir, I shall hail with pleasure the return of an amicable adjustment of the differences between the two nations,

And have the honor, &c.

Old Times.

The following has been communicated, not only with a view to circulate and preserve the memory of the men of other years, and celebrate the virtues of Livingston, but, also, that the matter may be applied to passing events and the present state of our country:

Extract from his excellency governor Livingston's message to the general assembly of the state of New-Jersey.

Gentlemen—The conduct of our oppressors has, thro' the whole course of the war, been so infatuated and remorseless, as if Heaven had deprived them of common sense, as well as hell inspired them with all its malice. But their day of national correction is swiftly approaching. Their unparalleled cruelties both in the eastern and western world, have at last kindled the Divine vengeance: and the judgments of God are now overtaking a nation which has filled up the measure of its iniquity; and long been the most impious and irreligious of any in Christendom.

When all the horrors of desperation seize her; and utterly hopeless of conquest, she determines to rise even above herself by some signal stupendous act of barbarity, Nov 75, like the death in the apocalypse, great wrath, because she knoweth that she hath not short tarry. She may attempt to desolate what she finds it possible to subdue. Against such ravages and destruction, to which, we know by experience, it is not beneath her dignity to descend, it is our interest to oppose the most strenuous exertions. We want only one spirited and general effort to expel her remnant of banditti from the continent, and forever to emancipate ourselves into complete and uninterrupted liberty. One campaign more will, in all probability, decide the important contest; and in whose favor it is likely to terminate, is written by the hand of Providence in characters too legible to be misunderstood.

The alacrity of our men to enter into the service, and the great dispatch with which our battalions are completing, must also affect every lover of his country with singular pleasures.

I hope, gentlemen, it will engage your reasonable consideration in what measures ought to be adopted respecting those ambitious inmates, (ever-willing citizens to all the purposes of deriving to the state every legal benefit and protection, but to none of returning reciprocal duty and allegiance) who seem resolved, in the very end of the quarrel, to maintain a kind of shamful and most dangerous neutrality; hoping, by not avowedly espousing either side, but occasionally and indirectly abetting both, to secure to themselves a favorable reception with the prevailing party, let that party eventually prove to be the oppressive or oppressed. Such political hypocrites ought, by a general law, to be dragged from their lurking holes, ferreted out of their duplicity and refuge of lies, and be taught by an act for the purpose, that however willing the legislature may be to imitate the example of the generous householders, who made no difference in his payments between those who went to labor in his vineyard at the first or eleventh hour; they are determined not to set the first example in the world, of allowing wages to those who never would enter the vineyard at all, 'till the grapes were fully ripe, by the cultivation of others; and came thither only with the view of sneakily snatching upon, and regaling themselves with, the wine of other peoples expressing.

I have farther to lay before you, gentlemen, a resolution of congress, of the 23d of April, recommending it to the legislatures of the several states to pass laws, or to the executive authority of each state, if invested with sufficient power, to issue proclamations, offering pardon, with such exceptions and under such limitations and restrictions as they shall think expedient, to such of their inhabitants or subjects as have levied war against any of the states, or adhered to, aided or abetted the enemy, and shall surrender themselves to any civil or military officer of any of these states, and shall return to the state to which they may belong, before the tenth day of June next, and recommending it to the good and faithful citizens of those states to receive such returning penitents with compassion and mercy, and to forgive and bury in oblivion their past failings and transgressions.

Tho' I think it my duty to submit this resolution to your serious consideration, because it is recommended by congress, I do not think it my duty to recommend it to your approbation, because it appears to me both unequal and impolitic. It may, consistently with the profound veneration for that august assembly, be presumed that they are less acquainted with the particular circumstances and internal policy of some of the states than those who have before more favorable opportunities for that purpose. There seems, it is true, something so noble and magnanimous in prescribing an unmerited amnesty to a number of disappointed criminals submitting themselves to the mercy of their country; and there is in reality something so divine and christian in the forgiveness of injuries, that it may appear rather judicious in offering any thing in obstruction of the intended mercy. But as to the measure of pardon to which we are under the highest obligations to conform our conduct, though it forbids at all times, and in all cases, the indulgence of personal hatred and malice, and in all respects any treatment of national enemies or municipal offenders, necessary to self-preservation, and the general well of society. And as to humanity, I could never persuade myself that it consisted in such lenity towards our adversaries, either British or domestic, as was evidently productive of tenfold barbarity on their part; when such barbarity would probably have been prevented by our retaliating upon them the first prostration; and consequently our apparent inhumanity, in particular instances, have certainly been humane in the final result. Alas! how many lives had been saved, and what a scene of inexorable misery prevented, had we from the beginning, treated our bosom traitors with proper severity, and inflicted the law of retaliation upon an enemy too savage to be humanized by any other argument! As both political pardon and punishment ought to be regulated by political considerations, and must derive their existence or non-existence from their salutary or pernicious influences upon the community, I cannot conceive what advantages are proposed by extending to the embraces of a clemency a set of beings, from which any country I should imagine, would esteem it a capital part of its fidelity to remain forever at the remotest distance. It is not probable that those who desert us to aid the most matchless conspirators in the refinements of cruelty, (who have exhibited human iniquity in their engines of torture) in introducing arbitrary power and all the horrors of slavery, and will only return from disappointment not from remorse, will ever make good subjects to a state founded in liberty, and indubitably determined against every kind of human despotism. The thirty or emerald-birds convicted of the most flagrant treason, and who, by the benign interposition of government, were upon very hopeful signs of penitence, generously pardoned, and then with multiplied crimes, subjected in our service, have all, to a man, deserted to the enemy and are going in arms against their native country, with the accumulated guilt of its being now not only the country that first saw them fly, but which last affords them a more mercifully prepared to receive them than their own land. Who would be so bold as to say that a republic is by any by-man means absolutely incorruptible, having so entirely extinguished all the primitive virtue and patriotic nature to man, as not to have a small spark to kindle the original flame. It is possible that such a probability may never arrive at the highest government, and should, even by the profane use of tyranny to a few, be capable of one single virtuous impression. They have by a kind of gigantic effort of villainy, astonished the whole world, even that of transending, in the enormities of desolation and bloodshed, a race of murderers before unequalled, and without competitor. Were it not for these miscreants, we should have thought that for cool, deliberate cruelty, and unavailing, unobscured love, the sons of Britain were without parallel. But considering the education of the latter, which has familiarized them to the shedding of innocent blood, from the mere thirst of here, they have been excelled in their own peculiar and distinguished excellence, by this monstrous birth and off-spring of America, who, in defiance of nature and of nature, have not only by a vast ambition chosen her badge of freedom, but waged an infernal war against their dearest connections, for not making the like absolute and avowable election. By them have numbers of our most useful and meritorious citizens been banished, hunted down, pillaged, murdered, stolen or intercepted. By them has the present contest on the part of Britain, been encouraged, aided and protracted. They are, therefore, responsible for all the additional blood that has been spilt by the addition of their weight in the scale of the enemy. Multitudes of them have, since they began to transgress. At the commencement of our opposition they appear as one sanguine than others, and, like the cricket king of their island, exceeded in blaze and noise, the calm and durable flame of the steady and persevering. They have associated, subscribed and sworn to assist in repelling the hostile attempts of our well-affected oppressors. They have, with awful solemnity, pledged their faith and honor to stand, with their lives and fortunes, by the congress and their general, in support of that very liberty which, upon the first opportunity, they perfidiously aimed to oppose, and have since sacrilegiously sworn utterly to exterminate. This worthy citizen has lost a venerable father, that one a beloved brother; and a third, a darling son, either immediately by their hands, or by betraying him to the enemy, who, from a momentary unintentional collapse into humanity, were sometimes inclined to spare, when the pitiless wretches insisted upon slaughter, or threatened to complete an act of a relenting mercy, merely because he was not dishonorably cruel. Nor will such an act of grace prove eventual or restoring to their injured country the most proper objects of pardon. The more ignorant and debased of these ignorant and delinquent can be) will not be able to obtain leave from their vigilant task-masters to return to their duty. The most daring, rascals and indolent will be indulged with this privilege, and that only to save their estates, without the least compunction of conscience, alteration of sentiment, or melioration of heart. These having already been sworn and forsworn, will, without ceremony, repeat their perjury whenever it appears conducive to the introduction of tyranny. To screen such characters from popular resentment and personal insult, I presume no prudent man would chuse to become surety. Those of our citizens who have from the very beginning of the illustrious conflict, hazarded their persons and property, will think it inequitable to receive such malignant into a full participation of all the blessings resulting from that independence, which, with the smiles of Providence, has by their conduct been so gloriously contended, and at so great expense and peril, bought out the very jaws of tyranny. There is, in some of our countries in particular, who have more eminently suffered by their wanton rage, so much to merit an aversion against this kind of gentry, that the more conspicuous which (generally the greatest sufferers) would think it extremely hard to proffer them all the immunities of that happy constitution, which they have at infinite risk been instrumental in establishing, while those monstrous-wretches meditating our destruction, spilling our blood, and actually wishing for our final enthrallment. And can they ever expect to regain the confidence of their late fellow subjects, whose very looks themselves must confound and abash them? Surely their mean spiritless in brooking to return to their country, circumstanced as they are, is only to be equalled by their guilt in deserting it. Should we not be much happier, together with the abolition of regal misrule, to purge the continent also of this political pollution, which must necessarily tarnish the luster, and may gradually infect some of the still incorrupted sons of America? Will it not be better policy to insist upon a perpetual separation from those whose intercourse with us must constantly revive the most painful ideas, and whose very presence among the genuine sons of the island, would seem as natural as that of Satan among the sons of God? The disgrace they have brought upon their native country can never be expunged but by excluding them. Let them, therefore, rather go into voluntary banishment, and settle some uninhabited island, rocky, if they please, as their hearts, and swear as their consciences, where, not having one honest man among them, but being all involved in the same atrocious and insupportable crime of perjury, nor any individual of the whole culprit-fraternity point at a greater scelerat than himself—There let them establish a system of vasalage most suitable to their own slavish dispositions; and erect an infamous monument in putrid memorial of those apostates from reason and converts to despotism, who fled from Justice, for an attempted assassination of Liberty. Or let them take sanctuary in a certain already settled island (probably their favorite spot, because contaminated with every species of infamy) where it is no bar to the royal favor to have embraced one's hands in a brother's blood, where the massacre and famishing of thousands has been rewarded with prerogative; and where no man need despair of promotion for being a rascal.

PRIZE COURT,

New York district.

This case will be first considered as it is disclosed by the ship's papers, and the preparatory examinations, and then will be examined the defence arising out of the further proof that was ordered and produced.

It appears by the papers, that the property in question was laden on board the ship Mary and Susan, at Liverpool, in England, some time in the month of July, 1812.

That the Mary and Susan is an American registered vessel, and that she sailed from Liverpool on the 16th July, 1812, on a voyage to New-York, with these goods on board, and under a charter party to John Richardson, styling himself an English merchant, residing in Liverpool.

That she had a licence on board, obtained from the British government, to protect her against capture by British cruisers.

That at the time of her departure information of the hostilities existing between the United States and Great Britain had not reached England.

That on the 3d September, 1812, she was captured as a prize by the privateer Ticker, and brought into the port of New-York.—The position in which she was taken has not been ascertained with precision. It is differently stated in the preparatory examinations which have been read, varying from 18 to 30 miles south of the light house.

It is also in evidence, that John Richardson, the person in whose behalf these goods are claimed, is a native subject of the king of Great Britain, but a naturalized citizen of the United States.

The national character of Mr. Richardson is the principal ground on which this cause must be decided; but before I proceed to consider, that to examine the effect of his naturalization here, and of his subsequent residence in England, with the explanation given of it, by the further proof which was ordered and produced, I wish to dispose of some other questions which were first raised as principal grounds of defence, in a preceding cause, and also relied on in this.

1st. It has been insisted, that this property was confided to the faith of the government, because laden on board an American vessel before the commencement of hostilities, and proceeding to its destined port in ignorance of that event.

2d. That it was captured within the territorial waters of the United States; thus under the protection of the government, and not subject to be made prize.

3d. That it was exempt from capture, because proceeding in an American vessel, and under the American flag.

In examining the points which have been stated, it will be necessary to advert to some general principles of the law of nations. In doing this, it will not be requisite to notice particularly its divisions into necessary, voluntary, conventional, customary or positive.

The law of nations, without defining or developing its divisions more minutely, may be stated to be, the law of nature, rendered applicable to political societies, and modified, in progress of time, by the tacit and express consent, by the long established usages and written compacts of nations: usages and compacts become so general, that every civilized people ought to recognize and adopt their principles.

A principle which is deducible from natural reason, and firmly established by the primitive law of war, the general law of nations, in which is not embraced, the conventional or customary law, is,

That as soon as war is declared, all the property of the enemy or his subjects, wherever found, whether on the land or on the water, is lawful prize. This position, it is presumed, will not be contested. It is laid down in terms thus broad by all the late as well as the early publicists. By Grotius, lib. 3, ch. 8 & 5. Puffendorf, ch. 8. Bynkershoek, ch. 2. Vattel, ch. 5, lib. 3. Martens, lib. 8, ch. 2.

If, then, enemy property under any circumstances be exempt from the rigorous operation of this principle, the exemption must be found in the conventional or customary law. That the rigor of this fundamental law has been relaxed by the express agreement of some nations, the tacit acquiescence and consequent customs of others, is freely admitted. The severity of the laws of war, and the stern exercise of many belligerent rights, have been gradually modified and ameliorated as civilization and refinement diffused their influence over the nations of the earth: national humanity has kept pace with the progress of science and religion, which gradually infused the benignity of their principles into the whole system of national intercourse. The enlarged views and intellectual improvement resulting from the one, gave efficacy to the precepts of the other, which taught all people that public, like municipal laws, were to be administered, not only in justice, but in mercy.

It was about the middle of the 17th century, that these enlightened views, were matured into a decisive and practical influence on the conduct of belligerent powers. That the ferocious and sanguinary spirit, which had uniformly distinguished national conflicts begun to abate. That war became more a contest between governments, than nations, between monarchs contending for political supremacy, with objects more direct and definite, than individual calamity. The petty pillage of a town and the oppression of individuals, whom accident or the pursuit of fortune, had placed within his power, ceased to add to the laurels of the prince, or the splendor of his throne; and this new view of national honor and magnanimity, this revolution in moral feeling, produced a correspondent revolution, in the practice, if not in the laws of war.

This, too, was an important epoch in the history of European commerce. Ever since the reign of Elizabeth, England had taken a conspicuous part in the politics of Europe. That active princess entered with spirit into the affairs of the continent, for the express purpose of extending the trade and commercial connexion of her kingdom. The impulse generated by her measures continued and extended its influence through the whole of the 17th century—and it was soon perceived, that a more liberal policy, towards each others subjects, at the commencement of hostilities, was necessary to the safety and convenience of commercial enterprise. To all the views and feelings, therefore, resulting from the increased wisdom and refinement of the times, were added the powerful motives of direct and evident interest.—That commerce might be beneficial, not only to individuals, but to the revenue of the state, it was necessary that those engaged in it should pass freely from one country to another, and dwell with safety wherever their pursuits might lead them. If, in times when princes were as capricious, when wars were as frequent quite, and undertaken for causes as trivial as at present, these excursions were to have been attended with captivity and confiscation, it is easy to perceive the evils that would inevitably interrupt the progress of the commercial system then contemplated and began.

In the progress of social improvement, therefore, we find the source of the desire to remedy these commercial embarrassments, and in that desire the proximate cause of the practice which now generally prevails among belligerents, of exempting from seizure the persons, and from confiscation the effects of each others subjects, within their respective territories, immediately on the commencement of hostilities. The form in which it first appeared, was that of giving notice to alien enemies to depart with their goods, and stipulations to this effect are first found in treaties made soon after that of Munster in 1647-8. During the violent and complicated wars, terminated by that convention, the property of hostile individuals, as usual, had been confiscated; but by the 24th article, restitution was agreed upon.—And in the treaty made 7 years afterwards between Cromwell and Lewis 14th, it was agreed, that in case of war, the merchants of the contracting powers should have six months to depart with their effects. This is the first stipulation of the kind I have found in a treaty.

I am aware that in England some regulations favorable to the freedom of commercial pursuits had been adopted at an earlier period, as appears by the 30th chapter of Magna Charta, and a statute passed in the reign of Edward III. But these were local and municipal regulations, and failed to produce an immediate or decisive effect on the customs of Europe, although they may have prepared the way for the treaty stipulations to which I have alluded.

Notwithstanding the precedent which had been established, and the concurring motives of interest and humanity which demanded an amelioration of the first severities of war, the safety of alien enemies, and their effects, rested for a long time, exclusively, on the special stipulations of treaties. So late as the period when Bynkershoek wrote, the beginning of the last century, they received no sort of favor or protection, unless there existed a treaty to that effect, between the belligerent states. Even Vattel recognizes the relaxation of the ancient rule as a modern practice. From recent instances, and from finding the provision in question, in some of our latest treaties, it is even doubtful now, whether it has acquired the force of a national custom, and whether the confiscation of enemies goods, in the country, at the commencement of hostilities, if not protected by treaty, would be deemed a violation of the law of nations, or a mere departure from a recent practice.

In the war in which we are now engaged, it is conceded, that the rule is to be applied, and having briefly traced its origin and progress, it remains to examine its extent.

It will appear, I think, from the authorities which must govern us, that no effects belonging to an alien enemy, but such as are under particular circumstances within the country at the commencement of hostilities, has ever been deemed by the law of nations or the usages of war, under the safeguard of public faith where special compacts do not vary the general rule. No other property is within the modification of the law. All that comes into the country subsequent to the declaration of war, is still subject to seizure and confiscation, where there is no treaty on the subject.—We have none with England that can arrest or suspend the application of this principle. In the treaty between the United States and Prussia, the contracting parties stipulated that in case of war, the subjects of each other should be allowed nine months to settle their affairs and depart with their effects; and the 26th article of the treaty of '94 with England, is somewhat similar. Both obviously relate to property in the country at the commencement of hostilities, and therefore under the protection of the government.

In an examination of the present question, but little aid can be derived from the early writers on national law—Grotius and Puffendorf and their cotemporaries, who explain with great minuteness, the duties and obligations arising from the primitive laws of war, afford no light on a principle unrecognized in practice, at a period when the physical force of nations was not limited in its exercise by those rules which have since derived authority from the acquiescence of a more refined age. The exemption of enemies property from confiscation under any circumstances, formed no part of the martial policy of that day.

Bynkershoek, as has already been noticed, states in his 7th chapter, that all enemies goods in the country at the commencement of war, is confiscated, unless protected by treaty. In chap. 3, when treating of the suspension of commercial intercourse between enemies, he says, “it is clear that the goods of enemies brought into our country, are liable to confiscation.”

Vattel confines the exemption expressly to goods in the country at the time war is announced. I shall give his words, for I may perhaps have occasion to make another remark upon them:

“The sovereign declaring war, can neither detain those subjects of the enemy who are within his dominions at the time of the declaration, nor their effects—they came into his country on the public faith. By permitting them to enter his territories, and continue there, he tacitly promised them liberty and security for their return; he is therefore to allow them a reasonable time for withdrawing with their effects; and, if they stay beyond the term prescribed, he has a right to treat them as enemies—though as enemies disarmed.”

This embraces all the law on the subject; for, although recognized, it is no where distinctly stated.

Martens, more rigid in the application of the rule, says—

“Where there are neither treaties nor laws touching these points nations continue still to seize on all the property belonging to their enemies subjects which is carried into their territories after the declaration of war.”—This goes directly to the point before us—and I shall add an extract from Chitty to the same effect. He says, that

“In strict justice, the right of seizure can take effect only on those possessions of a belligerent which have come to the hands of his adversary after the declaration of hostilities.”

In another place he observes, “the prohibition of Vattel reaches to the exemption only of goods in our hands, at the time of the declaration, and does not cover property coming into our territory after that declaration.”

That the exemption of Vattel embraces only goods in the country at the rupture is perfectly plain; and I think it open to an inquiry, whether a still more rigid rule may not be fairly extracted from the terms in which it is expressed, which is, whether not only the property but the owner, the claimant, must have been within the country before the war, to entitle either to Governmental protection.

Personal property follows the rights of the person. On general principles, therefore, unless the person claiming is entitled to protection, his property cannot be. The persons, according to Vattel, entitled to protection, are those who were in the country at the declaration of war. They must be permitted to return with their effects. And it seems to me, that the exemption of hostile property from seizure is founded entirely on this personal right, and that this right is derived from the circumstance of having come into the country before the war, and therefore on the public faith. In common with all other general rules, this must ever be subservient to the express stipulations of a treaty. As it does not seem necessary, I shall not now examine whether such exist between the United States and Great Britain.

These remarks are only the partial result of a general investigation, and not a direct examination of the principle they embrace. They are therefore particularly open to correction.

This particular branch of the subject has been examined with some care, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there were any and if so, what circumstances that could take enemy property not in the country out of the operation of the general rule, clearly established by the authorities which have been referred to; and I am constrained to say, that not a single dictum has been found, except that in Azzuni, to which I shall have occasion to refer, claiming the safeguard of public faith for property not actually within our territorial limits at the commencement of the war. The inference appears to me irresistible that no extension of the principle is intended.

It would seem to follow, then, under the rule which appears to me to be established by that public law which must control the decisions of this court, that if this must be considered enemy property, it is subject to capture and condemnation as prize.

Whether the result of my examinations be correct, or otherwise to attempt to show, after what has been said, that the property in question is not protected because laden, and proceeding in ignorance of the war, would be superfluous and irregular. But indulging, as I do, a proper diffidence in my own opinion of the law, on a subject so novel and important I must be permitted to fortify it, by attempting to develop what I conceive to be the practice of other nations who profess to be governed by it.

In the doctrines held and enforced by G. Britain, we may perhaps find a satisfactory exposition of the law in cases like this we are discussing. And if in a war with her we adopt the construction of her own government and the practice of her own courts, we can afford no just ground of complaint.

In examining these we shall find not only that the English prize courts are in the constant habit of condemning property brought in ignorant of the war when captured, but property in port at the commencement of hostilities, and even property captured before the war, but in contemplation of that event. The only difficulty and discussion that ever occurred on the subject in that country, was to whose benefit the condemnation should inure, whether to the Lord High Admiral, or since the abolition of that office to the king in his office of Admiralty, or to him jure coronæ.

During the usurpation of Cromwell, the office of Lord High Admiral was in various ways depressed, and its perquisites reduced. The protector found them valuable, and it became his policy and his interest, not only to engross and direct their application to unusual purposes, but to abolish the office itself.

From time immemorial, captures made from the enemy under particular circumstances, had been considered as perquisites of the Admiral and under the name of Droits of Admiralty, appropriated to support the dignity and splendor of his station. The sinister policy and distracted views of the government at this period, introduced much confusion as to the distribution of the revenue arising from these sources; and at the restoration, the distinction between Droits of Admiralty and direct forfeitures to the crown, was ill understood, and but little regarded in practice. With the regular settlement of the government, however, the Lord High Admiral began to claim, what had once been considered the rights and emoluments of his office, which produced much animated discussion between him and the king. The controversy was at length referred to the greatest lawyers and ablest civilians in the kingdom. From their combined wisdom resulted an order of the Privy Council, which, with great apparent precision, designated the rights and settled the conflicting pretensions of these worthy brothers.

This order in council bears date the 6th March, 1665. As far as relates to this subject it remains unaltered, and at this day governs the decisions and practice of the British prize courts.

Independent of all other matter, a reference to the terms of this order alone, will abundantly show, that property coming in ignorant of the war, is subject, in England, to seizure and confiscation.

The part of the order connected with this question, is in these words:—

“All ships and goods belonging to enemies, coming into any port, creek or road, of his majesty's kingdom of England or of Ireland, by stress of weather, or other accident, or by mistake of port, or by ignorance, not knowing of the war, do belong to the Lord High Admiral.”

Enemy's ships and goods, then, coming into a port, creek or road, not knowing of the war, are condemned to the Admiral. But the coming in must be voluntary, unconnected at least, with any circumstances resulting from the war, to constitute a droight of Admiralty. But what if it be not so? The answer of Sir William Scott is plain.

“When vessels come in not under any motive arising out of the occasions of war, but from distress of weather or want of provisions, or from ignorance of war, and are seized in port, they belong to the Lord High Admiral. But where the hand of violence has been exercised upon them, where it arises from acts connected with war, &c. they belong to the crown.”

Thus far, then, we have an exposition of this order, and therefore of the British practice, which is still regulated by it, showing, conclusively, that ignorance of the war does not avert a forfeiture, and that under this part of the order these goods would not be droights of admiralty, because the hand of violence has been upon them; because her coming in arose from acts connected with war.

A practical illustration of these principles captured in ignorance of the war, or lying at liberty in port at the commencement of hostilities, or in any way seized or detained before the declaration of war. Danckebaan, African, the Hersteller, and the Rebecca, in 1 Robinson, and the Maria Francaise, in 6 Robinson—all these vessels, I believe, were captured in ignorance of the war.

The word "coming" Mr. Brown says, in his "civil and admiralty law" is worthy of attention; and so indeed it is in an English prize court. He goes on to say, in the words of sir William Scott, extracted verbatim from the case of the Rebecca, "it has, by usage, been construed to include ships and goods, already come into ports, creeks or roads, &c." and in consequence of this construction, he adds, "all vessels detained in port, and found there at the breaking out of hostilities are condemned." Jure coronæ of the king.

This practice of condemning vessels in port at the breaking out of hostilities is founded exclusively on this strange construction of the order; and it is remarkable enough, that they are condemned jure coronæ to the king. The claim of the admiral is defeated, I presume, by the circumstance that they were not enemy's vessels when they came in, as he is entitled only to enemy's vessels coming in.

Another part of the order is, "all such ships as shall be seized in any of the ports, creeks or roads of this kingdom, or of Ireland, before any declaration of war or reprisal by his majesty, do belong unto his majesty."

Under this is probably sanctioned the condemnation of property detained by embargo, before war is declared; and hence, also, property captured before the war, under whatever pretence or mistaken motive, will be condemned if hostilities commence before the adjudication. Sir Wm. Scott says, that "the person claiming, must not only be entitled to restitution at the time of seizure, but he must be in a capacity to claim at the time of adjudication." This, at first view, would seem to be at variance with the general rule or practice already assented to, that property in the country is not liable to confiscation.—But the reason of the distinction no doubt is, that property thus situated came in by coercion, and furnishes conclusive evidence that the rule exempting hostile property from confiscation, must be strictly construed, that under the diversified circumstances and various situations in which it may be placed and captured, the public faith is only pledged for the protection of that which was not only in the power of the adversary, but had been voluntarily brought within his territory, and placed within his power before the commencement of hostilities.

Thus, then, I think it appears, where there is no reciprocal agreement to prevent it, that property is condemned in England, although

In opposition to this practice, and to what I conceive to be the clear and established laws of war in such cases, a passage from Azuni has been cited in these words:

"A merchant vessel that happens to be at sea when the nation to which it belongs enters into a war cannot be captured on its arriving at an enemy's port in right of the war which has supervened between the two nations. He ought then to be under the safe guard of the public faith."

What he ought to be, and what he is allowed to be, by the usages and customs of nations, are very different things. Each of us might in our closets devise many humane and beneficial modifications of the laws of war; but to what purpose? The whims and reveries of authors do not govern nations at this day; it requires the sanction of the civilized world to invest them with the force and authority of laws.

The passage is remarkable, because it has neither the opinion of any publicist, nor the practice of any nation to support it.—Tis true he refers to two treaties for a recognition of this principle, and two individual instances of personal magnanimity. The one extracted from a French newspaper. On this authority he has announced a new law to belligerent nations. Surely the provisions of two treaties are not binding on nations not parties to them, nor can personal magnanimity establish a rule for the government of the world.

This principle of Azuni has not yet, and I will venture to predict, never will become part of the law of nations, and it never ought, if wars are, as they should be, commenced only for just causes and with legitimate views.

The end of a just war is to obtain a remuneration for some loss sustained or injury received; and after announcing to the world that force will be employed to obtain that which is withheld, can it be necessary in every individual case of attack to send a herald to proclaim your intention, that your adversary may be prepared to resist. Thus hazarding a loss equal to that which it is sought to repair.

On a careful perusal of the work in which this doctrine is advanced, I think it will be found that to whatever consideration it may be entitled as a work of ingenuity and research, it is unworthy of much weight as an authority. It was produced, if not under the dictation of a distracted government, yet in some degree for the purpose of supporting the alterations it proposed in the maritime law of nations, and under the operation of prejudices too strong to admit of an impartial examination of a national question.

It was obviously written, under the innovating influence of the times; at a period, when the inflamed passions of men, and the convulsed energies of nations were uprooting the foundations of social and political order. When new systems of policy, of municipal and public law, were every where springing up with a luxuriance that threatened to confound all established principles, and perplexed the soundest understandings. When intellectual efforts were perverted, by the captivating novelties and splendid plausibilities engendered "in that season of fulness, which opened" upon the world with the French revolution. When changes and innovations, eccentric in their nature, and infinitely various in their character, overwhelmed every system of ethics and philosophy, which laborious wisdom had devised, or time consecrated. Absorbed or dissipated all that was fantastic in superstition or venerable in orthodox opinion, while the victorious eagles of a frenzied people, indiscriminately overshadowed or subverted all the monuments of human folly, and all that remained of ancient grandeur.

From sources so agitated if not polluted, nothing satisfactory can be drawn. The oracles of wisdom are seldom uttered amidst scenes of tumult and commotion. We must look back beyond the troubles of these latter days for wise rules, and trace their modifications and present form, through the acknowledged and uniform practice of settled and civilized nations. That is at variance with this novel suggestion, and it cannot be admitted on an authority so questionable.

It is alleged—

2dly. That this property was captured within the territorial waters of the United States, and therefore not subject to be made prize.

There is something so novel in this position, and in the arguments which it has suggested, that it is difficult to reduce them to a systematic examination.

It would be easy to explain the foundation of the jurisdictional right of every nation, to those portions of the sea that wash its shores. To show that the source from which it is derived is self-preservation. That this sovereignty is assumed by, and concedes to each, for the preservation of its own peace, to avoid the evils that may result from a warfare between others, prosecuted within its immediate vicinity. But whatever may have been the origin of this claim, or by whatever reasons sustained, the precise nature of this sovereignty is involved in some obscurity. It will, however, be unnecessary to investigate that minutely in order to explain the difficulty which the argument on this branch of the subject was intended to present. By examining the constitution of the admiralty and prize courts, and the power derived to the captors by the prize commission, it will become obvious that it has no connexion at all with the general question of prize—that it affords protection under particular circumstances to a friend never to an enemy—that it is an appendage, (if I may use the term,) to a neutral territory—but does not, and cannot exist between belligerents.

The common admiralty jurisdiction, (as Comyn calls it) extends to all things done super altum mare. The prize jurisdiction is not thus limited. It embraces the whole question of prize, unrestrained by the locality of the capture: It takes cognizance of all captures, no matter where made, if made as prize. The validity of the capture depends on the "jusbelli" as determined by the law of nations. The effect and ultimate direction of the forfeiture depends on the rights granted by the terms of the commission, as explained by legal definitions, and recognized by universal usage.

What, then, does the prize commission grant?

To make captures of enemy goods on the high seas, limiting the power intended to be conveyed by the very terms that limit the common admiralty jurisdiction.

By ascertaining the extent of that jurisdiction, we must necessarily discover, what is meant by the high seas, and thus the interest derived from this capture.

Wood gives the answer of the judges of the realm to the complaints of the admiral concerning prohibitions granted by the common law courts. In different places, they say, "by the laws of this realm, the court of the admiralty has no cognizance of jurisdiction of any manner of contract, plead within any country of the realm, either upon the land or the water. It is not material whether the place be upon the water infra fluxum and refluxum aqua, but whether it be upon any water within any country, taking that to be the sea, wherein the admiral hath jurisdiction, which is before by law described to be out of any country."

Comyn says, "the admiralty has jurisdiction in matters on the main sea, or coasts of the sea, not being part of the body of any country. And if it be between high and low water mark when the sea flows; for then it is super altum mare, though upon the reflux it be infra corpus comitatus."

The admiralty, then, has jurisdiction on all waters, not infra corpus comitatus; and how is it given? by the very terms contained in this commission. All waters, therefore, not comprehended within the body of a country, constitute a part of the high sea: unless it can be shown, then, that this capture was made within the limits of a country, it was well made, and vests an interest in the captors.

In analogy to the British practice, it has been contended, that by reason of the locality of the capture, the forfeiture must go to the government, in the nature of a droight of admiralty, because included, I presume, in the terms of the British order, which gives a direction to the forfeiture. But we have neither droights of admiralty, nor such an order; the whole subject must be regulated by the commission and instructions. We can only discover what has been reserved to the government, by ascertaining what has been granted. They have authorised captures on the high seas, which I think has been shown to include the spot where this capture was made.

If ever we had droights of admiralty, and an exact copy of that order in force here, still the forfeiture would go to the captors. The place of capture is not embraced by either of the terms used in it, as appears clearly in 2 Brown, 61, and by the exposition given of them by sir William Scott in 1 Robinson, 194.

It is insisted—

3dly. That this property is exempt from capture, because proceeding in an American vessel, and under the American flag.

This objection would seem to be sufficiently answered by the principles already laid down. The same rules that explain the admiralty jurisdiction, and designate the limits between it and the common law jurisdiction, must determine what, under the law of nations, is to be considered in the territory, so as to exempt it from capture. It must be within the common law jurisdiction, within the body of a country.

The notion that vessels must be considered as part of the territory of a nation, is antiquated and exploded. The most strenuous advocates for the freedom of goods in free ships, no longer place the controversy on that ground.

The principle first formally promulgated in the Consolato del mare about the 12th century, that enemy property was good prize on board free ships, has certainly been contested at different periods. It has sometimes been admitted and rejected by the same and by different nations: but the high authority of that celebrated code, has generally prevailed where treaty stipulations did not establish a different rule. Within our own times it has been attempted with great force and with much spirit, to establish a different principle, but it was lost with the scattered fragments of the armed neutrality.

Amidst the uproar of the world, the flag, too, has dwindled into a vain emblem of sovereignty; protecting nothing, certainly, but the vessel, and designating only to what portion of the globe she belongs. These are the principles of England. They were recognized by our government in its correspondence with the French minister in the year 1793 and I am not prepared to deny that they are founded in reason.

The additional instructions issued by the president, have been relied on as a ground of defence. These instructions were prepared and dated at the city of Washington, the 26th August. On the 29th they were known here. The privateer Tickler was then at sea, and there is no evidence at all to show that she had a knowledge of them at the time this capture was made, to wit, the 3d September. Indeed all presumption is against it. Considering, then, the captain of this privateer is ignorant of these instructions, and under these circumstances of the case he must be so considered, I am of opinion that they could have no effect or operation on his conduct. There is a material difference between acting in ignorance of a supreme legislative act and of executive orders. The one affords no impunity to the commission of a crime: the publication of a law enacted by the known public authority of the country, which operates upon every member of the community is the only notice, which, in the nature of things, can be given of it. A knowledge of it must be presumed ex necessitate, from the impossibility of giving to it farther publicity. But a private executive instruction, for the government of a certain class of public agents, can be made known to them in a different manner, and must be so before they can be governed by it. In short, the one is a public, the other a private instrument. Ignorance of the one cannot be alleged, but the other cannot be obeyed unless known. A law operates until repealed with the same solemnity with which it was enacted. An instruction must be obeyed until revoked, with the same formality with which it was given. The original instruction was given and communicated to the commanders of these vessels, and another intended to annul or supercede it, must be given and communicated to them in like manner to produce that effect; until then the first instruction is their only rule of action. Again—this is a warlike operation. Considering, then, these instructions of the president in a military point of view, is not every act done under the one legal and effectual until another is communicated? If the libellants had been instructed to capture property of this description; would they not have been bound to do so, until an order interdicting it was received?

The case has been likened to captures made after a treaty of peace signed; but there is not the least similitude. To capture enemy property is a right of war. If there be no war, there can be no capture. The right to capture is during war, and is extinguished with it, co instante. Some publicists have contended, even that a capture is good till notice of peace received—But that is exploded.

I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that these instructions can have no weight under the circumstances of this case

But suppose, for a moment, that they were to have effect—that they were known or though not known, that still they were binding. That, it seems to me, would only raise a question between the government and the captors. If this be enemy property, this court would not restore it. If the captors have no claim, it would be condemned to the government.

But from the best view I am able to take of these additional instructions, it appears to me, that they were not intended to touch the case of enemy property. It is well known, that at the commencement of the war, American vessels, laden in most cases with American property, were molested and captured by privateers, with the view to a condemnation on the ground of being engaged in an illegal trade with the enemy. As these vessels sailed in ignorance of the war, the government thought, that under all the circumstances of the case, they were entitled to consideration and lenity. These instructions, then were issued to protect American vessels and American property from molestation before their arrival, without intending, in my judgment, to interfere with the question of prize in relation to enemy property. If it were otherwise, it would prevent the ease of the executive abrogating, not only a right already vested by law, but one which is universally given and recognized in modern warfare—to capture enemy property on the high seas, and a proceeding resulting in nothing but drawing the forfeiture to the government; thus frustrating the very objects which had led these people to this species of warfare; to capture hostile property within the limits prescribed by their commission.—I cannot give to these orders a construction that will lead to this conclusion.

The last question to be considered is—

Whether Mr. Richardson, in whose behalf this property is claimed, is, for the purposes of this proceeding, entitled to all the rights and immunities of an American citizen.

In the prosecution of this inquiry, I shall not stop to examine whether a naturalization, obtained for special and temporary, and not for general and permanent purposes, can be valid and effectual? Whether a government is bound, under any circumstances, to protect a citizen or subject, who not only withdraws voluntarily from the performance of every duty, but who, for nearly "twice the period that ordinary calculation assign to the continuance of human life," incorporates himself and his resources with the numbers and the wealth of another nation?

These, in my judgment, are questions well worthy of consideration, and less easy of solution than seems to be apprehended. But, as I have already exceeded the limits usually observed on occasions of this sort, I shall wave their discussion now, and notice only the more limited difficulties suggested by the course of the argument.

The facts relative to Mr. Richardson's naturalization here, and residence abroad, as disclosed by the further proof which was ordered, are these:

It appears that he was naturalized as a citizen of the United States in the year 1795, according to the laws then in force on that subject; that in 1797 he went to England; that in 1799 he came again to this country, and returned to England in 1800—where he continued to reside till March 1813, making a residence of 16 years in England, with the exception of a visit to this country of a few months. The effect of that will presently be noticed.

It is contended by the captors that this residence constitutes a domicile under the law of nations. A commercial residence, within the principles of prize law, investing the claimant with all the characteristics of a British trader, and involving him in all the consequences and all the evils incident to that character.

I think it may be assumed as a principle, that the law of nations, without regarding the municipal regulations prescribed for his admission, views every man as a member of the society in which he is found. Residence is prima facie evidence of national character; susceptible, however, at all times, of explanation. If it be for a special purpose, and transient in its nature, it shall not destroy the original or prior national character. But if it be taken up animus manendi, with the intention of remaining, then it becomes a domicil, superadding to the original or prior character, the rights and privileges, as well as the disabilities and penalties of a citizen or subject of the country in which the residence is established.

"The domicile," says Fattel, "is the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there. A man does not then establish his domicile in any place, unless he makes sufficiently known his intention of fixing there, either tacitly, or by an express declaration."

Again—"The natural or original domicile is that given us by birth, where our father had his; and we are considered as retaining it, till we have abandoned it in order to chose another. The domicile acquired, is that where we settle by our own choice."

This is the general principle, determining the national character solely by the domicile, whether natural or acquired. As the original domicile is given by birth, it requires no explanation. But what shall constitute an acquired domicile?

Although the definition given of it, appears at first view sufficiently plain, yet in analyzing it, we have soon to encounter an important difficulty. When shall the intention to remain be deemed to exist? If it be not openly declared, when, as Vattel expresses it, shall it be deemed to be tacitly made known? What shall be evidence of the animus manendi and determine the intention?

In order to ascertain this, we must resort to the exposition of able magistrates, whose duty it has been to expound and apply this public law: we must descend into an examination of the judgments and official acts of tribunals sitting and deciding under the law of nations.

It has been contended that the practical illustration of this doctrine, derived from the course and practice of the prize courts, justifies the following conclusions:

1st. That no residence establishes a domicile to any hostile purpose, or operating a condemnation of goods, but that which is either taken up or continued after the commencement of hostilities.

2d. That on the breaking out of war, a citizen or subject of one belligerent country, has a right to return from the other, and bring with him, or withdraw from them, his goods and effects.

I think the consideration of these propositions will embrace all the arguments, and lead to an examination of all the authorities which are in any way applicable to the merits of this cause.

It must be remembered, that the principle laid down by Vattel is general, and must be universal in its application. It has no relation, whatever, to either a state of war or peace. The different authorities which have been cited, must all be examined with a reference to that.

The most general view which has been taken of this subject by sir Wm. Scott, is in the case of the Harmony, 2 Rob. 266.

"Of the few principles," he says, "that can be laid down generally, I may venture to hold, that time is the grand ingredient in constituting domicile. I think that hardly enough is attributed to its effects; in most cases it is unavoidably conclusive; it is not unfrequently said, that if a person comes only for a special purpose, that shall not fix a domicile. This is not to be taken in an unqualified latitude, and without some respect had to the time which such a purpose may, or shall occupy; for if the purpose be of a nature that may, probably, or does actually detain the person for a great length of time, I cannot but think that a general residence might grow upon the special purpose. That against such a long residence, the plea of an original, special purpose could not be averred; it must be inferred, in such a case, that other purposes forced themselves upon him, and mixed themselves with his original design, and impressed upon him the character of the country where he resided.

Surely, if terms can be explicit, and language can be plain, this is so. There is in it, not the least allusion to a state of hostilities, or to a belligerent country. The terms are as comprehensive as those of Vattel.—Showing, that residence alone, wherever it may be, is the source and foundation of domicil, and that from the length of the residence is derived the evidence of an intention to remain. If this be not so, why is time the grand ingredient in constituting domicile? If residence in a hostile country were necessary, that would be the grand ingredient, the characteristic feature in this acquired character, which works a forfeiture of goods.

But it is said, that the further remarks of this great authority in the same case, furnish an inference unfavorable to the opinion I have expressed.

"Suppose a man comes into a belligerent country at or before the beginning of a war; it is certainly reasonable not to bind him too soon, to an acquired character, and to allow him a fair time to disengage himself."

From this I should draw an argument directly the reverse of that which it has been cited to support—why is it too soon to bind him to an acquired character, who comes into a belligerent country at or before the beginning of a war? Most assuredly because he had not, by a residence previous to the war, established a domicil, or manifested his intention to remain. His residence had been too short to afford evidence of a determination to fix his habitation there.—He shall, therefore, be permitted to make his election, to retire, and be allowed a fair time to disengage himself. If this claimant had arrived in England at, or immediately preceding the war, we would have had a very different case to examine.

K

Sir William Scott proceeds. In proof, &c. see 2 Rob. p. 267.

He here supposes an American to go to Europe—not to any particular hostile country, and to remain for five years, intimating distinctly that it would fix on him the national character of the country in which he was thus established.

It appears also, from the same case, that one of the Murray's was considered by the common law of England, as a British trader, subject to the bankrupt laws of that kingdom. How a British trader? Hostilities did not exist then between that country and this. He had acquired, therefore, the character of a British trader, by a residence in time of peace. It is that character that brought him within the operation of these local laws, and that character that would work a condemnation of his property in the prize courts of a nation at war with England.

This case is so replete with information on this subject, that I shall notice one other passage, found in the judgment of the court.

"Well, I have said, is a great agent in these matters, and I should have been glad to have heard any instance quoted, on the part of Mr. Murray, in which a residence of four years, connected with a former residence, was deemed capable of any explanation."

It is true, that the residence of the claimant, in that case, was in a hostile country; but it is equally true, that in the passages to which I have referred, the court lays down the general principles, without any reference whatever to that fact, as is obvious from the context and his general reasoning on the subject.

The case of the Indian Chief, 3 Rob. p. 17, affords much light on this question. This vessel was seized in a British port where she came for orders, on a voyage from an enemy colony to Hamburg. The claimant was a native American, and the court, after stating that fact says:—

"He came, however, to this country in 1763, and engaged in trade, and has resided in this country till 1797—during that period he was undoubtedly to be considered as an English trader, for no position is more established than this, that if a person goes into another country, and engages in trade and resides there, he is by the law of nations, to be considered as a merchant of that country: I should therefore have no doubt in pronouncing that Mr. Johnson was to be considered as a merchant of this country, at the time of the sailing of this vessel on her outward voyage."

The vessel sailed in 1795. The residence in this case was 12 years.

In the case of Mr. Miller, the claimant of the cargo of this vessel, the principle under consideration was applied with great rigor.

He was an American citizen and American consul, resident in some of the remote possessions of Great Britain, in India. He was for that reason pronounced by the court of admiralty, a British merchant, and his property condemned for being engaged in a trade prohibited to British subjects.

It is very manifest, therefore, that foreigners, who reside in Great Britain and enter into trade, are considered by the government and courts of that country, in pursuance of the general principle of the law of nations, as British merchants entitled to all the privileges, and subject to all the restrictions of the native merchants, of that kingdom.

It also appears from other cases that the principle is impartially and universally applied. That their own subjects when settled abroad, are allowed all the benefits, and held to all the restraints of the native subjects of the country in which they reside.— If resident in a neutral country, they are treated as neutral merchants, and may trade freely, even with the enemies of their native land.

This general rule, is given by sir Wm. Scott in the case of the Emanuel 1, Rob. 249.

"The general rule is, that a person living bona fide in a neutral country, is fully entitled to carry on a trade to the same extent as the native merchants of the country in which he resides."

In the cases of the Dree Gebroeders 4th Rob. 191, and the Adriana 1 Rob. 263, the rule is exemplified. Grant and Boland, the respective claimants, were both native subjects of Great Britain, claiming the American character. It does not appear that they were ever naturalized in this country. The court makes no allusion to that circumstance, with the view, no doubt, if the fact were so, to avoid discussing the question of naturalization. He examines nothing but their residence, and admits, that if they had sufficiently proved it to have been in this country, they would have been entitled to a neutral character.

In the case of La Virginie, 5 Rob. 91, a Frenchman claimed the benefit of the American character, and it is fully admitted by the court, that if he had sufficiently made out his residence to have been in this country, he would have been entitled to restoration as a neutral.

So it has been decided, even by the lords on appeal, that a British born subject, resident at Lisbon, acquires by that circumstance, the Portuguese character, and can trade with impunity with the enemies of England. But it would seem by a recent decision, that the same rights are allowed to British subjects resident in this country. There are a very great variety of cases as well in the common law books, as in the admiralty decisions, which have a bearing in point of principle on this question; but it cannot be necessary, nor is it now convenient to analyze them all. From all I think it appears very conclusively, that residence gives national character, independent of the political state or condition of the country in which it is established. Whether the native country, or the adopted country be at war or peace is perfectly immaterial. By residence neutrals become belligerents, and belligerents neutrals.

But the question constantly recurs; what is, what constitutes this residence? And it certainly is not easy to answer it with precision. It must be such a residence, however, as will stop the party from saying, that he came for a special or temporary purpose; such as will fix upon him the animus manendi the intention to remain. The residence itself, as I have said, is prima facie evidence of the intention; if continued it becomes in process of time conclusive. In the case of the Indian Chief, twelve years was decided to have that effect. In the case of the Emden, ten years was said to fix the national character. In that of the Harmony, four years was declared not susceptible of explanation.

In this case there has been a residence of sixteen years, with the exception of a visit to this country. It is well established that a temporary excursion, either to the country of the original domicil, or to any other, shall not be deemed to interrupt the residence; the time previous to the absence shall attach to that subsequent, and constitute a continued residence.

But taking the time most favorably to the claimant, there is an uninterrupted residence of thirteen years, which, in my judgment, is unavoidably conclusive.

In this case, most especially, Mr. Richardson is a native British subject, and the same authority, so often quoted, says:—

“It is always to be remembered, that the native character easily reverts; and that it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicil in the case of a native subject, than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country.”

La Virginie, 5 Rob. 91.—This rule applies here with great force. It does not appear, from any evidence that has been produced, that Mr. R. was recognized in England as a citizen of America; and upon the general principle held by the government of that country, we must presume, that he mingled again with the mass of its population, as a legitimate, complete British subject, enjoying all the rights and advantages of that character, without being subject to any of the restrictions and inconveniences of an American citizen. It does not appear, that even after the war, he was, by himself, or by others, considered liable to the ordinary evils incident to the citizens of a hostile country.

There may be other evidence of the intention than that which mere length of residence affords. The intention may be openly declared, publicly made known, and that however short the residence may be, shall establish the domicil.

Whitehill had been but two days in the enemy country when war was declared; but he had previously avowed his intention to remain, and his property was condemned.

It has been alledged that Mr. Richardson was established in Liverpool as a commission merchant only, and that he was not engaged in general commerce; that is wholly immaterial—quo ad, this shipment he can only be recognized as a merchant; his domicil is established, and this transaction imparts to it a commercial character.

Having endeavoured to show how a domicil is established, how a foreign commercial character is acquired, it will be proper to inquire how it is divested; how a citizen of one country can disengage himself and his property from the effects and consequences of a residence established in another; and this brings me to an examination of the last point which I have proposed to consider.

It is insisted that Mr. Richardson being a naturalized citizen of the United States, had a right to withdraw his property from the hostile country.

As a general proposition, I think this cannot be maintained: it is by no means clear, that a citizen or subject of one belligerent can stricti juris withdraw any thing from the territories of the other. It is no doubt true, that bona fide cases of this kind are treated with indulgence; and that, from motives of public policy, the general principles of the laws of war are not unfrequently relaxed and accommodated to the sufferings and peculiar circumstances of individuals.

But it is of no use to discuss the principle, unless the facts disclosed can bring the case within it.

It is both proved and admitted, that this property was shipped before the declaration of war was known to the claimant, and it is difficult to conceive how property can be claimed here as withdrawn from the hostile country, when it was sent before the claimant was apprized that the respective nations were at war. This difficulty is increased by the full proof before the court that these goods were shipped for sales and returns; they were not sent to remain here, and wait the arrival of the owner. It is clearly established by the papers, that they were to be sold as soon as might be convenient, and the avails remitted to him in England. All expectations of success, therefore, from this source, must certainly be ill founded.

It is farther urged, that Mr. Richardson's affidavit and others, offered as further proof, show that he intended to return to this country. The affidavits which have been produced to this point, are those of Robert Falkner, James Mills and John Sill. Their affidavits go to show, that Mr. Richardson, while in England, at different times expressed an intention to return to America, if the orders in council, complained of by this country, were not repealed, and the commercial intercourse between the two countries restored. Mr. Richardson himself deposes that he did make these declarations, and did entertain that intention.

These facts are well proved, and the claimant is entitled to the full benefit of them. But however distinctly these declarations were made and repeated, and however earnest and decisive that intention may have been, I held on the authority of the judgment in the case of the President, and many others, that it is perfectly immaterial and unavailing in a prize court.

"A mere intention to remove," said Sir Wm Scott, "has never been held sufficient, without some overt act, being merely an intention, residing secretly and undistinguishably in the breast of the party, and liable to be revoked every hour. The expressions of the letter in which this intention is said to be found, are, I observe, very weak and general; of an intention merely in futuro, were they even much stronger than they are, they would not be sufficient; something more than mere verbal declaration; some solid fact, showing that the party is in the act of withdrawing, has always been held necessary in such cases."

Besides the intention which was entertained, rested wholly on a contingency, the alternative of which might instantly have obliterated this impression from his mind, and produced a determination not to return. This, in fact, must have been the state of the claimant's mind at the moment this shipment was made. He knew not of the war, and the only assigned cause for his intention to return to America was removed. In his opinion the orders in council were so revoked that the usual commercial intercourse between the two countries would be soon restored. Under that supposition these goods were shipped, and from his own showing therefore, I am not only authorised, but bound to presume, that the intention to return to this country did not at that moment exist.

But if it had so existed, the judgment in the case of the Indian Chief—3 Rob. 24, shows how insufficient and ineffectual it is considered in the prize courts of England. It is there most decisively stated—that the character acquired by residence, ceases only by non residence—That it ceases only from the time the party turns his back on the country where he has resided, on his way to his own—That it adheres to him till the moment he puts himself in motion, bona fide to quit the country of his residence, sine animo revertendi. The vessel, in that case, was the property of a Mr. Johnson, a native American, but who had for some time resided in England, She was seized as being engaged in a trade with the enemies of England. The court distinctly determined, that if Johnson had remained in England till the time of seizure, she would have been condemned as the property of a British merchant; but as he had left the country on his way to America, he must be deemed to be in pursuit of, and to have revived his native character—and for that reason only she was restored.

So in the case of Curtisias; he had been resident in an enemy colony, but had left it before the capture of his property, and was actually on his way home. The lords, on appeal decided, that as he had put himself in motion towards his own country, as he was in itinere he was entitled to restitution. There are other decisions of these distinguished authorities, showing, that the character which residence gives, can only be divested by an actual departure from the country in which it is established, or at least some act that may be deemed an actual commencement of his movement from it, and a real substantial effort to regain his native or prior domicile. The principle of these decisions I shall adopt in this case, because I think it founded in good sense, and furnishing the only practicable application of a rule, intended to ameliorate the strict laws of war. If the rule be not thus restricted, and thus applied, there will be no end to alleged intentions of returning. If a previously declared intention is to justify exportations from the enemy country, in every dubious state of things, they will always be made, in anticipation of possible consequences and speculative projects, leading to a long continued intercourse, the evils of which cannot be foreseen, and which it would certainly be destructive to tolerate.

It is said, that Mr. Richardson executed the intention he had expressed by returning to this country. As he has returned, he is certainly now entitled to the benefit of it; but it cannot have a retrospective operation, having acquired and established the character of a British trader, it adhered to him until he did return.

It is also said, and I admit that a person in a foreign country, at the commencement of hostilities, may elect to return or remain abroad; but surely that election must be made known. How can it be disclosed, what shall be evidence of his election? We have seen that a mere declaration of his intention to return is insufficient. I should presume, that a continuation in the foreign country is the most conclusive evidence that can be furnished of his election to remain, and in the nature of things nothing can be legal and conclusive evidence of his election to return, but an attempt to carry that election into effect. In every act done to effectuate that he shall be protected. While he remains the presumption of law is against him, and can only be repelled by the commencement of his return. He cannot remain in the hostile country sending out as many goods as may suit his convenience and then claim them, upon the ground of a previously declared intention to return. The shipment and his return must be contemporaneous acts, or so nearly connected in point of time as substantially to form but one transaction. It is evident from the facts in the case, that at the time this shipment was made, Mr. Richardson was not in pursuit of his American character. This, then, was an act done as a British trader, and cannot be otherwise considered.

Mr. Richardson, moreover, did not leave England till 7 or 8 months after the capture of the Mary and Susan, and his return is now fairly open to the suggestion that it was produced by the capture of his property. Upon principle, therefore, and upon authority, too, it is not entitled to consideration, and must be laid entirely out of the case.

I perceive the necessity of closing this opinion without averting to a few other topics which the argument presented. I have already been too diffusive, for which the nature of the cause, it is hoped, will be deemed a sufficient apology. I was duly impressed with its novelty and importance, and have felt a solicitude, amidst the pressure of other business, to manifest at least, a desire to arrive at a just conclusion; that which has been pronounced, has been resisted with all the feelings that human misfortune and individual calamity are calculated to produce; but it has been forced upon me by what I conceive to be clear and explicit, though rigorous rules of law, which imperiously demand the suppression of all personal sympathy.

I have, however, the consolation to know, that if injustice has been done, relief will be administered in another place, where the skill and profound researches of the Judge cannot fail to detect and correct my errors.

Alien Enemies.

We have been favored (says the Aurora) with a copy of the opinion delivered by chief justice Tilghman, in the case of Charles Lockington—which opinion has since been confirmed by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court, delivered on the 1st of January, 1814.

The opinion was delivered by the chief justice on the 22d day of November, 1813—in the words following:

OPINION.—From the return to this writ of habeas corpus, and the evidence, which has been produced, it appears, that Charles Lockington, who is a subject of the British king, came into the United States, before the declaration of war, and has never been naturalized. His business was connected with commerce; and on the 18th of July, 1812, he reported himself to John Smith, marshal of the district of Pennsylvania, as an alien, and British subject. On the 19th of March, 1813, he applied, as an alien enemy, for the marshal's passport, to repair to Lancaster, which was granted; and, at his own request, afterwards changed to Reading; in pursuance of an order issued from the office of the secretary of state, by which all alien enemies (with certain exceptions, not including the case of Mr. Lockington) were directed to retire, to a place above forty miles from tide water, to be designated by the marshal. On the 9th of the present month, the marshal found Mr. Lockington in this city, in violation of the order above mentioned; upon which he required him to retire to Reading. This being refused by Mr. Lockington, the marshal took him into his custody, and placed him, for safe keeping, in the debtor's apartment, of the prison of the city and county of Philadelphia, until he could be conveyed, or would consent to retire, to Reading, or should be discharged by due course of law. The reasons assigned by Lockington, for coming from Reading to Philadelphia, was the want of money to subsist in Reading; and he offered to return thither, if the marshal would furnish him with money. War having been declared by the congress of the United States, on the 18th day of June, 1812, proclamation of that event was made by the president on the day following. On the 7th day of July, in the same year, a notice was issued from the department of state, and published in those newspapers, in which the laws of the United States are published, by which all British subjects were required to make report of themselves to the marshals of the districts, in which they resided; and at the same time the several marshals were directed to cause the laws, which relate to alien enemies, to be published, in order that such persons might be informed of the situation in which they stood. Those laws were, accordingly published. On the 23d of February, 1813, an order was issued from the department of state, and published in the newspapers, by which "alien enemies, residing, or being, within forty miles of tide water, were required forthwith to apply to the marshals of the states, or territories, in which they respectively reside, for passports, to retire to such places, beyond that distance from tide water, as should be designated by the marshals" subject to certain exceptions, not affecting the present case. At the same time the several marshals of the U. States received instructions from the department of state, to take into custody, and convey to the places assigned to them, all persons to whom the said requisition was applicable, and who did not immediately conform to it. On the 5th of April, 1813, the several marshals were informed, by a note from the department of state, that the president had appointed John Mason, esq. commissary-general for prisoners of war, "including the superintendance of alien enemies;" and that, in future, all letters and documents on those subjects, were to be addressed to that gentleman; and all instructions from him in relation to the same, were to be obeyed; unless otherwise directed from the department of state. On the 31st of May, 1813, a circular letter, signed by John Mason, was addressed to the several marshals of the United States, and published in the newspapers—This letter was dated "office of commissary-general of prisoners, Washington, May 31, 1813," and is expressed in the following form: "The president, being desirous of defining more particularly, the treatment of alien enemies, and of extending as much indulgence to them, as may be compatible, with the precautions made necessary, by the present state of things, directs, that, in regard to such as may be within your district, you will be governed by the following rules. You will cause to be removed, as heretofore prescribed, if not already done, under the former orders from the department of state, all who are not females, or under eighteen years of age, who are not laborers, mechanics or manufacturers, arrived in the country previous to the declaration of war, and actually employed in their several vocations; subject, however, to the following modifications." Then follow the modifications, none of which apply to Mr. Lockington. These are all the facts of any importance on the present question.

It has been contended, that the orders issued from the public offices, are not to be considered, as the acts of the president; and that, if they are his acts, they are not authorised by law. Both these objections shall be considered; but I shall first advert to the point, introduced in the suggestion filed by the marshal, which goes to the jurisdiction of a state judge, in cases like the present. It is supposed that the state judges have no authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus, because the power of declaring war, being vested in the congress of the United States, all matters appertaining to that subject, must be under their control; that congress, if it had pleased them, might have considered alien enemies, as prisoners of war, who are not entitled to the benefit of a writ of habeas corpus—and, finally, that as the laws of the United States have given to the state judges, a certain jurisdiction, with respect to alien enemies (which I shall have occasion to mention hereafter) but have not given to them authority, to interpose by a writ of habeas corpus, that writ ought not to be issued.—In answer to these suggestions, it is to be observed, that the authority of the state judges, in cases of habeas corpus, emanates from the several states, and not from the U. States. In order to destroy their jurisdiction, therefore, it is necessary to shew, not that the United States have given them jurisdiction; but that congress possess, and have exercised the power of taking away that jurisdiction, which the states have vested in their own judges. Our act of assembly directs, that, in all cases, "where any person, not being committed or detained, for any criminal, or supposed criminal matter, shall be confined or restrained of his liberty, under any color or pretence whatsoever," he shall be entitled to writ of habeas corpus.—Now, it is no answer to this law, to say, that, being made, before the present constitution of the United States, was established, it could not be intended to apply to cases arising under the constitution. The people of Pennsylvania still remain citizens of the commonwealth, as well as of the United States; and it is of as much importance to them to be relieved from unlawful imprisonment, under color of authority derived from the United States, as from any other imprisonment.—When the present federal constitution was adopted, the people were not easy until they had obtained an amendment, declaring that the powers not delegated to the United States, by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states were reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. A writ of habeas corpus must, therefore, be issued, in all cases, where the right to issue it, has not been given up to the United States. That this right has not been given up, was my opinion, delivered in the case of Olinstead, where I assigned reasons which I shall not now repeat. But that is not all. It is a principle, well established, that even in cases where congress might assume an exclusive jurisdiction, the authority of the states remains, and such a jurisdiction is assumed. There are many instances, in which the powers of the U. S. are suffered to lie dormant; such as the power of establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies; and, while the power remains dormant, the several states regulate the subject. In subjects, also, within the jurisdiction of congress, when they do legislate, the authority of the states is taken away, only so far as the law of the United States declares. This is exemplified in the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, where it will be found, that, in some instances, the courts of the United States are vested with an exclusive jurisdiction; but in many more they have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of the several states.—And, although it is true, that, by the terms of the act, the courts of the United States have only a concurrent jurisdiction, yet, I apprehend the construction would be the same, if the express terms had been omitted. By the fourteenth section of the same act, power is given to the judges of the United States to grant writs of habeas corpus, for the “purpose of an enquiry into the cause of commitment; provided that they shall, in no case, extend to prisoners in gaol, unless where they are in custody, under, or by color, of the authority of the United States, or committed for trial, before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify.” Now, if it had been intended to exclude the state judges, this is the place in which we might expect to find evidence of such intention: for, the subject was full in the mind of the legislature, as appears by the care with which they restrained their own judges, from interfering with commitments, not under the authority of the United States.

The judicial power of the United States extends to all cases in law or equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made under their authority. Supposing that congress had the right to assume an exclusive jurisdiction, in all cases founded immediately on these subjects, the exercise of it, would be intolerably grievous, without a great increase of courts and judges: and, even then, it would often happen, that the state courts would have to decide on the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, on questions arising, collaterally, in causes within their jurisdiction. Still the authority of the United States may be preserved, by retaining, as they have retained, an appeal to their own courts. But it seems to be the general opinion, that from a decision on a habeas corpus, no appeal or writ of error, lies; and, thus, points of vital importance to the United States, may be determined by state judges, without an opportunity of revision. This may certainly, be a serious evil, but it does not appear to be without remedy. For, although by the general principles of law, an appeal or writ of error might not lie; yet the subject being within the power of congress, they may regulate it as they please. As to an attempt to take away from the state courts altogether the right of issuing a writ of habeas corpus, in any case where a man pretends to justify an imprisonment under the authority of the United States; whenever the subject shall be brought before congress, it will be found to be attended with very great if not insuperable difficulties.

I have said thus much on the point of jurisdiction (although I consider it as having been long settled and acted upon by the supreme court of this state, because some persons of high standing in other states, for whose opinions I entertain the most sincere respect, have expressed doubts on the subject. It is a matter deserving the greatest consideration, in which the people of the different states are deeply interested. The inconvenience of clashing opinions between federal and state judges, may sometimes be felt; but when I consider the situation of a Pennsylvanian, imprisoned unlawfully, by color of a pretended authority from the United States, on the banks of the Ohio, or the shore of Lake Erie, with only one federal judge to whom he can apply, and that judge in the city of Philadelphia, I feel as little inclination as I have right, to surrender the authority of the commonwealth.

But there is another objection to this habeas corpus, applicable equally to the judges of the states, and of the United States: it is, that Mr. Lockington is in the situation of a prisoner of war. If he be so, he is not entitled to a privilege, which never could have been intended, for persons of that description. A prisoner of war is subject to the law of war; he is brought among us by force; and his interests were never, in any manner, blended with those of the people of this country. He has no municipal rights to expect from us. We gave him no invitation, and promised him no protection. His object was to injure us: and we bring him hither solely for safe keeping.—Far different is the case of a great body of people, who, although now placed in the situation of enemies, by events over which they had no control, yet, in their hearts, may bear no enmity to the United States; nay, who may even prefer this country to their native soil. Many of them came among us, with a view of sharing our fortunes. Our laws held out invitations; they were suffered to acquire property, personal and real; we permitted them to swear, that they intended to renounce their native sovereign, and become fellow citizens with us. Many, it is true, came merely on business, without such intent, and may be really inimical. But even they had that implied promise, which civilized nations have long been supposed to make, that, in case of sudden war, there should be permission to depart in a reasonable time, without injury to person or property. I am far from denying, however, that the condition of these people is to be decided, not by a reference to the usual courtesy of nations, but by our own laws. Congress had the power of legislating on the subject: they have exercised that power; and their acts are paramount to all foreign customs. It is these acts, which we are now to consider, and it will be found, that they are such, as the most civilized nation need not blush to avow. They preserve a sacred regard for treaties; and, in cases where no treaty exists, they vest the president of the United States with full powers, to be exercised "according to the dictates of humanity, and national hospitality;" not forgetting, however, a due regard to the public safety. It has lately been decided, by the supreme court of New York, in the case of Clark, vs. Murray (10 Johns 59,) that British aliens residing in the United States, so far from being considered as prisoners of war, may sue, and be sued, as in time of peace.

The act respecting alien enemies, was passed on the sixth of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety eight. In considering it, I shall not pursue the wide range, which was taken in the argument of this case. In fixing its true construction, it is of no importance, under what administration it was enacted; by whom it was brought forward; or by whom advocated, or opposed, on its passage. It is the law of the land; and being so, it becomes the duty of every individual to obey, and of every court to enforce obedience.

It begins by enacting, that when war is declared, or invasion by a foreign nation is perpetrated, attempted, or threatened, and the President of the United States shall have made public proclamation of the event, "all natives, citizens, denizens, or subjects, of the hostile nation, or government, being males of the age of fourteen years and upwards,

"who shall be within the United States, and not actually naturalized, shall be liable to be apprehended, restrained, secured, and removed as alien enemies." Here is a broad proposition, standing as a foundation for summary proceedings, against persons who are declared to be in the situation of alien enemies. I do not consider, as has been contended by Mr. Lockington's counsel, that the apprehending, restraining and securing, here mentioned, are to be intended solely for the purpose of removal out of the United States. It is a provision for the public safety; which may require, that the alien should not be removed, but kept in the country under proper restraints; and the nature and degree of these restraints in cases where there has been no misbehavior, may depend, in some measure, on the treatment which the hostile government gives to citizens of the United States, who may chance to be within its power. The act then proceeds to declare that "the president of the United States shall be authorised, in any event as aforesaid, by his proclamation thereof, or other public act, to direct the conduct to be observed on the part of the United States, towards the aliens, who shall become liable as aforesaid; the manner and degree of the restraint, to which they shall be subject; and in what cases and upon what security, their residence shall be permitted; and to provide for the removal of those, who, not being permitted to reside within the U. S. shall refuse, or neglect, to depart therefrom; and to establish any other regulations, which shall be found necessary in the premises, and for public safety." Then follows a proviso, for securing the observance of treaties, which is not material in this case; because, at the time of the declaration of war, there was no treaty, regulating the subject, in existence, between the United States and Great Britain.

In the second section of the act it is enacted:

"That after any proclamation shall be made as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the several courts of the United States, and of each state, having criminal jurisdiction, and of the several judges and justices of the courts of the United States, and they shall be, and are hereby respectively, authorised, upon complaint, against any alien enemy, or alien enemies, as aforesaid, who shall be resident and at large within such jurisdiction or district, to the danger of the public peace or safety, and contrary to the tenor or intent of such proclamation, or other regulations which the president of the United States shall and may establish in the premises, to cause such alien or aliens to be duly apprehended and conveyed before such court, judge or justice; and after a full examination and hearing on such complaint, and “ sufficient cause therefor appearing, shall and “ may order such alien or aliens, to be remov“ ed out of the territory of the United States, “ or to give securities of their good behavior, “ or to be otherwise retained, conformably to

 “ the proclamation or regulations which shall “ and may be established as aforesaid, and
 “ in any prison, or otherwise secure such a“ lien or aliens, until the order which shall “ and may be made, as aforesaid, shall be per“ formed.

It cannot be doubted, but that provision in the first section, considered without reference to the second, authorises the president to establish a regulation, that all alien enemies of a certain description, shall retire immediately to a place to be appointed by the marshal; and that in case of non-compliance, the marshal shall remove them. But the second section, having authorised certain courts and judges, upon complaints made against alien enemies, to have them apprehended, and brought before them; and, after bearing, to make such order as may be necessary, for carrying the regulations of the president into effect; there is not wanting strong color for an argument, that the only manner of executing the regulations, is by complaint to a court or judge. This is a point well worthy of serious consideration. I have considered it attentively; and I shall give the reasons, which have induced me to conclude, that, notwithstanding the second section, the president was authorised to make an order for the removal of the alien enemy by the marshal, in the first instance. It is never to be forgotten, that the main object of the law is, to provide for the safety of the country, from enemies who are suffered to remain within it. In order to effect this safety, it might be necessary to act on sudden emergencies. It is well known, that the United States are exposed to great danger, in a war with an enemy who commands the sea. Bounded by the Atlantic ocean to a great extent, with numerous bays and navigable rivers, penetrating the very heart of the country; there is no knowing when, or where, the attack may be made. Without incurring the charge then, of undue severity, prudence might require, that alien enemies residing in large cities, should be removed with more secrecy and more expedition than the formalities of law admit. The president being best acquainted with the danger to be apprehended, is best able to judge of the emergency which might render such measures necessary. Accordingly we find, that the powers vested in him are expressed in the most comprehensive terms. He is to make any regulations which he may think necessary for the public safety, so far as concerns the treatment of alien enemies. It is certain, that these powers create a most extensive influence, which is subject to great abuse: but that was a matter for the consideration of those, who made the law, and must have no weight, with the judge, who expounds it. The truth is, that, among the many evils of war, it is not the least, to a people, jealous of their freedom, that, from necessity, the hands of the executive power, must be made strong, or the safety of the nation will be endangered.

But, it may be asked, what is the use of the provisions in the second section, concerning courts and judges, if the regulation of the president may be executed, without resorting to them? The answer is, that the use is great. In the first place, where the marshal is ordered to make the removal, he is at liberty to apply to the judges, and there may arise cases, in which he will find it prudent, to strengthen himself by the judicial authority. But besides, many regulations may be made, which contain no order for the marshal to act, or which may direct him to proceed by way of complaint to the judges. If the regulation in question had simply been, that alien enemies should retire to a place to be appointed by the marshal, any citizen might have complained of an alien enemy, who declined to comply; and a judge might have made and enforced an order for his removal. There may be various regulations for the general conduct of alien enemies, without pointing out the mode of carrying them into effect: and in all such cases, the courts may take cognizance of them. There may be regulations, which barely order, that certain things shall be done, or shall not be done, without defining the penalty in case of disobedience. In such cases, the judges to whom complaint is made are vested with considerable discretion. They may, according to the nature of the case, either direct the alien enemy to be removed out of the United States, or to give security for his good behaviour, or to be imprisoned, until the order of the president is complied with. It would be a waste of time to point out all the uses of this provision, respecting the power of courts and judges. To those, who reflect on the subject, many more, than I have mentioned, will suggest themselves. It is worthy of remark, that in the third section of the act, it appears, that the president may, by his warrant, directed to the marshal, order him to apprehend any alien enemy, and remove him out of the territory of the United States. Now, it is difficult to conceive a reason, why the president should be authorised to remove any alien enemy out of the country, without assigning a cause, and yet that he should not be permitted to direct, that those of a certain description, should repair to a certain place within the United States, and in case of a refusal, that the marshal should remove them. The particular reason assigned by Mr. Lockington, for not complying with the order of the president, I cannot but very much regret. But, although it absolves him from the charge of obstinate and perverse disobedience, yet, it can have no effect on my judgment, as it is a subject on which I have no power to act. I am not without hopes, however, that this public discussion may bring to the mind both of our own and the British government, a matter which seems not to have been attended to: that is to say; that persons, detained in a foreign land, cut off from their funds, and without the opportunity of pursuing their usual occupations, may be involved in distress, which demands relief.

But, supposing the president had power to make the regulation under which the marshal has acted, it is denied that he ever did make it. The act of congress requires, that the president should establish regulations, by his proclamation, or other public act. He has made no proclamation; but has he not made a public act? The first order was issued from the department of state, although it does not appear to be signed by the secretary of state, nor is the name of the president mentioned in it. The attorney for the United States says that the orders of the president are usually communicated in this form. If the matter rested on this notification, I should be somewhat at a loss what to think of it. The president could not transfer his power to the secretary of state; and as there is no mention of his name, some evidence might be necessary to show that it was really his order issued from the department of state. But the order issued from the commissary general of prisoners, puts the matter out of doubt; for the regulations there established, which refer to, and adopt the former orders from the department of state, are expressly declared to be the act of the president, although they are not signed by him, but by the commissary. This is sufficient to satisfy me. Being published as the orders of the president, signed by an officer of high trust, and never disavowed, I consider them as the public acts of the president.

I must add a few words, with respect to the return to this habeas corpus. The writ is directed to Joseph Corman, keeper of the debtor's apartment of the prison of the city and county of Philadelphia, who made return that he detained Mr. Lockington by virtue of a written order from John Smith, Esq. marshal of this district, by which he was commanded to keep the said Mr. Lockington, who had violated the orders of the president, &c. until he should be discharged by law. Connected with this return, I must take the suggestion presented by the marshal, and verified by his oath; by which it appears, that he placed Mr. Lockington in the debtor's apartment, until he could be conveyed, or would voluntarily go, to Reading. The marshal's order to the keeper of the prison has, at first view, somewhat the air of a judicial act, for which he, certainly, can have no authority. But the peculiar circumstances of the United States, with regard to prisons, will serve to explain the matter. They have no prisons of their own, and make use of the state prisons, by permission of the several states. Although the marshal held Mr. Lockington in custody, in a ministerial capacity, it might be necessary for him to give the keeper of the prison, some document to authorise his detaining him. So that I consider Mr. Lockington as, in fact, in custody of the marshal. Being of opinion that the marshal had a right to take him into custody, and place him in the debtor's apartment, for safe keeping, until he could conveniently be removed to Reading, I must order, that Charles Lockington, be remanded to the custody of the keeper of the debtor's apartment.

The prisoner was, accordingly, remanded.

Charge

Delivered to the grand jury at the opening of the present session of the criminal court of Baltimore County, by his honor. Judge Martin, (Nov. 1813.)

An infinitely wise and good God, when he first created man, created him innocent, and consequently happy. For innocence and happiness are so inseparably connected, that the last is ever attended by the first, and without the first the last can never be attained.

His Creator was then his only sovereign, and his only law giver, whose holy laws were engraven on his heart, and to all which a prompt obedience was the spontaneous result of that love and reverence for the author of his existence, which, while innocent, was part of his nature. And thus would man have ever remained, had he continued in that state of innocence, in which he was created. Human governments in that case would never have been formed; nor would civil institutions ever have existed; for they would not have been wanted. Our Creator would have continued to be our only ruler and governor. This earth would have been a blooming Paradise; and we ourselves but little lower than the angels.

But man, being endowed with freedom of will, without which he could not have either merit or demerit in his actions, nor have been more accountable for them than is an elegant and ingeniously constructed piece of mechanism for its movements: yielding to those temptations by which he was proved, rebelled against his God, and lost that Divine image in which he was created—His whole nature became entirely changed and debased; his intellect became darkened; his will perverted, and all his inclinations and passions wholly evil and corrupted; and thus he became the slave of all the vile lusts of the flesh, and wicked affections of the mind. Thus sin and misery entered into this world, and as the human race multiplied, the earth became overspread with monsters as much more deformed and dangerous than the most savage beasts of the forest, as vitiated intellect exceeds the instinct of nature; who, being unrestrained, except by the imbecility of their understanding, it was the necessary result, that the weak should become a prey to the strong—the indolent and the timid, to the enterprising and bold—and simplicity and ignorance to insidious cunning and craftiness; and the whole human race walking in their own evil ways, and doing whatever seemed good in their own eyes, this would soon become one deplorable theatre, on which was displayed nothing but misery and crime. And in the horrid atrocities which, within the last twenty years, have been exposed to our view in that unhappy nation, which once was the seat of all that was elegant, polite and refined, we have had a most distressing proof of the inconceivable guilt into which mankind are capable of plunging themselves when forsaken by God, and delivered up to their own evil imaginations

To guard against such enormities; to preserve peace and order in society; to secure the rights of individuals from being infringed; to protect them in the safe enjoyments of property and reputation, liberty and life, establishments of human governments became necessary; which having once been effected, old ones have been done away, and new ones have been successively established in their places, from a very early period of the world to the present time. All professing to have those great ends in view—though most of them seem very illy suited for their attainment: and as many of them have had their origin in force or in fraud it is not much to be wondered at if the happiness of their subjects has not been sufficiently attended to in their formation. Even those which have originated in compact, the most legitimate of modes, have from the weakness and imperfection of human nature, too often been found, in the sequel, by no means productive to that degree which was hoped for and expected, of that good which was the object of their founders,

Of the various kinds of governments, which have been at different times adopted by different nations, this, and the others of the United States, have chosen those of the republican form. A form of government most excellently adapted for a people who are wise and enlightened, virtuous and good. And it may most truly be said for such a people only. For when their rulers and citizens become ignorant and foolish, wicked and depraved, such governments are sure to degenerate into tyranny or anarchy, which last is indeed the worst, the most insupportable kind of tyranny; for as this consists in the uncontrolled despotism of one, so that consists in the uncontrolled despotism of many.

But, however beautiful a republican government may appear in theory, it has, notwithstanding, two capital vices, which are discovered in practice, and which are inherent in its nature; the one relating to its rulers, the other to its citizens. The evils arising from both of which proceed pretty much from the same cause, that lust of power and the propensity to abuse it, when obtained, which is inseparable from our depraved nature.

The restrictions of their power, and the short period of its duration, frequently excite the rulers of such governments from a desire to increase their power, insidiously to attempt the most dangerous encroachments on the constitution, by which they are restricted; and a too eager wish to perpetuate their power, induces them too often, instead of seeking this by an honorable and faithful discharge of their duty, and trusting to the grateful acknowledgements of the people for effecting their wish, to resort to the most shameful intrigue, and the vilest corruption; and after having wriggled themselves into office by the unworthiest means, to apply to means, if possible, still more unworthy, to continue themselves therein. While, on the other hand, the people, from the abuse of that freedom, or in other words, of that portion of power reserved to them by republican institutions, too frequently endeavor to overturn and destroy the constitutional authority of their governments, and instead of by rational and honorable investigation, attempting to convince their fellow citizens of the illegality or impolicy of those measures which they disapprove; in order to obtain a redress of their grievances and a removal of their authors in a peaceable and constitutional manner; are too often hurried away by some vile incendiary, under the form of a popular demagogue, who has nothing to risk but his worthless neck, into violence and rebellion in opposition to provisions frequently the most salutary. Instances of which; we find from the historic page, have too frequently occurred.

It is a trite observation, that virtue is essentially requisite in a republican government. Nor can any thing be more true—virtue is the life, the soul of such a government; without which it is a corrupt, a stinking carcass.

But from hence many seem to think, that virtue and republicanism are inseparably united, that every citizen of such a government must of course be virtuous: and that a man need only be known to be a republican to be considered as a paragon of every virtue. Would to God this was truly the case! Courts of criminal jurisdiction might then be done away, and your services be dispensed with; or if wanted, would only be required for those of a different political character.

To determine the justice of these pretensions we need only to enquire what is virtue? Or in what does it consist? Virtue as distinguished from piety, by which we mean more particularly the discharge of our immediate duties to God, consists in the performance of all those things which are required of those, according to our respective situations in life, for the comfort and happiness of our fellow creatures. But true virtue and true piety are so intimately connected together, that the one cannot subsist without the other: for no action can be truly virtuous but that, the motive of which flows from and may be resolved into the love of God—which is, indeed, the fulfilment of all the law and commandments. The man who, performing those actions which are externally virtuous, from no better motive than the promotion of his own interest, the acquisition of popularity, the gratification of his vanity, or as a stepping stone to his ambition, would not boggle for a moment at the guilt arising from the perpetration of actions both externally and internally vicious, whenever they would best serve his selfish purposes. There can, I repeat it, be no real virtue but that which flows from and may be resolved into that pure and undefiled religion, which was sent down from Heaven to restore to man that paradise, out from which he was driven by sin. It follows from thence that no man can be truly virtuous but him who is truly religious.

These are truths, which, though scoffed at by many who have the vanity to call themselves the wise men of this world; and though a cold-blooded, flint-hearted soul-freezing and false philosophy, conceived and brought forth in hell, and nursed by the devil, propagated through Europe, the sources of all her wretchedness and misery, and too extensively introduced into these

United States, hath attempted to eradicate these truths from the human heart, yet this court will ever feel it their pride to embrace them with unequivocal approbation, and not the less, because they are truths, which have been taught us by that God, whose cradle was a manger.

Need we now recur to the question, whether the people of the United States, or of this state, have that share of virtue necessary to animate and give energy to a republican government; or whether we are that virtuous people among whom republican institutions are likely to remain permanent and preserve their original purity? That man must indeed have been an anchorite, shut up in a cell, without intercourse with the world, who can be for a moment at a loss to give his decision.

At the time when the American revolution first had its commencement, there was not, I am convinced, a people in the universe more deeply imbued with the principles of morality, virtue and religion, than were the citizens of this country; and to this we were principally indebted for its completion, unstained by any remarkable enormities; but perhaps the sun in its annual course, does not at this time shine upon a people, who have since that period become so greatly deteriorated in virtue, morality, and religion.

The principles began early to depreciate with the depreciation of their paper money; happy would it have been if their depreciation had ceased, when paper money ceased to exist! But the path of vice are declivous and rapid is the descent. To this we add, that for twenty years past, Europe has been spewing out upon this devoted country, an almost unremitting torrent of her filthiest feculency, by which not only that mass of corruption, which was amongst us has been individually increased, but those who were tainted before, have become still more rotten, and in too many instances many, who were until then sound, have received the infection.

To the extreme profligacy and depravity of manners among all ranks of society; to that wickedness and vice, which raising up its head, stalks unblushingly through our land, must be ascribed all those evils, under which we are now suffering, including the present war with all its concomitant calamities. Vainly do we attribute them to the "violation of sailors' rights," and other acts of injustice of the British government, on the one hand; or to the weakness, the folly or wickedness of our own on the other, as their immediate cause; for even the injustice and injuries suffered from other nations, and also the curse of having weak, foolish or wicked rulers, when it happens to be the case, are themselves judgments too inflicted upon a people as a punishment for their sins.

The Supreme Being, in his wise Providence hath made it his constant rule to punish national crimes by national afflictions. The political existence of nations is confined to this world, and in this world he always chastises them for their national guilt; and sometimes utterly destroys them.

War, famine and pestilence, are the three scourges most usually adopted by him, wherewith to avenge himself on nations who have trampled his mercies under their feet, and insulted his justice. Of these war is the most bitter and severe, the most to be deprecated, as besides its own appropriate evils, it is frequently productive of both the others, pestilence and famine; besides which nothing can be more fertile in dissoluteness and corruption of the morals of a people, nothing so productive of new and additional scenes of vice; and thus war constantly furnishes additional supplies to those very sources from which it first originated.

And as war is one of the greatest calamities, by which an avenging God can, in his wrath, punish mankind, so can no guilt be more aggravated or inexpiable, than the guilt of the man, who without justifiable cause, plunges a nation into war. Such a man is accountable to his God for the distress and misery, both public and private, which shall flow therefrom.—In the sight of Heaven he will be viewed as the wilful, the deliberate, murderer of every individual, who loses his life in its prosecution. And his soul is stained by every drop of blood, which shall be spilled thereby: stains, which must be washed out, in this world, by tears of the deepest and most bitter contrition, or will be punished, in another, by the hottest fire of Divine indignation.

Does any one doubt that war is sent upon a nation as a punishment for its sins, and that we are now suffering in consequence of our iniquities? Let him hear what St. James says upon that subject:

“From whence came wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members?”

“Ye lust and have not; ye kill and desire to have—and cannot obtain.

“Ye fight and war, and yet ye have not because ye ask not.

“Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it in your lusts.”

And though his answer is interrogative, in form, he means it as the strongest affirmative, as much as if he had said, “there surely cannot be among you, to whom I address myself, a man of common sense and understanding, who can possibly doubt, that wars and fightings proceed from the cause to which I have assigned them.”

As therefore the calamities under which we are now suffering, proceed from, and are the just punishment of our wickedness, as a people, so nothing can be more available for their removal or alleviation, than a general and universal reformation in our lives, by turning from time to righteousness.

And as a general reformation can only be brought about by the reformation of individuals, it becomes the duty of each individual to begin with himself, and by his example and precepts endeavor to extend it to others.

Whoever would wish to see this war, with which we are now afflicted by an avenging God, terminate in an honorable peace: or, if that cannot be obtained, that Heaven may smile upon our arms in its further prosecution, let them clean their hands from all iniquity, and purify their hearts from all pollution; let them humble themselves before the Lord; let them cease to do evil and learn to do well. They who thus act, whatever may be the boasting of others, will prove themselves the purest patriots and the sincerest friends to their country; while, on the contrary, they who continue in their vicious pursuits; who go on adding sin to sin, with greediness; who indulge themselves in the gratification of all their unruly passions, whatever may be their professions, are its greatest enemies; and, as far as in them lies, they ensure the disgrace and discomfiture of our armies, while they sharpen the swords and strengthen the hands of our enemies.—And of such persons it may indeed be with great truth said, that “they are guilty of moral treason.”

I have, gentlemen, observed to you that the necessity of human governments originated in the fallen and corrupt state to which man was reduced by disobedience to his Creator, for the prevention or punishment of crimes, as far as they can affect the interests of civil society. But governments would be of little use, unless wise and salutary laws were enacted by them, with sufficient sanctions for that purpose; nor would such laws be of much service, unless strictly enforced, and the punishments allotted to their several breaches of these laws inflicted with certainty and impartiality. For these purposes courts of criminal jurisdiction have been established, and, according to the wise provisions of this state, and of England, from whence we have adopted them, grand juries are the means through which those violations are inquired into, and presented to the court. You see, therefore, gentlemen, how important a part you have to act in the promotion of that reformation so devoutly to be wished for by every friend to his country, as far as can be effected by the dread of human punishment.

It is your special province, gentlemen, to search into the violations of every law, the breach of which is punishable; and present them to the court, to be ultimately decided by a petit jury. I say, gentlemen, of every law; for however unwise or impolitic any law may be, and however desirable may be its repeal, yet, if not repugnant to our constitution or to the laws of God, it is the duty of every good citizen while it remains in force to obey it; and the duty of the court to punish its infraction.

A recurrence, gentlemen of the grand jury, to the oath you have taken, a copy of which you will have with you, will sufficiently point out to you the great outlines of your duty. You are diligently to enquire into all offences which are given in charge of you—which may be disclosed to you by the witnesses who will be sent to you; or which may come within your own knowledge; for if any members of the grand jury are acquainted, of their own knowledge, with any offences having been committed, it is their duty to inform their brethren, and of the grand jury to find presentments on such information.

In agreeing on your presentments it is not necessary that you should have positive testimony from those who were eye witnesses. Crimes, especially those of a deeper guilt, are generally attempted to be committed in secrecy. Strong circumstantial evidence is all that can in most cases be had; it is all that ought to be expected, and frequently will be more satisfactory, even than direct testimony.

You are, gentlemen, to receive no testimony on the part of the person against whom the inquiry is making, nor are you to receive witnesses at his instance; and therefore you ought not in any case to make a presentment, unless where, upon the evidence before you, as it stands uncontradicted, you could conscientiously, as petit jurors, say that the person was guilty of the crimes with which he is charged.

You are, gentlemen, in making your enquiries, to be actuated only by an honest regard for public justice, uninfluenced by motives arising from envy, hatred or malice, in making your presentments; and in the present state of the public mind, it may not be improper to caution you particularly against suffering yourselves to be in the least degree operated upon by party distinctions or considerations. Let your sole inquiry be, whether the party is guilty or innocent, not whether he is of this or that political character. You are equally to guard against the effect of hope and fear, love or affection, that they may not arrest your enquiries and cause you to let crimes pass unrepresented. Should the person accused be as dear to you as your right eye, or as useful as your right hand, yet if your consciences are satisfied of his guilt, you are compelled by the sacred oath you have taken to present him.

You will, gentlemen, easily perceive the necessity of preserving in perfect secrecy what passes among you, since the disclosure might frequently be the means of criminals making their escape, before the enquiry was completed; and might also sometimes expose a grand juror or a witness to the vindictive passions of the offenders presented.

The clerk will lay before you a list of the licenses to ordinary keepers and retailers of liquors; and the court recommend to you, gentlemen, in a particular manner, to enquire into the conduct of those to whom they have been granted, as well as to the persons who sell without having such licenses.

As to the usual classes of crimes into which you are to enquire, you are sufficiently acquainted with their nature, not to need any particular explanation of them from the court; but concerning the crime of high treason it may be proper to say a few words.

By our constitution this crime against the state or the United States, is confined solely to "levying war against them, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This crime is, in all governments, considered as comprising in it the deepest malignity of guilt, as being contrary to that allegiance which every citizen owes to that government of which he is a member, and striking at the very existence of government, as well as introductory to almost every other species of crimes. And I hold it, gentlemen, as a sacred and incontrovertible truth, a truth of which I cannot doubt, that no citizen can more rightfully divest himself of his allegiance to his government, without its consent, than his government can, without his consent, deprive him of its protection. This truth is founded in the very nature of civil society, and essential to its existence. The contrary doctrine is the spawn of folly and knavery. We are indeed very gravely told by certain wiseacres of modern growth, that as it did not depend upon any man's choice whether he should be born in any particular government, he is therefore under no obligation to continue his allegiance to it any longer than he pleases. And these same wiseacres as gravely tell us that children are under no obligation to love, honor and obey their parents, except so far as seem good in their own eyes, because their parents, in begetting them, were actuated by their own pleasure, without consulting them whether they chose to be begotten Nay, there are among them such impious fools, who proceeding on the same principles, even tell us that man is under no obligation, nor owes any duty to his God, because his existence was forced upon him, without his consent being first obtained or even asked for.

I have only to add upon this subject, no act of treason can be justified, except in consequence of its being committed under a well grounded apprehension, that loss of life would be the consequence of a refusal, and that all acts of treason must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury by two witnesses at least, whereas in all other cases the testimony of one witness is sufficient.

There are, gentlemen, several laws of this state, which the court are directed to give in charge to you, a list of which will be furnished you by the clerk, and to which you will pay proper attention.

If you should on any occasion stand in need of legal advice, you will of course apply to the attorney general.

The court, gentlemen, will no longer detain you from entering upon your enquiries.

Reply of the Grand Jury TO THE PRECEDING CHARGE.

The grand jury having duly considered the solemn charge delivered to them at the opening of the present session of this court, (a copy of which has been furnished them) beg leave, respectfully, to present and say, that they feel impressed with a proper deference for that honorable tribunal; yet they cannot, in duty to themselves and their beloved country—its laws and political institutions, permit some of the moral and political principles, diffused through the charge, to pass unnoticed, lest the unreflecting and uninformed, might indeed, be induced to believe that the hearts of the American people, were not only “deteriorated,” but even rotten to their cores.

Although some of the reasoning and sentiments perfectly accord with that of the jury, there is much in the extensive range taken by the court, so repugnant to their opinion of what is correct, or consistent with our national dignity, or with the true principles of our excellent form of government, that the jury have thought it their bounden duty to point out some of what they conceive thus exceptionable and erroneous.

We are well aware that “human governments were formed, and courts of law established, to preserve peace and order in society, and to protect individuals in the enjoyment of property, reputation, liberty and life, that of all government, the most legitimate is that of the republican form—and that virtue is essentially requisite to its preservation.”

And while we lament that man is too much inclined to evil, and that improvement of morals and a stricter observance in the practice of virtue, must be always desirable, and particularly so to us, from the genius of our government, yet we are confident, in a strong conviction, that there is no general deterioration in virtue, morals or religion.

The virtuous stand our country has taken in the existing contest, when power would tyrannize over right—and the spirited enthusiasm of a great majority of the people, in support of its righteous cause, are alone sufficient to evince a national purity and integrity, which ought to have quieted any apprehensions, as to the safety of the republic.

But although the jury cannot see any national degeneracy, they are sorry to observe, that there are many amongst us, who are treacherous, venal and abandoned, on whom it is to be feared, laws or example will have little, if any effect; some, who are wickedly endeavoring to paralyze the national arm, and appal the national heart; and who make religion the engine to effect these worst of purposes. But the jury must beg leave to say, that it is not without mingled emotions of regret and indignation that they have heard their present public enemy—the ally of savages, the instruments of despotism, and the tools of corruption—an enemy who has pillaged, plundered, and violated, the innocent and the fair, and defaced, insulted and defiled the house of christian worship, stiled the “bulwark of the religion we profess.” Yet, the jury entertain the lively confidence that our Divine religion, thus abused by the hypocrite and the masked traitor, will finally, by the blessings of an all-wise Providence, be shed abroad in our hearts; and spread its purifying and benign influence throughout every region of this happy land.

That a powerful and ambitious nation, aspiring to unlimited sovereignty and control, should attack and commit aggressions on a virtuous and religious people, it must be acknowledged, to the disgrace of human nature, is neither novel or uncommon, and the history of few nations furnished so many examples of such wanton, national injustice, as that of Great Britain.

The jury have not deemed it within the bounds of their duty, or the limits of this presentment of their sentiments and opinions of the charge, to turn aside to enquire who, or what was meant by the strong terms of which the court seemed to imprecate the wrath of heaven, upon the head of that individual who should plunge a happy people into the calamities of war, merely to gratify his own ambition. They believe that none but an individual possessing despotic control could have the power to inflict so heavy a calamity. So far as the expressions of the allusions of the court applied to absolute government, they meet with the hearty approbation of the jury; and it is not without a considerable degree of confidence and satisfaction, they express their belief, that not even an enemy of the chief magistrate of the United States, who has the least regard to truth, would or could apply such insinuations to him; a man who has so long been the choice of the people, and so recently re-elected to the high station he has filled, since the declaration of war, by nearly two-thirds of all the people of this nation.

The intrusion upon territorial jurisdiction, the violation of personal rights, and the base infringement of the freedom of navigation, the jury humbly conceive were just and ample causes of war—and thus driven into the contest, the American people, the world and posterity, must acknowledge we have justice on our side; and justice, observes the great American sage, “establisheth a nation.”

The jury cannot omit glancing at what they deem, the absurd and unconstitutional ground on which the court have predicated their remarks in defence of perpetual allegiance. The premises, and deductions drawn therefrom, are, altogether such as they must totally reject; they view them as in flagrant hostility with the honor and interest of the union, and with every genuine American feeling and sentiment. And they more pointedly deplore the utterance of such doctrine, on this subject, at a crisis so important to their country; when instead of entering in to the views and policy of the enemy, and, thereby, making an inroad upon the energies of the nation—they hold it to be the sacred duty of every faithful and patriotic heart, to beat in unison with those efforts American valor calls forth in support of justice and right, against tyranny and oppression. With due deference to the honorable court, they would further add that the promulgation of this novel sentiment, on perpetual allegiance, could only be productive of an effect to lessen the physical force of the nation, in its present belligerent attitude; and as they would not aid in communicating a spasm to even the most slight nerve of the government—they, therefore, deeply regret, that the honorable court should have so digressed into an extra judicial track, as to touch a subject they have been thus impelled to notice with some degree of condemnation.

The jury cannot accord with the honorable court, in sinking man so low in grade, on the scale of creation, as is contended for in the charge; they would rather exalt than disgrace human nature—and, as freemen, they are unwilling to cast an unnecessary and undeserved stigma on the dignity of man.

The jury do not deem it expedient to resort to writers on the laws of nations, to prove the fallacy of the doctrine they condemn; for it requires but a slight beam of sober reason to play upon the mind, to see the subject and its bearings in all their deformity. If the charge should hereafter be received in a British court of justice, as good evidence against a naturalized American, and should produce condemnation and punishment—say an ignominious death—the penalty for treason; in such an event, the jury would observe, that the feelings of its authors would require a solace, of which they hope they will not be destitute in the hour of need.

The jury would close this subject by advertent to that portion of the declaration of independence, which excludes to man—“life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness”—and they would make a reference to the constitution of the United States, which authorises congress to “establish a uniform rule of naturalization.” Such rule having been established, growing out of the constitution, the jury deem it the duty of good citizens to respect the high obligation it imposes; and they feel a full confidence in the good faith and honor of the nation which are the several pledges of guarantee, for the protection of the naturalized citizens from every country.

The jury feel much pleasure in finding they are supported in their opinion by a member of the supreme court of the United States. “Perhaps (says Judge Iredell) it is not necessary that it (the right of expatriation) should be expressly decided on this occasion; but I will freely express my sentiments on that subject; that a man ought not to be a slave; that he should not be confined against his will, to a particular spot, because he happened to draw his first breath upon it; that he should not be compelled to continue in a society to which he is accidentally attached, when he can better his situation elsewhere: much less when he must starve in one country, and may live comfortably in another; are positions which I hold as strongly as any man, and they are such as most nations in the world appear clearly to recognize.”

For these and other reasons, not herein particularly expressed, the jury beg leave respectfully to present and say, that the charge delivered to them, at the opening of the present session of the court of oyer and terminer, by the chief judge thereof, contain sentiments and expressions, of which they totally disapprove.

Charge to the Grand Jury,

By the venerable Jeremiah Townly Chase, of Maryland, to the grand jury of Montgomery county, November term, 1813.

It is your office, gentlemen of the grand jury, to enquire into all crimes, misdemeanors and offences committed within the body of Montgomery county.

In prosecuting your enquiries, your duty will prompt you to be circumspect and diligent; and for the better ascertainment of the truth of any accusation brought before you, as you are not permitted to examine any witnesses on the part of the accused; you will examine and cross examine the witnesses for the state separately and out of the presence of each other.

In making your presentments, you will be impelled by the purest motives, and will not suffer your judgment to be perverted by favor or affection, or biassed by prejudice, resentment or ill will, but in the words of your oath, you will present "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, according to the evidence brought before you."

In you, the innocent, whose reputation has been sullied, and his character drawn into suspicion by the envenomed tongue of slander, will find a shield to protect him against the shafts of malice, and to the evil doers you will prove a terror, by bringing to condign punishment the violators of the law.

The blessings to be enjoyed by living in society depend on supporting the government under which we live, respecting and aiding the constituted authorities, placed over us with our own consent, in the manner which our constitutions direct and prescribe, on a strict observance and faithful execution of the laws.

It is the duty of every citizen to support the constitution and the laws, and to maintain the freedom of opinion, and to preserve the liberty of the press inviolate. The free inquiry into the conduct of public men, in power, and the investigation of the measures of government, are rights emanating out of our excellent constitutions; rights which are not diminished or impaired by a state of war. The inquiry into, and investigation of the conduct and measures of men in power and office, ought to be made with decency and respect, "nothing extenuating, nor setting down aught in malice;" and for the purpose of communicating correct information, and obtaining redress of grievances, in the manner the constitution and laws warrant, for changing our rulers and transferring the powers of government to other hands—persons who will better promote the general welfare, and better provide for the common defence. On the preservation of those fundamental principles, entire and undiminished, rests republican governments and the happiness of the people.

Duty, combined with interest, ought to impel every citizen to preserve peace and good order, and to give his aid in resisting and suppressing all riotous and unlawful combinations of men collected for the purpose of invading the property and infringing the rights of others, under the flimsy, delusive, and despotic pretext of reforming abuses and aiding government, in cases to which the arm of the law will not extend, but who too often become ministers of vengeance, and misguided instruments in the hands of base men, who sit in disguise, and whose concealed and diabolical views will not bear the light.

All such acts are unwarrantable and tyrannical assumptions of power, encroachments on the rights of others, and have a manifest tendency to subvert the government, prostrate law and justice, and render all our rights insecure.

The freedom of the press has been justly considered by all wise and discerning men as the palladium of our liberty and rights, and has been sanctioned by the bill of rights of Maryland, in terms the most explicit, which declares it shall be preserved inviolably.

The liberty of the press is subject to no restriction but what the law imposes, and whenever it is abused or perverted to the base purposes of traducing and defaming the characters of private or public men in power, or office, the remedy is not in the hands of the mob, but in the courts of justice, to which resort may be made to obtain redress commensurate to the injury sustained, which is to be ascertained and fixed by an enlightened jury of the country.

To secure and render permanent the rights and blessings we enjoy under our excellent government, it is our duty to cultivate harmony and good will, promote union among ourselves, and studiously avoid every thing which has a tendency to create feuds and animosities, and embitter the minds of fellow citizens against each other by the delusions of party prejudices. When we differ, let it be like men and brothers who have the same object in view, the general happiness, but pursue different methods for the attainment of it. Let the only contest be, who shall do most in support of the general and state governments, and who shall most distinguish himself for the observance of the laws of his country, and in rendering those services, which tend to the promotion of peace and good order in society, and are most conducive to increase the stock of general happiness. By cultivating this disposition, and performing these offices, Americans can have nothing to fear, they will draw closer the cords of amity and good will, silence the voice of discord, frustrate the schemes of the intriguer, arrest the sword of violence in the hands of their enemies, and perpetuate the blessings they now enjoy, equal rights, equal liberty and equal security in the enjoyment of property.

I can venture to assert, without subjecting myself to the imputation of arrogance and presumption, that so long as religion and morality prevail, the trial by jury is preserved inviolate, and the rights of representation supported, the freedom of the press maintained, a free and candid enquiry into the conduct of public men and measures advocated and encouraged, and the streams of justice are permitted to diffuse themselves pure and unpoiled through every part of the state; the citizens of Maryland will enjoy the great and inestimable blessings of liberty, property, and the rights of conscience.

Animated by patriotic zeal, and that love of liberty and independence which is interwoven with the ligaments of the hearts of Americans, our greatest exertions should be made to secure and perpetuate the blessings enjoyed under our excellent government.—Although few possess talents and power to promote the general welfare, and diffuse the benefits of society, yet each person within the sphere of his influence, however limited, and within the walks of domestic life, may, by his exemplary conduct, in cultivating harmony and good will, and discountenancing vice, repress the evils which disturb the general tranquility, contribute much to preserve the peace and good order of government, and to produce that state of society in which each citizen encircled by his relations and friends, fearing no evil, may repose himself in safety under his own vine, and enjoy his property unmolested by the hand of power or violence.

Religion and morality are justly considered as the two great pillars which must support all good governments, and I think I may venture to predict, without any claim to the spirit of prophecy, that no republican government can exist long, if those inestimable props are suffered to decay by an unpardonable neglect and indifference to the most important duties and principles they inculcate, are subverted by violence, drawn into contempt by ridicule, or undermined by the arts and insidious contrivances of designing men, whose views are incompatible with good order, and hostile to the general happiness.

Government and laws restrain the crimes and outrages which would be subversive of society; protect the lives and secure the liberty and property of the citizens, and the christian religion, which we profess, (I disclaim all invidious distinctions of sects and denominations, and consider the whole body of christians as united under our blessed Redeemer, seeking the path which leads to everlasting life,) with expanded wings, hovering over this favoured land, considering us as accountable beings, and holding up rewards and punishments, to prompt and accelerate us to an observance of our duty, and to restrain us from the perpetration of those crimes which infringe good order and embitter our lives, in a voice the most eloquently persuasive and endearing, invites and importunes us to take shelter under the benign influence of her mild dominion; to live in peace together; to be good citizens and good men, and with the soothing consolatory language of a tender mother, hushing her darling infant to repose, speaks comfort to the desponding souls of the wretched, whose names are written in our misfortune's book, and exhorts them to persevere in well doing, "to deal justly, love mercy and walk humbly before their God," and their reward shall be immortal life and never ceasing bliss.

Licensed Vessels.

From the Arcadian Recorder, (a Halifax paper) of Aug. 21, 1813.

To the printer of the Recorder.

SIR—A letter having appeared in a late newspaper, reflecting upon some decisions which have lately been made in the court of vice admiralty respecting licenses, I have procured and shall be obliged to you to publish notes of the two leading laws, and likewise a case decided by sir W. Scott.

It there appears, that there can be nothing in them disrespectful to the governor of this province, as they have been decided upon the same rule of law which was applied to his majesty's own licenses granted by the secretary of state in England, and that this rule of law was publicly declared by a decision of the high court of admiralty eleven years since, and printed in Robinson's report soon after, and was therefore well known both at home and abroad; that if parties, whether British subjects or foreigners, have ventured their property in open defiance of this public rule, they have only to blame their own imprudence, and cannot complain of any violation of the faith of the nation, which was certainly never pledged to give an interpretation to the licenses contrary to its declared laws; that though some of those cases were fair, and the parties had acted honestly, yet there were others which were involved in fraud and perjury, and there was good proof, that the vessels were not destined according to their licenses.

I need not say any thing respecting the seizure of a vessel off the light house, which is described as so unjustly made, because some things frequently turn out very different when they come to be examined into, from what they are represented by interested parties. If it should prove as is stated, the owners will obtain their property, and the seizers be condemned in costs and damages. Till the facts are better known, or justice has been refused, it is unfair to apply such language to that capture. The great services which the privateers have rendered this province in protecting trade and navigation are so well known, that a person of candor would be rather unwilling to cast such severe reflections upon them on such uncertain grounds.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

CAUSIDICUS.

14th July, 1813.

Johanna Newcombe; Judgment.—Dr. Croke.

This is an American vessel and cargo, under a license from sir John Coape Sherbrooke, under the prince's order of the 13th of October, 1812.

It is indefensible on every point.

1st. The license was not procured till after the capture, and was not brought in till the master returned from the United States. The story which he tells is, that he did not mention the license whilst he was on board the privateer, for fear it should be American. That he was sent back to his own vessel, and there put into a boat and landed upon the American shore, which was near. That whilst passing the privateer in the boat, he held up the license in his hand, which was the first time he attempted to make it known to the captain of the privateer. That he came to this province from the U. States, and brought in the license. The license is granted to Mooly & Co. and has no connexion whatever with this vessel or cargo in particular, and therefore, even admitting that it was a protection, it must be proved to have been on board. By not producing it in proper time to the captor, they have placed themselves in a suspicious situation as to the reality of its having been on board at all, and it should be necessary to establish that fact by better evidence than the mere affidavits of the master.

2d. The vessel was taken half a mile from the American coast, and the master admits that he was steering for Eastport in the states. He swears, however, that he went only to touch there, and that his real destination was to Halifax. It may be doubted whether, adopting the principles which govern blockades, a vessel can be permitted to touch at a port not comprehended within the license, being such a port as that there may be any suspicion justly entertained that the cargo was intended to be there landed, which is evidently the case with all the eastern ports of the United States. This supposition is confirmed by the papers. The clearances and other ostensible papers profess a voyage to Eastport, which is usually admitted to be a justifiable fraud. But there is an affidavit of the master to the same effect. This is, however, said to be false, to have been a mere form of office, and that he has now contradicted it upon oath in his claim and examination to which faith ought to be given. It is not, however, denied that he really made that affidavit. Whatever allowances may be made for voyages of this nature, whatever necessity there may be for some deception, I cannot so far divest myself of all principles of morality, and all rules of evidence, as to think any commercial conveniences or official forms a sufficient excuse for violating the most solemn and serious of all obligations, and to admit the credibility of a witness who has been guilty of such a crime. If the master has admitted that he has foresworn himself in the United States to deceive his own government, what reason can possibly be assigned why he should not practise the same art to impose upon a British court at Halifax? The latter oath is full as likely to be false as the former. But there is likewise a charter party on board for a voyage to Eastport. This was not a necessary document; they were not obliged to produce this instrument to enable the vessel to clear out from Boston. It must have been entered into for the security of the parties themselves, and must have shewn the real nature of the voyage. It is inconceivable that parties should have laid themselves under the legal obligations of this instrument, if it was entirely false, and without any apparent purpose of advantage.

If these difficulties could be removed, the effect of the license itself remains to be considered. It is a license simply to Messrs.

Moody & Co of Halifax. Though they are on the spot, they have not claimed in any capacity whatever. The claimants have not stated themselves to have had any connexion or privity whatever, with that house of trade, or even any transfer from them.—Nor indeed does their name occur in the claim.—By the late decision in this court, a license is a mere personal privilege which cannot be extended beyond the parties specified in it.

It has been alleged in argument, that the claimants might be able to clear up and prove all the points, that might show a connexion between messrs. Moody and themselves in this intended importation, and which would likewise prove the reality of the destination to Halifax. Further proof can never be allowed where there is no ground laid for it in the original evidence. It is said indeed that this was a transaction of a covered nature, and therefore the real fact could not appear in the original evidence. This is certainly true as far as documents go, but the master must or ought to have been acquainted with the truth; if such connections had subsisted, he must have been informed of it, and he had the opportunity of stating all such facts in his claim, which the court might have allowed the parties to establish by evidence. Here no circumstances of the kind have been pleaded, and yet the house of Moody & Co. was here to have intervened a claim, and brought it to the knowledge of the court.

I reject the application for further proof, and condemn the vessel and cargo.

14th July, 1813.

Cuba, Thomas; Judgment.—Dr. Crake.

A claim has been given for this ship, by Samuel L. Bishop, the supercargo, and Enos Collins, for George Thomas of New-York, and for 100 barrels of flour as the property of Freeman Allen, Moses Ward, and Bishop himself, all of New-York, and for 750 barrels of flour, as belonging to Enos Collins, and Joseph Allison of Halifax.

This case therefore in its general circumstances comes within the principles of decision in the Johanna, and other late judgments in this court. It remained only for the claimants to show if they could discover any material distinction between them.

The license is granted to W. K. Reynolds and co of Halifax. The claim is for other persons, who are not alleged to have any privity, or connexion with them, nor does the name of Mr. Reynolds appear in the claim.

Mr. Collins swears that Freeman Allen of New York had funds of his in his hands, from various mercantile transactions and particularly the proceeds of a vessel called the Amanda. That being desirous of obtaining a remittance to this country, the present cargo of flour was laden in consequence of an agreement between Moses Ward, Bishop, Collins, and Allison. That a license had been procured and transmitted from hence, and which had expired, and that the cargo was sent under the present license, which was procured in the United States.

A difference has been taken between this and other cases, that the property there belonged to enemies; in this a part is claimed as belonging to persons of this town, and it was therefore argued that they were entitled to greater favour and latitude. I cannot admit this circumstance to have any weight in the decision; because in all transactions with enemies, they are entitled to full as much good faith and liberality, as are shown towards our own countrymen; and so far from its being any special merit in British subjects to carry on a trade with the enemy, which is said to counteract all the inconveniences of war, and to continue the blessings of peace, it appears to me that the balance inclines rather the other way. If an enemy trades with this country, it is at his own open risk; if his property is seized, not being protected, it is confiscated, nothing further. A British subject trading with the enemy unauthorised or beyond the limits of his privilege, is guilty in some measure of a violation of his allegiance; it is a high misdemeanor, in communicating with, and treating those as friends, whom the sovereign of his country has pronounced to be enemies, and it is decidedly unlawful.

I admit that there is no appearance of fraud in this case, and I am extremely sorry that a respectable mercantile house in this place, without any bad intentions, should incur a considerable loss, but I fear that they must be involved in the consequences of the acts of those who have shipped these goods in the enemy's country, even without their knowledge or approbation, under an insufficient license. I cannot however agree with the counsel, that no sort of blame, or at least of inadvertence, is to be attributed to them, and that the validity or invalidity of the license like the present was a nice point of law, with which mercantile men could not be supposed to be acquainted. For this was not a sudden unpremeditated venture, but a regular deliberate transaction; the claimants had funds in the United States which it was their object to bring into this country in cargoes of flour. There were two grounds, upon either of which they ought to have known the insufficiency of this license for that purpose. The point is that of plain commo-sense, upon which all law is founded, and to which it may be ultimately referred. No person, I conceive, of sound understanding, upon reading the license, could suppose that a privilege granted to certain persons by name, could be any authority to any other persons not mentioned, or that an instrument which has upon the face of it nothing of a transferable form, or import, could be hawked about from one end of the states to another, and, without the ceremony of an endorsement, could serve to protect any cargo, the property of any human character, in any port to which it might find its way. But in the next place, the restriction of licenses to the persons mentioned is no new doctrine. It was fully established ten years since in the case quoted at the bar, that of Jonge, Johannes, Rob. 263, "that government was to judge of the particular persons to whom licenses were to be granted, and that when a license is granted to one person, it could not be extended to the protection of all the persons, who may be permitted, by that person to take advantage of it." This case has been long published and is familiar to all the gentlemen of the profession, who could have advised the parties if they had consulted them. If they had been so informed, either from those learned gentlemen or even from their own good sense, they might have procured proper licenses in their own names, and should have cautioned their correspondents in the United States, not to risk their property except upon such licenses as were unexceptionable. They have acted therefore imprudently, and incautiously, and however unwilling I may be to pronounce a judgment which may occasion loss to gentlemen of good character, and who have incurred no imputation of improper practices, after weighing deliberately all that has been urged in their favour, I think myself obliged to adhere to a rule of law which was established in the high court of admiralty ten years since, and upon grounds which appear to me to be solid and incontrovertible, and which if once broken in upon, would lead to abuses more extensive than can easily be conceived, and which it is feared have already prevailed to the great benefit of the enemy, and of course to the injury of this country.

THE JONGE, JOHANNES,

Decided in the High Court of Admiralty, on the 4th of May, 1802.

This was a case of a cargo of flax, taken on a voyage from Rotterdam to Stockholm, and consigned to sundry merchants there, by bills of lading, expressing their account and risk. The claim was given for the various British proprietors by Mr. Smith, one of the partners in the house of Bridge and Smith, stating that a licence had been taken out for this shipment by their house, in consequence of letters from their correspondents. The words of the license were, "permit messrs. Bridge and Smith, or their agents, or the bearer of their bills of lading, on board three neutral ships, to import without molestation from Rotterdam to the ports of Leith, &c. certain articles there mentioned, being British or neutral property."

Judgment.....Sir W. Scott.

In all these cases, in which the utmost innocence of intention appears on the part of persons claiming under such licenses, the court is certainly very desirous to extend the privilege granted for their protection, as far as it can without sacrificing any principle of law; but if either, from the inexperience of the parties, in making the necessary application, or from any inaccuracy in the office where the license is granted, the defects are such, as put the case beyond all principle, the court may lament the loss which the parties will sustain, at the same time that it may not feel itself authorized to relieve them. The great principle in these cases is, that subjects are not to trade with the enemy, without the special permission of the government, and a material object of the control which government exercises over such trade, is, that it may judge of the particular persons who are fit to be entrusted with an exemption from the ordinary restrictions of a state of war.

The question for me to consider, will be, whether under these observations, the claimants are entitled to engage in this trade, either under the words of the license, or under any authority fairly derivable from it. Bridge and Smith obtained a license to import, as for themselves, their agents, or holders of their bills of lading. It is not pretended the application was made in the names of any other persons, who were to be concerned in the importation. The form in which the license is expressed is, "that Bridge and Smith were to be importers," so far as to be able to transfer their interest to others, not originally concerned in the transaction. Is it possible to say that these parties come under either of the descriptions of persons mentioned in the license. Bridge and Smith are certainly not the importers, because the real and effective bills of lading consign the goods to other persons; they can not claim any interest before the court. Are the claimants the agents of Bridge and Smith? Certainly not. That house appears rather to act as the agents of these persons, and to have no original interest in the shipment. Then the only possible character in which the claimants can stand before the court, is, that of bearers of their bills of lading, as deriving a title from bills of lading transferred from Bridge and Smith. There was a general bill of lading on board, consigning the property to Bridge and Smith, but it appears clearly that this was meant to operate only as a formal paper, so that no right whatever was to be conveyed, there being other bills of lading on board, by which the master was bound to deliver the several parcels to the order of the Dutch shippers.

Then how can I restore these goods under either of those titles? The only persons to whom I am authorised to restore, are Bridge and Smith, as importers, or their agents, or persons holding their bills of lading, and claiming under bills of lading, which Bridge and Smith, after having conducted the importation from the enemy on their own account, had transferred to them. Seeing that there is no apparent violation of good faith towards the public in the parties interested in this claim, I am sorry to be obliged to pronounce, that there is no character in which they can receive restitution.

Then is this case entitled to the same indulgent consideration as the court applied to one, which is represented as a similar case, the Christiana Sophia? In my opinion they are not similar cases. In that case Mr. S. made oath that he intended to include the several persons, and that he took a license for himself and co. meaning to include them under the denomination of co. The court under these circumstances, did accede to the favorable suggestion, that the Irish government might be apprised of the intention of including all the persons—that Mr. S. might have stated the names, and then have taken a license in an abbreviated form. But can this be said of the present case? Bridge and Smith take a license for themselves only, and I have already said, they can prove no agents, since they appear never to have had any interest. If this accident has happened by inadvertency on their part or from want of a correct form in the office granting the license, the parties may take the opinion of the superior court. If that court should feel itself at liberty to give a more favorable construction to their claims, I cannot say that I should be sorry; but I do not feel that these goods can be restored by me, without my taking upon myself to say, what I hardly conceive I am upon any principle warranted to declare, that when a license is granted to one person it may be extended to the protection of all other persons who may be permitted by that person to take advantage of it.

Massachusetts District, ss.

SPECIAL DISTRICT COURT, SEPTEMBER, 1813.

IN ADMIRALTY.

Benjamin Chapman, for himself, officers, owners and crew of the private armed Schooner Fame, vs.

Brig Joseph, Charles L. Sargent, master, William Dall and Isaac Vose, claimants.

This is a vessel of the United States, owned by the claimants, captured on the 16th July last, by the privateer Fame, near Half Way Rock in Boston bay, on her return from England for Boston.

The ship sailed from Boston for Hull in England on the 6th April, 1812. Having arrived at Hull and discharged her cargo, she sailed from thence early in June, 1812, for St. Petersburg, with merchandize belonging to the owners, which had been deposited in England in a preceding voyage, and for the exportation of which bond had been given on their behalf.

The voyage to Russia was under a British license, exhibited in the case, dated June 8, 1812, to continue in force till 1st November following. The ship having arrived in Russia, there discharged her lading; and in October, 1812, took on board a cargo of hemp and iron for London, on freight, on account of a German house of traders established at St. Petersburg. At this time the existence of the war between the United States and Great Britain was known at St. Petersburg. The ship was compelled to winter in a port in Sweden, and arrived in England in April last, where the cargo taken in at St. Petersburg, was discharged. About the 28th of May last, she sailed from London for Boston, in ballast, by permission of the British government, and with the license above mentioned on board. It is stated in the affidavits, that the hon. Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary from the United States at St. Petersburg, was advised with as to the legality of proceeding from Russia to England under the license above mentioned, notwithstanding the war; that he observed he "knew no law against it," and forwarded by the ship despatches to our government; that there was about that time a report at Petersburg, that an armistice had taken place in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council; that the master was obliged to take in the freight at St. Petersburg to pay the necessary expenses on the ship which had accrued; that the return by the way of England was the only practicable mode of saving the ship to the owners, and that she would have returned to this country the last year, had it not been too late, on arrival in Sweden, to proceed to England that season.

With a disposition to extend every admissible indulgence for the preservation and return of ships belonging to our citizens, which were abroad on the breaking out of the war, I do not consider myself at liberty to pronounce an acquittal of this vessel; but on the authority of decisions found in our books, as well as recently rendered in our own country, and under the necessity of rejecting the claim, and considering the ship liable to condemnation, on the ground of trade with the enemy, from the cargo carried from Russia to England.

The precise nature and extent of Mr. Adams's advice has not been satisfactorily evidenced. There is nothing in writing from that gentleman on the subject; and it is observable that the language which he is stated to have expressed on the occasion, does not imply any opinion of the legality or propriety of sailing to England with a cargo. The situation of American ships in Russia, with little prospect of escape, if they should attempt to return home in the ordinary mode, would no doubt excite the sympathy and solicitous attention of that gentleman; and if this ship had returned, even by the way of England, in ballast, though in legal strictness it might not have been justifiable, the transaction would have been obviously less exceptionable.

From my view of the law in this case, I am obliged to pronounce the condemnation of this ship; but I entertain great doubts whether I am required to condemn to the captors. The situation of citizens owning ships or goods abroad at the commencement of the war, and their exertions to bring them home in safety, are entitled to a benignant consideration, especially where it may be apparent, that the course of proceeding adopted was fairly and exclusively directed to that object. Circumstances of this description have been thus viewed by the government in numerous cases, and of great magnitude, which are sufficiently notorious. And there appears reason to doubt, whether, in just construction of the delegated authority to private armed cruizers, it could be intended inevitably to deprive the citizen of an appeal to the equitable interposition of the government to relax the rigorous enforcement of the law, under the exigence of peculiar circumstances.

If there were a clear explicit rule of law on this subject I should be bound to declare it, though I might regret the severity of its operation; and such certainly would be my course. But in considering the nature and extent of the power given to cruizers, it may, I think, be justly questioned whether as regards the vessels of our own citizens there is not an implied reserve of the rights of the government relative to cases of this description. "Prize," says Sir W. Scott "is altogether a creature of the crown. No man has, or can have, any interest but what he takes as a gift of the crown. Beyond the extent of that gift he has nothing—Ello parta eadunt reipublicæ. It is not to be supposed, that this wise attribute of sovereignty is conferred without reason; it is given for the purpose assigned, that the power to whom it belongs to decide on peace or war, may use it in the most beneficial manner for the purposes of both. A general presumption arising from these considerations is, that government does not mean to divest itself of this universal attribute of sovereignty, conferred for such purposes, unless it is so clearly and unequivocally expressed. In conjunction with this universal presumption, must be taken also the wise policy of our own peculiar law, which interprets the grants of the crown, in this respect by other rules, than those which are applied in the construction of the grants of individuals.—Against an individual it is presumed, that he meant to convey a benefit with the utmost liberality that his words will bear. It is indifferent to the public in which person an interest remains, whether in the grantor or the taker. With regard to the grant of the sovereign it is far otherwise. It is not held by the sovereign himself as private property; and no alienation shall be presumed, except that which is clearly and unequivocally expressed." 5 Rob. 163, Amer. Ed. What in this authority is said of the crown is applicable to the sovereignty of any other form of government, and, of course, to our political system.

It is a question of magnitude how far letters of marque and reprisal, by which the exertion of individuals is adopted as auxiliary to the public force against the enemy, shall give to vessels bearing such commissions, the right of interrupting our own vessels, especially those unequivocally bound to our own ports. I do not find a satisfactory determination from books, on the subject, establishing any precise limitation. The reason may be that cases of the character recently presented to this court have seldom occurred. I refer to vessels of the United States bound into our harbors and captured at the very entrance of those harbors by privateers stationed there for that purpose, and in some instances as would appear from their size and equipment, for that purpose only. A state of things so unusual and so irritating and tending to so much disorder, inconvenience and just disquietude, demands a serious attention to the question that has been suggested. LYKRENOFF, in defending the mode of warfare by privateers against some illiberal animadversions, observes, that what they do is done under the sanction of public authority. "In this country, says he, (Holland) they are not allowed to sail without a commission, &c. nor without first having made oath and given satisfactory security that they will not do any injury to neutrals." It was the vexation to neutrals, by arrest, and detention without cause, which was the subject of complaint and regulation. It does not appear that similar precautions were established in reference to their interruptions of their own national commerce, from which it may be inferred, that no such practice then prevailed or was anticipated.

In the ordinance of Louis XIV, there is an express prohibition to vessels of war against detaining the vessels of subjects, friends or allies, which shall have submitted to examination, and exhibited their regular documents, and against taking or suffering any thing to be taken from them, on pain of death. By our prize acts, these vessels are subject to the instructions of the President. In the instructions accompanying the commissions to our armed vessels, very emphatic precautions are given relative to proceedings towards neutral vessels; nothing is said respecting our own vessels. If it could have been in contemplation that the frequent seizure of vessels of the United States would have been practised, and especially that such enterprizes would be the principal if not the sole object of any of those expeditions, some particular instructions would doubtless have been given to prevent the inconveniences and abuses that might otherwise ensue. There are cases undoubtedly, in which our own vessels must be considered as liable to capture and to be condemned to the captors as the property of enemies, under the true construction of the prize act, the commission and instructions. But the question is, whether the situation and circumstances of this vessel present a case in just interpretation within the grant of the government to the captors. The general foundation of this grant is that of service rendered to the state, the exposure of property and life hazarded in the contemplated enterprizes, and the capture and bringing into port of the property of enemies. The true character of the grant may be tested by the acknowledged exceptions, such as ships and goods, belonging to enemies, coming into port by stress of weather, accident, mistake of port, or by ignorance not knowing of the war, or voluntarily coming in upon any revolt. In these cases the property in England is either a droight of admiralty, or belongs to the king, jure coronæ. The interposition and seizure by a cruiser, would confer no right of participation in the proceeds, and upon this obvious ground, that such interposition would be unnecessary.—The property being, in the cases stated, already sufficiently secure. By analogy with those cases, and regarding the principle on which they proceed, I should doubt, considering the character, situation, conduct, and destination of this vessel, whether the captors can maintain a claim to condemnation to their use.

There is a material difference between vessels thus situated and destined, and neutral vessels found culpable; the latter can only be proceeded against according to the laws of nations;—but in regard to our own vessels, they are subject to our municipal law, and in the case supposed, bound directly into port, there can be no necessity of intervention by our cruisers, to exclude the government, if there be an unjustifiable infraction of law, or to defeat the extension of mercy, if there be mitigating circumstances. On this ground, it may be presumed, were issued the additional instructions of August 28, 1812, prohibiting the interruption of any vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, coming from British ports, laden with British merchandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council, and directing to give them aid and assistance. Those instructions have been relied on by the counsel for the claimants, and by the district attorney, in asserting the rights of the government against the exclusive claim of the captors. This vessel was coming from a British port to the United States, but at a period when there was no marked connection of her return with the repeal of the orders in council.—Still, as appears to me, those instructions have a bearing on the case; and it is observable that, pursuant to the original directions from the proper authority, which have never been rescinded or varied, they are still delivered to cruising vessels on the issuing of every commission. It is understood they accompanied the commission of this vessel, which is of recent date. In analyzing those instructions we perceive their reasonable foundation, and their applicability to the present case. The vessels there described, though coming from British ports, were not to be interrupted. They were bound to ports of their own country and no interposition of cruisers, public or private was necessary; they were bound to the United States under an expectation of admittance in consequence of the repeal of the orders in council, or, if they should be mistaken in this the owners were willing to submit themselves to the just and equitable disposition of the government. The object of the instructions is then expressed, "in order that such vessels and their cargoes may be dealt with on their arrival as may be decided by the competent authorities." The cases formed a reasonable exception to the grant to cruisers; and the present case though not precisely correspondent, yet so approximates to the cases specified, that I consider it within the fair purview of those instructions.

I have not had an opportunity (such has been the business before the court) to make that thorough examination on this subject that might be wished. There may be principles and cases which have escaped my attention, which would have compelled a different result from that which my present impressions lead me to embrace. I decree condemnation to the United States. In this course every reasonable claim of the captors to compensation or allowance, as well as of the owners of the ship to mitigation and relief, will be in a situation to be considered and regarded, as the circumstances of the case may appear to require. If in this determination there is a departure from what the law enjoins, the error will, of course, be corrected in a superior tribunal.

IN THE PRIZE COURT, FRIDAY, OCT. 22, 1813.

Before his honor Peter Edwards, Esq.

Judge Surrogate.

CAROLINE, RIDGEWAY, MASTER.

JUDGMENT.

This is the case of an American ship, with a cargo of cotton and rice, taken out of the port of Charleston, by the boats of his majesty's sloop Moselle, and of the privateer Brilliant, having on board a license from sir John B. Warren, granted at the request of the Russian minister, for the purpose of carrying dispatches to his court; a claim has been given by the master, under the license, for his owners in the United States. The license bears date the 12th of April last, and is in the following words, viz.

By the right honorable sir John Borlase Warren, bart. K. B. admiral of the blue and commander in chief of his majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed on the American and West Indian stations, &c. &c.

Whereas Mons. Swertchkoſſ, counsellor of legation from his imperial majesty the emperor of all the Russias, to the United States of America, has requested me to grant the necessary protection for a vessel to proceed with dispatches from his excellency the Russian minister, to Russia, (either by way of Gottenburgh, or directly by the Baltic Sea.)

All captains and commanders of his majesty's ships and vessels of war, and all other armed vessels, are therefore hereby required and directed to permit the vessel bearing this pass, (and charged with his excellency's (dispatches accordingly) to proceed on her voyage without molestation, and to render her any assistance she may stand in need of on the said voyage, or on her return to any port of the United States.

Given under my hand and seal, on board of his majesty's ship San Domingo, in the Chesapeake, the 12th of April, 1813.

JORN BORLASE WARREN.

By command of the Admiral,

Thomas Fox, private secretary.

Sir John Borlase Warren having returned to port, since granting the annexed passport, and difficulties having arisen on the subject of her cargo,

I hereby certify, that I know it was the intention of the right honorable the commander in chief, that the pass on the other side hereof, should protect the cargo of any vessel bearing the dispatches therein mentioned, as well as the vessel itself: Provided always that it did not consist of any article contraband of war.

Given under my hand, on board his majesty's ship Marlborough, in Lynnhaven bay, this 18th of May, 1813.

G. COCKBURN, Rear Admiral,

And 2d officer in command of his majesty's ships and vessels in North America.

There is no cargo mentioned, nor any thing contained in it to ground a belief that the Russian minister applied for it; but there is a certificate of admiral Cockburn annexed, explanatory of sir J. B. Warren's intention, for the ship taking a cargo. It is a case of a novel, and important nature; there is no question of property, it being admitted that both vessel and cargo belong to citizens of the United States—it solely rests therefore on the construction of law, which has been cited, and ably argued by the counsels on both sides; and I feel the greatest diffidence in forming my decision. Whatever it may be, I presume, it will not be final; and this consideration gives me much satisfaction, that a superior tribunal will ultimately judge of its merits.

That sir J. B. Warren is fully competent, under his extensive powers, to grant such licenses, is, I believe, admitted; but it is alleged by the counsel for the captors, that there has been a violation of it, which should deprive the grantee of its protection, that the explanation of admiral Cockburn is inadmissible, and that the license must be strictly construed according to the letter of it; it being a passport of safe conduct, and not a license of trade; therefore it will not admit of any latitude of construction, or explanation; on the other side, it is contended, that it is entitled to the like liberal construction, which is allowed in licenses on trade, and that admiral Cockburn's certificate is good and ought to be admitted. Every respect is due from this court to licenses, granted by the authorised agents of government, and it is its duty to give them every legal support.

I have attentively perused the several cases of law, which have been cited on both sides of the question, and without expatiating on them, I shall to the best of my ability, form my judgment, on the application of them to the present case.

The license was granted by sir J. B. Warren in the Chesapeake, and the application for it was from Washington, the seat of government; all the contiguous ports, now under rigorous blockade; and it was granted specifically, for the protection of a vessel, conveying the Russian minister's despatches. It must then be reasonably presumed, that the license was for a vessel, intended to sail immediately from one of those ports under blockade, as most convenient to the residence of the minister, and most expedient for the purpose of despatch; a license was as necessary here for a neutral, as an American vessel. It can hardly be supposed that the whole range of the American coast was intended, to choose a point of departure from, or that a scope of months was intended to arrange it.

From the tenor of the license itself, and from the law which has been cited, I am of opinion that this is not a license of trade, but a passport for safe conduct, as literally expressed, for the Russian minister's despatches; and must be taken according to the strict letter of it—and under this impression, I do not think that admiral Cockburn's certificate of sir J. B. Warren's intention, can be legally admitted.

But had this license been to the extent asserted, is the bonafides of the guarantee unimpeachable? It was granted on the 12th of April; on the 18th of May, an explanation is required, as to its extent; and on the 13th of July, it is set into operation; from whence? from the port of Charleston; a port at the time of granting the license open to the sailing of all neutrals, where no license could be required, but under blockade at the time of the ship's intended departure, when a license became absolutely necessary. It cannot be alleged that it contemplated the blockade of Charleston. The license is to protect the vessel from and on her return to the United States, with despatches. I presume it must have been explained to sir J. B. Warren, that his protection was for this special purpose; but this vessel is to be sold, if the master can effect a sale of her on her arrival in Europe; for this he is furnished with full authority. The letter of instructions to the master, orders him to be directed by Mr. Baumhauer, either to end his voyage at Gottenburg, or to proceed to a port in the Baltic, and it is stated that Mr. Baumhauer will aid him with his advice, and render him such services as he may require.

This certainly seems to place Mr. Baumhauer in a character not altogether consistent with that which he appears so tenacious of supporting; a person intrusted with important despatches to his government, as he is stated to be, is a public character, that cannot be supposed to have concerns with mercantile speculations.

The circumstance of the Pilot is not a little singular. Charleston was known at that time to be blockaded, the usual plying of the pilots outside of the bar was of course at an end: one, however, is found on board of this ship, for the purpose of seizing the first opportunity to take her out. But it does not appear how he was to return. It would seem that he was intended for the voyage, that no delay might occur, which might throw the ship probably, in the way of the blockading power; and after the ship was detained, hired himself as a servant to Mr. Baumhauer; and here occurs a serious question—why has not that gentleman proceeded with his important despatches? what has detained him? A Spanish ship sailed from Europe soon after his arrival, and a British ship not long after; his presence was not necessary for the further protection of the ship, because, if restored, the license would have effect with the aid of a certificate from this court. In defining the nature and essentials of licenses, sir William Scott states them to be high acts of sovereignty and necessarily stricti juris, and must not be carried further than the great authority which grants them may be supposed to extend; to give due effect to them, it is necessary first, that the intention of the grantor shall be pursued.

2d. That there shall be an entire bonafides on the part of the grantee; it seems absolutely essential that no more should be done than that which the grantor intended to permit; and the party who uses the license, not only engages for fair intentions, but to act conformably to the intentions of the grantor.

The case of the present license before the court, as I have before observed, is in my opinion, no more than a passport for safe conduct, and must as such, from all the law that has been cited, be strictly construed.—The intention of the grantor appears to be clear and determinate, and that there has been a great want of that essential bonafides on the part of the user of it, must prove injurious to his claim, and will justify me in dismissing it.

FROM THE AURORA.

Judgment pronounced by the American consul at Bordeaux, in the case of the recapture of the brig Criterion of New York.

I, William Lee, consul and commercial agent of the United States of America, for the district of Bordeaux, (comprising the departments of Charente-Inferior, Gironde, the Landes, and the lower Pyrenees) in France, have rendered and do render, in the chancellery of the said consular agency, established at Bordeaux, the following judgment.

ON RE CAPTURE. In the cause:

Between Robert Waterman, commander of the brig Criterion, before her capture and part owner of the cargo of said brig, acting as well for himself, as for Messieurs Hull and Griswold of New York, merchants, owners of said brig Criterion, claimant.

Peter Sauvage, of Bordeaux, a French citizen and merchant, styling himself consignee of the brig Criterion, in that quality also claimant.

Robert Andrews, and Jonathan Jones, citizens of the United States, established at Bordeaux; J. H. Lafonta, Justin Fouseat, Labat-Beehet, J. P. Longehamp, Philipou, and co. Gaillard-Matez-eu and co. Veuve Thomas Decaze fils aine et co. Jean Bonnaïe Delance, A. M. Borduzat, Paris Carrie freres and co. also of Bordeaux, and C. G. Barrillon, of Paris, all merchants and consignees of portions of the cargo of the brig Criterion, and therein respectively representing the respective American owners thereof, and in behalf of the same, and of the said portions of cargo, also claimants.

And Benjamin Stacey, commander of the brig Criterion since her recapture, and John Bathedat, a French merchant residing at Bayonne, actual consignee of the said brig and cargo, both acting on account of and as agents for the owners, officers, and crew, of the letter of marque the Volant, of Boston, commanded by Nathaniel M. Perley, against all claims, contrary to the interest of the owners, officers, and crew, of said letter of marque Volant, defendants.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

The brig Criterion, laden on freight by Hull and Griswold, of New York, (owners thereof) carrying six pieces of cannon, with boarding pikes, and arm chest and ammunitions, commanded by said captain Robert Waterman, and having on board a supercargo, by name E. W. Sage, sailed from New York on the 16th of January last past, bound to Bordeaux, or to a port in France.

It appears that this vessel had a permit granted by his I. and R. majesty, to M. P. Sauvage, merchant at Bordeaux, by him on certain conditions transferred to Thomas Waterman, brother of captain Robert Waterman aforesaid, and by said Thomas Waterman ceded to the aforementioned Messrs. Hull and Griswold.

On the 13th of February last past, the aforesaid brig Criterion, captain Waterman, being in 46, N. L. and 5 W. L. from Greenwich, fell in with and was captured by his Britannic majesty's frigate the Belle Poule, commanded by captain Harris, who put a British prize master, duly commissioned as such, together with sixteen seamen on board, and ordered the said brig to steer for Plymouth, in England.

The aforementioned supercargo, E. W. Sage, the captain, Waterman, and all the crew of the Criterion, having been previously taken on board the Belle Poule as prisoners, Waterman only after delivering to the British captain all his principal papers being suffered to return and remain on board the Criterion.

On the 10th of the same month, of February, the American armed ship Volant, commanded by captain Nathaniel M. Perley, had sailed from Bayonne, laden with sundry merchandize, having a commission as a letter of marque issued by the president of the United States, and on the 16th of the same month, in 57 deg. 10 min. N. L. and 6 deg. 5 min. west of the meridian of London, fell in with the aforesaid brig Criterion, then a prize under British colors. The said brig gave chase to the Volant, and having come within reach of her cannon, the latter fired several shot at her; whereupon the English prize master finding that the Volant was an armed vessel of superior force, hauled down his British colors.

The captain of the Volant therefore took possession of the Criterion, and took on board his vessel her whole English crew, (one Thomas Horn, the boatswain of the Belle Poule, only excepted) and put on board of her ten Americans of his own crew, under the command of captain Benjamin Stacey, to whom he gave a copy of his commission or letter of marque, with written orders to sail for Passage, and there to wait a favorable wind and tide, for the purpose of proceeding to Bayonne, and there to consign the vessel to M. John Bathedat, merchant, of that place.

On the 19th day of March last, captain Stacey (having touched at Passage as ordered) arrived with the brig Criterion at Bayonne; and on the same day Pierre Lanne, vice consul and sub commercial agent of the United States at Bayonne, in the presence of said Stacey, Robert Waterman, and John Bathedat, put the seals of this consular agency on the hatchways and on all the openings and bulk heads of said brig Criterion.

On the 22d, 23d and 24th of the same month, of March, the following persons were interrogated by the aforesaid vice consul, Pierre Lanne, touching the facts relating to the capture and recapture of the said brig Criterion—viz.

1st. Robert Waterman, former captain of the Criterion.

2nd. Benjamin Stacey, captain and prize master since her recapture.

3d. Thomas Horn, belonging to the crew of the Belle Poule.

4th. H. Woodbury, one of the seamen put on board the Criterion by the captain of the Volant.

On the 2d of this month, of April, Robert Waterman again appeared before said Pierre Lanne, vice consul of the United States as aforesaid, and made a declaration or protest, wherein he relates all the accidents which had happened to the brig Criterion since her departure from New-York, and particularly that of the capture of said vessel, by the British frigate the Belle Poule, by the British frigate the Belle Poule, captain Harris, and the recapture of her by the Volant, captain N. M. Perley. He further states in said protest, that, on the 22d of March last past, he wrote a letter to John Bathedat, consignee of the Criterion and agent for the recaptors, demanding of him the restitution of the said brig, and cargo on board of her, and offering to give security for the salvage thereof in conformity to the laws of the United States, to which demand the said Bathedat did not think proper to reply: Wherefore said Waterman, in behalf of himself, the owners, and all concerned in the said brig Criterion and cargo, solemnly protested against the said Bathedat, against captain Harris of the British frigate the Belle Poule, and against all others whom it might concern, for all losses and damages sustained by, or which might result from the capture and recapture of the brig Criterion.

On the 2d of April, I having repaired to Bayonne, Benjamin Stacey, the American prize master of the said brig Criterion, appeared before me in the chancery of the consular subagency at Bayonne, and then and there filed a libel in behalf of the owners, captain and crew, of the letter of marque the Volant, to the effect following:

1st. That the war between Great Britain and the United States of America, did exist and had existed since the 18th day of June, 1812.

2d. That the president of the United States had granted letters of marque and reprisal, against the ships, goods and property of the subjects of the king of Great Britain.

3d. That the ship Volant of Boston, commanded by captain Nathaniel M. Perley and having a commission or letter of marque, sailed from Bayonne on the 10th day of February last.

4th. That the said ship Volant, having been chased on the 16th of February by a brig under English colors, attacked and captured the same.

5th. That this brig proved to be the brig Criterion of New-York, belonging to Messrs. Hull and Griswold, merchants of that city, to be mounted with 6 carriage guns, to be armed with boarding pikes and small arms, and it appears that she had been captured some days previously, by the British frigate the Belle Poule, the captain of which frigate had put on board the Criterion an English prize master and sixteen men.

6th. That the brig Criterion, was taken possession of by capt. N. M. Perley, of the Volant, and sent into Bayonne, to the address of John Bathedat, under the command of the said Benjamin Stacey, duly commissioned and authorised by said Perley for that purpose.

7th. That the brig Criterion, having been under capture by the British, and having navigated during five days as an armed vessel, under the command of a British officer duly commissioned, might have attacked and caused damages to the vessels and commerce of the United States; that she had chased the Volant, with such intentions, and that for these reasons, she ought to be called a good and lawful prize.

8th. That therefore, he, the said Benjamin Stacey, as well for himself as for the owners, officers and crew of the Volant, required that the brig Criterion and her cargo, together with her tackle, guns, boats, apparel and appurtenances, or such part or parts thereof, and of these, as he and they had a just claim to under laws of the United States, should be forthwith adjudged to belong to him and them.

In consideration of the aforesaid libel, and of the circumstances of the case; and on the same second day of April I published a monition, advising all persons who may be interested in the brig Criterion, or in her cargo, &c. to bring in their claims, and to shew cause, if any they might have, why the said brig and cargo should not be proceeded against, agreeably to the laws of the United States.

On the third of this present month, Robert Waterman, former master of the brig Criterion, acting in his own behalf, as well as for and in the behalf of Messrs. Hull and Griswold, owners of the said brig Criterion, deposited in the chancery of the sub-agency of the United States at Bayonne, a claim wherein he demands:

1st. The restoration of the brig Criterion, her guns, boats, tackle and apparel, as the property of himself and of the said Hull and Griswold.

2d. The restoration of the goods or merchandize belonging to him the said Waterman, viz: 10 boxes Havana sugars, 4 bales cotton, and one hundred quintals of codfish.

3d. That the consul should direct to be paid into his hands, on account of said Hull and Griswold, the freight of the merchandize composing the remainder of the cargo of the Criterion.

4th. That the consul should authorize him to receive the freight of and also the commissions on said cargo, as stipulated by the bills of lading to be paid to E. W. Sage, the supercargo.

Peter Sauvage, a French merchant, residing at Bordeaux, has deposited in the chancery of this consular agency a memoir, in which he sets forth that according to an agreement passed on the 25th of April, 1812, between him the said Sauvage and Thomas Waterman, which agreement has been approved by Messrs. Hull and Griswold, of New-York, he is of right consignee of the brig Criterion—and he therefore demands:

1st. That the whole amount of the sale of the hull and appurtenances of the brig Criterion, be paid over to him, also the amount of the freight due to the said vessel, together with the amount of commissions as stipulated in the bills of lading, promising on his part to account with the concerned for the amount of the same.

2d. That the proceeds of certain merchandize consigned to him personally shall be paid unto him the moment after the public sale of the same; offering to conform himself to the law of the United States of 1800, concerning the salvage due to the recapture of an unarmed American vessel.

Robert Andrews, the widow H. Decaze and son, Philipon and co. Bonnaffe Delancee, J. P. Longehamp, Gaillard, Malezieux and co. J. H. Lafonta, J. Foussat, Paris Carrie, Brothers, and co. P. Labat Bechet, and A. M. Borduzat, all merchants established in Bordeaux, and consignees of a part of the cargo of the brig Criterion, deposited on the 10th of the present month in the chancery of this consular agency a letter, in which they claim their portions of the Criterion's cargo which were originally consigned to them; and request that the said merchandize be delivered to them en nature, offering to pay to the recaptors of the brig and cargo, salvage of one sixth part of the said goods en nature, or on a just estimation of the value thereof one sixth part of the said value in conformity to law.

Morton and Russell, merchants of Bordeaux, and agents for Benjamin Stacey and John Bathedat, deposited on the 12th of the present month, in the chancery of this consular agency, a memoir, in which they state, that in consideration of the Criterion's cargo being addressed to French merchants, and of her sailing under a French permit, the total of said brig and cargo ought to be adjudged to the owners, officers and crew of the Volant as French property; or otherwise, that one half of the said brig and cargo ought to be adjudged to the owners, officers and crew of the Volant, as a salvage for the recapture of the same.

Out of these facts and claims arise the following questions:

1. Can the Criterion be considered as French property?

2. If the brig Criterion and her cargo be considered as American property, what salvage are the owners, officers and crew of the re-capturing vessel entitled to by the laws of the United States, for the re-capture thereof?

3. Must a public sale be ordered of the brig Criterion and her cargo, for the purpose of adjusting the differences which exist among the interested therein?

4. As consul of the United States can I, and must I, pronounce upon the claim of Peter Sauvage?

5. What measures can be taken for the preservation of the rights and property of all those interested in this brig and cargo, and for the deposit of the sales thereof?

Firstly, it appears that the permit or license granted by the emperor of the French to Peter Sauvage, and under which this vessel was dispatched from New-York, does not denationalize this brig and cargo; for, the sole and only use of such permit was to authorize this vessel to enter into some port in France, and there to sell her cargo and to take returns. That the consignment of this vessel and cargo, or of the greater part thereof, to French merchants, can in no wise alter its American character; for, were we in the absence of other or more ample documents to determine this character, we should be justified in resting our decision on the 14th and 24th articles of the convention of 1800, the first of which ordains that: "The flag shall protect the property;" and the last, that "the prizes of either party which shall enter the ports of the other, shall not be arrested or seized, nor shall the officers of the place make examinations concerning the lawfulness of such prize." In conformity with this the letter of his excellency the minister of marine, of October 14, 1812, to the maritime prefects—It is there said:

"The moment that a prize, evidently English, shall be made by an American cruiser and brought into France, the administration of the marine ought to make no difficulties in leaving her to the dispositions of the 24th article of the convention of 1800, and in manner practised by our consuls in all cases of prizes which French cruisers introduce into neutral or allied ports."

Hence it will be seen that the French laws which ordain that a vessel re-captured, if she remained in possession of the enemy twenty-four hours be considered a lawful prize, cannot be applied to this case. The only laws which must govern us are those of the United States, and of these particular regard is to be had to that of the 3d of March, 1800.

On the second question, we observe that although part of the papers of the brig Criterion were retained by capt. Harris, of the Belle Poule, and we are thus prevented from ascertaining by documentary evidence whether the said brig was or was not the bearer of a commission as a letter of marque, yet that this fact is not important in the decision; for the intention of the American legislature, in the law of the 3d March, 1800, was evidently to indemnify the recaptors for the danger they might run in taking possession of American vessels captured by the enemy and which in his hands might be in a situation to annoy our commerce.

Thus the 1st section of that law gives but one sixth to the recaptors of the vessel so retaken, if such retaken vessel is not armed, because in such case, the recaptors are not exposed to risk in the recapture. But it accords half of the value of the vessel and cargo, if the vessel recaptured is found to have been armed as a vessel of war, either before or after her capture by the enemy. Therefore the question in the present case is narrowed to this fact; was the brig Criterion armed or not armed at the moment of her recapture by the Velant.

It is true that Emerigon, on insurance, volume 1st, page 573, says, that a vessel, though not armed as a vessel of war, may defend herself against the enemy. It is permitted to repel force by force," but, continues the same author, "should the vessel defending herself capture the enemy, she does not by this act become entitled to the property, because she is not the bearer of a commission from her government giving her the right to make prizes."

This doctrine quoted by the consignees, is applicable solely to a vessel sailing like a simple merchantman without a letter of marque or commission, and being attacked by an armed vessel which she may capture by resisting force to force.

But the case in question is totally different. The brig Criterion, at the moment of her recapture, was manned, officered and commissioned by the enemy, as appears by the evidence of Horn. Therefore the brig Criterion had a right to attack and capture the vessels of the United States; for as chief justice Marshal says: "It has been the practice in the present war, and is certainly very practicable, to man a prize and cruise with her a considerable time without sending her in for condemnation."

It therefore results from what has been said, from the letter as well as from the spirit of the law of March, 1800, that it is solely from the fact itself, whether the Criterion was or was not an armed vessel, dangerous to the commerce of the United States, that we must decide whether the recaptor is entitled to a salvage of one sixth or to one half of the said Criterion and cargo.

What says the first section of this act? That when any vessel other than a vessel of war or privateer, or when any goods which shall hereafter be taken as a prize by any vessel acting under authority from the government of the United States, shall appear to have before belonged to any person or persons residing within or under the protection of the United States, and have been taken by an enemy of the United States—such vessel not having been condemned as a prize by competent authority before the recapture thereof, the same shall be restored to the former owner or owners thereof, he or they paying for and in lieu of salvage if retaken by a private armed vessel, one sixth part of the value of the vessel or goods to be restored. And if any vessel so taken shall appear to have set forth and armed as a vessel of war before such capture, or afterwards, the former owner or owners on restoration thereof shall be adjudged to pay for, and in lieu of salvage, one half of the true value of such vessel of war or privateer."

Thus this section is entitled in the margin: "Salvage on recaptured property claimed by residents of the United States."

I have quoted it to show more clearly to the consignees of the Criterion (many of whom being foreigners cannot have had a previous acquaintance with our law) that the words vessels of war do not intend always public armed vessels or men of war as they suppose, but sometimes private armed vessels. So here the distinction is very clearly preserved. For the second section of the same act provides for the salvage on the recapture of public ships, armed or not armed, belonging to the government of the United States and is entitled in the margin: "Compensation for recaptured property claimed by the United States."

Congress then by the words "vessels of war" meant to designate any private armed vessels commissioned before capture, or any vessels armed and used as vessels of war after capture and before recapture.

Were we to take the construction of this act as given to us by the agents of the owners of part of the cargo of the Criterion, a letter of marque could not be considered as a vessel of war, and yet a letter of marque is not, strictly speaking, a privateer.

Gaines in his Lex Mercatoria Americana, page 239, to page 251, gives the case of the Amelia, which from its similitude to this I cannot omit citing.

The Amelia was a Hamburg vessel, armed for her defence with eight iron guns, &c. bound, in 1799, from Calcutta to Hamburg.

She was taken by a French national corvette and manned and officered by Frenchmen, recaptured by the United States man of war the Constitution, captain Talbot, during that unfortunate dispute which existed between France and the United States in 1799.

The district court of New-York decreed one half the gross amount of said ship and cargo.*

The circuit court reversed the decree, and the captors appealed to the supreme judicial court of the United States.

Chief justice Marshall gave a long opinion on this case, in the course of which he said:—

"The Amelia was an armed vessel commanded and manned by Frenchmen with whom we were then at war; very little doubt can be entertained but that a vessel thus circumstanced, encountering an American unarmed merchantman, or one that should be armed, but of inferior force, would as readily capture such merchantman, as if she had sailed immediately from the ports of France."

He cited the different acts which have been passed in the United States, for regulating salvage in the case of recapture, among others the law of 1800, and says:—"This act of 1800, having passed subsequent to the recapture of the Amelia, can certainly not affect that case as to the quantity of the salvage, or give a right to salvage which did not exist before."

In case, said he, of recapture subsequent to the act, no doubt could be entertained but that salvage according to its terms would be demandable. But as the law did not exist at the time of recapture, judge Marshall allows capt. Talbot a reasonable salvage of one sixth.

Thus we see that the merchant vessel the Amelia, armed for her defence like the Criterion, taken by the then enemies of the United States, officered and manned by them, is considered as an armed vessel (or vessel of war) and that one-sixth part in consequence thereof is allowed to a public armed ship as a salvage for the recapture thereof.

Now it is certain that the Criterion, at the time of her recapture by the Volant, was armed with six cannon, small arms, boarding pikes and ammunition, and that she was manned by British subjects and commanded by a British officer commissioned for that purpose by captain Harris of the Belle Poule; it is certain also that she chased the Volant, and no doubt can be entertained but that she would have taken her had not the latter been armed and of superior force, as it appears from the declarations of Stacey, Horn, and Woodberry; these facts I say render it impossible to consider the brig Criterion otherwise than as an armed vessel, or vessel of war at the time of her recapture, or to refuse to adjudge to the recaptors as salvage the half the value of said vessel and cargo.

On the third question, viz. Ought we to order a public sale of the brig Criterion and her cargo?

It would have been more agreeable to me had the parties agreed on this point; but as they do not, let us examine how far I am authorised by circumstances and by precedent, to terminate their difference on this head.

Had the Criterion been carried into a port of the United States, where all the interested could have been present, instead of a port of France, where only a part of the interested are represented, this difficulty could have been more easily adjusted in conformity with the letter of the law.

But viewing every circumstance arising out of this recapture, it appears to me impossible to adjust this concern, to ascertain the value of the vessel and cargo, and to make the lawful distribution without a public sale.

In Lex Mercatoria Americana, page 206, we learn that in a case there cited, lord Mansfield said, "That the recaptor was not obliged to agree to the valuation of the goods, he might have had the goods sold, if he had so pleased, and taken half the produce."

Marshall on insurance, page 485, a chapter on abandonment, states the case of a ship from London to Bermuda, taken by a Spanish privateer, retaken by the English and carried into Boston. The court of admiralty gave a salvage of one half to the recaptors, and as no person appeared willing to give security or to answer to the moiety, to satisfy the salvage, the cargo was sold in the court of admiralty. The recaptors had their moiety of the proceeds and the surplus remained in the hands of the court.

It is to be observed, that captain Water-

* Under the law of 1800.

man, the legal representative of the owners of this vessel, and Peter Sauvage, who claims the consignment, are in favor of a public sale.

That captain Stacey and M. Bathedat, who represent the owners, officers and crew of the Volant, demand a public sale.

The consignees of a part only of the cargo object to this sale; these demand that a division of the goods en nature shall be made between them and the recaptors, in such proportions as the final judgment may direct, a course of proceeding which is not practicable, considering the perishable state of some of the articles composing this cargo, and the damaged state of others, as discovered on opening the hatchways for the purpose of landing the fish. It has been proposed to some of the consignees, to name persons to appraise this vessel and cargo, and the consignees should bind themselves to pay to the agents of the owners, officers and crew of the Volant, their proportion of this appraisal, as the sentence should determine.—But this, though at first offered by them, has now been objected to on the plea that the appraisal must be according to the nominal prices, few sales being made at present, and that if the market should continue bad, the sales of the cargo may eventually produce less than the actual appraisal.

It appears to me on examining several American, French and English authors, on this point, that where in case of recapture the parties interested disagree about the valuation of the goods, the judge shall order a sale or appraisal, as he thinks fit, or as the case may require. It also appears that the captain has an implied authority to do the best he can for the benefit of all concerned, and the insurers are bound by his acts. Therefore when all the interested are not present, and when the insurers have no agent, where the crew has been taken out of the vessel, where part of the cargo is damaged and is in a perishable state, the vessel's papers lost, or when difficulties arise about pursuing the voyage round (all of which points touch this case) the ship and cargo ought to be sold to pay the salvage, and thereby put an end to the voyage.

But there are other reasons which imperiously demand a public sale in this case.

The license under which this vessel sailed from New-York, and was to be permitted to enter a port in France, and export thence a return cargo as contra value for the United States, being annulled by a capture (as the collector of the port of Bayonne has declared) her voyage is destroyed. She can now only be permitted in France as a prize vessel, and her being a prize to an American letter of marque is proved only by the judgment and sale rendered and made in the chancery of this consular agency. It is also certain that had we insisted on entering this vessel under the permit, and not as prize, the collector of the port of Bayonne must have seized her.

The truth and force of these facts are incontestible; there may have been insurances effected in the United States. There appear to be persons interested in this vessel and cargo who are not regularly known. Messrs. Balguerie, for instance, claim a quantity of cotton under a simple letter announcing that it had been shipped, but which is unaccompanied by a bill of lading—The rights of such persons ought to be preserved by avoiding all arbitrary and unsound decisions which might envelope their property with the greater portions of the cargo. For these reasons it appears to me that the public sale of the vessel and cargo, is the only legal and judicious mode of preserving the rights and interest of all concerned.

On the fourth question, viz: Can I, and must I, pronounce on the claim filed by Peter Sauvage?

It is to be observed that the agreement made between Peter Sauvage and Thomas Waterman, was passed in Bordeaux. The 14th article of the Napoleon code ordains:

“That a stranger (even if he is not a resident in France) can be cited before the French tribunals for the execution of obligations contracted by him in France.” Therefore the tribunals of Bordeaux are competent to decide on this claim of Peter Sauvage; their decision cannot be had until Waterman, Sage, and Hull and Griswold, shall be apprised of the claim, and be allowed a reasonable time to answer to the same; particularly as the agreement produced by Peter Sauvage is far from being conformable to the terms expressed on the bills of lading: The first gives Peter Sauvage 4 per cent, but the bills of lading stipulate that there shall be paid E. W. Sage, supercargo, 5 per cent. on the gross sales, and 2 1-2 on the net proceeds.

This difference leads to a reasonable supposition that there has been some agreement between Waterman (the holder of Sauvage's permit) Hull and Griswold, and Sage, the terms of which we are not made acquainted with.

The capture and recapture may also change very essentially the position of the parties, and naturally give birth to the question, how much and what amount is due to Sauvage, for a permit in all probability of no value by this capture and recapture. At all events, it is to E. M. Sage, supercargo of the brig Criterion, now a prisoner in England, and not to P. Sauvage, that the commission and freight would have been paid, had the Criterion arrived without accident in France.

Therefore we have endeavored by the decision which follows to preserve the rights of Sauvage, Sage, and Hull and Griswold, to be pronounced upon by a competent tribunal, which can alone decide whether the American merchant must pay the French one, the price of his permit, considerably diminished in value, if not rendered totally useless, by the capture and recapture of the vessel sailing under it.

On the fifth question, what measures can be taken for the deposit and preservation of the proceeds of the sales if they should take place?

The proceeds of the sales should be deposited in the hands of persons of unquestionable solidity, to be paid over to the lawful proprietors or their agents. To this effect I am of opinion that the salvage, after deducting therefrom the freight, primage and commissions, as expressed in the bills of lading, the duties due the imperial government of France, the per centage due the government of the United States, and all other commissions and charges attendant thereon (to preserve the rights of the recaptors) shall be placed in the hands of John Bathedat, merchant of Bayonne, whose solvability is well known.

That the other portion of the sales which shall appear to belong and coming to the owners of the aforesaid brig and her cargo, after deducting the freight, primage, and commissions, as expressed in the bills of lading, the duties due the imperial government, and all commissions and charges attendant thereon, should be deposited (provided no legal agents of the owners shall appear to receive the same) with Jonathan Jones, merchant of Bordeaux, one of the consignees whose solvability is notorious.

And that the amount of the commissions, primage, and freight, expressed in the bills of lading, should remain deposited in the hands of said Jones; for the preservation of the rights of all those to whom the same shall hereafter appear to belong.

This distribution preserves the rights, titles, and interests, of all the concerned.

Now know ye from these motives and considering the premises, I, William Lee, consul and commercial agent of the United States, in virtue of the powers and duties resulting from the nature of my appointment, doing justice to all parties, do adjudge the half of the nett proceeds of the brig Criterion, her cargo, apparel and appurtenances, to the owners, officers and crew of the letter of marque the Volant, capt. N. M. Perley, represented by Benjamin Stacey and John Bathedat, as the salvage, accorded to them by law for the recapture of the armed brig or vessel of war Criterion.

Ordering, that the said brig, her cargo, guns, arms, boats, tackle, apparel and appurtenances, be sold at public sale, in the chancery of this consular agency at Bayonne, at the time and place to be announced for the same, in the newspapers, and by hand-bills, as shall hereafter be directed.

Ordering further, that the half proceeds of such sale of said brig, cargo and appurtenances, deduction being made for freight, primage and commissions, stipulated in the bills of lading, together with all the commissions and other charges, as above specified, be deposited in the hands of John Bathedat, merchant at Bayonne, there to remain, until information of this my judgment, by a court of competent jurisdiction in the United States; after which the said amount of salvage shall be distributed among the owners, officers and crew, of the letter of marque, the Volant, in the chancery of the United States at Bayonne, in the proportions, and in the manner pointed out by the law of the United States passed on the 27th of January last past, entitled an act concerning letters of marque, prizes and prize goods.

Ordering that the other half of the proceeds of said vessel and cargo, deduction being made of the duties due the imperial government of France, freight and commissions, as specified in the bills of lading, and all other charges above specified (excepting the per centage due the government of the United States) shall be deposited, provided no agent or agents legally authorised to receive the same from the chancellor of this consulate, shall appear before the sales are completed, in the hands of Jonathan Jones, American merchant at Bordeaux, to be by him held for account of all persons interested in the same, and subject to the order and approbation of such person or persons, or his, or their agents duly authorised for receiving the same.

Ordering that the amount of the freight, and commissions before mentioned, and as specified in the bills of lading, shall also be held by Jonathan Jones, in trust for the owners of the brig Criterion, the owners, officers and crew of the Volant, Peter Sauvage or whichever of these parties may be entitled to the same or any portion thereof to be determined by a future judgment relative to said freight and commissions, to be had when the amount of the sales, freight and average shall be ascertained.

Provided that the said John Bathedat as agent for the owners, officers and crew, of the letter of marque, the Volant, give good and sufficient security, by bond of one or more sureties, to be filed in the chancery of this consular agency for the amount so deposited in his hands, to answer for the same in all future appeals, and decisions, which may be had in the above case.

And that Jonathan Jones, for the amount which may be deposited with him, and for the distribution thereof, in conformity with this sentence, shall also file a bond of one or more sureties, in the chancery of this consular agency.

Concerning the demand of Peter Sauvage, I declare my incompetency to decide on the same, and leave him the right to prosecute his claim before a competent tribunal.

And I finally order that all unforeseen charges, which may arise on the execution of this judgment, as well as the per centage or commission, which shall appear to accrue to the consular agency in the direction, and sale of the brig Criterion, and cargo, together with the per centage due the government of the United States, shall remain deposited in the chancery of this consular agency, subject to the decision of the honorable the secretary of state of the United States.

Done and judged, in the chancery of the United States' consular agency, at Bordeaux, this seventeenth day of April in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-seventh.

WM. LEE.

British Inhumanity.

From the Hudson (N. Y.) Bee.

We request the attention of the reader to the following account of the almost unparalleled ingratitude and treachery of the crew of a British ship to the crew of an American vessel—the latter having saved the lives of the former, whose vessel had been wrecked, and they in return for this humane act, seized and made prize of the vessel and property of their preservers! Were it not that such a nation as Britain existed, this act of treachery might be correctly styled unparalleled; but British history is full of incidents of such black ingratitude. Such conduct, even in our enemy, cannot fail to call forth the indignant feelings of every American who has a drop of patriotic blood flowing in his veins.

The account is furnished us by captain BARZILLAI PEASE of this city, who is one of the unfortunate sufferers, and who arrived here a few days since:

PROTEST.

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known to all whom it may concern, that on this 6th day of September, 1813 personally appeared before me Philip Rutter, acting commercial agent for the United States of America at the port of Rio de Janeiro, Valentine Barnard, master of the brig Nanina of New-York, together with Barzillai Pease, Andrew Hunter, and E. Fanning, co partners in the voyage of said brig, who severally depose and swear, that they sailed from New-York on board the American brig Nanina on the 4th of April, 1812, which vessel had been fitted out by her owners, John B. Murray and Son of New-York, who had previously entered into a contract with Barzillai Pease, C. H. Barnard, E. Fanning, Valentine Barnard, and A. Hunter, for procuring skins and sea elephant's oil, at the Falkland Islands. On the 16th May, 1812, arrived at Bonavista for the purpose of taking in salt, &c. and sailed May 27th. On 25th May arrived at St. Jago for the purpose of procuring water, &c. and sailed on the 2d of June. On the 7th of September arrived at the Falkland Islands and built a shallop to pursue our occupation. On the 4th March, 1813, C. H. Barnard, E. Fanning and Andrew Hunter (leaving the brig safe moored at four Island Lagoon at the English Moreland, with V. Barnard and B. Pease on board) proceeded with the brig's company to procure seal or elephant's oil; and whilst sailing around Eagle Island, on the 3d of April discovered the passengers and crew of the ship Isabella, George Higton, master, from port Jackson (in the colony in New South Wales) bound to London, which ship had been stranded on a reef or shoal attached to said Island on the 9th of February, 1813; her cargo consisting of oil and skins, being part lost whilst beating into the harbor. G. Higton master, capt. R. Drure, of the 73d regiment, and Mr. Holt came on board and related to us their unfortunate situation. Capt. Higton informed us that from the planks and timber of the wreck he had commenced building a vessel and requested our assistance in supplying him with such materials as he stood in need of, which we informed him we most assuredly would do, and which we considered it a duty incumbent upon us to perform. On the same evening we waited on them at the camp. Captain Drure and wife expressed great anxiety to be removed, we informed them that we would if requested by them take them on board immediately, and such other persons as wished to leave the island, and likewise assist as far as laid in our power those who wished to remain behind. On the 6th of April, capt. G. Higton sent for us and informed us that, he as master of the vessel felt responsible for every individual on board, passengers and crew, and that it was the general wish of every one to leave the island, and if the remains of the Isa bella's cargo was any gratification to us for relieving them it should be at our disposal. We informed him that we felt it our duty to relieve them and we only accepted of the remains of the Isabella's cargo as it would in some measure be a compensation to us for having our voyage destroyed by the act we were performing, and if permitted to remain behind would prevent any one from benefitting by it. We consequently entered into an agreement (which is in possession of lieut. Wm. D. Aranda) to this purport: that we should receive for a compensation for our trouble and loss of our voyage every article which belonged to the wreck (individual property excepted) and their assistance in securing the same, and on the arrival of the brig in depositing the same on board; and that the crew were to consider themselves under the direction of the master and concern of the brig Nanina and to abide by his or their directions respecting their future allowance of provisions, &c. until their arrival in a port in North or South America. This agreement was signed by every individual remaining on the island except sir H. Hayes and Samuel Brakenvell, whose reasons for not signing it was not at that time known. On the 12th April the shallop sailed having on board capt. Drure and family, five marines and five sailors, with some of our own crew, the latter for the purpose of getting the brig in readiness to proceed from her present situation to Eagle Island. E. Fanning and A. Hunt, with three of the shallop's crew, remained on the Island, who on the following day with the assistance of those of the Isabella crew who remained) commenced saving the remains of the wreck, which inevitably would have been destroyed in the next gale of wind, a much greater part than what now remained having been destroyed in a former. We were thus employed for several weeks, during which time every care was taken by us that their wants should be supplied as far as laid in our power, giving them abundance of provisions (geese which the island afforded) and salt which was in the store, and when there was a scarcity of geese on the island, one of us with the boat's crew procured them from the adjacent islands, likewise a pint of wine per day. We were in this situation when lieut. D. Aranda arrived, who had been sent by the British admiral or consul to their assistance—a representation of their unfortunate situation having been made by lieut. London, who with several others left the island for the purpose of procuring relief in their long boat, and was fortunate in reaching the continent. Immediately on the arrival of W. D. Aranda, E. Fanning and A. Hunter were put under arrest and told cerally by him on the following day that in consequence of our flag he should consider us as prisoners of war, with our men; we were only allowed the privilege of a few rods walk within the limits of the camp and that on neutral ground. On the 25th May the shallop arrived and was immediately taken possession of by lieut. D. Aranda, the Americans on board made prisoners of war and not allowed any communication with us on shore; we were deprived on the same day of our guns which prevented us from procuring any fresh provisions except what we procured with snares, &c. On the 15th of June the brig Nanina arrived at Eagle Island at about two hundred yards from the shore. A party of men boarded the brig from a boat, the commanding officer of which demanded if there were any English on board; being answered in the affirmative, he immediately commanded the securing of the arms of the Americans and the assistance of the English. The shallop, before captured by the English, then came along side (having W. D. Aranda commander of the Nancy on board) and towed the brig into the harbor and made the Americans on board prisoners of war. The following day V. Barnard and B. Pease were ordered to get their things on deck and were sent on shore in the night, where they had to walk over marshy ground for the distance of six miles, and deprived of their bedding for six days, and no provisions allowed them for thirty-six hours after their coming on shore. Our men (or some of them) were compelled by threats to work, which is contrary to the usage of prisoners, unless in cases of the greatest necessity; during this time our trunks were broke open and many articles of property taken or destroyed, our beds were publicly cut to pieces and the feathers scattered in the air. Lieut. Aranda observing that they were public property; the skins were cut to pieces by every one and no account kept of any thing that was taken from the vessel, but every thing was free plunder; we were kept within the limits of the camp and no fresh provisions allowed us, and only procured as above stated. On the 19th of July we were ordered on board, and before we could get our things in readiness our house was broken down, and we were compelled to walk six miles in the rain and after getting on board to sleep in that situation on the cables without bed or covering for two nights. The provisions which we had reserved for our use was stolen from us by those who remained at the camp, &c. On the 27th July we sailed from Eagle Island, seven of us were obliged with our trunks, &c. to sleep in a small place between decks, while a large cabin was only occupied by lieut. London and a prostitute from port Jackson, two passengers on board the late ship Isabella. During the passage to this place every assistance which laid in our power was given to the officer on board (Wm. Marsh) whose situation from the time of his taking charge was extremely unpleasant, being sent on board without bed or clothing which we supplied him with, and no chart or quadrant to navigate the vessel with, and it was fortunate in our being able to supply him with a quadrant and books. On the 23d August we arrived at Rio de Janeiro where a representation was made of our situation to the British consul and admiral.

Proceedings of the shallop after leaving Eagle Island for purposes before stated. On the 13th April we fell in with a small boat formerly belonging to the Isabella which had sailed from Eagle Island for the purpose of discovering if any of the adjacent islands could afford them relief. Their situation was deplorable, they themselves (Mr. Matison and three men) acknowledging that they could not have survived one half hour longer; took them on board and proceeded to Fox Bay on the English Moreland, from thence to Arch Island harbor. Being discommoded on board, eighteen left the shallop under the direction of C. H. Barnard, and arrived the same day at the brig. The following day, C. H. Barnard with two men returned on board the shallop in order to bring her round the Moreland where they arrived on board the brig on the 3d day of May. All hands then proceeded to get the brig in readiness for proceeding to Eagle Island, accompanied by the shallop. On the 16th May the shallop sailed and on her arrival at Eagle Island was taken possession of. On the 22d of May the brig got under way and arrived at New Island on the following day, where we experienced (afterwards) continual gales of wind until the 11th of June, during which time the vessel was in the greatest danger, although every precaution was taken to render her safe, and by general consent it was concluded on remaining there until a more favorable opportunity occurred; for as all our hopes remained on the preservation of the brig, we were very cautious not to run any risk. On the 11th, Charles H. Barnard, with a boat's crew, proceeded to Beaver Island, about 20 miles, for the purpose of procuring fresh provisions and wood. During their absence of the 13th inst the English crew and passengers of the Isabella demanded from capt. V. Barnard, that as the weather was now favorable, the vessel should proceed to sea, which he objected to in consequence of the boat's being absent; but informed them if they would wait until the arrival of the boat and the weather should continue to be favorable, that they would naturally proceed on; they insisted they would not wait. Captain Barnard requested of captain Drure that he would use his influence with the marines and prevent them from their proceedings and assured him that as soon as the boat returned the vessel should proceed; but capt. Drure refused to act on the occasion notwithstanding he was one of the principal ones which requested the vessel should wait a more favorable season, observing that he had rather wait three months than encounter such a series of bad weather as we had met with. The marines and crew immediately commenced getting her in readiness for sea and on the following day got under way. B. Pease represented the situation of the vessel to capt. Drure and the risk she would run sailing among the islands where there was no person acquainted, and that in case they would stop at Beaver Island that he would act as pilot on the occasion. This capt. Drure observed to the men which they agreed to comply with; but on their arrival at Beaver Island they positively refused to send the boat on shore or to admit the vessel coming at anchor, but after firing several guns proceeded to Eagle Island where they arrived on the 15th June, and was immediately taken possession of by lieut. Aranda, who instead of immediately sending the shallop to the relief of those on Beaver Island as the emergency of the case required, employed her for various other purposes until the 10th July. He then sent her out under charge of Mr. Marsh under pretence of looking for the boat and crew left at Beaver Island; but after agreeing that capt. Pease who was best able to search for them should go in her, she was sent off with no American on board, but one foremast hand. She was absent three days in the whole, and never went either to New Island (where he parted with the brig) or to Beaver Island where he was when the brig was taken possession of by the English—the only two places where it was at all probable they could be found, which in the present case was as destitute of the common feelings of humanity as it was contrary to common sense, and we think that no further search ever had been made for them, as on the 27th of July we sailed leaving the brig Nancy unmoored and in apparent readiness for sailing.

Wherefore these deponents do hereby solemnly protest against Robert Drure, captain in the 73d regiment, his lady and two children, Miss Spencer, passenger. — Matison, John Baptist, Joseph Ellis, William Roberts, John Hubbard, — Johnson, — Huse and wife, Robert Andrew and William Ray, for having forcibly taken possession of said brig Nanina while laying at anchor at New Island, one of the Falklands, and removing her thence to Eagle Island, and against the consent of her officers and crew; as also against Wm. D. Aranda, commander of his majesty's brig Nancy, for capturing and keeping possession of said brig Nanina after her having arrived within two hundred yards of Eagle Island; and also against said Wm. D. Aranda for landing on Eagle Island and there seizing and putting under military arrest, the persons of E. Fanning, A. Hunter, Wm. Montgomery, Charles Lot and James Tolever, and for afterwards sending them to this port as prisoners. And against Wm. Marsh pretending to act as prize master on board said brig. And against all and every person concerned in the capture and detention of said brig, her officers and crew. And the said appearers also protest against all and every person whom it does or may concern, and do declare that all damages, losses and detriments that have happened to said brig and the goods of her lading from winds, waves or capture, are and ought to be borne by the merchants and freighters interested, or whomsoever else it may or does concern, the same having occurred as before stated, and not by and through the influency of said brig, or neglect of said appearers, officers or crew.

British Consistency.

From the Democratic Press.

In the Emporium of Arts and Sciences for December 1813, (conducted by Thomas Cooper, Esq. professor of Chemistry, Mineralogy, &c. in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania:) is published a dissertation on political economy by Dr. E. Bollman, maintaining the superior advantages of foreign commerce to the home trade, and which certainly displays a great deal of ingenuity.—In the course of it, Dr. B. adverting to, and differing from the opinion expressed by Mr. C. that "foreign commerce is a productive cause of all modern wars" makes the query "but is it true?" to which Mr. C. answers in a note, and states the following singular circumstance.

"I think it is. Look through the history of the European wars, particularly those of England, and it will be found so. It is not a little singular that in 1738, the king, the lords, the commons, and the British people were actually outrageous in support of the principle that FREE SHIPS MAKE FREE GOODS. Sir Robert Walpole could not withstand the torrent; one of the most efficient causes of his ultimate dismissal, was, that he did not take care to insert this principle as a national right, in his convention at PARDO; a right, in defence of which, the British nation actually went to war with Spain in 1739. Flags were displayed, and cockades worn in almost every town of the kingdom, with mottos such as FREE TRADE, NO SEARCH. Tempora mutantur. 'T. C.'

Dr. Smollet in his continuation of Hume's history, vol. 3, ch. 6, p. 16, 17, 21, states that when the convention concluded at Pardo on the 14th January, 1738, was published for the information of the people, divers merchants, planters, and others trading to America, the cities of London and Bristol, the merchants of Liverpool, and the owners of sundry ships which had been seized by the Spaniards, offered petitions against the convention, by which the subjects of Spain were so far from giving up their groundless and unjustifiable practice of visiting and searching British ships, sailing to and from the British plantations, that they appeared to have claimed the power of doing it as a right: for they insisted that the differences which had arisen concerning it should be referred to plenipotentiaries, to be discussed by them without even agreeing to abstain from such visitation and search, during the time that the discussion of this affair might last. They therefore prayed that they might have an opportunity of being heard, and allowed to represent the great importance of the British trade to and from the plantations in America; the clear indisputable right which they had to enjoy it, without being stopped, visited, or searched, by the Spaniards on any pretence whatsoever; and the certain inevitable destruction of all the riches and strength derived to Great Britain from that trade, if a search of British ships sailing to and from their own plantations should be tolerated UPON ANY PRETEXT, OR UNDER ANY RESTRICTIONS, or even if the freedom of this navigation should continue much longer in a state of uncertainty.

Mr Pitt, afterwards Earl Chatham, "declaimed against the convention as insecure, unsatisfactory, and dishonorable to Great Britain. He said the great NATIONAL objection, the searching of British ships, was not omitted, indeed, in the preamble; but stood there as the reproach of the whole, as the strongest evidence of the fatal submission that followed; on the part of Spain, an usurpation, AN INHUMAN TYRANNY claimed and exercised over the American seas. On the part of England, an undoubted right by treaties, and from God and nature, declared and asserted in the resolutions of parliament, were now referred to the discussion of plenipotentiaries, upon one the same equal foot. This undoubted right was to be discussed and regulated; and if to regulate be to prescribe rules, as in all construction it is, that right was, by the express words of the convention, to be given up and sacrificed; for it must cease to be any thing from the moment it is submitted to limitation"—and Mr. Lyttleton affirmed, that "if the ministers had proceeded conformably to the intentions of parliament, they would either have acted with vigor, or have obtained a real security in an express acknowledgment of our right not to be searched, as a preliminary, sine qua non, to our treating at all. Instead of which they referred it to plenipotentiaries. Would you, sir, (said he) &c."

And it will be recollected (as mentioned by Mr. Cooper) that when Russia proposed the armed neutrality, that free ships, free goods, was then adopted as a principle of maritime law by every maritime nation of Europe except Great Britain.

Inland Navigation.

Shortly after the commencement of hostilities with the Creek Indians, gen. Pinkney, aware of the difficulty of supplying the troops when they had penetrated some distance into the nation, determined to attempt the navigation of the Chatahooche, which has succeeded beyond expectation. Much praise, we understand, is due to major Bourke, to whom the execution of this laudable enterprize was confided, for the zeal and ability with which he discharged his duty.

Great benefit will result to our country at large from this measure. Besides ensuring to the army a regular supply of provisions, near a hundred miles of land transportation will be saved. Nor is this all—It will open a safe and direct communication with New Orleans, which, under existing circumstances, is of no little consequence. Sugar can at this time be purchased in New Orleans for about eight dollars a hundred, brought through lake Ponchartrain and up the Alabama to the junction of the Coosa and Tallapoosa for less than two—thence along a firm and level road of sixty miles across to the falls of the Chatahooche, and up that river to within a few miles of a large portion of our frontier, for a trifling expense. Estimating the whole cost at fifteen dollars a hundred, it will be nearly one half less than the selling price of sugar in most of our sea port towns. In time of peace, the prospect is equally flattering. We shall then have free access to the trade of the gulph of Mexico, and can give our superfluities in exchange for the West India productions, which, from long habit, have in a measure become necessities of life.

Captain Garrison, whose journal we subjoin, is of opinion the Chatahooche can be navigated with much ease by keel boats 40 or 50 feet long and 5 wide, carrying about 50 barrels of flour—and two of his boatmen acquainted with the navigation of the Savannah river from Petersburg to Augusta, think the Chatahooche is preferable. Several boats upon the above construction, we learn, will be built by government with as little delay as possible.

Extract from Capt. Garrison's Journal of a trip down the Chatahooche.

Left Floydville, near the Cherokee boundary line, 2d February—sprung a leak and put to shore, compelled partly to unload—re-loaded on the 4th and proceeded two miles to the entrance of a large creek—passed Deep creek two miles on the west side, and two miles lower down Poplar creek on the east side—here the river is deep and handsome—four miles from this are the byeamore Islands, where a number of beautiful creeks enter on both sides—Pinkney's river, a handsome stream, enters eight miles below—Sandy river six, on the west side opposite Beech Island—eight miles lower down a number of good streams enter—the river handsome and navigable for boats drawing not more than three feet water.—Put off at sunrise on the 5th—came eight miles to a shoal near two in length, but not difficult—three miles below Hickory creek comes in—there is a shoal at the Four Islands 12 miles lower down, but not dangerous, from which we encamped three miles. Put off early on the 6th—after going five miles passed Piney-Log creek, a large and beautiful stream—arrived at the three Big Islands, twelve miles, where there is a shoal somewhat difficult—encamped two miles below at a small shoal. Put off the 7th at sun-rise—passed a trifling shoal about four miles—there are several little shoals on the west side, five miles lower down, but they do not materially affect the navigation—came six miles to a shoal, a little below which stands an Indian village, now evacuated—thirteen miles below passed a large cultivated island, inhabited by Cowetau Indians; the river shoally; proceeded three miles and encamped. Put off early on the 8th; passed Adams's river, [Ho,ith lite,gau] a handsome stream, 22 miles, encamped three miles below at the Burnt Village, where general Adams's detachment crossed in their late expedition against the Oakfuskees. Put off early on the 9th; the river being shoally and the wind high, we encamped, having gone only ten miles. 10th, came 13 miles through a shoally and difficult river interspersed with islands. 11th, came six miles, when we found ourselves at the head of high and dangerous falls, by Indian computation ten miles long.

It is contemplated, we believe, shortly to remove Fort Mitchell which stands near the foot of the Chatahoche Falls, to the head of them; where a strong work will be erected, and the principal depot for provisions established. The Federal road will likewise be altered to pass that way.

Big Bone Cave.

A description of the BIG BONE CAVE, in White county, Tennessee, by D. V. Maddox, esq. in a letter to a friend.

Dear Sir—On my way to this place. I was arrested by curiosity to visit the Big Bone Cave. The road leading to it, terminates in the angle of two mountains, forming as it were, the foot and ankle of the great Cumberland range; in the angle of which yawns the mouth of this hideous cavern. The aperture is a semicircle, whose semi-diameter is about fifteen feet. The sun was declining in the west, and his rays bore in a direct line against the mouth of the cavern, intermixing light and darkness with such hideous perplexity, as to leave the mind in doubt, which of the two to adopt. At the same time that there is issued from its mouth a column of smoke, occasioned by the burning of torches within, which gave to the whole an appearance that seemed to realize the most exaggerated picture of the infernal regions! While a smutty crew, in letters, resembling nothing but devils in appearance, bore in black sacks, the nitre and bitumen which seemed to constitute the horrors of the place.

As the sensations excited by these appearances, were only ebullitions of the moment, and believing that where there was so much to astonish without, there might be something to admire within, I determined to explore the cave. I therefore employed a guide, changed my clothes, procured torches, and entered the cavern.

The passage from the entrance is a serpentine grotto; sometimes 20, sometimes 50, and sometimes not 5 feet in altitude.—After traversing this grotto for several hundred yards, we arrived at the entrance of several new apartments; some to the right, some to the left; now turning at right angles, then obliquely, till we were lost in the labyrinths which a faint torch, and the various windings of the alleys, produced in this darksome abode.

We now had proceeded beyond the atmosphere of smoke, occasioned by the burning of torches employed to light the workmen. Till now, the sooty walls and ceiling of the apartments, had exhibited the most dismal and legubricous appearance. The cautious wanderer hearing nothing but the indistinct echoes of hammers and pick-axes, dying upon the ear, with most appalling sounds, and seeing at intervals, the flame of torches, followed by men in the shape of devils, was easily impressed with the belief, that the place was inhabited by a thousand fabled Cyclops, occupied with their bellows and forges in fabricating thunder!

But the whole appearance is now changed. We have ascended by means of a ladder into an upper suit of apartments; where the glassy smoothness of the ceiling, and the ornamented incrustations of the walls, seemed to render "darkness visible." This was the most spacious and beautiful apartment we had yet visited. The lower surface, though of clay, is smooth and even; the form is oval terminating in a narrow passage at each end; the walls beautifully enamelled with petrified salts, with here and there, projecting spars with various crystalized substances. The ceiling is concave, with a surface so smooth and glassy that the reflection of the light from our torches gave it the appearance of the stary firmament. On one side of the apartment, I discovered a small aperture, that led by a gradual ascent, in the figure of a stair case, to more than half the height of the rooms. From this position I had a mere ample view of the concave above, and the colonnade below rising in pillars, which discover their semi-diameters in the sides of the wall, and reaching to the ceiling as if to support the roof.

When I descended to the lower surface, and surveyed the magnificent beauty of the surrounding walls, the sublimity of the spacious concave above, constructed with so much regularity and order, as if nature had sought in this subterraneous abode, to mock the work of art, it was impossible to resist the feelings which the objects around me naturally inspired!—Every thing was wonderfully beautiful, and awfully sublime!—But the idea of being three miles under ground, filled the mind at once with terror and apprehension.

My guide now informed me, that in this apartment had been found bones of a remarkable size and figure. He said, they had dug up the talon of a Lion, 13 inches long; the hoof of an Elephant; the ribs of the Mammoth; and the skull of a Giant; but that they were all destroyed. He showed me a fishing net made of bark silk, and a moccason of the same materials, both perfectly sound.

This cave is incomparably the largest and most complete yet explored in America.—Madison's cave, as described by Mr. Jefferson, extends only three hundred feet under ground. Whereas, the Big Bone Cave extends in its meanders, several miles! The sides of the various vaults are of solid limestone. The earth consists of nitre, salts, and copperas. In many parts of the cavern issues strong currents of air, which seem to be the effect of water, forcing itself through small aqueducts; or it may be driven by the pressure of the atmosphere, through some orifice in the top of the mountain.

The whole crust of the rock, forming the cave is full of cells and avenues, covering about five hundred acres of land, not a hundredth part of which has been explored, and of that not a hundredth part of its riches are yet exhausted.

When the bowels of these subterraneous vaults shall be no longer able to yield their riches to gratify the avarice and cupidity of insatiated men, the cave will then become the abode of its original inhabitants, and may one day become as famous for ghosts and spectres, as the celebrated cave of Antiparos.

This cave is the property of Major John A. Wilson, of M'Minville—It employs at present about one hundred workmen, who manufacture five hundred pounds of nitre per day.

August 17, 1813.

Description of the Mississippi,

By D. T. Madox, Esq.

The Mississippi is the Nile of America. The aborigines who resided on its banks, called it Mechaseba, or Father of Waters—A name, which at once conveys to the mind an idea of the mighty flood, and the simplicity of its description. Its length is between three and four thousand miles, meandering through one of the richest and most delightful countries in the world. The tract of country embraced by this mighty river, and its tributary streams, contains nearly a million of square miles. They interlock with the waters of the Potomack in the east, with the lakes in the north, and those of the Rio del Nord in the west. From its confluence with the ocean, a man of war can ascend it one thousand miles—yet its mouth is so guarded by bars, that a vessel drawing more than fourteen feet water, cannot pass it without lightening. It is the high sea of the western world—and bears on its bosom the product of the most varied and favored climates. Transporting commercially, the the sugar, rice, cotton and indigo of Louisiana; salt, iron and lead of Ohio, and the north western territories; flour and distilled spirits of Pennsylvania and Virginia; and live stock and bacon of Kentucky and Tennessee.

For two thousand miles from its mouth, its average width is three-quarters of a mile, and its depth above thirty fathom. For half this distance, the banks are low, and liable to be overflowed at its periodical flood. But this evil has been counteracted by the industry of its inhabitants, who have constructed artificial banks or levees, of sufficient height to keep the water within its channel. These afford an agreeable walk in the morning and evening, while the sun is below the horizon. Here you behold on the one hand, boats, barges and batteaux, wafting the varied produce of the upper countries on the bosom of this mighty flood, to the great mart at New-Orleans, or meandering through its hundred mouths to the ocean.—While on the other hand, the eye is caught, and agreeably entertained with the prospect of well cultivated fields of cotton, sugar, rice and indigo, till the view is lost or intercepted by the towering cypress, that rises majestically behind, beautifully decorated with moss that hangs in festoons from its boughs, and interspersed with underwood and cane.

“Where active fancy travels beyond sense,
“And pictures things unseen—”

The tillable lands on either side of the river, extend from one half to three quarters of a mile. The farms occupy generally from five to ten acres front, and from forty to eighty in depth; the whole settlement exhibiting the appearance of one continued village, with the river for the main street. Thus far, on either side of the river, every thing is pleasant, every thing is beautiful. But should you attempt to penetrate beyond this scenery, you are immediately lost in a labyrinth of lakes and bays, and in danger every moment of being swallowed up by alligators, that lie concealed to catch the unwary traveller as he passes.

The annual inundation of the Mississippi, its soil and climate, and particularly its grandeur, are characteristics which assimilate it to the Nile of Egypt. And like the Nile, too, canine madness, which infests every other country, is unknown on the Mississippi. Whether it is owing to the atmosphere, or to any property in the water, has not yet been determined. If to the latter, might not the preventive be ascertained by decomposition? and if it acts so powerfully as a preventative, why not, by preparation, serve as a cure?

It has been asserted that the Bay of St. Barnard, was once the mouth of the Mississippi—that it is approximating to the east, and that it may one day discharge itself into the Atlantic at the mouth of the St. Mary's. If so, all the country between it and the Rio Mexicano, has been alternately its bed and margin. However this be, it is remarkable, that the lands on the south west of the river are considerably lower and appear to be of more recent growth, than those of the north east. The facility with which new lands are formed at its mouth by the deposit of alluvion, favors the presumption, that it will one day intersect the Gulph Stream near the Florida Point. And in that case, Mobile will become one of its tributary waters; forming a country in the angle of these mighty rivers, fit for the habitation of man, which is now inhabited only by the monsters of the deep.

Western Scenery.

FROM THE BARDSTOWN (KY.) REPOSITORY.
To the Editor.

By giving the annexed extract of a letter a place in your paper, you will enable me to redeem a pledge which I some time since made the public, to prevail upon the author of one side of an interesting correspondence, to submit particular parts of that correspondence to public inspection. The subject of the present letter will perhaps interest that part of your readers who derive pleasure from delineations of rural scenery, and the more interesting subjects of natural philosophy.

Extract—A few days since, to relieve the penury of close study, I determined on taking a tour through the adjoining county, which lies west of Bardstown. A partial survey of an immense range of hills, which are called Knobs, and of the face of the country which lies immediately above them, were among the motives that prompted me in this excursion. A thousand objects fell under my eyes, to interest the votarist of natural curiosities, and excite the most grateful sensations in a heart, that delights in contemplating majestic eminences and extensive plains.

The route I pursued, led through the plain in which Bullitt's Old Lick is situated. I have heard a variety of interesting anecdotes, relative to the enterprizes of early adventurers in the country of which this place was the scene, when every species of wild animal known in this state, the rude and bloody savage, and civilized men, formed, as it were, but one society! How delightfully we are interested with those images, of imagination, which are stolen by a fanciful recurrence to a scene like this! This lick was the great point of concentration of the buffalo, the elk, the deer, and the interesting variety of animals, that resort to salt springs as one great source of their nutriment and health. And here, too, the bold, the hardy, and early adventurer, taught by the wily savage, would lay in ambush, and deal death to the animal, out of several hundred, that might be the choice of his taste. The joy of the buffalo, upon their arrival at this spot, was evidently manifested by the ceremony of rolling and a thousand awkward gambols, that at once contributed to the playful frolics of an almost innumerable herd, and afforded amusement to the lurking hunter. The danger of the hunter while in this situation was two-fold; for if his piece was discharged when upon the ground, his life was instantly threatened, by a most violent and dreadful dispersion of the buffalo in every direction, who, under the alarm, would blindly overwhelm every thing before them, and continue running for miles; while the sly and wary Indian, seeking the death of the white man with as much cruelty, as he sought game with cunning and avidity, resorted to the same spot, and would spend days and nights in anxious and ceaseless search. From this latter cause of danger, the utmost ingenuity of the hunter could not secure him; while from the former he sought refuge by climbing a tree, and securely resting on its branches. Carniverous animals of every kind would follow the hunter, as the provider of their sustenance, wait upon him in hungry expectation, and prey upon the offal of the animals which he killed.—The horror and dangers of this scene were much increased by the midnight howlings and voracious appetite of these "hunger-smitten lords of the desert," who would rend the air with the most piercing and frightful yells, and attack man himself with the fierce-ness of tygers, when severely pinched by starvation.

The ground about the lick exhibits a luxurious and interesting appearance. The surface is very uneven, from the circumstance, I suppose, of the visitation and licking of buffalo, &c. for some thousand years past.—This opinion I suggested to my comrade, who, being rather more sceptical than myself, did not honor me with an entire concurrence. But if we consider that this has been a place of resort for wild beasts from time immemorial, that every one, whilst gratifying its appetite by consuming some of the saline clay, must have borne off much more soil than it brought in, we cannot for a moment entertain a doubt that the depressions and prominences which make the surface of the ground, have been occasioned in the way that I have suggested.

But this spot, so long the exclusive possession of the wild animal and the untutored savage was soon wrested from its original proprietors by civilized man, reclaimed from the wilderness, and made the seat of wealth and industry, joy and plenty. For a number of years past, the supply of salt requisite for the consumption of a great part of this state, was the effect of human labor, employed in converting the water of this important lick into this useful article of human and animal life. In the momentous work, the tall oak which adorned the neighboring hills, and covered the deep plain, has been wrested from the forest and made subservient to the purposes of public utility. All nature droops and pines under the destructive influence of human art; for now, here, and there is only to be seen a tall and solitary pine, that nods to every gale, mingles its sorrows with every passing breeze, and seems to mourn over this barren waste, stripped of its gay attire.

This place, when even in its state of most flourishing prosperity, was frequently visited by the murderous savage, for the purpose of committing depredations and killing the inhabitants. There is a knob that rises immediately on one side of the lick, to an almost immeasurable height, upon which they would securely assemble and view the operations of the white men below. A company of Indians, who came merely for the purpose of pillaging, watched their opportunity and seized a man by the name of Cahey, whom they conveyed to the summit of this knob, and severely scourged with rods. After having merrily indulged in torturing him until their savage dispositions were gratified, and having confined him until they were ready to depart with stolen property, he was set at liberty to inform his companions of this refinement in the tortures of Indian captivity. This towering eminence has taken its name from this occurrence, and is known in every part of the state, as "Cahey's knob." The observations of the Indians from this point enabled them to perceive the numerous wells that were dispersed through the lick. The apprehension of falling into these wells was the only consideration, that restrained them from attacking the inhabitants in the night, and producing an entire slaughter of them. This suggestion has been made by an intelligent Indian, who has visited the settlement since peace was established.

As you emerge from this plain, in ascending these "Alpine heights," one of the most beautiful and interesting landscapes opens upon the view, that ever afforded pleasure to the sight of a human being. When you attain the utmost summit of the "cloud-capt hill," your vision, from being unobstructed by any intervening object, is free to penetrate to that limit, in which the green foliage of nature blends with the cerulean blue, and forms a spectacle at once brilliant and sublime. Here and there tall trees are to be discerned, which have lifted their proud heads above their competitors, and wave their branches in triumphant majesty as the kings of the forest. These stately and majestic trees, together with slight eminences beautifully dispersed upon the plain, give to the whole prospect a charming diversity, that fires the imagination with celestial rapture, and transports the soul beyond the power of expression.

This range of mountains is several hundred miles in extent, passes about three miles below Louisville, and is supposed to have once formed the shore of a vast lake which covered the fertile plains of Kentucky, Ohio, &c. If I recollect right, philosophic mention has been made of these matters, by the celebrated Volney, who travelled through the western country some years since. He suggests, that the whole tract of country which lies above this range of mountains, as high up as Pittsburgh and bordering lake Erie, was once the bed of an immense lake. He supposes that the summit of the hills, which compose this range was sufficiently high to do this; and by some dreadful throes of nature, this dam or barrier was rent to its foundation, and a chasin produced through which the waters of the lake were discharged. In this escape of the waters they centered from the high to the low grounds, and formed the bed of the river now called Ohio.

It might be here observed, that this extraordinary agency of nature was not necessary to have produced a channel, through which the waters of this lake might have been discharged. A slight subterraneous communication, opening at one end in the lake, near the base of this barrier, and at the other into the low lands below this range of mountains, would have been sufficient at first to have led to a slight evacuation of water.—The force exerted upon the small volume passing through this channel, by the compression of several hundred feet of superincumbent water, would have the inevitable effect of abrading the sides of this subterranean canal, and enlarging its diameter. In this way, both the communication would be widened, and the volume of water increased in magnitude and impetus. The continued operation of these causes, would soon produce a channel equal in capacity to that which is observable between the hills that border upon the plain through which the Ohio now glides. But to proceed upon the suggestion of Mr. Volney.

The opinion of this gentleman is corroborated by a thousand appearances both above and below the surface of the earth. The indications exhibited by the face of the country at Louisville, and on each side for a considerable distance along the base of this range of mountains, give to his hypothesis a strong coloring of probability. It is difficult to bring the imagination to conceive, how so broad and solid a barrier, upwards of 100 miles in breadth, could be rent in twain, and a fissure produced, through which the waters of this mighty lake were discharged, and, with the floods of the Mississippi, disembogued into the Gulf of Mexico. But if we recollect the wonderful chasms, wrought by powerful convulsions of nature in other countries, and which, from their depth, width, and extent, have become subjects of curious speculation in natural philosophy, we might readily give into the opinion, that a similar effect might result from a similar cause in the United States. A violent earthquake would be fully adequate to the production of such a chasm. Even a slight channel produced in this way would have certainly led to the subsequent evacuation; as the water must have rushed through it with impetuous violence, and widened the channel to an extent suited to the volume of water that had to pass. Conceiving this theory to be correct, it is reasonable to suppose, that the walls of this chasm, at its entrance, were more violently pressed upon and abraded by the water in its egress, than the sides of the same chasm at a more remote point below. This is what has actually happened. The bottom which intervenes between the hills just below Louisville, and through which the Ohio now mildly glides, is much wider than the bottom to be seen any where below, throughout the whole width of this range of mountains.

When the whole of the waters of this lake were drained, and the only river that continued to flow was the Ohio, fed by tributary streams, it is natural to suppose that this river would desert the broad surface which formed the bed of the great flood of water in its discharge, and center in a channel, accommodated to its volume. This supposition is much strengthened by the face of the country, both above and below Louisville. The surface of the ground is marked by hundreds of broad and shallow channels, all running parallel with the river, which clearly indicate that the Ohio in its course, before it had formed the deep channel which it now occupies, overflowed a large extent of country. The land which is most remarkable for these slight channels, lies below Louisville, on the south side of the river, and is designated by the name of the Pond Settlement. The soil in this neighborhood has been pierced to the depth of fifty feet. There being but an uniform stratum of sand, through which shells of various kinds are thinly dispersed, clearly proves that it is the effect of alluvion. This tract of land is several miles wide, continues 15 or 20 miles down the Ohio, and lies several feet above the highest inundation that has been known by the oldest settlers of this state.

It would seem that the site of Louisville, and the adjacent country for many miles round, is also what is called made land; and formed by terrene matter, accumulated by the waters of the lake, as they converged in the entrance of the channel, through which they were discharged; which process was further aided by the alluvial inundations of the Ohio, before it had furrowed out its present channel. The level surface of the country, as well as the nature of the soil, is calculated to render this suggestion more than specious. Wherever the earth has been penetrated in the digging of wells, the stratum of sand has been discovered to extend from the surface to a distance beyond the deepest apertures thus made.

The probability of the former existence of this immense lake, is sanctioned by the traditional tales of the Indians of the Atlantic tribes, and recorded by Stith in his history of Virginia: also, by similar traditions of the western tribes of Indians, mentioned by McKenzie.

Pursuing an eastern direction from Louisville towards Pittsburgh, you will find that the ascent of the country is remarkably gradual. In all probability the site of the last mentioned place is not so high as the summit of the hills a few miles below Louisville.—Under all these considerations, I think it might be affirmed, without incurring the charge of philosophical extravagance, that the whole tract of country mentioned by Mr. Volney was once covered with several fathoms of water.

When we contemplate the mighty revolution which has been wrought by the draining of this lake, and consider that a new world, as it were, had emerged from the deep, which will afford a fertile source of nourishment of millions of human beings we can but adore the power and beneficence of the Creator, which has been so wonderfully displayed in contributing to the happiness of man!

The Ohio may, with great propriety, be ranked among the most beautiful and useful rivers in the world. The unparalleled fertility of the country through which it meanders; the mildness and salubrity of the climate; the growing enterprize and prosperity of the inhabitants, and the agricultural and commercial spirit by which they are animated, give rise to the most pleasing anticipations, and authorise the prediction that, in a few years, the western country will vie with any part of the United States. The introduction and employment of steam boats will much facilitate the intercourse between New Orleans and the different states and territories that border on the Ohio, Mississippi, and their tributary streams—This important invention will exert the happiest influence on their destiny, by contributing to their prosperity, and rapidly accelerating their advancement to a state of solid glory.

Mr. Holmes' Speech

In the senate of Massachusetts during the reported answer to the governor's speech, &c. January, 1814.

Mr. President—When after eight days deep consideration of the committee, an answer is produced, which, I apprehend, will remain a standing monument of the degradation of this once respectable state; the gentlemen of the majority must not deem it unreasonable, if I occupy some time in discussing its merits. And in this, I confess, I despair of making any impression on the majority of this board. After having, during a war of eighteen months, taken their ground against their country and in favor of its enemy; after having condemned their own government, and justified the aggressions and atrocities of the enemy, in every particular, without a solitary exception, an attempt to dissuade them from this course, must in this case be desperate. I might as well attempt to convert an Atheist by scripture; I might as well go into the church yard, rebuke the tombs, and expostulate with the sleeping ashes of the dead. No, sir, it is not then when I expect to convince or to edify: it is an apprehension, that silence may be deemed an acquiescence in these inflammatory proceedings. It is for the sake of my political friends, that I stand forth the advocate of my injured country.

I agree with his excellency, that the liberty of speech is important to a free people, and he who would restrain it is a foe to republican freedom. It is a privilege which I highly prize, and which I shall take advantage of in this debate. True, it may be abused: in bad times bad men will endeavor to excite discontent. In the commencement of a war, slander and abuse are wonderfully successful. There was danger for a while, that the outrages of party might drive the administration from office, or compel them to make an ignominious peace. But truth prevailed. Notwithstanding every attempt to throw a stumbling block in the way of the administration in the days of difficulty and distress, their popularity has increased, and the people are more united than at the commencement of the war you speak of the growing discontents of the people: Where is your evidence? In the elections? In what elections? New York, the most commercial state in the union? In New Jersey, where every branch has been regenerated in a year? In Maryland, where you but just smuggled in your governor? In Vermont to be sure, you have a minority governor for one year; and, I trust, for one year only. But in the city of New York, at a very late election, the American cause prevailed by a change that was truly astonishing. And all this in time of war against the incessant clamors and slanders of party, without any sedition act, or other act to screen the administration.

His excellency informs us, that he has received fifteen hundred stands of arms from the secretary at war; and you, in the answer, attribute this event to the efficacy of your famous resolve of June last. To suppose that that anti climax, that complete specimen in the art of sinking, could produce any other effect in the mind of the secretary of war, than ridicule, is to me absolutely incredible. It began with a preamble full of invectives, with a "whereas," followed by a string of accusations against the whole course of the measures of the administration, and concluded with a "Therefore resolved, that the adjutant general be requested to write to general Armstrong for the arms, &c." It was, indeed, a production which promised much, and performed nothing, and I will add, effected nothing. It is probable that general Armstrong, agreeably to his promise, sent you the arms as soon as they were ready but none the sooner for your pitiful resolve.

But this war is unjust. Must we travel over this ground again? This charge has been refuted more than a thousand times. But that makes no difference; they can renew it: though vanquished, they can argue still. The right of blockade, orders in council, and impressment, are brought up, and all justified with greater obstinacy than in the British period.

I have said, and I repeat it, that the priority of the French decrees could be no excuse for these orders, if such had been the fact. What sir, retaliate upon an innocent neutral the aggressions which your enemy has committed upon that neutral? The priority of aggression makes no difference: each nation must account with us, for the injury it has done us: I have wondered that the government of the United States have ever condescended to discuss the question of the priority of these edicts; though it is beyond question that the blockade of the 17th of May, 1806, was far more injurious to American commerce, than the Berlin decree of the 21st November, following. This extraordinary blockade obstructed the commerce of nearly one thousand miles of sea coast, including many important commercial cities, and the mouths of several large and navigable rivers. But the advocates of Britain say she had a right to do all things—she had force enough to invest this whole extent, therefore it was legally blockaded, whether the force was applied or not. So I suppose gentlemen would contend, that some other coast, equally extensive, was actually blockaded, because it might be; and in this way, Britain might blockade every port in the world at the same time. But the strongest advocates for retaliation have not pretended that it could be justified until after notice of the first aggression, and neglect or refusal to repel it. Upon what principle, then, was the order of council of the 8th January, 1807, imposed? This was but forty-seven days after the Berlin decree, and before we could have had notice of it; and yet Great Britain had a right, say they, to retaliate on us for an act which we could not prevent, and of which we did not know! It is vain to pretend that this order was not a retaliation of the Berlin decree, because less rigorous in terms. It was contrary to the known law of nations, and Britain had the power to enforce it; but France had no power to enforce her decree, and it could be considered but an empty threat.

But it is suggested, that this war is for the protection of British seamen. This charge is without any foundation. We are contending for the protection of our own seamen on board of our own ships. The law of nations admits not the subjects of one nation to enter on board the ships of another, and to take such as they shall judge their own. The case is simple, and capable of demonstration. The ocean is the common highway of nations. On it, each has a concurrent, but neither an exclusive jurisdiction. If, then, one nation has a right to take such as she shall judge her own subjects, in this common jurisdiction, the other may re-take the same subject if she judges him to be her own. If this nation has a right to recapture, she has, a fortiori, a right to resist the first taking—so that pursuing your principle, one nation claiming a citizen in a jurisdiction common to both, has a right to take him from another, while this other, if she claims him, has a right to resist. But though the jurisdiction is concurrent on the ocean, it is not so on board ship: Here the jurisdiction is exclusive. Vattle says, that a person born on ship board is considered as the natural born subject of the nation to which the ship belonged, because within the exclusive jurisdiction of that nation.

It is true that there are cases, in which a belligerent may enter on board for certain purposes; for instance, to search for contraband goods, and to prevent a violation of blockade. But these are exceptions, and go to prove the rule. It is manifest that these exceptions, especially that relative to contraband goods, are the effect of compact. They are part of the conventional law of nations. The natural law never defined what articles were contraband. These exceptions, so strictly defined and carefully guarded, prove incontestibly the general rule, that each nation has an exclusive jurisdiction on board its ships on the ocean. But to pretend that because there is one exception, therefore there is another; that because the officers of one nation have a right to enter on board the ships of another, in search of contraband goods, and if they find any that are suspicious, they have a right to carry in the ship for trial; that therefore such officers have a right to enter on board and take such men as they shall judge their own, without trial, is, I confess, a course of reasoning which I do not fully understand. If this right exists, why do not gentlemen give us the evidence of it? they are wise and learned in the law of nations; where is the writer on national law, who has undertaken to establish the right of a nation to enter the ships of another, and to take such as she may deem her own, without submitting the question to an international tribunal!

But gentlemen insinuate, that British subjects whom we have naturalized are the subject of contention, and they insist on the doctrine of perpetual allegiance; or, at least, that a naturalized citizen has only a local protection; that is inasmuch as allegiance and protection are reciprocal; and this protection does not extend beyond the territory or exclusive jurisdiction of the nation: so the allegiance is subject to the same limitation. As a consequence of this doctrine, a British subject, naturalized here, is obliged to fight against his native country until he gets three leagues from the shore, and the moment he crosses this imaginary line, he is absolved from his allegiance, and obliged to fight for his native against his adopted country. This consequence alone is sufficient to make the proposition ridiculous. But the law has removed every doubt on this subject. Naturalization is deemed, the giving a foreigner the rights of a citizen; or converting a foreigner into a citizen. The word itself carries with it its own definition. Our own law has determined its effect. It was decided in Nov-

York, that it operates retroactively, and places the man in the same situation as if he had always been a citizen. The principle is the same in England. Coke and Blackstone tell us, that if a man be made a denizen, the children born after he was denized shall inherit; but not those which were born before. But it is not so in the case of naturalization; because naturalization has a retrospective energy. But the British statute which provides for the naturalization of such foreign seamen as shall have served two years on board their ships, puts this question beyond doubt. The act makes them as natural born subjects or natives within the kingdom.

But the answer to his excellency's speech has brought up the question of retaliation; and a wonderful degree of sympathy is excited for his majesty's subjects. Newark is artfully selected, probably as the first aggression. I suppose the burning the defenceless villages on the shores of the Chesapeake are instances of British mercy. The exciting the Indians to indiscriminate massacre, was British mercy. The brutalities of that Vandal, Cockburn, are instances of this mercy! the cold-blooded murders of that Goth, Proctor, are further instances of it! Who were the aggressors in this business of retaliation? The advocates of perpetual allegiance will say, America! with them a man is fixed to the spot where he drew his first breath. If an American, on a visit to England happens to have a son born there, though the parent should immediately return with him to America, this child owes an allegiance which he can never shake off; and if some thirty years afterwards, in defending his soil from British pollution, his house from conflagration, or his wife and children from rape, he happen to be made prisoner, he is condemned as a vile traitor to his majesty, is sentenced to be hanged by the neck, until he is almost dead, to be cut down, his bowels torn out by violence and thrown in his face, his head cut off, his body dissected in quarters and the quarters to be at his majesty's disposal—This is a necessary consequence of perpetual allegiance, and a faint picture of British humanity.

But we are charged with driving the aborigines from their inheritances. It is but a short time since Mr. Jefferson was an object of ridicule for his regard for the Indians and his disposition to civilize them. Now, that they are the allies of his majesty, all hostility against them is evidence of a disposition to exterminate them—never was a charge more unfounded, cruel or pernicious—we have used them as children—they had no ground of complaint against us; and what good motive could have induced his excellency to infuse into the minds of the people and of these Indians, that the United States are determined to drive them off? The effect is beyond a doubt. It will awaken them to vengeance, and the innocent blood which may flow in consequence, may one day be required of us, who disseminate charges so groundless and injurious.

But it is said this is a war against New England—here is the attempt again to excite local jealousies. New England has interests peculiar to herself; she must be separate. The honorable chairman, probably looks forward to the period, when we can speak of the kingdom of New England; and possibly anticipates, that Josiah the First may be its future sovereign. And, sir, though I utterly abhor a monarchy, if we must have a king, I should be as willing that gentleman should wield the sceptre as any other—I should prefer him to George the third; for I do not think him quite so crazy. I should prefer him to the prince regent, for he possesses the charities of domestic life, which his royal highness does not appear to be overburthened with. I should prefer him to Bonaparte, because, though he is a military man, I do not believe he is capable of doing half so much mischief. Having said this to pacify the honorable member on his favorite subject, I shall now proceed to examine that part of the answer which relates to the embargo. Gentlemen have a wonderful faculty of denouncing laws as unconstitutional. It was to be expected that those gentlemen who regard their reputation as correct lawyers, would have deliberated before they decided. At least it was hoped, that inasmuch as we have a tribunal competent to decide this question, and that very speedily, gentlemen, instead of threatening to legislate against the legislation of congress, would have taken the means to have a decision in the courts of the United States. Are they afraid to trust the federal judges? do these gentlemen lack wisdom and integrity? or is it this wisdom and integrity which they are afraid of? The other embargo was deemed by some unconstitutional, because it was unlimited; but it was decided otherwise in this state; and if I mistake not, the honorable member from Worcester argued in favor of its constitutionality. The objection to the embargo is, that it restricts the coasting trade, and gentlemen seem to insist, that the right to regulate commerce among the several states, means between state and state. I will read you the opinion of general Washington on this subject—(Here Mr. H read a communication of president Washington to the senate, 25th March, 1794, and insisted that it was in point.) But that clause in the constitution which authorizes congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare, is amply sufficient. Who can doubt of the importance of this measure to the common defence? We are starving ourselves to feed our enemies. They suffer exceedingly; and perhaps this is cause of more than half the clamor. Gentlemen feel compassionate towards the district of Maine. The people to be sure, suffer privations, and they are willing to endure them; but they are not starving nor severely distressed: and very few of them would thank us for our condolence. The embargo was a measure called for by both parties; and the people had rather bear it, hard as it is, than that their enemy should be fed. But gentlemen threaten legislative interference: are they prepared for this? They mean surely, by a state law, to repeal the embargo, and enforce the repeal against the officers of the general government. This is coming out. If they are in earnest, I like this. You have talked long enough. We begin to doubt your nerve. Your rich men have probably made up their minds, as well as those of desperate fortunes. They probably understand the meaning of the word revolution. They have probably thought where they shall be when the wheel stops. But gentlemen magnify the ill success and disgrace of this war. This was expected. It seems to be a subject of exultation. I too regret as much as any man the disasters of our arms. But it was not entirely unexpected. We had been thirty years at peace: The art of war was of course neglected. Our revolutionary heroes have, one after another, passed off the stage of action. In a free country, you must begin hostilities without preparation. If you prepare, the people will know for what; and if so, you tell your enemy, and his preparation will be correspondent. If so, you may as well be at war at once. We had to encounter the prejudices of a people inured to peace; and to resist a desperate faction who were advocating the enemy and throwing every obstacle in the way of the government. We had to raise troops and obtain money. These obstacles are overcome. And have we met with nothing but disgrace and defeat? Were the defence of Fort Meigs, Fort Stephenson, Sackett's Harbor and Craney Island, disgraceful? Are our unparalleled triumphs on lake Ontario, and the complete and signal victory on Erie, when with an inferior force, we captured in fair battle, a whole fleet, disgraceful? Give me such disgraces as these, and you are welcome to all the laurels which thicken round the brow of the mighty Cockburn!

The speech and reported answer speak of debts and taxes. We were once told that a national debt was a national blessing. I never believed it. In war we must have debts and in peace we must pay them. Taxes sufficient to pay the interest, is all a people at war ought to endure, and this is all we shall be obliged to endure. But his excellency intimates, that the debt will continue as long as the union of the states. Was this intended as a hint to the people, that to avoid the debt, they must divide the states? I don't apprehend that the people of this commonwealth are yet ready to pay their debts this way.

Our government, it is said, discover no disposition to peace, and that they have taken no measures to put an end to the war. These are groundless assertions. We offered to remove the former embargo, as to England, if she would remove her edicts. We accepted of Erskine's propositions. We declared war on account of impressment and the orders in council. The orders were suspended, and we immediately proposed a cessation of hostilities, on the single condition of suspending the practice of impressment during the armistice; and offered the exclusion of British seamen from our employ, if Britain would abandon impressment. A similar offer was made by Mr. Monroe to admiral Warren. We passed a law, excluding British seamen from our employ.— We adopted the proffered mediation of the emperor of Russia, and sent ministers to Petersburg for the purpose of treating: and this too, while Russia was at war with France, and fighting for England. In this situation, at a time when the efforts of France, were most powerful, and it was expected that Austria would join her, Mr. Madison, being under French influence, a tool of Bonaparte, agreed to submit the dispute to the investigation of the ally of England, and the most powerful enemy of France. And when Britain refused this reasonable proposition, and proposed to treat separately, we agreed, and ministers have been appointed. But his excellency has discovered evidence of French influence, in the proposition of Bonaparte, that America should treat for a general peace with the allies of France. Has his excellency forgotten when lord Castlereagh claimed his party by the name of “our friends in congress?” What can influence this government and people in favor of France? It is passion, prejudice or interest, that creates a partiality in one nation for another. We have no French language, laws, constitutions, manners nor customs. We have no French merchants, agents or spies, among us. Can governor Strong and his friends boast of minds as free from British attachments? Have they no prejudices either civil or religious, that draw them towards the world's last hope? Sir, it is in vain to disguise it, the opposers of the government are under a very fatal British influence. I do not mean by this, that they are sold to Britain, or that they would dare openly to aid her. I mean to say, that they have attachments and partialities for Britain, that are extremely dangerous to the liberties of their country.— England is our mother country, the nation from whom we descended. The tombs of our ancestors are there. Every man has a strong attachment to the land where are deposited the ashes of his fathers. We speak the same language. It has been said by some one, that it was the policy of France to make her language the court language of Europe, that she might, the better, maintain her influence at those courts.

What then must be the power of Britain over us, who not only gives a language to the court, but to the people? The advantage is infinite. We are inundated with her books. Law, politics and divinity, are literally imported. The student at law, reads English history, politics and law, eulogized by English writers and leave off admiring their constitution, and probably wishing that ours resembled them more. The divine reads English sermons, and sometimes preaches them, in which the writer takes care to boast of the rights of Englishmen; and in this way, England is believed not only the bulwark of our policy but of our religion. This is not all; British merchants, agents, and perhaps spies, speaking the same language, can deal and negotiate with wonderful facility.

And a lid to this, sir, the privilege granted by the treaty of 1794, to refugees: to return with their love of royalty and hatred of republicanism, and to recover and hold lands, as citizens, and you have some of the streams of British influence; streams, which I apprehend are converging to a torrent, which may one day sweep away the liberties of our country.— But why do I pursue this course, to prove the existence of British influence, when there is a party in this country who go step by step with the British ministry, who justify every aggression, and whose maxim is that Britain can do no wrong; when our governors and legislatures are withholding their aid, discouraging the people, and throwing every obstacle in the way, both of prosecuting the war, and obtaining an honorable peace. Look at all this, and if you are not convinced of British influence, you would not be persuaded should one rise from the dead.

Suppose we were at war with France, and a party should justify every act of France, and condemn every act of our own government; would you not have reason to say, that that party were under French influence? If, in the progress of the war, one of your naval heroes should capture and destroy a French ship of equal force, and we should spread a resolve on the journals of this senate, that it was against our morals and religion to rejoice at the event, or to thank the hero, would it be uncandid to say, that the hand of Napoleon was in this thing? If some reverend clergyman should denounce the president as a Nero, exulting at the conflagration of Rome, because he had recommended a resistance of French aggression, should we not have some reason to suspect that this holy man was a little biassed in favor France? I might proceed, but I sicken at the prospect. Gather all the public acts of the legislature of the province, from the charter of William and Mary, down to the revolution, and I doubt whether you will find so much unequivocal, unalloyed loyalty to the British government, as has been exhibited by the public documents of the commonwealth since the war.

Well may you complain, that the people are emigrating. It is not the sterility of the soil—for this, with industry, the handmaid of virtue, is comfortably productive; it is not the rigor of the climate, for this contributes to health and health to happiness. It is the pestilential atmosphere of British influence, from which they flee. You see on all sides a want of American feeling, and a total deterioration of revolutionary principles. Where are the monuments of your revolutionary glory? What have you done with that sanctuary where a WARREN, an ADAMS, and a HANCOCK, preached the immortal principles of freedom? It is now used, I suppose, for the purposes of vilifying the government, eulogizing Great Britain and boasting her agents for insulting the sovereignty of the American people. Where is Beacon Hill? The monument is thrown down, the hill itself swept into the dock, and the tables of stone, on which were written the achievements of the revolution, are hidden behind the back stairs of the state house. Why do you hang by your walls the trophies of your victories?— They serve but to rebuke us. They are monuments of glory that is departed. Like the memory of joys that are past, pleasant and painful to the soul.

I apprehend that your party has arrived at a crisis, in which it is equally dangerous to advance or retreat. The union, I believe, is in no danger from your intemperate proceedings. But they may prove fatal to yourselves. Man may be compared to a ship. Reason is the helm, passions are the sails, good and bad fortunes are prosperous or adverse winds, and hope is the anchor. Thus man commences his voyage across the sea of time. With his reason, his passions, and his hopes, under proper regulations, he can stem the storms and tempests which beset him in his course, and will, at last, arrive at his haven in peace, in safety, and triumph. Put his helm of reason lost, under the control of blindfold prejudice or passion, he is driven on rocks, shoals and quicksands, and meets with inevitable shipwreck. Take care that this be not the shipwreck of your party.

SCRAFS—FROM LONDON PAPERS.

Mr. Delahoyde, of Selon Vale, who has recently distinguished himself by his successful treatment of insanity, performed one of his miraculous cures in the course of the last month, under the inspection of the duke of Sussex and several noblemen, together with the physicians of the transport board. In order to satisfy these gentlemen that the merit to which he laid claim was not without foundation, he went to the house of sir Jonathan Miles, at Hoxton, and from ninety-three of the wildest of the patients selected one of the most ungovernable, who has been nearly three years in chains, and was literally naked. This unhappy wretch he conveyed to his premises at Hoxton, to make his experiment, where the physicians to whom we have alluded felt his pulse, and found it considerably above a hundred. Mr. Delahoyde, then proceeded to perform his cure, which he always does in private, and in a short time afterwards returned his patient to his guests, who to their astonishment found that his pulse had been reduced to 73. The man has since been completely restored, and is now at work in the garden at Lion Vale, is perfectly sane, and has had several conversations with the duke of Sussex and other persons of distinction, who have attested the fact. Independent of this cure, several others have been performed by this gentleman, equally surprising. His mode of treating his patients remains a perfect secret. Some medical men have imagined that he has recourse to exhaustion, but he has clearly proved that this is not his practice.

The counsellor Dorasan, a gentleman well known throughout Russia by many useful discoveries, has lately succeeded in a very interesting experiment upon the grains of the basella rubra; he has produced from them a color equal in brilliancy to that of cochineal. This plant may be cultivated with little trouble in the southern parts of the Russian empire; and already one pound of the color it gives may be bought at the rate of one ruble and twenty five copecks, while a pound of cochineal costs fifty rubles.

Query. "May not this discovery contain the secret hitherto known only to the Tartars, of imparting a brilliant red to the pith of trees, which when boiled and cut into given shapes, form those beautiful beads, to which we give the name of Tartar coral?"

Colonel Lair, chief of the marine engineers at Antwerp, has recently constructed, by direction of Bonaparte, a number of flying bridges: by means of one of them 1000 men can be passed from one bank of the Scheidt to the other. They likewise offer great facilities for embarking and disembarking even of loaded waggons, whatever may be the state of the tide or of the sea.

Didot, the famous French printer, lately published "a memoir on the properties of a new diving machine called a Triton," by which a person may, 1. Remain in the water as long as he pleases. 2. He may descend into the water to as great a depth as the column of water displaced by his bulk permits. 3. He may use his arms and legs and body at pleasure, he may walk or labor with ease, at that depth to which he has descended. 4. He runs no hazard: he may give notice when he thinks proper to those who, on the surface, attend his operations. 5. He is not enclosed in the machine, which is but small, and does not prevent his entering into fissures, or narrow clefts. 6. The sea being often dark, as Halley informs us, he may carry a lantern down with him to the depths of the sea, to enlighten the submarine grottos, or the holds of vessels, into which he may have penetrated. 7. The machine is not costly. The principal novelty in this machine is the adoption of artificial lungs, by which the difficulty hitherto found of breathing in the sea is remedied.

Mr. Patrick, in his chart of ten numerals in two hundred languages, adds the following observations:—"Melancholy is the fact, that, if the population of christian Europe be 180 millions; that of christian America be 20; that of christian Africa 3; and of christian Asia and Tartary 10; the total is merely 213:—while Pagan China, Japan, Cochinchina, and Chinese Tartary, boast of 400,000,000 of souls; India of 100,000,000 heathens; and Siam, Ava, Aracan, Asam, and Nepal, of an additional 50,000,000."

Economy in Bread.—The rev'd. P. Haggitt, prebendary of Burlam, has lately stated a successful experiment for saving the consumption of flour in making bread. Mr. Haggitt gives the following account of the process. "I took 5 lb. of bran, boiled it, and with the liquor strained from it kneaded 56 lb. of flour, adding the usual quantity of salt and yeast. When the dough was sufficiently risen it was weighed and divided into loaves; the weight before being put into the oven being 63 lb. 13 oz. or about 8 lb. 10 oz. more than the same quantity of flour kneaded in the common way. It was then baked two hours and some time after being drawn the bread was weighed, and gave 83 lb. 8 oz.—loss in baking 10 lb. 5 oz.

The same quantity flour kneaded with common water loses about 15 lb. 10 oz. in the baking, and produces only 69 lb. 8 oz. of bread, gain by my method 14 lb.—that is a clear increase of one fifth of the usual quantity of bread from a given quantity of flour." He also states that the bran after being used in this way, is equally fit for many domestic purposes.

Meteoric Stones.—Being a few days ago at Malpas, I was alarmed by a very peculiar appearance of a light cloud, as if the heavens were opened, this was succeeded by the fall of two or three stones of a blackish cast; I thought that a thunder storm was approaching, but the appearance was so different from any thing I ever saw before that I was soon convinced to the contrary.

This phenomenon was accompanied by an explosion, something like the deep sound of a cannon, the stones which fell were very hot and soft, as soon as they fell, but afterwards acquired great hardness. I observed before, that the appearance of a light cloud preceded the fall of the stones; the luminous vapor were of considerable size.—I have the stones in my possession, and should any of your correspondents desire to see them, they are ready for their inspection. I remain yours.

The Relievos.—An artist in a late ingenious publication, distinguishes three kinds of relievos, basso, mezzo, and alto. Basso relievo, when the projection is less than one half of the natural thickness of the object represented; such as is seen in coins and medals and the freezes and ornaments usually employed in buildings. Mezzo relievo, when one half of the figure emerges as it were from the substratum. Alto relievo, when the figure is so completely silent, that it adheres to the plane only by a narrow strip.

India Trade.—In the British house of lords, on the 21st of June, when the bill for the renewal of the charter of the East-India company was under discussion, the earl of Buckingham defended the part which extends the private trade to India; which he said had formerly been so much shackled by restrictions, that the American merchants had derived advantages therefrom, which ought to have been enjoyed by the English merchants; and who will in future enjoy it. He stated, that the trade of the Americans with India in 1806—7, amounted to not less than two millions five hundred pounds sterling, which exceeded by five hundred thousand pounds the whole private trade of the British merchants that year.

The water drinkers.—In a foreign journal are the following remarkable cases of female water drinkers.

Catherine Beansergent has been distinguished from the most tender age, by a thirst which nothing could quench. In her infancy she drank two pailfuls of water every day.—When her parents endeavored to prevent her drinking water so abundantly, she procured it clandestinely; in summer, from the river, from fountains, and the houses of neighbors, even in the streets; and in winter, with pieces of ice or from snow, which she melted privately night and day. The harsh manner in which her family treated her on account of this propensity, induced her at length to quit her paternal mansion. She went in Paris, and entered into the service of some persons more indulgent than her parents, and who left her at liberty to drink as much water as she chose. Her conduct in this service was irreproachable. At 22 years of age she was married to a man named Ferry, a cordwainer, from whom she concealed her ardent thirst, through fear that he would expose her. She had nine children in 1789—During the months she was in a family way, her thirst increased; she refused consequently to quench it with any other drink than fresh water, of which she drank three and four pints at one time. In the winter of 1788, being then near her time of delivery, she drank nearly two pailfuls of water in 24 hours; water at that time cost, on account of the extreme rigor of the season, six sous the pail. Her husband, whose wages did not permit him to furnish the necessary quantity, went and collected a quantity of ice and snow, and melted it for her. What is extraordinary, this female, who enjoyed very good health, could never drink a glass of wine, without feeling a painful shivering in her limbs. She returned naturally the water she drank, and this water was extremely fetid.

THE GOTHs AND HUNS.

The terrific honors which these ferocious nations paid to their deceased monarchs are recorded in history, by the interment of Attila, king of the Huns, and Alaric king of the Goths.

Attila died in 453, and was buried in the midst of a vast campaign in a coffin, which was enclosed in one of gold another of silver and the third of iron. With the body were interred all the spoils of the enemy, harnesses embroidered with gold and studded with jewels, rich silks, and whatever they had taken most precious in the palaces of the kings they had pillaged, and that the place of his interment might for ever remain concealed, the Huns deprived of life all who assisted at his burial.

The Goths had done nearly the same for Alaric in 410, at Cosenza, a town in Calabria.—They turned aside the river Varento, and having formed a grave in the midst of its bed where its course was most rapid, they interred this king with prodigious accumulations of riches.—After having caused the river to re-assume its usual course they murdered, without exception, all these who had been concerned in digging this singular grave.

Grecian Antiquities.—A few months since, as a laborer was tilling a field in the vicinity of Bordeaux, the ploughshare struck against something hard. On examining the spot, he found that it was a brick, which had been partly detached from what seemed to be the outside of a vault. He took up the brick, and perceived that his conjectures were well founded, and immediately informed the owner of the estate of his discovery. Workmen were employed to effect an opening through the top, and a square burying place was found which contained two coffins made of the finest marble of Paris, and lying along side each other. On opening them, the well preserved bodies of a man and woman appeared, which must have laid there nearly two thousand years, as the inscriptions in Greek characters on the marble announced, that they were the bodies of a Grecian prince and his wife, who in former ages had formed a settlement on these coasts beyond the Pillars of Hercules. These antiquated remains of frail mortality were committed to their parent dust; but the coffins, which are of the most exquisite workmanship were shown for the gratification of the curious. The French government, having heard of the discovery, offered 120,000 francs (5000l. sterling) to its possessor, intending to remove the marble sarcophagi to the imperial museum; but he refused that sum, fancying he would obtain higher terms if he exported them to England.

As they have not yet made their appearance on our shores, it is not improbable that he has been prevented by authority from robbing France of the Grecian antiquities, so long slumbering in her bosom; and that after all they may have been seized as national property.

Some remains of a Roman building and other Roman antiquities, were lately discovered at Wraxatall wood, in the parish of Ditteredge, near Bath. Some laborers in grubbing up a part of a coppice, discovered, among other things, fragments of seven or eight columns, nearly of the Tuscan order, small pieces of fresco paintings of Roman brick, small aqueducts, scarified tiles, and other indications of baths and retatories: places that appear to have had intense heat in them, in horizontal flues; a stone tablet, with a groove round the edge of it for preparing the sacrifice.

Another stone tablet, with an oval basin cut into it, which appeared to have borne the effects of ordinary fire, charcoal and bones of various animals: urns, basins, and other utensils, of black and red pottery, a vessel of glass, a specimen of flat window glass, a fabulum and dome, small brass coins, together with stones, &c. with which the building had been roofed. The columns were preserved, the altars, flues, glass pottery, &c. were deranged and dispersed by the laborers, and the greatest part of the coins were thrown away.

A field of wheat belonging to Mr. Lewis, farmer of Purton, Wilts, claims the admiration of the surrounding country; persons far and near are resorting to view it. His crop of wheat, last year completely failed; but without fresh ploughing, sowing, or manure, there has this year sprung up from each old root from 60 to 65 stalks, each bearing as many ears, and these ears, are as much as 5 inches in length, full of the finest grain imaginable; and, what is more astonishing, a new stalk is springing from the first joint; the nature of the grain seems, however, to have been changed by being so long in the ground; it is now as fine a piece of lammas wheat as ever was witnessed; and what stems can crop up last year produced remarkable bearded ears. The burthen appears so miraculously abundant, that the grateful man looks upon himself as particularly favored by Providence.

An extensive establishment has recently been formed near Toulouse, in France, for the manufacture of indigo, from the wood plant. The experiments are said to have been extremely successful, and the coloring matter obtained by a chemical process, imparts a brilliant and solid dye to the finest woollen cloth, linen stuffs, cottons and silks.

DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY.

The following is an act lately passed to relieve persons who impugn the doctrine of the Holy Trinity from certain penalties.

Whereas, in the 19th year of his present majesty an act was passed, entitled "An act for the further relief of protestant dissenting ministers and schoolmasters, and it is expedient to enact as herein after provided; be it therefore enacted by the king's excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that so much of an act passed in the first year of the reign of king William and Queen Mary, intitled "An act for exempting his majesty's protestant subjects, dissenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws, as provides that that act or any thing therein" contained should not extend to give any ease, benefit or advantage to persons denying the trinity as therein mentioned, be and the same is hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted, that the provisions of another act passed in the ninth and tenth years of the reign of king William, intitled "an act for the more effectual suppressing blasphemy and profaneness" so far as the same relate to persons denying therein as mentioned, respecting the Holy Trinity be, and the same are hereby repealed.

And whereas it is expedient to repeal an act, passed in the parliament of Scotland, in the first parliament of King Charles II. intitled "An act against the crime of blasphemy;" and another act, passed in the parliament of king William, entitled "an act against blasphemy;" which acts respectively ordain the punishment of death; be it therefore enacted, that the said acts and each of them shall be, and the same are hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted, that this act shall be deemed and taken to be a public act, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such by all judges, justices and others, without being specially pleaded.

GENERAL ORDERS.

THE MURDER OF LIEUTENANT BLUNDELL.

Horse Guards, September 10, 1813.—The commander in chief is persuaded, that the late trial of ensign Edward McGuire, 6th West India regiment; ensign James Gilchrist, 6th West India regiment; lieutenant Anthony Dillon, 101st regiment; ensign Daniel O'Brien, 101st regiment; for the heinous crime of murder, has excited the liveliest interest and anxiety throughout the army. His royal highness has therefore been pleased to direct that the following letter, which he has received from the lord viscount Sidmouth, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, shall be published in general orders;

"Whitehall, September 8.—In obedience to the commands of the prince regent, I have the honor of acquainting your royal highness, as that it is his royal highness's gracious intention not to order the sentence upon the four officers of the army, who were capitally convicted at the last assizes at Winchester, of the murder of lieutenant Blundell, of the 101st regiment of foot, to be carried into execution, but to grant them the royal pardon.

"I think it incumbent upon me, at the same time, to lay it before your royal highness a copy of the evidence advanced upon the trial of those officers; from which it appears, that the original disagreement between lieutenant Blundell and ensign McGuire arose from a trivial cause: that no attempt was made to reconcile the parties, but on the contrary, that instead of those efforts, which if properly and seasonably exerted, might have had the happy effect of preventing the meeting, which led to the fatal result; great pains were most unwarrantably taken to promote and instigate it.

This observation, I am bound to state, refers more especially to lieutenant Dillon, who, from his rank in the regiment, and his standing in the army, was peculiarly called upon to exercise his influence and authority for a purpose very different from that to which they were applied.

"I deem it my indispensable duty to submit this representation to your royal highness, and I do so in the full persuasion, that your royal highness will be pleased to cause such steps to be taken upon this painful occasion, as the circumstances of the case shall, upon consideration, be found to require.

Signed, "SIDMOUTH."

While the awful sentence of the law was pending, the commander in chief abstained from expressing any opinion on this most distressing occasion. His royal highness now feels it incumbent on him to take their part, which a due regard to the discipline and character of the army demands.

The commander in chief is sincerely rejoiced that the clemency of his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on behalf of his majesty, has been graciously extended to these officers, and has prevented their suffering an ignominious death.

The offence of which they have been guilty, cannot, however, in a military point of view remain unnoticed.

On a due consideration of all the circumstances attending this transaction, the commander in chief is induced to think, that of all the parties concerned, the unfortunate officer who lost his life, and the yet more unfortunate one by whose hand his comrade fell, are the least culpable; they appear not to have been actuated by any personal animosity, but to have been instigated and governed by the advice of others.

The commander in chief is greatly concerned to observe, that no such palliation can be adduced in the cases of lieutenant Dillon, ensign Gilchrist, and ensign O'Brien.

Their interference was equally uncalled for and unnecessary, and tended not as might have been expected, to settle the trivial difference which existed between their brother officers, but to magnify its importance, and to instigate them to the measure which had led to so fatal a result.

The commander in chief, therefore, has it in command to convey to all these officers the highest displeasure of the prince regent, for conduct so unmilitary and disgraceful; and to notify to them, that they are no longer officers in his majesty's service, but his royal highness being disposed in this decision to attend to the distinction which appears in their conduct, and observing that lieutenant Dillon, who, from his rank and standing in the army, ought to have set a different example, has throughout taken the most prominent part in these outrageous proceedings, and greatly influenced the conduct of ensign Gilchrist and O'Brien, is pleased to limit the declaration of being incapable of ever serving his majesty in any military capacity, to Anthony Dillon, late lieutenant in the 101st regiment.

The commander in chief directs, that this order shall be entered in the orderly books, and read at the head of every regiment and corps in the service. He hopes it will prove an useful and impressive lesson to the young officers of the army, and a warning to them of the fatal consequences of allowing themselves to be misled by erroneous notions and false principles of honor; which, when rightly understood and leading to its legitimate object, is the brightest gem in the character of a soldier.

By his royal highness the commander in chief's command

HISTORY OF SUGAR.

From Pennant's history of Indostan.

Sugar was originally brought from India by the introduction of the plant Saccharum Officinarium. I shall here give some account of this useful article, and its various removals from its native place into Europe, where it was for some ages, cultivated with great success. "Arabia," says Pliny, "produces Saccharon, but the best is in India. It is a honey collected from reeds, a sort of white gum, brittle between the teeth, the largest pieces do not exceed the size of a nut, and is used only in medicine."

The cane was an article of commerce in very early times. The prophet Isaiah, (xiv. 21.) and Jeremiah, (vi. 20) make mention of it.—"Thou hast brought me no sweet cane with the money," says the first, and the second, "To what purpose cometh there to me the sweet cane from a far country?" Brought for the luxury of the juice, either extracted by suction, or by some other means. In the notes on the elegant poem, the Sugar Cane, doctor Geinger informs us that at first the raw juice was made use of: they afterwards boiled it into a syrup and in process of time, an inebriating spirit was prepared therefrom by fermentation.

Sugar was first made from the reed, in Egypt, from thence the plant was carried into Sicily, which in the twelfth century, supplied many parts of Europe with that commodity; and from thence, a period unknown, it was probably brought into Spain by the Moors. From Spain the reed was planted in the Canary Isles, and then in Madeira by the Portuguese. This happened about the year 1506. In the same year Ferdinand the Catholic, ordered the cane to be carried from the Canaries to St Domingo. From those islands the art of making sugar was introduced into the islands of Hispaniola, and in about the year 1623 into the Brazils; the reed itself growing spontaneously in both those countries. Till that time sugar was a most expensive luxury, and used only, as Mr. Anderson observes, in feasts and physical necessities.

I shall here anticipate the account of the state of sugar in Spain, where in Europe it first became stationary, borrowing it from the 9th volume of my outlines of the globe. It was till late years cultivated to great advantage in the kingdom of Granada, and great quantities of sugar made in the ingenies or mills. In the year 1723, in the city of Meacill, were eight hundred families. Their principal commerce was in sugar and syrups made in four sugar works, from the plantations of canes, which reached from the south side down to the sea side; but these and the other sugar works are greatly decayed, by reason of the excessive duties. This with the increased demand for sugar, on the prevailing use of chocolate in the kingdom, which requires double the quantity of that article, has occasioned a drain of a million of dollars out of the country, in payment for sugar, preserves and other confectionaries—This is very extraordinary, considering that Spain is possessed of some of the finest sugar islands, besides the power of manufacturing it within its home dominions.

THE MAMMOTH.

On Saturday last, on clearing out the Chalybeate spring, on Mr. Funk's farm about one mile from this place, the bones of a Mammoth were discovered between four and five feet under ground. The part first discovered, was one half of the under jaw, in almost perfect preservation. The remainder of the skeleton was traced as far as the ribs, which were near three feet long; but on handling the bones, and exposing them to the air, they fell into pieces. The part of the jaw obtained, weighs about 26 pounds; and contains (in its socket) one complete tooth or grinder, measuring in length about six inches, and in breadth about three and a half—its depth cannot be ascertained until it is extracted. The tooth is covered with a dark glossy enamel, as hard as flint, and has no signs of decay. The whole head of the animal is supposed to have weighed about 100lbs.—the animal itself, about 1,000lbs. The extraordinary jaw bone is at present deposited in the post office for the inspection of the curious.

ANTE-DELUVIAN CURIOSITIES.

Watertown, (N. Y.) Aug. 24.

A gentleman on a tour to the westward this summer on exploring the mountains and ledges in the county of Oneida, has found a variety of valuable petrifications, consisting of sea-shell fish, &c. most of them were found enclosed in the softer kind of lime-rock; some of them deep in the lime-stone quarry. In Jefferson county, near Sackett's Harbour, he has found some still more extraordinary; among them are a large specie of coral, and the weapons or tusks of several non-described animals which, by the appearance of their teeth, &c. must have been very formidable, and which as materialists say, must have had their existence previous to the general deluge.

DOCTOR FRANKLIN.

Previous to the revolutionary war, doctor Franklin had formed many sincere friendships with literary and public characters in England—doctor Price and doctor Priestly, and many other of the virtuous men of those times, still retained his warmest recollection till death. But those characters who had joined the ministry, in their hostility to this country, he renounced their connexion and friendship, as abhorrent to his nature. He was perfect master of those virtuous distinctions between friendship for individuals, and love for his country. He therefore adopted a conduct suitable to the crisis. The following letter, written by him, addressed to one of his former friends in London, after the commencement of the American war, will shew the promptness of his decision, and the energy of his mind:

Philadelphia, July 5, 1775.

“MR STRAHAN.—You are a member of that parliament, and have formed part of that majority, which has condemned my nation to destruction. You have begun to burn our towns, and to destroy their inhabitants. Look at your hands!! they are stained with the blood of your relations, and your acquaintances. You and I were long friends; you are at present my enemy—and I am yours

B FRANKLIN.”

Thus did this illustrious man renounce all foreign partialities, that were inimical to the rights of his country. The same old leaven of hostility has again broken out upon us. Again are our towns on fire, and their inhabitants murdered in cold blood; it is therefore full time, that all British partialities of the present day be renounced—that every man who has an American heart, should prove it, by his readiness to sacrifice his life in defence of our rights, and repel the bloody invader of our peace.

In 1775, it was becoming a moral and religious people to renounce even the most sincere friendships for our enemy. Our Christian clergy then most fervently prayed for the triumph of the American arms, by land and by sea, even over the bulwark of our religion. It is now more necessary than ever, for a moral and religious people, to gird on the sword of justice, and smite our enemies to the ground; yea even to rejoice at our victories, by land and by sea, over our bloody foe; and the man who who does not so rejoice, is not one of the moral and religious people of this commonwealth, or nation.

Journal of the Hyder Ally.

April 8, 1782—At 10 A. M. laying at anchor under cape May, (Delaware) discovered three sail standing in from sea, with a light wind from the eastward; at 11 perceived that they were a frigate, a ship, a sloop of war, and an armed brig—At meridian the frigate stood for Cape Henlopen channel, the ship and brig standing in for cape May; made a signal for our convoy to get under way and stand up the bay; we then got under way and followed the convoy—At 1 P. M. the ship and brig came into the bay by cape May channel, the frigate coming round under cape Henlopen; prepared for action, all hands to quarters; at 3 1/4 past 1, the brig passed us, after giving us two fires; we reserved our fire for the ship, then fast coming up; we received very little damage from the brig, who stood after our convoy—she mounted sixteen guns, and was formerly the American privateer “Fair American,” commanded by capt. Decatur and equal to us in force—At 2 P. M. the ship ranged up on our starboard quarters and fired two guns at us; we were then at good pistol shot; we then attempted to run her on board, by laying her across the starboard bow, our yard arms locked, which kept us too far off to board; at the same time poured in our broadside from great guns and small arms; our fire was briskly kept up for twenty six minutes, when she struck her colors—Immediately sent our first lieutenant on board, and stood up the bay, the frigate at this time under a press of sail in chase after us, and the brig ahead in chase of our convoy; again prepared for action, and stood after the brig, but on her perceiving that the ship had struck, she stood for the frigate and got aground; we were obliged to pass her, as the frigate gained upon us—At 4 P. M. the frigate came to anchor in the bay (supposed for want of a pilot)—We then spoke the prize for the first time, and learnt she was his majesty’s ship the general Monk, captain Rodgers, of 19 nine pounders, but fighting 20 guns, and had on board, when the action began, 136 men, of which 30 were killed, fifty three wounded—of 16 officers on board, 15 were killed or wounded; the captain received three wounds; we had on board the Hyder Ally 4 killed and 11 wounded. The Hyder Ally mounted 12 six pounders and 4 nine pounders, with a complement of 115 men. During the action we fired 13 broadsides from our cannon, and from 60 to 70 rounds from our muskets.

Proportion of metal—The Gen. Monk, 10 nine pounders, fired 90 weight of shot at one broadside.

The Hyder Ally, 6 sixes and 2 nines, fired 54 weight of shot at one broadside.

Proportion, fifty to ninety.

PATENT LOOM.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman concerned in manufactures, in New-Jersey, to his friend in Philadelphia.

“You ask my opinion of the patent looms, rights of using which have lately been sold here for several of our counties. In a few days you will have the pleasure of seeing the most perfect thing of the kind ever exhibited, and with it the very ingenious inventor, captain Walter Jarves, of Connecticut, to whose genius and close application for many years we are indebted for these extraordinary improvements. He is now here on his way to your place—as soon as his loom was shown, we got convinced of its superiority; the imperfections of the others were visible, and the illicited principle of some so glaring as to convince the most sceptic—They are therefore laid aside, and many gentlemen who had purchased districts, will have, some five, some seven hundred, and some even one thousand dollars. This loom of captain Jarves's, from its simplicity and portability, as well as durability, and from its complete mechanical operation and mathematical proportions, I think bids fair not only to immortalize the inventor, but to be a great and universal saving of labor, time and expence, for by merely moving the batten or lathe, every movement necessary to any loom is effected, and in so doing, the operator may stand or sit, and work with one hand or both, and a child of ten or twelve years old, may be taught in a few weeks or even days, to do as well as a weaver in the old way would do in years—by that simple motion, the treddles are depressed, the webb let down and taken up, the shuttle thrown with a degree of precision and celerity that is truly astonishing; the quantum done is about double that of the common loom, with less than half the labor—and you must be convinced, that a webb kept at equal tension and the heddles sprung by the same power at all times, will make the most evenly work possible. In one moment you can set your loom for thick or thin cloth, and for single or double work, and of any width—and once set, you have no more change until the webb is done. I request you will not purchase any of these spurious things that are carried about, until you see Jarves's, when I am convinced you will agree with me that it stands pre-eminent amongst the most perfect and greatest efforts of human genius ever presented to the public."

OWHYHEE.

A gentleman belonging to the Fur Company established at the mouth of Columbia river, who lately arrived here over land from the establishment informs us, that frequent trips are made to Owhyhee for provisions.

The name of the place is rendered familiar to every one as the spot which terminated the useful career of that celebrated circumnavigator, captain James Cook.

It is perhaps equally well known that captain Vancouver gave the islanders several hogs and cattle, male and female—they have increased in an extraordinary degree, not only to afford supplies for those hardy children of the ocean who visit that region, but to offer a constant subsistence for the New York establishment on the North Western coast.

Vancouver enjoined it on the natives that they should religiously abstain from killing any of the horned cattle for the space of twenty years; that period nearly expired when our informant left the island, which is not more than two years ago. The cattle had increased very much, and the natives were furnished with a number of other domestic animals, promising abundant supplies to their European and American visitors.

Tamahamah king or despot of Owhyhee and all the neighboring isles, is esteemed the "Peter the Great," of the South Sea. He has taken into his service about fifty Americans, and eight or ten English, Scotch and Irish adventurers; he has built a pretty strong fort mounted with about twenty pieces of cannon, in which he keeps his arms, ammunition and merchandize; 200 men mount guard regularly, armed with clean muskets and bayonets in good order. His prime minister whom he calls Billy Pitt, is a fellow of great sagacity; with this man he superintends the carpenters, shipwrights and blacksmiths, attends the lading and unlading his schooners, which trade as far as China. His laws or taboos, are strictly adhered to, and a breach is punished in a most summary manner; stripes are the general punishment for small offences; for the breach of the taboo, death is immediately inflicted without much ceremony. A single instance which was related to us, will portray the power of Tamamah over his subjects. Almost every Englishman that arrives there, is anxious to purchase some relic of their unfortunate countryman, Cook; and the natives have sold upwards of fifty stones—each stone being the identical stone which knocked the captain down. This traffic was for some time carried on unknown to Tamamah, but when informed of it, he lamped and erected a temple on the spot where Cook was killed—he next ordered that divine honors should be paid him, and that no person should enter within the sacred circle, unless he was purified, and on no other account whatever was a stone to be removed from the premises. Not long after this injunction, another English virtuoso tempted a poor man to sell an identical stone. The circumstance was soon communicated to Tamamah, who had the culprit instantly dispatched.

Fishing is the constant employment of the men; war is no more heard of there; for all the neighboring islands have been some time conquered and are governed by chiefs sent from Owhyhee. Some white men are appointed chiefs—but the greater number are of such character as not to be trusted. The women, as in all savage countries, perform all kinds of servile labor. They collect the bread fruit, the banana and yams, cultivate the European seeds, and plant, spin, weave and make their cloth, fabricate their household kitchen furniture, build their cabins and in short perform every kind of domestic labor. They are withal cheerful and appear happy, possess elegant forms and carriage, they would appear only for their copper skins, born to please. A tall, corpulent woman, is esteemed a beauty with these people; Tamahamah's principle wife is about 7 feet high, and three and a half yards in circumference round the breast. She was, as well as her husband, extremely hospitable to strangers: her majesty, accompanied by her nymphs, would often dash amid the foaming billows, swim round the ship, and reach the shore in safety after sporting with the angry waves for hours. Missouri Gaz.

Mr. TURNBULL, the last circumnavigator that has published the history of his voyage, has introduced, in a new and enlarged edition of his work in quarto, a prodigious number of new facts relative to the interesting islands of the Pacific. Among other novelties, he mentions a circumstance, connected with geological speculation, which deserves to be transferred to our pages. In the voyage of Perouse, that navigator describes a reef of shoal banks, a few degrees north of Owhyhee, where he suggested that a pearl fishery might be established to advantage, and he states that the French frigates sailed over them. Some commercial persons, in consequence, lately engaged divers and visited the spot, but were astonished to find, not only that no vessel can now sail over these banks, but that through a large extent they afford but two or three feet water, and in many places exhibit verdant spots above the water. *An. MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS

Of sundry Citizens of the United States, praying relief from the oppressive operation of OLIVER EVANS' PATENT; vesting in him an exclusive right to certain Machinery, now in general use, in the Manufacture of Flour; with evidence to shew that the said Evans was neither the Original Inventor nor first applier of said Machinery, and consequently not entitled to the reward due to an actual Inventor under the Patent Laws of the United States.

THE subject of Oliver Evans' Patent rights to certain machinery used in the manufacture of flour, having excited considerable interest in the United States, in consequence of the exorbitant demands of the patentee, as well as the various publications, he has made for the purpose of establishing the validity of his claims. It now seems necessary to exhibit to the public a plain statement of the case, in order that those persons interested, may the more easily discover how far the patentee is entitled to recover under his plea of originality of invention.—In the year 1787, Oliver Evans obtained from the state of Delaware, a law investing in him the exclusive right to the use of the Elevator and Hopper-boy, in that state, (except to three used in the mills at Stanton) he also obtained from the states of Pennsylvania and Maryland, in the year 1787, laws vesting in him the exclusive right to use the same machinery in those states: in neither of these laws is the screw or conveyor mentioned, it may therefore be fairly inferred that he did not at the time of their enactment, suppose himself to be the inventor of that machine.—In 1790 he obtained from the United States a patent, vesting in him the "sole and exclusive right, and liberty of using and vending to others the said machinery," including the screw or conveyor, for the term of fourteen years; during the existence of the exclusive rights a vast number of mills were erected into which this machinery was introduced, and on which Oliver Evans generally demanded and received his patent price, varying according to the powers and elevation of the mill from thirty to forty dollars, for each pair of stones; some persons, however, he alleges, refused to pay him, and in a suit which he instituted in the circuit court of the United States at Philadelphia, for the purpose of enforcing a compliance with his demands, it was decided on the 23d day of October, 1807, that his patent was deficient and therefore invalid. This decision took place about three years after the expiration of his first patent from the general government, and consequently could have had no influence in inducing other persons to refuse payment before that period. The decision of the circuit court was made the pretext by Oliver Evans, for an application to congress in the year 1807, for a new patent, which was granted him (it is presumed) under a belief that he was the actual inventor and first applier of those machines, on which he had claimed and recovered the fees of a patentee first under the states of Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, and then under the general government, a period of about 18 years.—The new patent granted to Oliver Evans, is dated on the 22d day of January, 1808, one day after the passage of the law, authorizing the secretary of state to issue it; and upwards of three years after the expiration of his patent from the general government—during this interval in which no prohibition existed to prevent the erection of the Elevators, &c. many mills were built and those machines erected under the expectation that these would be exempt from the tax of a patentee.—A different construction however has been given to the reviving law by the courts, and those mills placed upon the same footing that mills are which have been erected since the enacting of the law of 1808 and issuing of the new patent—in one instance eighteen hundred and fifty dollars damages have been awarded upon a mill, erected during the interval, and capable of manufacturing twelve barrels of flour per day.—The alarming demands of the patentee with the construction given to the law by the courts, has induced an inquiry whether the improvements by which Oliver Evans is amassing so much wealth at the expense of the Farmers' and Millers' of the United States, are really his inventions, or those of other persons, collected by him and ingeniously applied to his benefit. This inquiry has resulted in the following evidence which has been laid before the Honourable Congress of the United States, at their present session, with a Memorial praying relief from the oppressive operation of the patent.

It is much to be regretted, that an exhibition of this testimony did not take place at the time of his application for a renewal of his patent; it might then have been the means of saving much trouble and expense to the public, and many individuals from great pecuniary embarrassment. The very able letter of Thomas Jefferson, Esquire, late President of the United States, [No. I] cannot fail to place in a just point of view Mr. Evans' claim to the originality in the invention of the Elevator; while the depositions of Samuel Stroud, Charles Latham and Miland Martin, [II] will shew that he was neither the first inventor nor applicer of them to their present use. The depositions of George Repp, Henry Stauffer, and Abram Stoffer, [III] most clearly prove that the Hopper Machine, (or Hopperboy) was in use long before Mr. Evans has pretended to be the inventor of that machine. The depositions of Lewis Evans, John Ellicott and Joseph Evans, [IV] will as clearly shew that he was neither the first inventor nor applicer of the Screw or Conveyor, which is so necessary to complete the combination of what Mr. Evans calls his improvements. The memorial of Jeremiah Bailly, [V] with Oliver Evans' letter to him [VI] will shew the means practised to prevent the introduction of improvements that may have a tendency to reduce the value of his monopoly.

The invention of Mr. Bailly, though simple in its construction, is intended to answer the purpose of both the Elevator and Conveyor, though neither in form nor principle bearing the smallest resemblance to either, except that it accomplishes the same end.

It is then a question, how Oliver Evans has been enabled to impose on the public for so long* a time with his patent rights, which can only be answered by supposing the inconsiderable price demanded under his first patent was paid him, rather than incur the trouble and expense of a judicial inquiry into the validity of his claim. The price demanded under the new patent upon a mill with one water wheel and two pair of stones [VII] is sufficient to shew that the powers of the patentee cannot be too early limited. This subject was last winter before the Senate of the United States and partially acted upon; but, as will appear by the report of their committee [VIII] the late period in the session at which it was taken up, was the reason why it was not fully investigated.

The reason why it has been thought necessary by the patentee to make and publish numerous calculations, to shew the great profits arising to the manufacturers of flour from the use of his pretended inventions, is an enigma not easily to be solved. If he is seriously of the opinion that they are founded in truth, the most credulous will not suppose their author capable of inventing the numerous improvements that he claims. If he knows them to be erroneous, what other object can he have in view than to prejudice the public mind, and thereby render it more difficult to defeat his pretensions by a legal inquiry. It is a fact, well known to every experienced miller in the United States, that the profits of the manufacturers of flour are not so great now as they were before the introduction of the Elevator, &c. owing to the number of mills having increased in the ratio greater than the growth of grain; and the certificate of some of the most skillful millers [IX] will sufficiently prove, that more flour cannot be made from a given quantity of wheat by the use of the modern improvements than can be without them. Were the use of labour-saving machinery confined to a few persons only, much would be saved to them from that source; but when it is as common in mills as the water wheels that work them, can it be believed that any profit can arise that would not, if no such machinery were in general use? So long as the number of mills are more than sufficient to manufacture all the grain raised, the competition amongst purchasers will necessarily keep the price so high, that a bare profit only will be left to the manufacturer, while the farmer will, from the competition, reap the benefit that arises from the improvements, by obtaining an advanced price for his produce.

That the subject of Mr. Evans' claim may rest upon its merits only, the documents and evidence are submitted without further comment.

Monticello, August 13th, 1813.

SIR,

Your letter of August 3d, asking information on the subject of Mr. Oliver Evans's exclusive right to the use of what he calls his Elevators, Conveyers and Hopperboys, has been duly received. My wish to see new inventions encouraged, and old ones brought again into useful notice, has made me regret the circumstances which have followed the expiration of his first patent. I did not expect the retrospection which has been given to the reviving law; for although the second proviso seemed not so clear as it ought to have been, yet it appeared susceptible of a just construction; and the retrospective one being contrary to natural right, it was understood to be a rule of law, that where the words of a statute admit of two constructions, the one just and the other unjust, the former is to be given them. The first proviso takes care of those who had lawfully used Evans' improvements under the first patent; the second was meant for those who had lawfully erected and used them after that patent expired, declaring they "should not be liable to damages therefor." These words may indeed be restrained to uses already past; but as there is parity of reason for those to come, there should be parity of law. Every man should be protected in his lawful acts, and be certain that no ex post facto law shall punish or endamage him for them. But he is endamaged if forbidden to use a machine lawfully erected at considerable expense, unless he will pay a new and unexpected price for it. The proviso says, that he who erected and used lawfully shall not be liable to pay damages: but if the proviso had been omitted would not the law, construed by natural equity, have said the same thing? In truth, both provisos are useless. And shall useless provisos, inserted pro majori cautela, only authorise inferences against justice? The sentiment that ex post facto laws are against natural rights is so strong in the United States, that few, if any, of the state constitutions have failed to proscribe them. The federal constitution indeed interdicts them in criminal cases only; but they are equally unjust in civil as in criminal cases; and the omission of a caution which would have been right does not justify the doing what is wrong; nor ought it to be presumed, that the legislature meant to use a phrase in an unjustifiable sense, if by any rules of construction it can be even strained to what is just. The law books abound with similar instances of the care the judges take of the public integrity. Laws moreover abridging the natural rights of the citizen should be restrained by rigorous constructions within their narrowest limits.

Your letter, however, points to a much broader question, whether what have received from Mr. Evans are the new and the proper name of Elevators are of his invention: because, if they are not, his patent gives him no right to abstract others in the use of what they possessed before. I assume it as a lemma, that it is the invention of the machine itself which is to give a patent right, and not the application of it to any particular purpose of which it is susceptible. If one person invents a knife convenient for pointing our pens, another cannot have a patent right for the same knife to point our pencils. A compass was invented for navigating the sea; another could not have a patent right for using it to survey land. A machine for threshing wheat has been invented in Scotland; a second person cannot get a patent right for the same machine to thresh oats; a third rye; a fourth peas; a fifth clo- ver, &c. A string of buckets is invented and used for raising water, ore, &c. can a second have a patent right to the same machine for raising wheat, a third oats, a fourth rye, a fifth peas, &c.? The question then whether such a string of buckets was invented first by Oliver Evans, is a mere question of fact in mathematical history. Now turning to such books only as I happen to possess, I find abundant proof that this simple machinery has been in use from time immemorial. Doctor Shaw, who visited Egypt and the Barbary coast, in the years 1727—8, 9, in the margin of his map of Egypt, gives us the figure of what he calls a Persian wheel, which is a string of round cups, or buckets, hanging on a pally, over which they revolve, bringing up water from a well, and delivering it into a trough above. He found this used at Cairo, in a well 264 feet deep which the inhabitants believe to have been a work of the patriarch Joseph. Shaw's Travels, 341, Oxford edition of 1738, in folio, and the Universal History, I. 416, speaking of the manner of watering the high lands in Egypt, says—"Formerly they made use of Archimedes' Screw, thence named the Egyptian Pump; but they now generally use Wheels (Wallowers) which carry a rope or chain of earthen pots, holding about 7 or 8 quarts a piece, and draw the water from the canals. There are besides, a vast number of wells in Egypt, from which the water is drawn in the same manner to water the gardens and fruit trees; so that it is no exaggeration to say, that there are in Egypt above 200,000 oxen daily employed in this labour." Shaw's name of Persian wheel has been since given more particularly to a wheel with buckets, either fixed or suspended on pins at its periphery.—Mortimer's Household, I, 18, Duhamel, V. Ferguson's Mechanics, plate 18. But his figure, and the verbal description of the Universal History, prove, that the string of buckets is meant under that name. His figure differs from Evans' construction in the circumstances of the buckets being round, and strung through their bottom on a chain; but it is the principle; to wit, a string of buckets, which constitutes the invention, not the form of the buckets, round, square, or hexagon; nor the manner of attaching them, nor the material of the connecting band, whether chain, rope or leather. Vitruvius, L. X. c. 9, describes this machinery as a windlass, on which is a chain descending to the water, with vessels of copper attached to it; the windlass being turned, the chain moving on it will raise the vessels, which in passing over the windlass, will empty the water they have brought up into a reservoir; and Perrault, in his edition of Vitruvius, Paris, 1684, folio, plates, 61, 62, gives three forms of these water elevators, in one of which the buckets are square, as Mr. Evans' are. Bossut, Histoire des Mathematiques, I. 86, says, "The drum wheel, the wheel with buckets, and the chapelets, are hydraulic machines, which come to us from the ancients; but we are ignorant of the time when they began to be put into use." The chapelets are the revolving band of buckets, which Shaw calls the Persian wheel, the moderns a chain pump, and Mr. Evans elevators. The next of my books, in which I find these elevators, is Wolf's Cours de Mathematiques, I. 370, and plate 4, Paris, 1747—8vo. Here are two forms; in one of them the buckets are square, attached to two chains, passing over a cylinder or wallower at top, and under another at bottom, by which they are made to revolve. It is a nearly exact representation of Evans' elevators. But a more exact one is to be seen in Besagulier's Experimental Philosophy, II. plate 34. In the Encyclopedie de Diderot et D'Alembert 8vo. edition de Lausanne, 1st vol. of plates, in the four subscribed Hydraulique, noria, is one, where round earthen pots are tied by their collars, between two endless ropes, suspended on a revolving lantern or wallower; this is said to have been used for raising ore out of a mine. In a book which I do not possess, "L'Architecture Hydraulique de Belidor, the II vol. of which is said [De La Lande's continuation of Montucla's Histoire des Mathematiques, III. 711] to contain a detail of all the pumps, ancient and modern, hydraulic machines, fountains, wells, &c. I have no doubt this Persian wheel, chain pump, chapelets, elevators, by whichever name you choose to call it, will be found in various forms. The last book I have to quote for it is Pronay's Architecture Hydraulique, I. advertisement VII. and see's 648, 649, 650, in the latter of which passages he observes, that the first idea which occurs for raising water is to lift it in a bucket by hand; when the water lies too deep to be reached by hand, the bucket is suspended by a chain and let down over a pulley or windlass; if it be desired to raise a continued stream of water, the simplest means which offers itself to the mind is to attach to an endless chain or cord a number of pots or buckets, so disposed that the chain being suspended on a lantern or wallower above, and plunged in water below, the bucket may descend and ascend alternately, filling themselves at bottom, and emptying at a certain height above, so as to give a constant stream. Some years before the date of Mr. Evans' patent, a Mr. Martin of Caroline county, in this state, constructed a drill plough, in which he used the band of buckets for elevating the grain from the box into the funnel which let them down into the furrows; he had bands with different sets of buckets, adapted to the size of peas, of turnip seed, &c. I have used this machine for sowing beuni seed also, and propose to have a band of buckets for drilling Indian corn, and another for wheat. Is it possible that in doing this I shall infringe Mr. Evans' patent? That I can be debarred of any use to which I might have applied my drill when I bought it by a patent issued after I bought it.

These verbal descriptions applying so exactly to Mr. Evans' Elevators, and the drawings exhibited to the eye, flash conviction both on reason and the senses that there is nothing new in these elevators but their being strung together by a strap of leather. If this strap of leather be an invention entitling the inventor to a patent right, it can only extend to the strap, and the use of the string of buckets must remain free to be connected by chains, ropes, a strap of hempen girthing, or any other substance except leather; but indeed Mr. Martin had before used the strap of leather.

The screw of Archimedes is as ancient at least as the age of that mathematician, who died more than 2000 years ago. Diodorus Siculus speaks of it, lib 1, page 21, and lib 5, page 217, of Stevens' edition of 1559, folio, and Vitruvius, X. 41. The cutting of its spiral worm into sections, for conveying flour or grain, seems to have been an invention of Mr. Evans', and to be a fair subject of a patent right, but it cannot take away from others the use of Archimedes' screw, with its perpetual spiral, for any purposes of which it is susceptible.

The Hopper-boy is an useful machine and as far as I know original.*

It has been pretended by some (and in England especially) that inventors have a natural and exclusive right to their inventions; and not merely for their own lives, but inheritable to their heirs; but while it is a moot question, whether the origin of any kind of property is derived from nature at all, it would be singular to admit a natural and even an hereditary right to inventions. It is agreed by those who have seriously considered the subject, that no individual has, of natural right, a separate property in an acre of land: for instance, by an universal law, indeed, whatever, whether fixed or moveable, belongs to all men equally and in common. is the property for the moment of him who occupies it; but when he relinquishes the occupation the property goes with it. Stable ownership is the gift of social law, and is given late in the progress of society: it would be curious then if an idea the fugitive fermentation of an individual brain, could of natural right be claimed in exclusive and stable property. If nature has made any one thing less susceptible than all others of exclusive property, it is the action of the thinking power called an idea; which an individual may exclusively possess as long as he keeps it to himself, but the moment it is divulged it forces itself into the possession of every one, and the receiver cannot dispossess himself of it. Its peculiar character too is that no one possesses the less because every other possesses the whole of it. He who receives an idea from me receives instruction himself without lessening mine; as he who lights his taper at mine receives light without darkening me. That ideas should freely spread from one to another over the globe for the moral and mutual instruction of man and improvement of his conditions, seems to have been peculiarly and benevolently designed by nature when she made them, like fire, expansible over all space, without lessening their density in any point; and like the air in which we breathe, move, and have our physical being, incapable of confinement or exclusive appropriation. Inventions then cannot in nature be a subject of property. Society may give an exclusive right to the profits arising from them as an encouragement to men to pursue ideas which may produce utility. But this may or may not be done according to the will and convenience of the society, without claim or complaint from any body. Accordingly it is a fact, as far as I am informed, that England was, until we copied her, the only country on earth which ever by a general law gave a legal right to the exclusive use of an idea. In some other countries it is sometimes done in a great ease and by a special and personal act; but generally speaking other nations have thought that these monopolies produce more embarrassment than advantage to society; and it may be observed that the nations which refuse monopolies of inventions are as fruitful as England in new and useful devices.

Considering the exclusive right to invention as given, not of natural right, but for the benefit of society, I know well the difficulty of drawing a line between the things which are worth to the public the embarrassment of an exclusive patent and those which are not. As a member of the patent board for several years, while the law authorised a board to grant or refuse patents, I saw with what slow progress a system of general rules could be matured. Some however were established by that board.—One of those was that a machine of which we were possessed, might be applied by every man to any use of which it is susceptible, and that this right ought not to be taken from him and given to a monopolist, because he first perhaps had occasion so to apply it. Thus a serew for crushing plaister might be employed for crushing corn cobs, and a chain pump for raising water might be used for raising wheat—this being merely a change of application. Another rule was that a change of material should not give title to a patent, as the making a plough share of cast rather than of wrought iron; a comb of iron instead of horn or of ivory, or the connecting of buckets by a band of leather rather than of hemp or iron. A third was, that a mere change of form should give no right to a patent; as a high quartered shoe instead of a low one, a round hat instead of a three square, or a square bucket instead of a round one; but for this rule all the changes of fashion in dress would have been under the tax of patentees. These were among the rules which the uniform decisions of the board had already established; and under each of them Mr. Evans' patent would have been refused. 1st, Because it was a mere change of application of the chain pump from raising water to raise wheat. 2d, Because the using a leather instead of a hempen band was a mere change of material: and 3rdly, square buckets instead of round, are only a change of form; and the ancient forms too appear to have been indifferently square or round. But there were still abundance of cases which could not be brought under rule, until they should have presented themselves under all their aspects; and these investigations occupying more time of the members of the board, than they could spare from higher duties, the whole was turned over to the judiciary, to be matured in a system under which every one might know when his actions were safe and lawful. Instead of refusing a patent in the first instance, as the board was authorised to do, the patent now issues of course subject to be declared void on such principles as should be established by the courts of law. This business however is but little analogous to their course of reading, since we might in vain turn over all the lubberly volumes of the law to find a single ray which would lighten the path of the mechanic or mathematician; it is more within the information of a board of academical professors, and a previous refusal of a patent would better guard our citizens against harassment by law suits. But throughout had given it to her judges, and the usual predominancy of her examples carried it to ours.

It happened that I had myself a mill built in the interval between Mr. Evans's first and second patents. I was living in Walsington, and left the construction of the mill entirely to the mill wright. I did not even know he had erected elevators, conveyors and hopperboys, until I learnt it by an application, from Mr. Evans's agent for the patent price. Although I had no idea he had a right to it by law (for no judicial decision had then been given) yet I did not hesitate to remit to Mr. Evans the old and moderate patent price, which was what he then asked, from a wish to encourage even the useful revival of ancient inventions. But I then expressed my opinion of the law in a letter either to Mr. Evans or to his agent.

I have thus, sir, at your request given you the facts and ideas which occur to me on the subject. I have done it without reserve, although I have not the pleasure of knowing you personally. In thus frankly committing myself to you, I trust you will feel it as a point of honour and candour to make no use of my letter, which might bring disquietude on myself;* and particularly I should be unwilling to be brought into any difference with Mr. Evans, whom, however, I believe too reasonable to take offence at an honest difference of opinion. I esteem him much and sincerely wish him wealth and honour. I deem him a valuable citizen of uncommon ingenuity and usefulness; and had I not esteemed still more the establishment of sound principles I should now have been silent. If any of the matter I have offered can promote that object, I have no objection to its being so used. If it offers nothing new, it will of course not be used at all.

I have gone with some minuteness into the mathematical history of the elevator, because it belongs to a branch of science, in which, as I have before observed, it is not incumbent on lawyers to be learned; and it is possible, therefore, that some of the proofs I have quoted, may have escaped on their former arguments.

On the law of the subject I should not have touched, because more familiar to those who have already discussed it, but I wished to state my own view of it merely in justification of myself; my name and approbation being subscribed to the act. With these explanations, accept the assurances of my respect.

No. II.

This is to certify that I the subscriber in company with William Marshall, occupied the upper mill at Stanton, in the year 1785 or 1786, and in the early part of that year did erect a set of Elevators and Hopper-boys which we kept at work several years, that at the time of erecting this Machinery I had no knowledge or belief of any of the kind being erected in the United States or elsewhere, and that after the said Machinery had been at work some time Oliver Evans called at the mill to see it and said that he had planned in his head a similar sett and appeared much pleased with the operation of them. That the said Oliver had nothing of the kind at work at the time nor for a considerable length of time afterwards, that I knew of, and that the said Oliver resided about two and an half miles from our mill, and that I never saw any thing of the kind at work in his mill for more than a year after we had the Elevators and Hopper-boy at work. Our Hopper-boy was an upright shaft revolving round with an arm not exactly like the one now in use, but it was upon the same principle. That it was extended with flights to draw the meal towards the Hopper; that one end of it was fastened in the shaft, the other raised up to fill the meal round it, and as it drew the meal into the Hopper it lowered. And I am confident that at the time Oliver Evans applied for the patent right of the machinery, had we thought it an object worthy our attention, we could have prevented him from obtaining his patent, as the legislature of this state would not grant a patent, knowing that we were the inventors, and in the law the said mills were exempt, and we could have had a patent right secured ourselves. That it was generally allowed by the people of the neighbourhood that we were the inventors of the Elevators, &c. and that the said Oliver Evans did not receive any pay from me for his patent right. That the first idea of the Elevators originated with James Stroud, seeing a band turning a rolling screen on which a buckle was fixed, and as it revolved round, the buckle caught grains of wheat at the bottom and throwed them over at the top; he then mentioned that by putting buckets on the said strap, it would raise wheat or flour to any distance he would chuse and empty it at the top. And that they did immediately erect an Elevator on that plan, which is the one now in use, and I believe that no improvement has been made since.

SAMUEL STROUD,

Before me, Edward Roche, esquire, Notary and Tabellion Public for the State of Delaware, duly commissioned and authorized, residing in the borough of Wilmington, on this fifth day of January, 1813, personally came Samuel Stroud, of said borough, merchant, and on his solemn affirmation, duly administered, affirmed and declared that the facts mentioned in the preceding certificate,

* It is proper to observe, that though the author did not at the time of his dictation, contemplate its publication, yet his permission has since been obtained to use it in the present Abridgment.

signed and subscribed by him, are correct and true.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my Notarial Seal, January 5th, 1813.

EDWARD ROCHE.

We the subscribers, undermentioned, do certify, that the annexed statement, made and subscribed by Samuel Stroud, is to the best of our knowledge and belief, just and true, and that notwithstanding our having heretofore given to Oliver Evans our depositions relative to the said invention: do hereby declare, upon mature reflection and consideration, and say that the said deposition of Samuel Stroud is to the best of our knowledge correct. The reason that we have said Oliver Evans was the inventor of that machinery, was, that the said Oliver Evans told us so, and we declared we had no further evidence of it; that as to the Hopper-boy in Marshall and Stroud's mill, Oliver Evans never claimed to be the inventor of the first motion.

Witness our hands January 5th, 1813.

JAMES STROUD.

EDWARD MARSHALL.

No. 13.

King William County, (Va.) to wit:

I hereby certify, that Charles Latham, personally appeared before me, the subscriber, a magistrate of the county above mentioned, on the 9th day of December, 1812, and made oath to the two following interrogatories, touching the matters therein contained, the answers which appear below:

1st. Interrogatory.—At what time did Major Martin first invent, construct or use the drill-plough?

2d. Interrogatory.—Did the said plough contain an elevator, and, if so, of what materials was the elevator constructed—was the strap revolving round rollers made of leather, or what other substance; and of what materials were the buckets attached to the strap composed?

To the 1st interrogatory the said Charles Latham answered, that the said Major Martin first invented, constructed, or used the drill-plough, with elevators confined to a roller of about three inches in diameter, in the year 1777, or 1778 at all events.

To the 2d interrogatory the said Charles Latham answereth that an elevator was used, constructed by the application of tin buckets to a wheel at the time abovementioned, to wit, 1777, or 1778. Afterwards the said plough contained an elevator, which was constructed of a leather strap, to which was fixed cups or buckets, which appeared to the witness to be cast of lead or pewter. The said cups or buckets were of the shape of a thimble, or of the cup of an acorn; revolving around two rollers of wood with an iron axle, which rollers were of about three inches in diameter, and six inches asunder. The distance of the elevators from each other, depended upon the size of the wheel that ran upon the ground and turned them. The said cups or buckets were of a size large enough to carry about three grains of Indian corn, or five of black-eyed peas. The time when the said elevator was used, was in or before the year 1782, as the witness is fully persuaded he then saw it.

King William County, (Va.) to wit:

I hereby certify that Nibbred Martin personally appeared before me the subscriber, a magistrate of the county abovementioned, on the 9th day of December, 1812, and made oath to the two following interrogatories, touching the matters therein contained, the answers to which appear below:

1st. Interrogatory.—At what time did Major Martin first invent, construct or use the drill plough?

2d. Did the said plough contain an elevator, and if so, of what materials was the elevator constructed—was the strap revolving round rollers made of leather, or what other substance—and what materials were the buckets, attached to the strap, composed of?

To the 1st interrogatory the said Mildred Martin answereth that she was married in the year 1781 to Major Thomas C. Martin, and in the spring of the year following, to wit, 1782, her late husband, the aforesaid Thomas C. Martin, planted a crop of Indian corn, as she believes with a drill-plough, which will be mentioned more at large in her answer to the second interrogatory above-mentioned. To the first above-mentioned interrogatory, she farther answereth she has no doubt but the same plough was used in 1782, but how much earlier, or when the said Thomas C. Martin first invented, constructed, or used the said drill-plough, she does not know.

To the second interrogatory the said Mildred Martin answereth that the said drill-plough did contain an elevator of which the following is the description: two rollers, one fixed over the other, around which a leather strap was passed about one and half inches broad, and twenty inches long, to which small tin cups or buckets of a size to contain two or three grains of Indian corn were fastened—the before-mentioned strap passed through a hopper or box containing the corn, and the corn was dropped from the tin cups or buckets, as the strap passed over the upper roller—the rollers received their motion from a wheel fixed to the plough, and communicated the motion to the leather strap. Given under my hand this 9th day of December, 1813.

Inter. 1. What is your age, profession or employment?

Inter. 2. How long have you known the mill belonging to defendant? When did you examine it, and who was present?

Inter. 3. Describe, particularly, the machinery of the mill belonging to defendant in respect to which this action is brought.

Inter. 4. If you have seen a Hopper-boy, in use in any mill before the year 1786, describe the same particularly, and answer the following questions:

1st. Was such Hopper-boy so constructed that the arm, which played on the meal, would rise of itself, as well as lower itself, to suit any quantity of meal that might be thrown under it.

2nd. Were the arms or arm which played on the meal led round by cords or leading lines which were made fast at their ends, and also fast to another arm which was made fast to the upright shaft near the upper end?

3d. Was the under side of the arm set with little inclining boards which turned up the meal to expose it to the air to cool and gather it at the same time into the bolting hopper?

4th. Was the arm balanced by a weight which hung to the end of a cord passing over a pulley at the upper end of the upright shaft to make it play lightly on the meal, in order that it might require little force to turn it and to make it rise over the meal of itself as the miller shovelled it up in a heap round the bolting hopper, or as the meal should fall from the elevator without stopping the motion of the hopper-boy?

Inter. 5. Do you know the plaintiff? How long have you known him? Did you ever see him working at any mill in Lancaster county?—If yea, mention precisely in what year; and what particular mill he was working at.

Sum's Case, No. 19.

April, 1804.

Franklin County, Pennsylvania, sct.

On this eleventh day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and six, before me, one of the Associate Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, in and for Franklin County, in Pennsylvania, at the house of Thomas Hetick, in Chambersburg, appeared George Roupe, burr-mill-stone-maker, who being by me legally affirmed to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth between the parties in the above cause, doth say: that he is aged forty-nine years and upwards, and formerly a millwright, and now a burr-mill-stone-maker; that this affirmant, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, or very early in the year eighty-six, built a mill for George Fry and John Hollingsworth, in Dauphin County, in this state, wherein he put a Hopper machine, calculated to convey the flour to feed the bolt; that he believes that two years before this, he put one in Brineman's mill, that the only difference between the Hopper machine made by this affirmant and put up in Fry's mill and the Hopper-boy in Benjamin Chambers's mill, is this, that the Hopper-boy is supported by weights to prevent it from sinking too deep into the flour; and the Hopper machine made by affirmant was shorter in the boards underneath that collect in the flour to the centre; the cross piece in the Hopper-boy in captain Chambers's mill is long and straight, and the cross piece in the Hopper machine, made and put up as aforesaid, was put in the form of an S, but, that the geers, necessary to work both, are precisely the same, and the principle mechanically the very same.

On part of plaintiff:

In answer to the first interrogatory affirmant says, that he has already answered the same in a former part of his deposition.

In answer to the second interrogatory, affirmant says, that he has lived in Chambersburg three years, during which time he has known the mill of Benjamin Chambers.—That this week he examined the said mill, no one present.

In answer to the third interrogatory, affirmant says, that there is an upright shaft, a cross piece with the shovels fastened on them, and works by the bolting geers.

In answer to the fourth interrogatory, affirmant says, that he does not recollect to have ever seen a hopper-boy in operation before the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six. The hopper machine, affirmant made for George Fry and John Hollingsworth, as aforesaid, he did not see in operation for some time after the mill was finished, as the race was not dug entirely before she was finished.

In answer to the first interrogatory, affirmant says, that he regulated the motion of his hopper machine by shortening the teeth to give it feed, and when it had too little, by throwing unbolted flour on the arms.

In answer to the second interrogatory, affirmant says, that the hopper machine made and put up by him at Fry and Hollingsworth's, was fastened in a square shaft and not led round by cords.

In answer to the third interrogatory, affirmant says, that the hopper machine he made and put up in Fry and Hollingsworth's mill, differs only from the hopper-boy in Benjamin Chambers' mill in this, that affirmant nailed on the under side of the cross piece small strips of boards—that the hopper-boy has small pieces of boards or shovels sawed in the cross piece, but the effects produced by both are the very same.

In answer to the fourth interrogatory, affirmant says, that he had no balance to his hopper machine, except as before stated in answer to first interrogatory, which balance he always found to answer the end.

In answer to the fifth interrogatory, affirmant replies, that he knows Oliver Evans—I have known him about three years since. I never saw him at work at any mill in Lancaster county or elsewhere. And further saith not.

Sums, Case No. 19, April, 1804.

Franklin county, state of Pennsylvania, sct.

On this eleventh day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and six, appeared before me, one of the associate judges of the court of common pleas, in and for Franklin county, in Pennsylvania, at the house of Thomas Hetick, in Chambersburg, Henry Stanger, of said county, now a farmer and formerly a miller, aged fifty-four years, who, being, by me, legally affirmed to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in the above stated cause, doth depose as follows: That between thirty-five and forty years ago, Christian Stouffer, the brother of this deponent, invented and made a machine to feed the bolting chests in the mill of deponent's father, Jacob Stouffer, who then lived in Warwick township, Lancaster county; that in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, this deponent bought a mill of Thomas Usher, near York-town, in Pennsylvania, that at that time there was no machine in her to feed the bolts, but that this deponent got his brother Daniel Stouffer, in that year, to erect one similar to the machine that was in his father's mill. That this deponent has this morning viewed the machine in the mill of the defendant of which the plaintiff complains, and is decidedly of opinion that it does in no particular differ in principle from the machinery for feeding the bolts above stated by him, and in use as aforesaid; there is some difference in the length, but its movements are governed and directed by the same mechanical principle; that this deponent saw the same kind of machine in use and operation in the mill of John Stouffer, deponent's brother in York county as aforesaid, about the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five.

In answer to the first interrogatory on part of plaintiff, Henry Stouffer answers as follows:

1st. That deponent is now fifty-four years of age, now a farmer, but formerly a miller.

Answer to the second interrogatory says, that he has resided in this county, near Chambersburg, about three years, during which time he has known defendant had a mill in said town, that he examined it this morning by himself.

Answer to the third interrogatory says, that it is worked by an upright shaft, on which is a large wheel and works in the bolting gears; that there is a cross piece of wood which lies on the flour and collects it to the centre to feed the bolt.

Answer to the fourth interrogatory says, that the machine, which he has mentioned in the body of his deposition, and which was in use in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, was not called by the name of a hopper-boy, but was called a hopper machine; and in answer to the first question arising out of the fourth interrogatory says, that the hopper machine which he knew in use, as above stated would lower itself to suit any quantity of flour that might be thrown under it, but that its own weight kept it down.

To the second interrogatory, deponent says, that the hopper machine invented and made by his brother Christian, was worked with cords as stated in the interrogatory; but that the one used by deponent near York-town had no cords, deponent believing they were of no use and the machine was better without them.

To third interrogatory, deponent says, that there were cross pieces nailed on the under side of the machines by him before stated to be used to convey, and that did well convey the flour to the centre, but not exactly like the one made by plaintiff, but answered the same end.

Answer to the fourth interrogatory says, that the hopper machine before mentioned by him was balanced by weights to regulate its motions; that in using it he sometimes hung heavy and sometimes light weights, as the machine required, to enable it to perform.

In answer to the fifth interrogatory, deponent says, that he has seen Oliver Evans about fourteen years since; that said Evans slept with deponent at depo-nent's brother's in Montgomery township, Lancaster county; never saw him at work in any mill in Lancaster county; that said Evans at that time went with deponent through deponent's brother's mill, where there was a hopper machine as before described to have been used thirty-five years since, that Evans these saw it, and that it was similar to Benjamin Chamber's machine, for which deponent understands he is sued by Oliver Evans: that the machine in deponent's brother's mill, which Mr. Evans saw, was made upwards of thirty years since, and that Oliver Evans only then offered for sale to his brother the elevators and said nothing about the hopper-boy. And further saith not.

Franklin County, Pennsylvania, ss.

On this eleventh day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and six, appeared before me, one of the associate judges in and for Franklin county, in Pennsylvania, at the house of Thomas Hetich, in Chambersburg, Abraham Stouffer, of said county, farmer, aged fifty-nine years and upwards, who being by me legally affirmed to testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in the above stated cause, doth depose as follows: That between thirty-five and forty years since, Christian Stouffer invented and made a machine to feed the bolting chests, called then a hopper machine, in the mill of deponent's father, in Warwick township, Lancaster county—that this deponent built a mill in Maryland, upwards of twenty years ago, that he put in her a hopper machine similar in every part to the one made by Christian Stouffer as aforesaid—that deponent saw the same machine in use and operation in John Stouffer's mill and Jacob Stouffer's mill (that said John Stouffer lived near York-town in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven or eight. That deponent has seen the hopper-boy in the mill of Benjamin Chambers, and is decidedly of opinion that it does, in no essential particular, differ from the same kind of machine that deponent knew to be used thirty-five or forty years since for the same purpose, and that it is governed by the same mechanical principle, and that the difference lies in some trifling particulars. That Oliver Evans wait'd on deponent in Maryland after he had his patent, and only proposed to sell him the elevators, and did not then claim the hopper-boy of deponent, although he saw it then in use in his mill.

In answer to the first interrogatory, put by the plaintiff, affirmant answers, that he is upwards of fifty-nine years of age, a farmer.

In answer to the second interrogatory, affirmant says, that he has resided in this county, one mile from Chambersburg, upwards of thirteen years, that he has known Benjamin Chambers' mill about six years—he has not examined since about a year.

In answer to the third interrogatory, affirmant says, that it is worked by an upright shaft, on which is a large wheel and works in the bolting gears—that there is a cross piece of wood which lies on the flour and collects it to the centre to feed the bolt.

In answer to the fourth interrogatory, affirmant says, that the machine which he has mentioned in the body of his deposition, and which was in use about thirty-five or forty years ago, was not called a "hopper-boy" but was called a hopper machine; and in answer to the first question, arising out of the fourth interrogatory, says, that the hopper machine which he knew in use, as above stated, would lower itself to suit any quantity of flour that might be thrown under it, but that its own weight kept it down.

In answer to the second interrogatory, affirmant says, that the hopper machine invented and made by his brother Christian Stouffer was worked with cords as stated in the interrogatory.

In answer to the third interrogatory, affirmant says, that there were cross pieces nailed on the under side of the machine by him, before stated to be used to convey, and that it did well convey the flour to the centre, but not exactly like the one made by plaintiff, but answered the same end.

In answer to the fourth interrogatory, affirmant says, that the hopper machine, mentioned by him before, was balanced by weights to regulate its motions, and which answered the purpose as well as Mr. Evans' plan.

In answer to the fifth interrogatory, affirmant says, that he has seen Oliver Evans—that he never saw him at work at any mill in Lancaster county, that the machine in deponent's mill, which Oliver Evans saw in use and operation, was made exactly in principle with the hopper-boy in Benjamin Chambers' mill, and copied from the one invented and made by his brother Christian Stouffer as aforesaid. That Oliver Evans pestered deponent to purchase the elevators, but did not mention the hopper-boy, and this was after Evans had got his patent. And further saith not.

To all whom it may concern:

I, LEWIS EVANS, of Anne Arundle county, in the state of Maryland, aged fifty-two years, do hereby certify that I was employed by Jonathan Ellicott about the year 1785 or 1786 to execute, with the assistance of my brother Joseph Evans, a plan of a spiral screw, which he, Jonathan Ellicott, intended for the purpose of conveying flour in the bottom of a bolting chest from each end thereof to the centre, where the flour was designed to fall through a hole into the flour chest below, that we executed the plan under the direction of Jonathan Ellicott, and found it to answer the purpose completely.

That sometime after, but before the end of the year 1789, Oliver Evans came to Ellicott's lower mills, on Patuxco, when the before-mentioned screw was in operation; that Jonathan Ellicott in my presence observed to the said Oliver Evans that his screw would be a valuable appendage to his, Evans's elevators; that it would supply them with wheat or meal, and thereby enable him to place them in any part of the mill. Upon which he, Jonathan Ellicott, opened the bolting chest for the purpose of shewing the said screw to Oliver Evans, that he, Oliver Evans, on seeing the screw, observed that it was a valuable improvement, and was the very thing which he had been wanting, but heretofore had never been able to discover it, and that it would completely answer the purpose he, Jonathan Ellicott, had described. Oliver Evans further observed, he knew how to convey wheat and flour in a perpendicular direction, but never before knew how to convey it horizontally.

The above is substantially the import of what passed on that occasion, if not the precise words.

At the same time, personally, appeared John Ellicott, of John, who being duly affirmed, according to law, declared he was present at the time alluded to, in the above certificate, when the conversation between Jonathan Ellicott and Oliver Evans took place; and that the same is substantially true as therein stated, and that in consequence of Jonathan Ellicott's being the inventor of the application of the screw to the removing of flour, meal and wheat, the said Oliver Evans agreed that the said Jonathan Ellicott should have his permission to use the elevators and hopper-boy in all the mills in which he was interested, during the term of his patent obtained from the state of Maryland; and for which the said Evans gave a permit, under his hand and seal, and said Jonathan Ellicott agreed on his part, that the said Oliver Evans should have the right and privilege, during the same term, of using his invention of the application of the screw for the above purpose.

To all whom it may concern:

I Joseph Evans, of Baltimore county, in the state of Maryland, aged about fifty-nine years, do hereby certify that Jonathan Ellicott, some time before the year 1785 or 1786, informed me that he had invented several ways of conveying wheat, flour or other substance, in a horizontal, ascending or descending direction, to wit, by means of a spiral screw, by a band revolving round pulleys or rollers, with block; fastened on the band, which he called a drag, or by the substance intended to be removed, fitting on the top of a band, revolving on rollers or pulleys, which was turned by the gravitation of such substance, which he called a descender. That in the year 1785 or 1786 I was employed by the said Jonathan Ellicott to execute the plan of a spiral screw for the purpose of conveying flour in the bottom of a bolting chest, from each end thereof to the centre, when the flour was designed to fill through a hole in the flour chest below, that with the assistance of my brother Lewis Evans we executed the plan under his direction, and found it to answer the purpose completely. That afterwards I executed conveyors for the said Jonathan Ellicott in all the different ways abovementioned, that I have executed for him screws in all the ways I have ever seen since, both with iron and wooden flights, with both broken and continued spires; that I have never seen any plan of a screw which in my opinion was equal (for the purpose of conveying substances) to the one I first assisted in making.

That I have followed the business of a mill-wright during a considerable part of my life, and have seen, I believe, screws in all the different modes that have been made.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

The memorial of the subscriber, an inhabitant of Chester county, Pennsylvania, respectfully represents—that your memorialist has discovered and applied a new, and, as he believes, a very beneficial improvement in the art of milling, by the application of wind to the purpose of conveying wheat and flour from one part of the mill to another; that the invention is different in principle from any discovery heretofore practised for that purpose: accomplishing the same end by less complex and expensive means, at the same time relieving the manufacturer from many of the inconveniences and objections that are justly attributable to the usual method by elevators, conveyors, &c. That your memorialist did, on the fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ten, and on the nineteenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, obtain from the patent office of the United States, where his specification is filed and model deposited, a patent, vesting in him the exclusive right to his invention, agreeably to the laws of the United States, in such cases provided, intending to sell the privilege to use said invention at the moderate price of thirty dollars for each mill, a sum that whilst it would not oppress any to pay, would amply remunerate him for all the time and expence employed in bringing to perfection an invention so beneficial to the community. But to the great mortification and disappointment of your memorialist, he finds that neither himself, nor his fellow-citizens, will be permitted to profit by the said improvement, if a certain Oliver Evans should succeed in a suit he has instituted against your memorialist, to recover damages for what he alleges an infringement of his exclusive right to the improvements in the art of milling, granted him by a law of congress, on the twenty-first day of January, 1808, and which, from late decisions in some of the courts of the United States, there appears too much reason to fear he will.

Your memorialist, therefore, prays that your honorable body will reconsider the law under which the said Evans claims his monopoly, and grant such relief as you, in your wisdom, may deem proper; and your petitioner will, &c.

Sir—I send you this to let you know that my paper cannot be evaded, more especially by the means you publish in your advertisement, of your patent wind machine, dated Sept. 7th; the principles of which I have known, and been well acquainted with ever since about the year 1787 or 1788, twenty-three years. If you wish to know who invented it so long ago, enquire of Mr. Jonathan Ellicott.

If you do not publish a counter advertisement, declaring that you will not put your machine into operation, having found that to be an infringement of my patent, and let me know it before I commence a suit against you, I will try what damages I can recover of you (and of every one who may use your machine) for the infringement; for I do assure you that I cannot believe that you were actuated by that laudable desire of making a useful improvement, because there was no need thereof; all that was necessary in the case was already discovered in use; but by a sordid and unjust desire to deprive me of my just rights, and which I hope to be able to prove to any court and jury and to recover ample damages for the injury you have already done me and the millers also, by keeping them in suspense, expecting to get of you, perhaps, at a cheaper rate a license to use the principles of the improvement which I have patented, and which is so beneficial to them, and for which I have not yet charged more than three dollars for every $100 they may gain by their use. I candidly send you a copy of my patent that you may shew it to your counsel and take advice on it.

APPROVED,

January 21, 1818.

*As congress appears, by this act, to have assumed as a fact, that Oliver Evans was the original inventor of the improvements for which he obtained his patent—it is for jurists to decide whether that point is open to enquiry in courts of judicature, without the assent of the plaintiff or his counsel.

On the 22d day of January, 1808, letters patent were granted to Oliver Evans, pursuant to the above recited act, securing to him an exclusive right in his original improvements in the art of manufacturing flour and meal, and in the several machines which he has invented or improved, and applied to that purpose, viz. his improved elevator, conveyor, drill, hopperboy and kiln-drier.

You are therefore hereby requested to pay for license to use those of his improvements which you have in use in your mills situate on Gwynn's falls, in the county of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, at the following rates for the whole, exclusive of the Kiln drier.

The price of license for the whole patent term is the sum which is saved by their use in the expense of labor only for one year—estimating the wages and boarding of a miler at $300 per year, and allowing that for every 20 barrels of flour the mill will manufacture in 24 hours one hand is saved, or 300 dollars a year, which is equal to 15 dollars for each barrel manufactured in one day. Therefore multiplying the number of barrels the mill will manufacture in one day by 15, gives the price of license for the whole patent term. Supposing the mill to run 200 days per year.

Mill-stones 7 feet diameter will manufacture	49	bbls. per day.
6 feet 6 inches	42	ditto
6 feet	36	ditto
5 feet 6 inches	30	ditto
5 feet	25	ditto
4 feet 6 inches	20	ditto
4 feet 3 inches	18	ditto
4 feet	16	ditto

Your mill runs two pair of 7 feet stones at a time, and will manufacture ninety-eight barrels of flour in twenty-four hours, which, multiplied by 15, amounts to $1470, saved to you in wages and boarding of millers each year, if you use the whole. This sum with interest on it until paid, counting from the time you began to use the improvements, with my patent term, is demanded for license to use the whole, excepting the Kiln-drier.

But after the expiration of sixty days from the delivery of this notice, if license be not purchased, an additional demand will be made of the interest on the whole sums saved you, in the wages and boarding of millers, as it accumulates, until license be purchased, counting from January 22d, 1813.

That is, you now owe me $1470 with 5 2-3 years interest, next year you will owe me the same sum with 6 2-3 years interest, and the interest on $1470 saved in that year and so on. The whole sum thus saved hereafter, goes on interest until you purchase license. You are allowed to retain the principal, paying interest thereon for the future use of the improvements until you purchase license.

But if you now choose to quit the use of them, and pay interest only up to the present time, it will be received in full payment for their past use. But if you refuse to comply with either of those terms suit will be commenced immediately.

If any circumstance exist to entitle you to a deduction, it will be made accordingly.

Elevating and conveying grain is deemed one-third part of the whole improvement.

Elevating and conveying meal one-third part.

Cooling the meal and attending the bolting hopper one-third part.

The price of license to use one-third part is half the whole.

The price of two-third parts is three-fourths of the price of the whole.

You use the whole improvements excepting the kiln-drier, and the price of license is $1470, with the interest, from 22d January, 1808, the date of my present patent, until paid.

Those who have used my improvements to two pair of six feet stones, making 72 barrels of flour per day, have saved in wages and boarding of millers, 1080 dollars per year, which for five years expired of my patent term, is

$5,400 00

Seventy-two barrels per day, for only 200 days per year, is 14,400 barrels per year, which at 50 cents gain each barrel (as was proved by the witnesses in the late trials at Baltimore, to be gained by making more and better superfine flour) is 7200 dollars per year, which for five years is

36,000 00

Total gained in five years $41,400 00

This calculation is made to show you, that you have gained enough already to enable you to pay for license, and to entitle me to my demand, even supposing your mill to work but two-thirds of each year.

OLIVER EVANS.

Delivered to on the day of requesting him to call on Nathaniel Williams, agent for Oliver Evans, for license.

The price of 98 barrels per day, multiplied by $15, is

$1,470 00

Interest, from 22d January, 1808, up to October 22d, 1813, being five years and nine months, is

517 15

Interest on $1470, to be saved this year in labor, for nine months past, counting up to 22d October, is 66 15

$2,053 30

No. IX.

Report of the committee, to whom were referred the memorials of John Worthington, and others, and Oliver Evans.

In senate of the United States, Feb. 22d, 1813.

Mr. Bayard, from the committee to whom were referred the memorials of John Worthington and others, and of Oliver Evans, REPORTED:

That the subject of the memorials is of considerable interest and importance to the community, and involves difficulties which would require more time and patient investigation fully to understand, than can be bestowed upon it during the remnant of the present session.

The committee confine themselves to stating, that the grievance complained of by the memorialists first mentioned, proceeds from an act of congress, passed the 21st day of January in the year 1808, whereby a patent which had before that time been granted to Oliver Evans, for fourteen years, for certain mill machinery, and which had expired by its own limitation, was renewed and continued for fourteen years from the date of the act. It appears that in the interval between the expiration and renewal of the patent, several grist mills were erected, into which the use of Mr. Evans' machinery was introduced.

By a judicial construction of the act of congress, it is held to prohibit the use of the machinery after the passing of the act, without the licence of the patentee, although the mill and machinery were constructed when no patent or exclusive right existed.

It also appears that the price at which Mr. Evans rated his licenses before the act of 1808, for one water wheel, was from 50 to 60 dollars.

Since that act, his prices has been gradually augmented, and he now requires from 5 to 100 dollars, for the machinery used in the manufacture of flour, by each pair of stones of six feet diameter.

In a single mill having several pair of stones, a demand was made of 2,500 dollars for the use of the machinery.

The machinery is undeniably of great importance to the public, but the increased and increasing prices of the patentee, threaten the imposition of an intolerable burthen upon a very useful and important class of manufacturers.

The committee are not prepared to recommend any specific relief in the case, and conceiving that it deserves more attention than it can receive during the present session, consider that it would be advisable to abstain from acting upon the subject at this time, and to leave it to the maturer consideration of the ensuing congress. The following resolution is submitted:

Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred the memorials of John Worthington, and others, and of Oliver Evans, be discharged from the further consideration of the subject of the said memorials.

No. X.

We whose names are hereunto subscribed being either practical millers or experienced in the manufacture of flour, having seen several statements made by Oliver Evans, tending to induce a belief that a much greater quantity of flour can be made from any given quantity of wheat, by the use of certain machinery, for which he has obtained a patent, than can otherwise be made—and being called on to state our opinions on the subject, we do hereby declare that from experience, we are of opinion that the machinery known by the name of Evans' machinery, is only calculated to save manual labor. In its application it merely conveys, in the first place, the wheat to the mill stones, where it is ground, and afterwards the meal to the bolting reel, where the flour and bran are separated, this is the whole agency this machinery has in the manufacture of flour, therefore the mill stones and bolting cloths being the only agents in separating from each other the constituent parts of the wheat, to wit, the flour and bran, it is evident, that if the wheat is introduced to the one, and the meal to the other, the means used to accomplish it, can make no difference in the quantity of flour that will be produced.

We do therefore without hesitation say that as great a quantity of flour of equal quality can be made from any given quantity of wheat without the use of the said machinery as can possibly be made with it.

Subjoined is a copy of the specification filed in the office of the secretary of state, upon which Oliver Evans obtained a renewal of his patent.

To all whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I certify, That the annexed is a true copy of a specification of inventions and improvements in the process of the art of manufacturing flour or meal, for which Oliver Evans obtained a patent, January 23, A. D. 1808.

In faith whereof, I James Monroe, secretary for the department of state of the United States of America, have signed these presents, and caused the seal of my office to be affixed hereto, at the city of Washington, this twentieth day of November, A. D. 1812, and in the thirty-seventh year of the independence of the said states.

SPECIFICATION

Of Oliver Evans's inventions of improvements in the process of the art of manufacturing grain into flour or meal; and for other purposes.

My first principle is to elevate the meal as fast as it is ground, in small separate parcels, in continued succession and rotation, to fall on the cooling floor, to spread, stir, turn and expose it to the action of the air, as much as possible, and to keep it in constant and continual motion, from the time it is ground, until it be bolted; this I do to give the air full action, to extract the superfluous moisture from the meal, while the heat generated by the friction of grinding, will repel and throw it off, and the more effectually dry and cool the meal fit for bolting in the course of the operation, and save time and expence to the miller. Also to avoid all danger from fermentation by its laying warm in large quantities as is usual; and to prevent insects from depositing their eggs which may breed the worms often found in good flour. And further to complete this principle; so as to dry the meal more effectually, and to cause the flour to keep sweet a longer space of time, I mean to increase the heat of the meal as it falls ground from the mill-stones by the application of heated air, that is to say, I kiln-dry the meal as it is ground instead of kiln-drying the grain as usual. The flour will be fairer and better than if made from kiln-dried grain, the skin of which is made so brittle; that it pulverizes and mixes with the flour. This principle I apply by various machines which I have invented, constructed and adapted to the purposes hereinafter specified, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

My second principle is to apply the power that moves the mill or other principal machine to work my machinery, and by them to perform various operations, which have always heretofore been performed by manual force; and thus greatly to lessen the expence and labor of attending mills and other works.

The application of these principles, including that of kiln-drying the meal, during the process of the manufacture or otherwise to the improvement of the process of manufacturing flour and for other purposes, is what I claim as my invention and improvement in the art, as not having been known or used before my discovery, knowing well that the principles once applied by one set of machinery to produce the desired effect, others may be contrived and variously constructed, and adapted to produce like effects in the application of the principles, but perhaps none to produce the desired effect more completely than those which I have invented and adapted to the purposes, and which are hereinafter specified.

No. 1.

THE ELEVATOR.—Its use is to elevate any grain, granulated or pulverized substances. Its use in the manufacture of flour or meal, is to elevate the meal from the mill stones, in small separate parcels, and to let it fall through the air on the cooling floor as fast as it is ground. It consists of an endless strap, rope or chain, with a number of small buckets attached thereto, set to revolve round two pulleys, one at the lowest, and the other at the highest point between which the substance is to be raised, &c.

buckets fill as they turn under the lower, and empty themselves as they turn over the upper pulley; the whole is enclosed by cases of boards to prevent waste.

No. 2.

THE CONVEYOR.—Its use is to convey any grain granulated or pulverized substances, either in a horizontal ascending or descending direction. Its use in the process of the art of manufacturing flour, is to convey the meal from the mill-stones as it is ground, to the elevator, to be raised and to keep the meal in constant motion, exposing it to the action of the air; also in some cases to convey the meal from the elevator to the bolting-hopper, and to cool and dry it fit for bolting, instead of the hopper-boy, No. 3; also to mix the flour after it is bolted; also to convey the grain from one machine to another, and in this operation to rub the impurities off the grain. It consists of an endless screw, set to revolve in a tube or section of a tube, receiving a substance to be moved at one end, and delivering it at the other end, but for the purpose of conveying flour or meal, I construct it as follows: instead of making a continued spiral which forms the endless screw, I set small boards called flights at an angle crossing the spiral line, these flights operate like so many ploughs following each other, moving the meal from one end of the tube to the other, with a continued motion turning and exposing it to the action of the air to be cooled and dried; sometimes I set some of the flights to move broadside foremost, to lift the meal from one side, to fall on the other, to expose it to the air more effectually.

No. 3.

THE HOPPER-BOY.—Its use is to spread any grain, granulated or pulverized substances over a floor or even surface, to stir and expose it to the air, to dry and cool it when necessary, and at the same time, to gather it from the circumference of the circle it describes, to or near the centre, or to spread it from the centre to the circumference, and to leave it in the place where we wish it to be delivered, when sufficiently operated upon. Its use in the process of manufacturing flour, is to spread the meal as fast as it falls from the elevator over the cooling floor on the area of a circle of from eight to sixteen feet, more or less, diameter, according to the work of the mill, to stir and turn it continually, and expose it to the action of the air, to be dried and cooled, to gather it into the bolting-hoppers, and to attend the same regularly. It consists of an upright shaft made round at the lower end, about two thirds of its length, and set to revolve on a pivot in the centre of the cooling floor; through this shaft, say five feet from the floor is put a piece called the leader, and the lower end of the shaft passes very loosely through a round hole, in the centre of another piece, called the arms, say from eight to sixteen feet in length, this last piece revolving horizontally describes the circle of the cooling floor, and is led round by a cord, the two ends of which are attached to the two ends of the arms, and passing through a hole at each end of the leader, so that the cord will serve to pull each end of the arms equally. The weight of the arms is nearly balanced by a weight hung to a cord, which is attached to the arms, and passes over a pulley near to the upper end of the upright shaft, to cause the arms to play lightly, pressing with only part of their weight on the meal, that may be under it. The foremost edges of the arms are angled upwards, to cause them to rise over and keep on the surface of the meal as the quantity increases, and if it be used separately and unconnected with the elevator, the meal may be thrown with shovels, within its reach while in motion, and it will spread it level and rise over it until the heap be four feet high or more, which it will gather into the hoppers, always taking from the surface, after turning it to the air a great number of times.—The underside of these arms, are set with little inclining boards, called flights, about four inches apart, next the centre, and gradually closing to about two inches next the extremities, the flights of the one arm to tract between those of the other, they operate like ploughs, and at every revolution of the machine they give the meal two turns towards the centre of the circle, near to which is generally the bolting-hopper. At each extremity of the arms there is a little board attached to the hindmost edge of the arm to move sideforemost; these are called sweepers, their use is to receive the meal as it falls from the elevator, and trail it round the circle described by the arms that the flights may gather it towards the centre, from every part of the circle; without these, this machine would not spread the meal over the whole area of the circle described by the arms; other sweepers are attached to that part of the arms which pass over the bolting-hoppers to sweep the meal into them.

But if the bolting hoppers be near a wall, and not in the centre of the cooling floor, then in this case the extremity of the arms are made to pass over them, and the meal from the elevator let fall near the centre of the machine, and the flights are reversed to turn the meal from the centre towards the circumference, and the sweepers will sweep it into the hoppers. Thus this machine receives the meal as it falls from the elevator on the cooling floor, spreads it over the floor, turns it twice over at every revolution, stirs and keeps it in continual motion, and gathers it at the same operation into the bolting hoppers and attends them regularly. If the bolting reels are stopped this machine spreads the meal and rises over it, receiving under it from one, two or three hundred bushels of meal, until the bolts are set in motion again, when it gathers the meal into the hoppers, and as the heap diminishes it follows it down until all is bolted. I claim as my invention the peculiar properties or principles which this machine possesses, viz. The spreading, turning and gathering the meal at one operation, and the raising and lowering of its arms by its motion to accommodate itself to any quantity of meal it has to operate on.

No. 4.

THE DRILL.—Its use is to move any grain, granulated or pulverized substances, from one place to another; it consists, like the elevator, of an endless strap, rope or chain, &c. with little rakes instead of buckets (the whole cased with boards to prevent waste) revolving round two pulleys or rollers. Its use in the process of the manufacture of flour, is to draw or rake the grain or meal from one part of the mill to another, it receives it at one pulley and delivers it at the other, in a horizontal, ascending or descending direction, and in some cases may be more advantageously applied for that purpose than the conveyor.*

I claim the exclusive right to the principles and to all the machines above specified, and for all the uses and purposes specified as not having been heretofore known or used before I discovered them. They may all be united and combined in one flour mill to produce any improvement on the art of manufacturing flour complete, or they may be used separately for the purposes specified and allotted to them or to produce any improvement in part, according to the circumstances of the case.

* This machine was invented, applied and shown, in operation, to Oliver Evans, at Ellicott's mills, on Patuxent, about the year 1785. It was then called a drag.

No. 5.

THE KILN-DRYER.—To kiln-dry the meal after it is ground and during the operation of the process of manufacturing the flour. I take a close stove of any common form and enclose it with a wall made of the best non-conductor of heat, leaving a small space between the stove and the wall, to admit air to be heated in its passage through this space; I set this stove below the conveyor that conveys the meal from the mill stones as ground into the elevator, and I connect the space between the stove and the wall to the conveyor tube by a pipe entering near the elevator, and I cover the conveyor close and set a tube to rise from the end of the conveyor tube near the mill-stones for the heated air to ascend and escape up a chimney; I make fire in a stove and admit air at the bottom of the space between it and the wall round it to be heated and pass along the conveyor tube, meeting the meal which will be heated by the hot air and the superfluous moisture will be more powerfully repelled and thrown off, and the meal will be dried and cooled as it passes through the operation of the elevator and hopper-boy. The flour will be fairer than if the grain had been kiln-dried, and it will keep longer sweet than flour not kiln-dried.

I set all my machines in motion by the common means of cog and round, tooth and pinion, straps, ropes or chains, well known to every mill wright.

ARRANGEMENT and CONNECTION of the several machines so as to apply my principles to produce my improvements complete.

I fix a spout through the wall of the mill for the grain to be emptied into from the waggoner's bag to run into a box hung at the end of a scale beam to weigh a waggon load at a draught. From this box it descends into the grain elevator which raises it to a granary over the cleaning machines, and as it passes through them it may be directed into the same elevator to ascend to be cleaned a second time, and then descend into a garner over the hopper of the mill-stones to supply them regularly, and as ground it falls from the several pair of mill-stones into the conveyors where it is dried by the heated air of the kiln dryer, and is conveyed into the meal elevator to be raised and dropped on the cooling floor, within reach of the hopper-boy, which receives and spreads it over the whole area of the circle which it describes, stirring and turning it continually and gathering it into the bolting hoppers, which it attends regularly. That part of the flour which is not sufficiently bolted by the first operation is conveyed by a conveyor or drill into the elevator to ascend with the meal to be bolted over again, and that part of the meal which has not been sufficiently ground at the first mill-stone to be ground over.

Thus the whole of the operations which used to be performed by manual labor is from the time the wheat is emptied from the waggoner's bag, or from the ship's measure until it enters the bolts, and the manufacture be completed in the most perfect manner, performed by the machinery moved by the power which moves the mill, and this machinery keeps the meal in constant motion during the whole process, drying and cooling it more completely, avoiding all danger from fermentation and preventing insects from depositing their eggs, and performing all the operations of grinding and bolting to much greater perfection, making the greatest possible quantity of the best quality of flour out of the grain, saving much time and labor and expence to the miller and preventing much from being wasted, the motions of the machines being so slow as to cause none of the flour to rise in form of dust and be carried away by the air, and the cases of the machines being made close prevents any from being lost.

OLIVER EVANS.

A Trip made by a small man in a wrestle with a very great man.

Answer to the Baltimore Miller's Memorial, and Thomas Jefferson's Letter.

The honorable Thomas Jefferson reasons speculatively in his letter published with the memorial of Isaac M'Pherson, Elisha Tyson, Thomas Ellicott, and others, in Niles' Baltimore Register, and in a pamphlet laid before congress, and draws this conclusion, viz. "invention then cannot in nature be a subject of property."

In answer to this train of reasoning, to which I must refer the reader, we will premise that all visible subjects of property, whether fixed, as land, or movable, such as wild beasts, fowl, fish, &c. and the spontaneous productions, while in a state of nature, are common property. The whole is the property of the community, because it is visible, it can be found and claimed, and each individual has equal right to it. He that settles on a piece of land to cultivate and improve it, has exclusive property in it and its produce while he occupies it, because his time, his thoughts, and his labor are spent on it; but, if he removes from it, it then devolves again to the community, another may take and use it; but if the community agree to sell their land, he that pays the price has exclusive property in the quantity he pays for, in fee simple forever. He that can take any part of the movable subjects, such as wild beasts, fowl, fish, &c. or spontaneous productions of the soil, &c. has, by common consent, and natural right, exclusive property in whatever he can take; because his time, exertions, and labor, have been expended to take them; he has shown acts which vests the property in him.

But a man's ideas and inventions, are, by natural law, his own exclusive property; he need show no act to vest the property in him so long as he keeps them secret to himself; and that for the same reasons above stated, his time and the labors of his mind have been expended in conceiving, maturing and arranging them; they may have cost him very dear (the writer well knows by experience) and may be very useful to him in many cases, without being made visible by being connected with matter to produce operative machines or useful improvements in the arts and further, because they cannot be a subject of common property while they are invisible, existing only in his own brain, where the community cannot discover them nor know what they are, or whether they exist at all; therefore can lay no claim at all to them, or have any property in them; and if the conceiver, the possessor, the exclusive proprietor, of an useful train of ideas, inventions, or knowledge, knows that the community stand ready to seize them, to make them common stock as soon as he discloses them, he will take care to keep them secret and hold his exclusive possession of them as long as he needs the exclusive use. Can Mr. Jefferson (or the memorialists) devise the means of discovering that they do exist, or to force him to divulge them, that they may get possession of them to support his arguments, by showing that they have made them common property, free to the whole community; that they may have the right, either to give them back to the inventor for a limited time to encourage him or not, as they please, without complaint from him; if not, Mr. Jefferson's argument falls, the foundation is taken away.

It is this erroneous doctrine, (which he seems lately to have adopted) this species of injustice, that has caused inventions and discoveries to be kept secret and been the cause of the slow progress of the arts, and entailed human misery from the beginning of the world to this day. For there are few such patriots as Mr. Jefferson: a man must be a patriot indeed, if he will divulge the discovery he has made, at great expense, the only thing perhaps which he possesses exclusively, by which he can make a comfortable living. If he knows that he will be insulted, abused, and robbed, by the very persons that he shall benefit by the disclosure, (for envy and malice are universally excited against the inventor,) while he lives, and unless he can soar above their reach he will suffer; the truth of which is well known to all that are in, or have passed through that degraded state. To be sure, the inventor received his gift from an inexhaustible source, the God of nature; who may give the same discovery to any other that may as much need it, to enable him to get a comfortable living, but he too may be as deeply interested in keeping it a secret, and hold as tenaciously his exclusive right. Let not this sentence excite the hopes of the memorialists, for such gifts are never bestowed on those who would rob an inventor of his right. We believe most sacredly, that a spirit of patriotism pervades the breasts of the possessors of those gifts, and they will offer them to the public, and part with their exclusive right to them, on reasonable terms; but if they are once induced to disclose, and then be deceived by the public, they will be justified in withholding such offers in future, until they can secure better terms for themselves. Thus it appears, that instead of Mr. Jefferson's conclusions being correct, viz. "inventions then cannot in nature be a subject of property," it is quite the reverse; for there is nothing that a man has by nature exclusive property in but his ideas and inventions, and these only are exclusively his, for it is impossible that others can have any property in them. This is a self-evident truth. Nor is there any person that can wrest such property from him, unless he by his own act, either discloses them or attaches them to matter, to improve some art, machine or manufacture, thereby making them visible, and giving the community the power to seize them, disclosing them in any way, does neither lessen his right nor increase that of the public. Nor does he, by holding his exclusive right, monopolise any thing that ever existed. Is it not time then that the public, the world, should discover the error palmed on them by the self-interested and unjust, and cease to attempt what cannot be accomplished, viz. to make the ideas and inventions of man, free to all, "like the air we breathe; like fire, expansible over all space," (Jefferson) and try the experiment of offering such protection as will purchase them.

As to the other points discussed in Mr. Jefferson's letter, viz.

1. Oliver Evans' right to a patent for the exclusive use of elevators (or the string of buckets, pots, or cups) the conveyor (or Archimedes screw) and the hopperboy. On this subject he has been deceived, (we think designedly) for there was no need of turning to his books, to prove that Mr. Evans did not invent what he has not patented, nor does he claim; his patent being for his improvement in the art and manufacture of flour, and not for machines. The string of buckets, Archimedes screw, the drill plough, are as free as they ever were to the public, and are no improvement in the art or manufacture of flour, and if Mr. Jefferson had found the elevator, conveyor, hopperboy, and drill, all perfect in his books, exactly as Mr. Evans had described them in his specification, it would not lessen Mr. Evans' right to his patent, had he taken them from the same books, and improved, arranged, and combined them, to carry into operation the great result, his great improvement on the art and manufacture, which presses so heavily on the shoulders of those citizens of the United States (certain millers near Baltimore) he had a right so to do, he has as good a right to use them as any other person.

2. The act for the relief of Oliver Evans. The question was fully discussed before judges Washington and Peters, Philadelphia; and judges Davall and Huston, Baltimore; and in both cases was decided to have no retrospective operation. Mr. Evans is glad Mr. Jefferson was not the judge; for it would have been a cruel unjust decision, if it had been decided that after congress had declared that the right to a patent belongs to the original inventor, and he had spent his all and reduced himself to poverty to get it disseminated; yet, because Thomas Jefferson, when secretary of state, issued to Mr. Evans a patent, informal, and not according to law, and which the court was obliged to declare void, therefore Oliver Evans has lost his right to his improvement, and lost the labor of the prime of his life, and must remain in poverty; and it now belongs to the memorialists who took the opportunity of seizing on it, when they thought there existed no law to prevent them, and of laying it as a burden on their shoulders, and when invited by Mr. Evans to lay it off, or pay him his old price of forty dollars, with interest, from the time they should have paid it, as their neighbors had done; they refused to do either, and although they now apply to congress to rid from the shoulders of the people of the United States (the Baltimore millers) the oppressive burden, yet they so love it, that they cling to it like savages, do to their cloaks, when assailed by the north-winds.

3. The rules established by the board of commissioners, under the first act of congress to promote the useful arts, of which Mr. Jefferson was the principal or leading member. We believe they were very bad indeed, for they would have refused patents for the most useful discoveries and inventions, of the utmost importance, that cannot be put in operation by the inventor for less than thousands of dollars expense. Under such rules there could scarcely be an improvement entitled to a patent. This shows the danger of entrusting such power to such a board, who cannot possibly be judges of the merits of an invention, until they see it in operation, and not even then, without experience in both the old and improved plan, for a considerable time.

4. The whole of the pamphlet of the memorialists, consisting of affidavits taken ex parte, goes to prove that O. Evans did not invent what he does not claim, and are as unnecessary as the letter, and were never produced in court, where they would have been rebutted, can be as promptly answered and completely refuted, as the letter has been. But it is unworthy of the public ear, further than to state that the testimony of the Stoufers and others in the case of Chambers, was not read in court, or it might have been proven that Chambers had changed the form of his hopperboy before the witnesses saw it, and Christian Stoufer has paid for licenses and did not then say that he was the inventor. That the memorialists have taken care to publish none of the testimony given in court, at the great trial at Baltimore, which lasted four days, and in which they were defeated on the testimony of their own witnesses, although they had engaged in their defence four of the most eminent lawyers. And that Lewis Evans, John Ellicott, and Joseph Evans were present in court, why did not they take their testimony there, in support of the testimony of Jonathan Ellicott, which was the same, but which Mr. Evans knew could not affect the cause, and let it pass; and so it is reported that it was proved Jonathan Ellicott was the inventor of the conveyor, although Mr. Evans had witnesses present to have proved to the contrary, and which he will do, perhaps, if ever they attempt to prove it in court again, if he and his witnesses live; true, three-fourths of them are deceased. And that Mr. Evans specified in his first specification, 1790, the very blowing machine patented by Jeremiah Baily, so that he could have no right to patent it in 1810, to destroy Mr. Evans' patent. That a Mr. Vulgamot has taken out a patent for another machine to elevate, specified by Mr. Evans. A third has altered the formation of the hopperboy, and taken out a patent, all are sued. One circumstance however deserves to be mentioned particularly. They have published in their No 2 the certificate of James Stroud and Edward Marshall, which they obtained, as is stated in an after certificate given to correct this. They had written it and presented it for signature, holding forth the idea, that its purport was, that the certificate of Samuel Stroud was correct, when he had said, that things were as he believed, and so, viz. that Samuel thought and believed as he had certified, which Stroud and Marshall signed on condition that they should next day be furnished with correct copies of both Samuel Stroud's and their own certificate. But before they furnished Stroud and Marshall with the copies, they went before a notary public, and affirmed that the certificate was voluntarily signed, and they published both certificates, laid them before congress, and published them in the newspapers, accusing Mr. Evans with the same crimes of having by such means obtained false testimony of James Stroud and

Edward Marshall (men whose integrity is unimpeachable) the very crime that they had perpetrated. But as soon as Stroud and Marshall could get copies of the certificates, which was sixteen days after given, they saw that their certificate would be construed entirely opposite to what they intended, and they with due deliberation made out another, which Marshall signed, and Stroud travelled with it thirty-two miles to Philadelphia, and signed and affirmed to it before a notary public, and delivered it to Mr. Evans. See this certificate in the report of the law case, page 15, published by Niles in the Baltimore Register, a copy of which report has been delivered to each member of congress in the winter of 1812, at the close of the session; which will show that deception and imposture is the sort by which they defend their precious cash. This one act will shew the true color of the whole of their transactions; they have certainly misrepresented to an extent sufficient to excite the just indignation of the best, the most feeling, the most just, and the most eminent men, such as Mr. Jefferson is acknowledged to be, against Mr. Evans. And no wonder, for how could their representations be doubted when backed by at least fifty men, already made rich by elevators and hopperboys, respectable both for wealth and numbers; surely they were quite certain, that congress, indignant at such oppression and extortion as they had charged Mr. Evans with, would, without hesitation, repeal the act for his relief. They knew that congress could not spend four days to hear the case, as the court had done, and that by wealth and numbers, they expected they could easily bear Mr. Evans down. But their having fled from a court of justice to congress for relief, bore a suspicious aspect; they could not get congress to act as promptly as they expected—and they are so far disappointed, and have obtained leave to go home.

“The committee to whom was referred the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Maryland, on the subject of the patent granted to Oliver Evans, for his improvements in machinery employed in the manufacture of flour, beg leave to report:

“That the memorialists complain, that by virtue of the act passed on the 21st January, 1808, intitled “an act for the relief of Oliver Evans,” the said Oliver Evans claims the benefit of certain improvements in the machinery employed in the manufacture of flour, of which he is not the original inventor. That he exacts large and unconscionable sums for the use of those improvements; and that those are compelled to pay, who have established their improvements before the passing of the said act.

“Your committee conceive it not only re-pagnant to the principles of a government organised like ours, to permit a question, of a character such as the first objection presents, to be litigated before the legislature; but it is impossible that a fair decision can be made, when it is indispensable, in order to render impartial justice, the parties should be permitted to go into evidence respecting the facts in controversy. A court of justice is the proper tribunal where such questions ought to be tried; and your committee are informed, that this very question has already been settled in that way by the circuit court of the United States, for the Maryland district, favorable to the pretensions of the said Evans.

The second subject of complaint seems, to your committee equally an improper subject for the interference of the legislature. The patentee, by law, has an exclusive privilege to use his invention as he pleases. No person has a right to complain, if the proprietor of an invention demand a sum deemed exorbitant, more than if such a demand has been made for any other species of property; it must rest with the purchaser whether his interest will permit him to yield to it.

The third ground of complaint is equally untenable in the opinion of your committee. The Legislature had the power (and it seems in this case they have exercised it) to subject those who should use the improvements mentioned, in future, to the claim of the said Oliver Evans. The patent originally granted to him had previously been declared void by a judicial decision. The case, therefore, stood as if no exclusive right had ever been granted; and it is certainly not necessary to prove, that a person who uses a new improvement before a patent is granted, is subject to the restrictions which follow the grant. Your committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorial ought not to be granted."

And surely they cannot complain, for they have had full scope for their art and intrigue. They first persuaded Samuel Robertson who owed but one hundred dollars (and who was not one of them) to stand as the ostensible defendant, to rake the chestnuts out of the embers for them to eat. The Tysons were deemed to be the real defendants and they called on the Ellicotts to be witnesses, all of them the most deeply interested perhaps of any millers in the United States. And when fairly beaten, they left Mr. Robertson in the lurch to pay damages and costs. Witness the following letter of Mr. Robertson to Mr. Evans (written after his fingers were burnt) And they have since been heard by four committees of congress, all this to get clear of paying what just and liberal men have paid freely, viz. not more than one hundredth part of what they have gained by the use of the improvement. They complain that the gains have gone into the hands of the farmers, but these men in particular have had the fifty cents per barrel for twenty years before any part went to the farmers, besides half the labor saved.

[S. ROBERTSON'S LETTER.]

Baltimore, Dec. 23, 1812.

DEAR SIR,

Of the result of the trial lately had of a cause in the circuit court, in which you were plaintiff and I was defendant, it is presumed you are apprised. The object of the present address is to procure a deduction from the present amount of damages, which the jury, from the testimony before them felt themselves bound to assess. You will not, it is presumed, be at all astonished at the singularity of this application, when the following facts are made known to you.

Some time after the claim for compensation for the use of your invention had been made through your agent or counsel, N. Williams, esq. of Baltimore, I repaired to that place with money for the purpose of discharging the claim under an impression that it was your right, and sensible of the advantages which were derived from the use of the machinery then applied to the milling business by me. My intention became known to other persons similarly situated, who used arguments and referred me to the opinions of others to show that you were not entitled to the compensation demanded; and wholly through persuasion I came into their views and consented the suit might continue. I only summoned a single witness, Mr. Samuel Howard, by whom I expected to prove the length of time the elevators had been used in my mill, and that witness was not sworn in the cause, although the greater part of the costs accrued in the case appear to be for witnesses who attended without my knowledge or direction. My residence is remote from Baltimore, and near which place many of the persons who were then contending your right reside. My name unfortunately headed the list of defendants, and I was not even present at the trial.

In addition to the above, I assure you, sir, that the judgment will bear peculiarly heavy on me; and in fact, that it will nearly go to deprive me of the only means of supporting a rising family. Under these circumstances, with the advice of several gentlemen who know your character and situation in life, I hesitate not to appeal to your feelings. The respectable jury who decided the cause, being impressed with the propriety of this application, have voluntarily offered their signatures to give to it the greater effect if you require it.

I am, sir, respectfully,

Your obedient humble serv't,

(Signed) SAMUEL ROBERTSON, 3d

Mr. Evans answered, that if he could believe it possible, that those men, viz. Elisha Tyson and son, and others, who were the real defendants and their associates have deserted him, his application should not have been in vain, but as he could not believe it, he referred him to them, offering however to pay as much on an average as any six of them would subscribe, so as not to exceed in the whole the amount of the damages and costs; but on future and repeated applications, being convinced that Mr. Robertson had been totally deserted by his pretended friends he agreed to accept the repeated offer of $1,000 in lieu of $1,350 which he had been allowed by law to treble, but did not, fearing that it might cause them to desert Mr. Robertson; yet have they out-witted both him and Mr. Robertson.

Now if each member of congress could be informed of the true facts, that Elisha Tyson of Baltimore, has been the prime mover of all complaint from Baltimore, although he has been making 72 barrels of flour per day for 22 years, and has had the 50 cents per barrel by making more superfine flour besides half the labor saved, all by the use of the improvement, as proved by witnesses in court, amounting to $180,400 in that time, by a fair calculation.

That when Mr. Evans called on him about the year 1789, to pay $53 for each pair of 6 feet mill-stones for use of his improvement, Elisha exclaimed, that it was a most extortionable price; that he would never pay; that he would defend by law to the utmost extent, that he would pay $12 1-2 per pair and no more. Mr. Evans being then too poor to bear the expense of such a law suit, and having given his improvement gratis to many, thought best to accept his offer, and gave him a license as he required, as if he had paid $66 for two pairs, although he had paid but $25; but Elisha promised to be very friendly and keep the fraud secret.

That in 1811, Elisha, by letter, inquired of N. Williams, esq. counsel and agent for Mr. E. whether Mr. E. had any claim, and if any, what was his price for license to use his improvements to 6 pair 6 feet mill stones, setting up on Susquehanna. Mr. E. answered by letter, $300 for each pair 6 feet stones for five pairs, to be paid as fast as they were got to work, but that no charge should be made for the 6th pair, they would then average $250 per pair each for 6 pairs.

When Elisha received this answer, he went to Washington and charged Mr. E. with the greatest extortion; that he had demanded of him $2,400 for one mill, whereas it was but $250 for one mill of 6 feet stones, or $1,500 for 6 mills. When he returned to Baltimore, he met Mr. Evans in the long room at Mr. Gadsby's, and there charged him with extortion, declaring that he had discovered what no other man knew, viz the means of breaking the patent, which he declared he would do unless Mr. E. would take reasonable prices; but Mr. E. supposing that Elisha meant by reasonable prices $12 1-2 per pair for 6 feet stones, would not compromise, but preferred that Elisha should try to break the patent, when he went out declaring that he would do it. He was followed by Evan Evans, a brother of the patentee, to try to effect a compromise; when after some conversation more friendly, Elisha declared to Evan that he could break the patent, but that his principles did not admit of litigation. That if Oliver would grant him and his sons license free of costs for all the mill stones they were about to set up, he would keep a perfect secret what he had discovered, and would not break the patent!! When the proposition was made to Mr. Evans, he repelled it with indignation, and Elisha went his way, and appeared as the active agent for Samuel Robertson and others, procuring the cause to be continued from court to court, and directing the summoning of witnesses, instructing defendant's counsel, &c. originating combinations, memorials, &c. &c. see the report of the case. They have attempted many deceptions to mislead. 1st. They say O. E. has patented what he has not.—

2d. They exaggerate his price of license—
3d. They depreciate the value of his improvement by the certificate of a set of millers who may know no better, but the Tysons and Ellicotts all knew better than to sign such certificate, to show that more superfine flour cannot be made by the improvement than without it. They know that Thomas Ellicott, the uncle of the present Ellicotts, has said in the Millwright's Guide, 2d edition, page 267: "That taking a large quantity we can make 2 or 3 lbs. more out of a bushel of wheat, by the new than the old way, although it be equally well ground, because it is so much more completely bolted with less waste."

This is saying far more than the patentee calculates on, for he says only that 25lbs. more superfine flour, and less middlings, stuff and bran, can be made to each barrel of flour, which is true. 4th. They say that the patentee is not the inventor, while they know that he is: their misrepresentations are too numerous to be mentioned.

If congress and the people were fully informed of the intense labor of mind, expense of time and money, inventors generally bear in discovering and maturing their improvements, and the greater difficulties they have yet to encounter to get them disseminated and introduced into general use, they would see the propriety of granting them protection in their rights for a longer term, and acknowledge their right of claiming a price for their licenses to use their improvements, in greater proportion to the benefits of their use, than the memorialists make complaint of, viz: 7 1/2 per cent as having been charged by the patentee for the improvements in the manufacture of flour.

These improvements were discovered, planned and arranged, by the patentee by a long, tedious, and laborious study, while living in Queen Ann's county, Maryland, in the years 1782 and 1783. He left that place in 1783 and began to prepare to build his mill in New-Castle county, Delaware; but before he left Maryland or began his mill, he communicated to several persons, some of whom are yet living, that he had discovered the whole improvements, and that he would build a mill that should take the grain from the waggon, elevate and convey it to any part of the mill, pass it through the cleaning machines, bring it into the mill stones, and as ground, it should convey the meal from the several pair of mill stones and elevate it to the meal loft, convey it to any part thereof, spread it over the floor, and stir it about to cool, and gather it to the bolting hopper, and attend it regularly; the tail flour should be elevated to be bolted over, the whole to be done by the power of the water wheel from the time the grain leaves the waggoner's bag until it be completely manufactured into flour and ready for packing. All this can yet be proved in court, that it was communicated before the mill was began, and which no one could then credit, unless fully explained to them, because nothing of the kind was ever heard of before. Now let the reader judge, if before such testimony, every petty claim to the invention of conveyors and drills, in 1786, by Jonathan Ellicott, and of hopper machines by others after the patentee had petitioned the legislature for exclusive rights, in February and March, 1786, will not disappear before a court of justice, as a drop of snow in a fountain of pure water, should it claim to be the original source, as they have done in 1812, 29 years after the original invention.

Again if we consider that a man who never saw a jack plane, simple as it is, cannot use it; he will throw it aside as useless, and take a drawing knife to smooth a piece of timber, if he has before used one, and cannot be persuaded to learn to use the plane. Then it cannot be supposed that such an improvement as described, could be produced by accidental thought, and carried into operation without expense; nor could it have been introduced into general use without great expense, unless the patentee had been vested with the authority that a master has over his apprentices; he gives the boy a jack plane, and compels him to work with it until he learns the use of it. With such authority a patent might be productive of profit even in 11 years, that is, if the patentee could both compel to use and to pay him for the use, then if he overcharged, the memorialists might, with propriety, complain of oppression and extortion.

The truth is, that it was with great difficulty and expense that the invention was matured; it certainly required much more to disseminate it and get it into general use. The patentee, or his agents, travelled, say 500 miles at a stretch, spending their money and time, offering the improvement gratis, to the first who should adopt it in a county, before they could find one to accept on those terms. There were no claimants of the invention in those days, no hopperboys, conveyors or drills to be found, nor inventors thereof. The profits and honors were not worth disputing about. The patentee and his agents were ridiculed as fools by the very class who now complain; but they persevered with a hope of reward in the future. One of the agents has no doubt that he has travelled on that business one hundred thousand miles in fourteen years, from state to state, and mill to mill.

The patentee expended three years writing the Millwright's Guide, to explain the improvements, and reduced himself to a state of real indigence; all that was got from the just and liberal was expended in this way, and the time was lost. And when he attempted to put the law in force, to compel the memorialists or such men to pay, his patent was declared void, while he supposed $10,000 was due him, and he was left in poverty. Now the memorialists say that it was unjust in congress to grant him a good patent, that his $10,000 and whole right were forfeited by the error of Thomas Jefferson, who was the United States' officer, and no fault to be imputed to the inventor. Let justice judge, between him and them, of their complaints of his rise of prices.

He first offered them his improvement gratis. It was not worth setting up. Then at thirty-three dollars. They would not pay. Then at forty dollars. It was quite too high. But many had seized on it, and were using it, others as soon as they supposed the right lost, set the machines to work.

When he obtained a good patent, they were all offered license at the former price, $40, with interest from the time they should have paid as their neighbors had done. Very few complied, although notice in public papers and by the agents calling, that the price would be raised to $100 the first year, then to $200 for the next year, then again to $300, for a mill making twenty barrels flour per day, where a hand and a half is saved, viz: the price of their wages and boarding for one year. They still refuse to pay, and think it easier to sign memorials, in which they have had no mercy on the patentee. They revive every injurious report long ago refuted in courts. It did not, perhaps, strike them, that having had the use of the improvements from six to twenty years, which saved them $300 per year in wages and board of a miller all that time, did enable them to pay $300 now easier than $40 at first. That their neighbors who had paid, think they should pay too; that they by refusing, increased Mr. Evans' expenses, and justifies him in recovering all expenses, costs, and charges of lawsuits, and loss of his time, by raising the price of his licenses; that he has no other way to do, except he sues them, and then the jury will find that they have seized on his property, and are holding forcible possession, they will award him the full annual rent of his machines or improvement, for the whole time they have so forcibly used it, and not the interest on the rent only, as he offers to take. If they had seen all this, they would have preferred to have done as Thomas Jefferson did. As soon as the demand was made he enclosed the money in a letter, stating that he was glad of the opportunity of paying for so useful an improvement, as he wished to reward the inventor, and encourage genius, although he doubted the right to make the demand.

If congress could be informed of the many pretenders there are to the invention of every useful thing that the patentee or any other, ever got into useful operation, of the vexations, slanders, and abuse imposed on them, they would turn a deaf ear to the memorialists, refer them to the courts of justice, and grant such protection to inventors as is necessary to enable them to withstand the attacks of such a host of enemies, who would seize on his inventions while he lives, but after his decease, and they be in full possession, they would give Oliver the whole credit and honor of the invention of elevators, conveyors, hopperboys, and drills, but Oliver is not willing to wait so long for his reward.

On the whole his hopes increase, that congress will be convinced that the best and shortest way to get possession of useful improvements, and to promote the progress of the useful arts, as enjoined on them by the constitution, (in these words: "Congress shall have power to promote science and the useful arts, by securing* to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings or discoveries for limited times"—not for a limited time.) is to grant their protection for a sufficient limited time in the first instance, to engage the inventors themselves to put their inventions in operation. They are the proper masters to teach the boys to use the jack plane that they have first learned to work with themselves. If twenty-eight years protection be a proper term for an author who puts his ideas on paper to sell (and it is known to be short enough) why should not the inventor who puts his ideas in operation by a machine, or to improve an art, which will cost him a thousand times as much in many cases, be protected for an equal time

The evident conclusion is, that inventions of the utmost importance have lain dormant, and cannot be produced until the protection be granted; that the memorialists are injuring their country to a very great extent.

The memorialists gain by the improvements in the manufacture of flour, as follows:

For every 20 barrels of flour made per day, there is the labor of one full hand saved. Elisha Tyson with two pairs of 6 feet stones makes 72 barrels per day, there is saved for him the labor of three and a half full hands, at $1 per day	$3 50
72 barrels per day at 50 cents, gained by making more superfine flour and less stuffs, as proved by their own witnesses in court, is	36 00

His gain by the use of the improvements per day is $39 50

Suppose 200 days per year at $39 50, makes his gain per year $7,900. 14 years at $7,900 makes his gain during the patent term $110,600. He has had the use of them about 25 years already.

Jonathan Ellicott with four pairs of 7 feet stones, makes 185 barrels of flour per day; the labor of nine and a fourth hands are saved for him, and his gain by the same rule per day is $161 75. His gain per year $20,350. His gain during the patent term is $284,900. He has had the use about twenty-five years already.

Thomas Ellicott with two pairs of 7 feet stones makes 100 barrels flour per day, the labor of five hands is saved him, and by the same rule his gain by the use is per day $55. His gain per year, allowing 200 days work per year, is $11,000. His gain during the patent term of 14 years is $154,000. He has had the use about six years, perhaps eight years. He has candidly declared that he will break the patent if he can; this was before he went home.

Isaac McPherson is a millstone maker, and we cannot see how he feels the burden, but we suspect he is oppressed by another patent which Mr. Evans took out for his improvement on making millstones, by turning and balancing them truly on their centre. This may have taken from him many good jobs. It was he that wrote to Mr. Jefferson.

They all unite in saying, that the profits have all gone into the hands of the farmer, so that there has not been more than three dollars per barrel profit left to the miller, and that lasted only a part of the year 1812; it soon fell to $2 50 per barrel, and down to $2, and even lower.

But Mr. Evans is willing to accommodate and to divide the gains and savings, by the use of his improvements equally between ninety-eight honest farmers, the miller and himself, and he finds that his share will be more than he ever demanded.

This is certainly the most extraordinary oppression; it burdens the oppressed with dollars and eagles, who call for more sacks upon the back, until they cry out bloody miller! bloody miller!!* Yet they hold on like dying misers to their bags.

The following numbers copied from the National Intelligencer, may be worthy the attention of those interested either for or against patent rights, although the same ideas may in some instances be repeated.

No. I.

Patent right, for new and useful improvements, no monopoly.

Monopoly, one of the most odious terms in the English language, has been used to convey the idea of exclusive right to new inventions. No wonder then that the people who have just conceptions of the unjust and oppressive act of granting monopoly, should be opposed to exclusive rights, bearing that odious name.

Lord Coke described a monopoly to be a grant by the king to any person or persons of the exclusive right of buying or selling, making or using any thing which any person or persons had the right of buying or selling, making or using, in their lawful trade, previous to such grant.

The parliament of Great Britain by their act of 21 Jac. 1, enacted, that all such grants were contrary to the laws of the realm, depriving their king of the prerogative of granting monopolies. But by the same act provided, that the act should not extend to deprive the king of his prerogative of granting exclusive rights, by letters patent, to the true and first inventor and inventors, of any manner of new manufactures, within the realm. This is the English patent law; there is no other statute law in the case.

Why did parliament make this exception, after having declared, that all monopolies were "altogether contrary to the laws of the realm?" I answer, because they saw that exclusive rights for new inventions were not monopolies, nor could they possibly be, according to the meaning of the word, as described by lord Coke. A thing that was to be new in the realm, certainly never existed in the realm, before invented or discovered by the patentee. If it had never existed, certainly no person could have been in the practice of buying or selling, making or using it, in their lawful trade. The grant then could not deprive any person of any right they possessed, nor could any one have any claim of any right to things which never existed.—Parliament no doubt conceived that no person could possibly have any right to the invention or discovery but the inventor himself. Therefore they allowed their king the prerogative of protecting these rights for 14 years by his letters patent, reserving the right to parliament of extending the term, or granting protection for new terms, as might be necessary—and which they have never refused to do where the case merited it. They have granted new terms of 7, 14, 18, 20, 25, 30 years, as the importance, expense or nature of the case required. Had they given those letters patent an appropriate name, and called them the king's protection of the right of the inventor by his letters patent, instead of a monopoly, hostility to the protection of the rights of inventors would have ceased in a great measure; the inventors would have escaped much persecution; much litigation would have been prevented; for the very idea of protection by the supreme authority in a just right, would have been conveyed, instead of a monopoly of public right. While the people believe patent rights to be monopolies, it will require a series of reflections even in congress to get rid of the idea; and no one can expect that congress will ever consent to grant a monopoly.

If protection of exclusive rights to new inventions are not monopolies in England, neither can they be in this country; for no power exists in our free government, to grant a monopoly, to deprive a person of any vested right; even congress have not the power to grant a monopoly, but have power to secure to authors and inventors exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, for limited times, by their letters patent, granting their protection to inherent right only. Accordingly our patent laws afford protection to the inventor or discoverer "of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, &c. or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, &c. not known or used," before discovered or invented by the patentee. Therefore patents in this country can be good only for things that are new and useful; things unknown in the United States; things that had no existence in the United States, before invented or discovered by the patentee; things to be discovered, invented, made or created by the patentee, in addition to the public knowledge or property. If so, no person can have any vested right in them; the protection granted cannot be a monopoly; because it takes nothing from nor deprives any person of any right they possessed; nor can the grant do any injury to any person. But if the thing patented was known and used in the United States prior to the supposed invention or discovery of the patentee, the patent would be void by our law. Therefore a patent right cannot be a monopoly in this country.

The constitution of the United States delegates the power to congress "to promote science and the useful arts, by protecting authors and inventors in the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, for limited times." This clause acknowledges the right of inventors, and enjoins it as a duty on congress to act effectually so as to promote science and useful art.

Congress, in the discharge of this trust, passed the act entitled "an act to promote the progress of the useful arts," granting their protection by letters patent for 14 years, to inventors or discoverers. We will proceed to examine how this act has operated to produce the effect intended.

No. II.

Congress passed the act entitled an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, with intent to excite to action the inventive genius of the U. States, and stimulate inventors with a prospect and hope of ample remuneration for their labors and expenses, by protecting them in the full enjoyment of their rights, exclusively for the term of 14 years, a time then deemed sufficient to reward them.

Genius was excited, and many, with more zeal and patriotism than prudence, have spent their all in producing such inventions and improvements as their means were equal to; but few have met the reward they expected & they find their patent terms expiring before they have received any profits. And it is a notorious fact, that no class of society, equally industrious and economical, are so oppressed with poverty and real indigence; as inventors are at this day.

Those who have conceived improvements too expensive for their means, have failed in their applications to prudent men for their aid, and their discoveries lay dormant.—Those who had the means and have produced expensive improvements, or expended their time or money to introduce them into use, have not been compensated, but ruined at the expiration of their patent terms.—There is no instance within the knowledge of the writer, of the term of 14 years having rewarded the inventor, as was intended by Congress, when they passed the act. It being the general opinion that he who makes a useful improvement is justly entitled to receive from the use of it a competency for life. The local circumstances of this country require a longer time; the state of the arts; the scattered population; the tedious law suits to be sustained; the general opposition to be met from those who are to use the improvements, who being attached to the modes they were taught, they will wait the first seven years to see the utility fully proved, and then many from their detestation to what they have been brought to view as a monopoly, will wait the last seven years that the patent may expire rather than pay for a licence. Thus fourteen years operates injuriously instead of beneficially to the public, in the following ways:

1st. Totally suppresses all expensive improvements that the inventor has not the means within himself to produce in operation, for no persons will risque their money to assist him, nor will the inventor himself risque the expense if he be prudent, while he has no prospect of being rewarded; and thus the invention will lay dormant be it ever so important and beneficial. And the public deprive themselves of the benefits of such improvements, for a much greater length of time, than would have produced them, and rewarded the inventor by his having received about 1-100th part of the benefit the public will have received in the same time, but counting the benefits to be received by the public after the expiration of the sufficient limited time, and we may then say, the public is to receive one thousand times the benefit that the inventor asks for his own inventions, for which no one can shew that the public gives any thing, or suffer any loss or disadvantage, by granting sufficient protection, or retains or secures any right by refusing to grant a sufficient term.

Witness the discoveries of the Marquis of Worcester published, observe, published in 1663, viz. The great Elastic power of Steam, the Torpedo, the Telegraph, Conversive Statue, the Principles in Optics, by which he could discover objects sunk beneath the horizon, or beyond objects which obstruct the view, a Self moving machine. These are all that can be recollected by the writer, of the marquis' one hundred inventions then published, and which have been reviewed in this country between 127 and 131 years since he published them. As to the utility of his discoveries the writer can speak of only one, viz. The Elastic power of Steam, which was re-discovered without a knowledge that the marquis ever existed, and the application improved on, and put in operation 28 years after so re-discovered, and 119 years after published by the marquis, so as to produce a steam engine ten times as powerful as the best then in use, and can be made with half the labor, more simple and permanent will require not more than half the fuel, and will work with a thousandth part of the water, and will support a thousandth part the weight, and will last ten times as long.

water, limestone or muddy water, and no sediment shall accumulate to interrupt the boiler. The same heat that drives it may afterwards applied to many other useful purposes, such as distilling, heating or boiling water to evaporate it, or for other purposes, or to warming the factory which the engine drives, its portability fits it for boats and carriages and a great variety of purposes, to which the other will not apply, especially to boats on the turbid waters of the Mississippi, salt water, &c. and carriages.

What was the reason this engine was not produced by the marquis in his day? Perhaps the same which kept it dormant 28 years after re-discovered here; 14 years only of exclusive right was offered him, and he could not produce the aid he wanted then, there, no more than the re-discoverer could procure it here; 30 years were necessary. What did the public gain or secure by the refusal? Nothing. What could it have cost them to make the grant? Nothing. What have they missed gaining by refusing the grant? Benefits to an incalculable amount, for if we take into calculation half the price of all the steam engines since made, and half the fuel they have consumed, and all other advantages that might have been derived from the improvement, it would swell the amount to baffle the calculator.

No. III

2d. It confines the inventor to the improvement of his own art only, because he cannot gain by improving any other, and there has been scarcely a solitary instance of any man having improved the art he was bred to— And it promotes the sordid and detestable principle or practice (which pervades the world) of keeping the principle of our arts secret. For if an artist, shackled as he is by old plans, should happen to discover an improvement on his own art, it is his interest to pay thirty dollars into the Treasury of the U. States, and take out a patent to prevent any other person from using it besides himself. Contrary to the patriotism that pervades the breast of every true inventive genius, who glories in making his discovery known to all, that they may be benefited by it, had not the impolitic law made it his interest to barely comply with the law by filing a specification in the patent office, which few will ever see, and not one of 100 who shall see it will understand, so as to be able to make and use the improvement, after the patent expires. Thus the inventor may continue to have almost the exclusive use of his invention, for not only one term, but two or three terms of 14 years, for every other person who may get the use of it will be as deeply interested as himself in keeping it a secret. Thus the public deprive themselves of the benefits of new and useful improvements, by the very steps they take to get possession of them.

The extension of a patent term for a useful invention or improvement, is certainly one of the most benevolent acts, originating from principles of justice and benevolence, with intent to reward the inventor for his past labors and ingenuity, and to encourage others to follow his example in producing other useful inventions. This looks indeed a little like granting a monopoly for a thing already existing and in use, until we recollect that no person, except the inventor himself, can have any inherent right to it; then it appears clear to be no monopoly, but if the patentee be not the inventor or the discoverer, it would be a monopoly in the most hateful sense of the word.

These extensions have, we believe, in every instance been productive of the most beneficial effects to the community, for instance—

1st. The extension of Bolton & Watts' patent for 25 years, when seven years of their first term had expired, by the British parliament; which enabled and encouraged them to establish the greatest and most beneficial manufactory that ever existed in the British dominions, or perhaps in the known world, viz. that of their improved Steam Engines.

These engines are the prime mover of their principal manufactories, founding their commerce and gigantic naval power.

2d. The extension of Whitmore's patent for making cards, which has caused a great manufactory of wire and cards to be established in New-York that will supply the U. States.

3d. The act of Congress for the relief of Oliver Evans, which gave a new stimulus to the inventive genius of the United States, and enabled him to force forward the improvements on Steam Engines, against the current of prejudice and opposition which had kept it dormant from 1773 to 1802, and had nearly suppressed it from 1802 to 1809, when he got his steam mill in motion in Pittsburgh, since which it has progressed rapidly, and his engines are now applied as follows: one 20 horse power at Manchack, sawing timber; one 20 horse do. at Natchez; one 8 horse at do. sawing; one 24 horse do. Lexington, grinding grain; one 40 horse do. making paper; one 42 horse building for Limestone on Ohio, for grinding grain; one 70 horse power for grinding grain at Cincinnati, Ohio; one 20 horse power at Marietta, Ohio, grinding grain. There are going in Pittsburgh one 24 horse power, grinding grain; one 16 horse power, making paper; one 8 horse power, drawing wire &c.;—one 16 horse, tilting shovels and spades; one 70 horse power, rolling and slitting iron.

And there are making at Pittsburgh, one for Louisville 20 horse power; one 20 horse for Frankfort, Ky.; one 20 horse for manufacturing at Cincinnati; one 30 horse to grind grain at Washington, Penn. one 13 horse for Lexington, Ky. At work at Philadelphia, 2 of 6 horse power each for grinding white lead; one 5 horse manufacturing steam engines; one 6 horse spinning cotton, at New York; one for manufacturing woollen cloth, 24 horse power; one 24 horse for drawing wire and making cards. At Middletown, Conn. one 20 horse power for manufacturing woollen cloth. At Providence, R. I. one 30 horse power for spinning cotton; one 20 horse power for manufacturing. At Boston, one 20 horse power for a boat. Amounting in all to 28 Steam Engines, 25 of which have been made since 1809.

These are some of the good effects of the liberal grant. Had it not been made, his improvement would not have a fourth part the progress; for he would have had neither power nor spirit to have forced it on against all opposition, as he has done; and he would have had the usual complaint that his invention had ruined him. And moreover it has enabled him to support his son George, to form associations in Pittsburg, and there to establish an iron foundry, steam engine manufactory, mould makers' shop, and blacksmiths shops, with 10 or 12 smiths' forges; and more than 50 workmen are there daily employed; making steam engines and other machinery, such as are wanted in the western country. And in order to bring about this establishment, the patentee assigned one fourth part of his patent right to his improvement on the steam engine, to Mr. Luther Stephens, of Lexington, Ky. to compensate him for an improvement that he had made to simplify its form, and to engage his talents in promoting its progress into use. And another fourth part his son, on condition that they would associate and form the establishment, which they have done with a full hope that Congress would be disposed to grant their protection in the exclusive right to the improvement for another term, to insure them a liberal compensation for the great undertaking, as well as to reward the inventor. Thus it is evident that the inventor has surrendered one half his exclusive right to his improvement, to promote establishments to extend the use of his improvement, for the public interest.

These steam engines are sold at lower prices than any other can be made and sold at. They will not require more than half the fuel to produce equal power. So that the inventor cannot be said to demand any thing for his licence; for he grants licence with the engine. It is certain, however, that he does not retain for his exclusive right one hundredth part of the benefits the public or the users of his engines receive from his invention; for it is a fact that those who use his engines, and know their superior qualities, would not accept the best English engines as a gift, if they could get his at his prices. Has a single right been sacrificed, or monopoly of any thing that existed been granted or secured to him?

No. IV.

Eminent Divines believe that the beneficent Creator of all things in his providence, causes every great good to be produced in due time through human agencies. Some are inspired to preach the gospel of everlasting truth; others the principles of the sciences and the useful arts; and others the principles of true and sound policy, Shall one more than the other find excuse, if he bury his talent and neglect his duty? If not, then all should be allowed to labor for the public good, as he feels himself disposed.

How great will the change be for the better, when inventors shall be protected in the exclusive right to their discoveries for 28 instead of 14 years! They will then be able to form associations by selling a part of their patent rights, for aid to mature their discoveries and put their improvements into operation. The public will then begin to receive the benefits of the use before 7 years shall have expired. For the interest of the inventor will be entirely changed: instead of keeping his discovery secret, he will travel, and hire agents to travel, to all parts of the U. States, where his improvement will be beneficial, to instruct the people to make and use it; and he may count on gaining much by selling his licences to use his discovery during his term—for the people will not think of waiting the expiration of his term, rather than to purchase licence, and thus they will be forced into a bargain by which the user of the improvement will gain 20, 50, or perhaps 100 dollars, for one that he shall pay to the inventor for his licence. If 100 purchase licence, then the inventor will have gained as much by the sales, as any one by the use. If 1000 purchase licence, he will have gained 10 times as much as any one of them. If 10,000 purchase his licence, then he will have gained 100 times as much by the sales, as any one by the use of his improvement. If he should become too rich, he is apt to be liberal and patriotic, he may still be a far more useful citizen than if 14 years only had been granted him, and he had never been able to have produced the improvement, and had remained in poverty, branded with the epithet of a whimsical projector, scoffed and insulted because he did not make what he said he had discovered. But if after he has become so rich he should become niggard and miser, (which God forbids) bid for the honor of inventors) yet he will soon die, and his riches may fall into better hands. But putting the inventors out of the question, it appears that the public will gain 100 times as much as the inventors themselves: If so, certainly the public interest requires the patent term to be extended to 28 years, provided no money is to be expended, no right infringed, no injury done, either public or private, no monopoly of any existing thing granted, to obtain so great benefits as to redeem from poverty and distress a useful class of citizens and their families, by simply allowing them the full enjoyment of their own rights and labor for 28 years, only, while every other citizen is protected for ever in the full enjoyment of their rights and labors, to promote the progress of the useful arts with unexampled rapidity, by bringing forth many improvements now lying dormant for want of encouragement, to increase the power and wealth of the nation, at this time engaged in defensive war, and in more need of such aid. For science and art, united with valor, will always be an overmatch for valor alone. Believing as he writes, the writer cannot refrain from hoping and believing that the great change will soon be made. If his zeal is without knowledge, the goodness of the cause will obtain for him the indulgence of his superiors.

Extract of a letter from Isaac Sanford, artist and manufacturer, dated Providence, Rhode Island, Dec. 20, 1813.

Dear Sir—In answer to your enquiries: I resided in England upwards of ten years; during that time had frequent opportunities to examine the steam engines erected on Messrs. Watt and Bolton's plan. I was more attentive to the subject, from a conviction that they were better calculated for driving machinery than water, and being determined to use one on my return.

Soon after my arrival I was agreeably surprised to find by your publication that you had made great improvement on the principle, which gave birth to the order for the engine at Middletown. It is no more than candid to say, that engine performed far to exceed my most sanguine hopes, and continued so during my stay. Your late improvement, the inexhaustible principle, is great. And from what has been done with the engine lately erected for us here, I am convinced that it will not only enable me to warm the adjoining apartments, but at the same time save a considerable part of the fuel. By supplying the boiler with distilled water, they will be much more free from sediment, which cannot be avoided in the old plan. And from experience am convinced our engine will not require more than one and a half cords of wood in 12 hours; and were it on the plan of Messrs. Watt and Bolton, it would take no less than 4 cords. Consequently from the bare difference in the fuel, exclusive of the other advantages, every man will acknowledge with me, that it is better to take your engines at your price, than others at a gift. I deem it a duty I owe to society, candidly to declare my opinion with regard to your improvements. I am doing the public much greater good than yourself, &c.

(Signed) ISAAC SANFORD.

The above extract of a letter from an artist of great experience and ingenuity, certainly merits attention from the public. It is a repetition of the same opinion expressed in his letter dated Middletown, June 16th, 1811; and other gentlemen might be quoted to the same amount.

It has been shewn, that to extend a patent term to reward an inventor for the good he has happened to be able to do, because he has encountered great difficulties in getting his improvement into operation, is a great good and beneficent act. But how much more great, good and beneficent would the act be, to award the protection of government for the double term in the first instance, and remove all those difficulties out of the inventors way. Thus to enable them to do good they can never be able to do without such aid, to shew what they can do, to bring into active operation perhaps, talents of the highest value, that are concealed by poverty, to produce improvements in a ten-fold ratio, perhaps both as to numbers and value. Now, if any person can shew that such a grant would cost the government a single cent more than the time of passing the act, or deprive a single citizen of a single right, it will be acknowledged, so far, a good reason for refusing it. But if no such thing can be shewn, why should we not hope that it will speedily be granted.

NO. VI.

Let us take a view and try to discover what effect a patent term of 28 years, granted in the first instance might have had on the inventions and improvements of a single inventor, who has been so fortunate at last as to escape from the dreary waste, where men seek for new discoveries, where insult, abuse and robbery is tolerated by common law, and the cold north east winds of disappointment, poverty and despair, rage incessantly, leaving behind him his fellow sufferers in too great numbers for him to attempt to relieve. He had discovered before the year 1785 the following improvements, viz: the principles for propelling carriages on turnpike roads, and boats on the western waters, by steam—some improvements in making iron wire for card teeth—a machine for making wire into card teeth at the rate of 3000 in a minute—a machine for pricking the holes in the leather at the rate of 200 pair in 12 hours—a machine for making the teeth, pricking the leather, and setting the teeth of cotton and wool cards at the same time; this was not put in operation but lost, (a machine for the same purpose has since been made and patented by Mr. Whittemore)—improvements in the manufacture of flour by a combination of improved machines; an improvement in rice mills, supposed to be as complete as in the flour mills; a machine for reaping wheat and other grain, by the power of a horse; (and last) a mill to draw wire and make it into card teeth. For he that can invent new things is, we believe, deficient in memory; and when new ideas or conceptions are repelled, as unprofitable and expensive guests, they quickly disappear, perhaps never intrude again on the same person.

The mind of the inventor was always entirely too fertile for his means. When he applied to the millers of his vicinity to contribute to the expence of constructing and maturing his improvements in flour mills, and to share in the use of them when completed; they refused, and no one could be found to pay any thing. Of this he complained to influential gentlemen, who advised him to petition the legislature for exclusive rights—and thus originated his first application to government, before the patent laws or federal government existed. He observed at that time, "that if government would purchase all his inventions, (meaning all that have been named) and sell licences to the people, it would be sufficient to pay the public debt and free the country from taxes." These were his expanded conceptions at that early period, and these are but a part of what he has conceived. At that time he had but faint conceptions of the opposition to the introduction of his improvement, and the insult, abuse, and robbery, he had to meet as soon as the value of his inventions would appear, of the great labor and expence of maturing his improvements, of the tedious law suits he should have to sustain to defend his right, to wear away his patent term before he could begin to realize any profits. Nor the great thirst many could have to be thought the inventor, after the utility of his discoveries should be known—the numerous and false pretensions they would set up, the intrigues and corruptions that would be practiced, to support their claims and defraud him of his rights; the powerful combinations that would be formed by the unjust and hypocritical to calumniate him, the glaring falsehoods that would be propagated to excite the indignation of even the best and most just, most eminent men, against him—until they could be undeceived. Little did he think that 29 years should pass away; instead of 14, before half of his improvements could be commenced, or that they should die with him.

No. VII.—FINANCE.

The following theoretical scheme for raising a revenue and freeing the people of the U. States from taxes, is offered for consideration.

Whereas, it is evident, that man's ideas and inventions are by natural law his own exclusive property, and that the power of the state cannot divest him of them, so long as he chooses to hold his right exclusively.—Therefore, governments have deemed it expedient to offer to all inventors to protect them in the full and exclusive right to the use and benefit of their ideas and inventions for 14 years, on condition that they will disclose them and put them in useful operation, and so describe them, that the public may have the full use of them, at the expiration of the patent term: And that those inventions so described, shall become the property of the public, in which each individual of the community shall hold an equal share, and receive an equal share of the benefits; not common property, to be used by those only whose interest they will alone promote, and that without rendering any compensation for those benefits to the rest of the community, but the property of all, who shall share the benefits equally.

And whereas, long experience has proved, that protection for 14 years only is too short a time. The inventors protest against it, because, say they, we had no part or share in making the contract, it was made ex parte by the government alone. And the time is too short to induce them to disclose their inventions and put them in useful operation, when it would be attended with any considerable labor and expence, none but the imprudent accept the terms, and they have become the objects of the scoff and ridicule of knaves and fools (this they themselves acknowledge) until they succeed in producing something useful and profitable, when they become the objects of their malice, envy, persecution, insult, abuse and robbery. And they have and will by their calumnies, supported by numbers, excited and will excite even the indignation of the most just and best men against the inventors.

The first part of the scheme then is, for the government to extend their protection from 14 to 28 years. This will excite to action prudent inventors, and enable them to obtain the aid of rich men, to put in operation the most expensive and most important inventions and improvements—many which are now lying dormant, though long since discovered, and would produce ten times the number of improvements of ten times the value.

The second part of the scheme is, for the government to take charge of the improvments, at the expiration of the patent terms, and sell licences to those who wish to use them, at such prices as they may be worth annually, and place the proceeds in the treasury, for the benefit of the whole people.

To elucidate this scheme, we will, for instance, take some of the late improvements already in use, and some that are declared to be ready to be put in operation

1. The cotton gin, that has doubled the value of every cotton plantation; and consider what each planter could afford to pay annually, rather than do without it.

2. The improvements in the manufacture of flour; considering what could be paid on each pair of millstones annually.

3. The late improvements on steam engines; and what could be paid for each horse power per annum, which will be applied to mills, forges, and manufactories, &c. of every kind.

4. The improvements on steam boats; considering that there will be thousands of them and what will be paid annually on each

5. Steam waggons; the great number there would be of them, and what would be paid on each annually.

Each of those inventions would produce an immense sum annually, if in the hands of government, who might charge 28 times the price that the patentees can, and would not be charged with extortion, as inventors are. They could demand annually, as much as the inventor dare demand for his whole patent term.

The writer forbears to calculate the vast amount, for the reader would say the man is deranged. The whole truth would not bear to be told in this case; for the Indian who had seen Fitch's steam boat, when he returned to his country, and was relating the many wonders that he had seen, was listened to until he said he had seen a great canoe run up stream by fire and smoke, was knocked down by one of his hearers, who exclaimed, 'I knew that you were lying all the while, but this is too great a lie to be borne with.' There would be no monopoly of any thing that ever had existed by this scheme; the revenue would arise from new stock. And one great advantage would be, he who paid his money into the treasury (without expence to the public to collect it) would do it most cheerfully, expecting to gain 3 or 400 per cent. by it.

Persecution of inventors would entirely cease, for it would become the interest of a great majority of the people to support them in their rights, that their improvements might finally become public property. The sordid and unjust would cease to calumniate inventors, for they could have no hope of getting possession of their property without paying for it by so doing. Inventors, encouraged by the sweet reward of riches and honors, would flourish beyond all former examples, and the government soon become the richest in the world, and the people be forever freed from taxes. And it is certainly neither justice nor good policy that any particular class should receive the whole benefits of any particular invention, when it is the property of the whole people. Why should the cotton planters only be enriched by the cotton gin, or the millers by the improvements in the manufacture of flour? They have not (many of them) used the inventors generously or justly. Congress have the power to devise the means of raising a revenue, and it is to be hoped they will put an end to this species of injustice, by passing a law, that as fast as patents expire, the improvements shall be the property of the United States, and their use be licenced by the government, at the prices they may be worth annually.

To the honorable the Senators, and Representatives in Congress, individually.
The subscriber, in behalf of himself and the patentees in the United States, begs leave to represent to the members of Congress:

That when any man discovers a piece of unlocated land, he is allowed by law to patent it, and on paying the public for their right to the soil, it is secured to him, his heirs and assigns forever—He can sell any part of it to others, to induce them to join with him in improving the same, by building mills, furnaces, forges, bridges, roads, canals, &c. for their own and the public benefit.—But it is evident, that if the exclusive right to the land had been granted for only fourteen years, that he could neither afford to make such improvements, nor could he sell any part of his right to induce others to engage to do it; and the consequence would be, that no prudent person would patent such lands, and no improvements would be made thereon, although it does not cost a man much to discover unlocated land, it being a fixed, existing thing, that can be easily found by any one who will go to it.

But to discover a new principle, or the means of applying a principle to make a new and useful improvement in science or art, oftentimes requires, not only ingenuity, but great labor and exertion, of both body and mind, in a long course of expensive experiments, for it is not an existing fixed thing, but has to be discovered, invented, and in a measure created by the inventor. The public can have no claim to it, or any thing that does not exist as proprietors of the soil. He that creates or produces a thing that never before existed, is by common consent, and the laws of nature, the only proprietor, as no other person can possibly have any claim or right to it. Thus, inventors humbly conceive, that they are entitled to be secured in their rights for more than fourteen years.—Inventors are so few in number that they are never represented in legislation, and cannot defend their rights, but are subject to the rest of the community, who forget to legislate, to protect such property as inventors produce; therefore, the property of the inventor only is left unprotected, and it is common to all, excepting only in such countries where the evil tendency of such policy has been discovered; there the inventor is protected in his rights for limited times; and even this partial justice has been productive of much good. But we have heard no good reason assigned why protection to them should be extended to 14 years only, while all other classes are protected in the exclusive right to the fruits of their labor forever; they cannot, more than others, afford to surrender the fruits of their labors to the public, at the end of fourteen years; nor can they improve their inventions or discoveries, or sell any part of their right to others, to induce them to join with them, to improve or extend their property for their own, or the public benefit.

A protection for fourteen years only, tends to suppress the inventive genius and labors of every prudent and wise man; for he knows that in so short a time, an improvement cannot be introduced against the prejudice and opposition it has to meet,* so as to yield any profit; therefore, discoveries must lay dormant, or be produced at the expence, and to the injury and ruin of the inventor, which is so often the case, that the reader will acknowledge that he would not bear the name of a projector of new things for any consideration, as it would destroy his credit equal to a bankruptcy.

All inventors think themselves capable of carrying on regular business in the beaten track as well as others, and generally have in their latter days to lament that they have labored for the public, subjecting themselves to the frauds and jeers of knaves and wags, to deprivations and poverty, while they have expended labor and exercised talents that would have soon raised them to independence if applied for their private interest. Believing that no further arguments need be used, and that he cannot make the case clearer, it remains with Congress to decide whether this state of things shall continue, and whether the public interest would not be greatly promoted by a further protection to the rights of inventors.

The writer, however, begs leave to declare that he believes that as early as 1786, he himself had conceived and discovered useful improvements, which, if they had been promptly and extensively put into operation, and the savings or gains by the use of them collected into the public treasury, it would have been sufficient to have discharged the public debt, defrayed the expense of government, and freed the people of the United States from taxes. But the most of them have been suppressed by the above stated policy, and are dormant at this day. But he knows that this assertion cannot be credited, for he has heretofore been deemed deranged for asserting much less. He hopes, therefore, that congress will appoint a committee, to ascertain the improvements he has already got into use, as well as those which he has specified in the patent office, and are lying dormant, that they may judge how far the assertion may be true. If it prove true in but one hundredth part, there surely may be ninety nine other inventors in the United States to supply the deficiency and make the case still worthy the attention of congress to pass a supplement to the patent laws, granting patentees, their heirs and assigns, the privilege of renewing their patents for a second term of fourteen years, any time within the last seven years of their first term; for if such supplement should produce improvements operating in the United States, the profits of the use of which will be sufficient to discharge the public debt, and exempt the people of the U. States from further taxation, it would be more than can be devised by any other means. The inventors will not fail on their parts to produce the improvements, and if others can devise the means of collecting the profits thereof into the treasury, the whole would soon be done; if not, the profits will remain somewhere in the United States; wealth is a good source from whence to draw supplies by loans or taxation.

*The greatest opposition is always to be met from those who are to be most benefited from the improvement; that is, from those who are to use it;—they cannot be induced to leave their old track.

If the protection now asked (for all patentees) had been granted to the subscriber when he petitioned the legislatures of Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, in the years 1786—7, and had he found assistance to put his discoveries in full operation, and have drawn one dollar out of every hundred dollars gained by their use, (as he now does from the use of his improvements for the manufacture of flour) he might have been able to have loaned government a large sum at this day; and those who used his improvements to have loaned or paid in taxes ninety nine times as much from the same source. And it would be difficult to ascertain the injury that any person would have sustained from the wealth of either the inventor or the user of his improvements.

If it was right in the legislature of New-York to grant exclusive right to Messrs. Li vingston and Fulton for thirty years, which did produce steam boats in operation in 1807 which had laid dormant twenty one years for want of such protection and aid, after having been invented and put in operation by others; it was an error in the legislature of Pennsylvania, in 1787, to reject my improvements, because they could not understand them, and wrong in the legislature of Maryland in limiting their grant to fourteen years a term too short to enable me to produce them.

If it be an error in an individual to refuse to use a patented machine, which would save him one hundred dollars in any given time, for fear of paying one dollar, or even six dollars out of the hundred, to the inventor, still it may be best to accept of important improvements on the terms that they can be produced. What was wrong or right at one time may be so now.

Great and expensive improvements, although they may be ever so important, cannot be produced without the protection that is asked; less will be thankfully received, but less will not, perhaps, answer the great purpose of stimulating genius to action, by remuneration equal to labors, expenses, and risks.

When we reflect that we ask neither money nor monopoly of any existing thing of congress, that the grant cannot deprive any person of any thing, while it may enable us to produce many new and useful things of the utmost importance and benefit to the community, promising to do much good, without as we believe, a possibility of doing any harm—While we offer to produce things of high value to the public, on condition of their securing to us not more perhaps than one hundredth part of their value, equal to lending money, or its value, at one per cent. for one year, and then forgiving the debt—To serve our country in the way the God of nature has qualified us best to serve it—To enrich our country on the simple condition of its refraining from the use of our property without our consent for a limited time, doing us justice in but a small proportion as done to others—Allowing us to enrich ourselves by our own labors, while we shall enrich our neighbors and our country at the same time—Acknowledging ourselves entirely subject to the rest of the community, a class without protection, excepting for limiting times, without the means of defending our rights—Anxious to do all the good that we conceive ourselves capable of, but sensible that we cannot do it at our own expense, without a prospect, tempted to abandon our natural pursuits, suppress our patriotism and bury our talents, that we may be free and independent, as others are. Under reflections like these, we cannot refrain from hoping that all we ask will be speedily granted. When we shall be able to form associations, obtain the necessary aid, give our minds full scope, with fair prospects, we will soon prove the good policy of extending to us, as to others, the full enjoyment of the fruits of our labors, although it be but for limited times.

We will not be compelled to keep our discoveries and principles of art secret in our own defence; this sordid and execrable principle which we despise will be exploded, forever, as soon as our interest can be promoted by disclosing and publishing them.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient humble servant,

OLIVER EVANS.

Washington, Jan. 7th, 1814.
